The following day Song Jiang arranged his men in five companies in front in charge of ten leaders. On either side was a company in ambush. Qin Ming again rode in advance to challenge the opponent, but no one came out to meet him. Song Jiang was suspicious, and ordered his rearguard to withdraw a little. He then rode to the front to see what happened. All at once a series of rockets was fired in the opposing army, and the infantry in front opened out into two divisions, and the cavalry dashed forth. The infantry on both sides discharged a shower of arrows. Song Jiang signaled for his men also to use their bows and arrows. But this could not resist the opposing troops which still advanced nearer. Now the bandits could not sustain the severe attack, and were soon thrown into confusion. They gave way all along the line, and were soon scattered about. Li Kui and Yang Lin, now led forth the men in ambush and attacked the opposing troops. Song Jiang and a number of men embarked on boats which were waiting in the creeks. When the troops reached the banks they found that their arrows had no effect on these boats which had boards at the sides to protect the men behind. The boats withdrew to a spot where the men disembarked on the opposite bank, but there were not many men there. Of the leaders six had been wounded, and among the men there were a great many casualties. Just then Chao Gai and Wu Yong arrived on the scene, having heard of the disastrous defeat. Song Jiang was very depressed and Wu Yong spoke to him, "Elder brother, do not be sad. In fighting victory or defeat is inevitable. Do not worry too much. We must think of some plan to defeat our enemy." Chao Gai issued orders for the boats to be ready to meet another attack by the opposing troops. He asked Song Jiang to retire to the mountain stronghold, and take rest there. Song Jiang however refused to go, but insisted that the leaders who had been wounded should go there.
General Huyan Zhuo was highly pleased with the victory, and rewarded his men liberally. They had captured about five hundred men and three hundred horses. The matter was duly reported to the capital by special messenger. Marshal Gao Qiu was much pleased to hear of the defeat of the bandits. He duly reported the victory to the Emperor who was pleased and ordered presents and money and wine to be sent to General Huyan Zhuo.
General Huyan Zhuo received the Imperial Edict, and distributed the reward among his men. He promised a further attack on the bandits whom he intended to completely exterminate. He, however, asked the imperial messenger to send a man from the capital, named Ling Zhen, who was expert in making explosives, and could attack a place five //distant. With that man's assistance he could easily crush the bandits. The messenger agreed to take this message, and duly delivered the same to Marshal Gao Qiu, who at once sent for Ling Zhen who was a Yan Ling man, and was the leading expert in ammunition at that time. His nickname was "Roaring Thunder." Marshal Gao Qiu gave him the new appointment, and dispatched him immediately to General Huyan Zhuo. Ling Zhen loaded many carts with ammunition, and taking about forty men he set out for Liangshan Marsh. He duly reported his arrival to General Huyan Zhuo, and discussed the military situation. He had brought three kinds of ordnance: (1) for incendiary bombs; (2) quick-firing explosives; and (3) for shrapnel bombs. Frameworks were erected on the banks of the lake, and the guns placed in position.
Song Jiang and Wu Yong were now discussing the situation, but could not decide on any plan for the defense of their stronghold. A scout, however, reported that "Roaring Thunder" Ling Zhen had arrived from the capital, and was placing guns in position all round the lake.
"That does not matter," said Wu Yong, "because we are surrounded by water, and the banks in places are a good distance away. However many guns they have, the shots will not reach our stronghold. We can abandon the camp at the foot of our hill, and watch how they will attack us."
Song Jiang accordingly issued an order that all men must withdraw to the main stronghold on the mountain.
Chao Gai and Gongsun Sheng, however, asked how they were going to meet the expected attack. While they were talking, they heard the roar of the guns. They saw two of the shots fall in the lake, but the third shot exploded in the camp at the foot of the mountain. Many of the leaders were upset by this new mode of attack.
Wu Yong said, "It would be a good plan if somebody would go and inveigle Ling Zhen to the bank. Once we have captured him we can then easily defeat the enemy."
"We must appoint Li Jun, Zhang Heng, Zhang Shun, and the three brothers Ruan to go by boat, and do this decoy work," said Chao Gai. "Two other leaders Zhu Tong and Lei Heng can assist them on the bank."
These leaders agreed to go, and divided themselves into two parties. One party embarked on two boats with about forty men on each boat, and went into the tall reeds. Li Jun and Zhang Heng on their boat got close to the gun carriage and overturned it. Ling Zhen upon hearing of this led about a thousand soldiers to the spot. Li Jun and Zhang Heng with about a hundred bandits seeing the troops coming retreated along the bank leaving their boats behind. When the soldiers were near, the bandits all dived into the water, and seeing this Ling Zhen ordered his men to embark on the abandoned boats, and cross the lake to attack the bandits. On the other bank were Zhu Tong and Lei Heng, who watching the position sounded their gongs and drums, and upon hearing this the bandits in the water turned, and took off the rudders of the boats so that they could not be steered, and the water also began to leak into the boats. The men in the water now seizing the gunwale of the boats, capsized them. Ling Zhen seeing the position ordered the boat to retire, but just then his boat was also held by the bandits and overturned. Ling Zhen himself was thrown into the water. Ruan, the Second, was in the water, and he seized hold of Ling Zhen and swam with him to the other bank. There Ling Zhen was bound with ropes, and taken to the mountain stronghold as a prisoner. Altogether about two hundred men were taken as prisoners; five hundred were drowned; and three hundred managed to escape back to their base. When General Huyan Zhuo heard of the disaster he rushed many troops to the spot, but all the boats had reached the other bank. He was very much annoyed at this defeat, but led his men back to camp.
Upon receiving the report of the capture of "Roaring Thunder," Ling Zhen, Song Jiang went down the mountain. Upon meeting the prisoner Song Jiang himself took off the binding ropes, and said to the escort, "I told you to invite this General and conduct him to our stronghold. Why have you no decency and treat him like this?"
Ling Zhen saluted, and thanked Song Jiang for his mercy. Song Jiang sent for a beaker of wine, and offered it to the prisoner. When the latter had drunk the wine Song Jiang conducted the prisoner up the mountain road. Upon reaching the stronghold Ling Zhen saw Peng Qi acting as a leader of the brigands, and could not say a single word.
"The two leaders here, Song Jiang and Chao Gai," said Peng Qi, "are agents sent from Heaven. They have collected heroes from all parts, and are now waiting for the Imperial Edict to exempt them from punishment, when they will be quite ready to devote themselves to the service of the country. As I am here I now obey the orders of the leaders."

Song Jiang courteously apologized to Ling Zhen, and invited him to join them.
"It makes no difference to me," said Ling Zhen, "that I stay here but my wife and family will be in danger when it is known that I have joined you."
"Don't worry about that," said Song Jiang; "I will arrange to have them all brought here for safety."
Ling Zhen expressed his thanks and said, "If you help me in that way, I'll die with a peaceful heart."
Chao Gai invited Ling Zhen to a feast. At the feast, there was a general discussion as to future military operations, and Tang Long said, "I've a proposal to make: a plan to seize a monster, complete in all its detail."

The Professor Wu Yong Sends the Flea Shi Qian to Steal some Armour & he Steals; Spots Tang Long inveigles & Lures the Spearsman Xu Ning up the Mountain

"My ancestors have always been armorers," Tang Long said to the chieftains. "Because of this skill my father was raised by Border Area Governor Old General Zhong to be head of the Yanan garrison. The linked cavalry method won victories for the previous emperor. The only way you can beat it is with barbed lances. I have a drawing of such a lance, passed down to me by my family, which can serve as a likeness. I can make one for you, but I don't know how to use it. Only my cousin, a drill instructor, knows. The art has been handed down from generation to generation. They never teach it to any outsider. My cousin can ply the lance ahorse or on foot. When he goes into action, he's like nothing human."
"You don't mean Xu Ning, Drill Instructor of the Metal Lancers?" Lin Chong interrupted.
"The very man."
"I'd forgotten until you mentioned him. His skill with metal and barbed lances is indeed unique. We met many times when I was in the capital and tested our military arts against one another. We developed a deep mutual respect and affection. But how can you get him to come up here?"
"Xu Ning has a matchless ancestral treasure. It protects his family from evil spirits. I often saw it when I went with my father to visit Xu Ning's mother in the Eastern Capital. It's a suit of goose-feather armor hooped in metal. Known as 'lion's fur,' it's light and snug-fitting, and no blade or arrow can pierce it. Many high officials have begged to see it, but Xu Ning always refuses. He cherishes it like his life. He keeps it in a leather box which he hangs on the central beam of his bedroom. If we can get hold of that armor, he'll have to come whether he wants to or not."
"No problem at all," said Wu Yong. "We'll ask our talented brother Shi Qian, Flea on a Drum, to attend to it."
"If it's there, I'll get it, by hook or crook," Shi Qian avowed.
"Do that, and I guarantee to bring Xu Ning up the mountain," said Tang Long.
"How?" Song Jiang demanded.
Tang Long leaned close and whispered in his ear. Song Jiang laughed. "Very shrewd."
"You'll need three men to go with you to the Eastern Capital," Wu Yong said. "One to buy the gunpowder and other ingredients for the cannons, and two to fetch Commander Ling Zhen's family."
Peng Qi rose and said: "If someone could go to Yingzhou and fetch my family as well, I would consider it a blessing."
"Have no fears, Commander," said Song Jiang. "Write notes, both of you, please. I'll have people see to it." And he directed: "Yang Lin, take some money and the letter, and go with men to Yingzhou and bring Commander Peng Qi's family. Xue Yong go to the Eastern Capital in the guise of a medicine pedlar who gives exhibitions of weapons skill and fetch the family of Commander Ling Zhen. Li Yun dress as a merchant and buy the gunpowder and other ingredients. Yue Ho and Tang Long accompany Xue Yong."
After Shi Qian went off down the mountain, Song Jiang had Tang Long make a sample barbed lance, under the supervision of Lei Heng who came from a family of blacksmiths. Once this was done, he directed the stronghold's armorers, with Lei Heng in charge, to copy the model in large numbers. Of this we'll say no more.
A send-off feast was laid for Yang Lin, Xue Yong, Li Yun, Yue Ho and Tang Long, and they went down the mountain. The next day Dai Zong also departed to inquire carefully into the situation. It would be hard to tell all the details in a few words.
Shi Qian concealed on his person certain tools and implements as he left Liangshan Marsh. He followed a winding road until he reached the capital. He spent the night at an inn and the next day quietly entered the city. He inquired where he might find Drill Instructor Xu Ning.
"Go through the gate of the battalion compound," a man instructed, pointing. "He lives in the fifth house. It has a black gate in the corner of the wall."
Flea on a Drum entered the compound and looked first at Xu Ning's front gate, then walked around and examined the rear. The house and courtyard were enclosed in a high wall, but he could see a cute two-storey building, and beside it a tall decorated pole. He studied the layout a while, then called at the house of a neighbor.
"Do you know whether Drill Instructor Xu is at home?"
"He doesn't get back till evening. He leaves again at the fifth watch for guard duty in the palace."
Shi Qian thanked the man politely and returned to the inn. He got his tools and hid them on his person.
"I'm going out and probably won't be back tonight," he said to the attendant. "Look after the things in my room."
"No need to worry. This is the imperial city. We don't have any thieves around here," the attendant replied.
Shi Qian went into the city, had some dinner, then quietly approached the home of Xu Ning in the compound of the Metal Lancers Battalion. He looked around but couldn't find any suitable place to hide. Night was falling, and he took up a position inside the compound gateway. Soon it was dark. There was no moon in the winter sky.
He noted a big poplar behind an Earth God Temple. He shinnied up, sat astride a limb, and watched silently. Xu Ning returned and went into his house. Two people with lanterns closed and locked the compound gate, then went back to their homes. In a drum tower the beat of the first watch sounded. Through the chill overcast the stars appeared lustreless. Dew turned to frost. All was still.
Shi Qian slid down from his tree, stole to Xu Ning's rear gate, and effortlessly scaled the courtyard wall. He crossed a small garden to the kitchen and peered in. Two serving girls were still cleaning up in the light of a lamp. Up the decorative pole he went, and over to the upcurved eave of a corner of the roof. Lying in this concealment, he looked into the window of the upper storey. Xu Ning and his wife were seated beside a stove. The woman held a child of six or seven in her arms.
It was their bedroom. Sure enough, there was a big leather box tied to the beam. Near the door hung a bow and arrows and a dagger. On a clothes rack were garments of various colors.
"Plum Fragrance," Xu Ning called, "fold these clothes for me."
One of the serving girls came up the stairs. On a long sideboard table she folded a purple embroidered robe, an official tunic with a green lining trimmed at the bottom by multi-hued embroidered flounces, a colored silk neckerchief, a red and green belt sash, and several handkerchiefs. These, plus a yellow kerchief packet containing a golden sash decorated with a lichee design and from which two otter tails dangled, were all wrapped in a cloth and placed to warm on a fender above the stove. Shi Qian's eyes didn't miss a thing.
Some time after the second watch Xu Ning went to bed.
"Are you on duty tomorrow?" the wife asked.
"The emperor is going to the Auspicious Dragon Hall. I must get up early and go at the fifth watch to attend him."
The wife said to Plum Fragrance: "Your master is on guard duty tomorrow at the fifth watch. You girls get up at the fourth, heat water and prepare something to eat."
"Obviously, that leather box on the beam has the armor in it," thought Shi Qian. "It would be best if I could take it during the night. But I must do it without alarming them, or tomorrow I'll never get out of the city, and that would ruin our whole operation. I'll wait till the fifth watch. There'll be time enough."
When both husband and wife were in bed, the two serving girls lay down on pallets outside the bedroom door. A night lamp had been lit upon the table. Soon the four were asleep. The girls had worked hard all day, and were exhausted. They snored lustily.
Flea on a Drum crept over, produced a long hollow reed, poked it through a hole in the window, and puffed. The lamp went out.
Around the fourth watch Xu Ning rose and called to the girls to fetch hot water. Awakening, they noticed that the lamp was extinguished.
"Aiya!" they exclaimed. "You've got no light."
"Go to the back and get another one. What are you waiting for?"
Plum Fragrance and the other girl opened the door at the head of the stairs and went down. As soon as he heard the stairs creak, Flea on a Drum slid down the pole and hid in the darkness beside the rear door. The girls opened this, came out and went to open the gate in the courtyard wall. Shi Qian darted into the kitchen and hid under the table. Plum Fragrance returned with a lighted lamp, closed the door and started the stove. The other girl went upstairs with a burning charcoal brazier. Before long, the water was boiling, and Plum Fragrance took that up, too.
Xu Ning washed, rinsed his mouth, and called for some heated wine. The girls laid out meat and buns. When Xu Ning finished, he instructed them to feed his orderly who was waiting outside. Shi Qian heard him descend the stairs and tell his orderly to eat. Then Xu Ning shouldered his pack, took his metal lance and came out. The girls lit a lantern and saw him to the gate.
Flea on a Drum emerged from beneath the table, mounted the stairs, climbed the lattice wall to the beam and crouched upon it. After closing the house door, the girls blew out the lantern, came up the stairs, undressed, and threw themselves down on their pallets.
When he was sure they were asleep, Shi Qian on the beam extended his long reed and again puffed out the lamp. Softly, he untied the leather box. He was about to come down when the wife, hearing a noise, awakened.
"What's that sound up on the beam?" she called to Plum Fragrance.
Shi Qian promptly squeaked like a rat.
"Can't you hear, mistress?" said the girl. "Those are rats, fighting."
Shi Qian emitted a series of squeaks like a whole battle, slipped down, stealthily opened the door at the head of the stairs, agilely swung the box to his back, went down the stairs, opened the house door, and stepped out. The various guards were departing, and the battalion compound gate was open, it having been unlocked at the fourth watch. He mingled with the crowd and left swiftly, not stopping until he reached his inn outside the city.
It was still not yet light. He knocked on the door and went to his room to get his luggage. He tied this and the box to a carrying pole, paid his bill, left the inn and headed east. Only after covering more than forty li did he stop at an eating house and make himself some food.
Suddenly a man came in. Shi Qian looked up. It was none other than Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller. Dai observed that Shi Qian had got what he had gone for. The two conversed in low tones.
"I'll take the armor to our mountain fortress," Dai Zong said. "You follow slowly with Tang Long."
Shi Qian opened the leather box, took out the metal-bound goose feather armor and wrapped it in a bundle, which Dai Zong tied to his body. The Marvellous Traveller left the inn, performed his magic rites, and sped off to Liangshan Marsh.
Shi Qian tied the empty leather box openly to one end of his carrying pole. He finished eating, paid the bill, shouldered the pole, and set out. When he had gone about twenty li he met Tang Long. They went into a tavern to confer.
"I want you to follow me along this road," Tang Long said. "Whenever you see a tavern, eating house or inn with a white chalk circle on the door you can go in and buy meat and wine. At those inns you can rest. Put the leather box where everyone can see it. Wait for me one stage from here."
Tang Long slowly drank his wine, then proceeded to the Eastern Capital.

In Xu Ning's house, the two serving girls rose at daybreak. They observed that not only was the door at the head of the stairs open, but the inner door and house door below as well. They made a hasty check. Nothing seemed to be missing. They went upstairs and reported to their mistress.
"We can't understand it. All the doors are open, but nothing is gone."
"At the fifth watch, I heard a noise on the beam. You said it was rats, fighting. Better take a look and see whether that leather box is all right."
The girls did so, and screamed. "It's disappeared!"
Hurriedly, the wife got out of bed. "Ask someone to go to the Auspicious Dragon Hall at once and notify the master. Tell him to come home as soon as possible."
Plum Fragrance and her companion hastily sent three or four men, one after another, with the message, but all returned with the same reply: "The Metal Lancers have accompanied the emperor to the Inner Palace Gardens. The Gardens are surrounded by his personal guard. Nobody can get in. You'll just have to wait for Xu Ning to come home."
The wife and girls were like ants on a hot griddle. But there was nothing they could do. They fluttered about anxiously, unable to eat or drink.
Only at dusk did Xu Ning remove his official robe. He gave it to his orderly. Carrying his metal lance, Xu slowly returned. At the gateway of the battalion compound, a neighbor spoke to him.
"Your house has been robbed! Your wife has been waiting for you all day!"
Startled, Xu Ning hurried home. The serving girls met him at the door.
"The thief must have slipped in when you left at the fifth watch," they said. "All he took was that leather box on the beam."
Cries of anguish burst through Xu Ning's lips from the depths of his vitals.
"Who knows when that thief crept into our room," exclaimed his wife.
"Anything else wouldn't have mattered," said Xu Ning. "But that goose feather armor has been a family heirloom for four generations! It's never been lost. Marshal Wang the dilettante offered me thirty thousand strings of cash, but I hadn't the heart to sell it. I thought I might need it in battle again. Because I was afraid that something might happen to it, I tied it on the beam. Many people asked to see it, but I said it was gone. If I raise a hue and cry about it, they'll surely laugh at me. Now it really is gone. What can I do?"
That night he couldn't sleep. "Who could have stolen it?" he wondered. "It must have been someone who knew I had the armor."
His wife thought a while and said: "The thief must have already been in the house when the lamp went out. Someone who became enamored of it and tried to buy it from you probably sent a high-class housebreaker to steal it when you wouldn't sell. Get people to ask around quietly and find out where it is. Then we'll decide what to do. Don't 'disturb the grass and alert the snake.' "
Xu Ning listened in silence. He rose the next morning at dawn and sat brooding in the house.
At breakfast time, there was a knock at the courtyard gate. The orderly went to see who it was. He returned and announced: "Tang Long, son of the head of the Yanan garrison, is calling to pay his respects."
Xu Ning directed that he be invited in. On seeing Xu Ning, Tang Long kowtowed.
"I trust all has been well with you, cousin," he said.
"I heard my uncle had returned to Heaven," Xu Ning replied. "I was tied down by official duties and your home is far away, so I never went to offer my condolences. I haven't had any news of you, either, cousin. Where have you been? What brings you here?"
"It's a long story. I've had bad luck since my father died, and wandered to many places. Today, I've come directly from Shandong to the capital to see you."
"Cousin, stay a while," said Xu Ning. He ordered that wine and food be brought for his guest.
Tang Long took from his pack two, long thin gold bars like scallion leaves, weighing twenty ounces, and presented them to Xu Ning.
"Before he died, my father asked me to give you these as a remembrance. There wasn't anybody I could trust to deliver them, so I've come today to hand them to you myself."
"How very kind of uncle to think of me. I've done absolutely nothing to show my esteem. I'll never be able to express my gratitude."
"Don't talk like that, cousin. Father was a great admirer of your skill with arms. He was sorry we lived so far apart and couldn't see each other. That's why he's left you these momentous."
Xu Ning thanked Tang Long and accepted the gold bars. He had wine served and entertained him. But his brows were knit and he looked glum all the while they were drinking.
Finally, Tang Long rose and said: "You don't seem very happy, cousin. Is something troubling you?"
Xu Ning sighed. "Of course you don't know. It's a long story. Last night we were robbed."
"Did you lose much?"
"Only the goose-feather metal-hooped armor known as 'lion's fur,' left to me by my ancestors. But it's a remarkable suit, and last night it was taken. I'm very upset."
"I've seen that armor. It really is beyond compare. My late father often praised it to the skies. Where were you keeping it?"
"In a leather box tied to the main beam in the bedroom. I can't imagine when the thief slipped in and got away with it."
"What's the leather box like?"
"It's of red sheepskin, and the armor inside is wrapped in fragrant silk quilting."
"A red sheepskin box?" Tang Long appeared startled. "Does it have cloud head sceptres stitched in white thread on the surface, with a lion playing with an embroidered ball in the middle?"
"Cousin, where have you seen it?"
"Last night I was drinking wine in a village tavern about forty li from the city. I saw a sharp-eyed thin swarthy fellow carrying it on a shoulder pole. I wondered what was in it. As I was leaving the tavern I asked him: 'What's that box for?' He said: 'Originally it held armor. But now it's only got a few garments.' That must be your man. He evidently has hurt his leg, because he walks with a limp. Why don't we go after him and catch him?"
"If we can do that, it will be a blessing from Heaven!"

"Let's not delay then. We'll go at once."
Xu Ning quickly changed into hemp sandals, fastened his dagger, took his halberd, and left the city with Tang Long through the east gate. They strode swiftly along the winding road. Ahead they saw a tavern with a white circle on its wall.
"Let's have a bowl of wine," Tang Long suggested. "We can inquire here."
They went in and sat down. Tang Long asked the host: "Has a sharp-eyed dark thin fellow carrying a red sheepskin box passed this way?"
"There was a man like that last night. He seemed to have a bad leg, and was limping."
"Did you hear that, cousin?" Tang Long exclaimed.
Xu Ning was beyond speech. The two paid for their wine and hurried through the door. Further on, they came to an inn. A white circle marked its wall. Tang Long halted. "I can't go another step," he said. "Why not spend the night here, and continue the chase early tomorrow morning?"
"I have official duties. If I'm not there for roll call I'll surely be reprimanded. What can I do?"
"You needn't worry about that, cousin. Your wife will explain, of course."
At the inn that night they again made inquiries. The attendant told them: "Last night a thin swarthy fellow put up here. He slept late and didn't leave till mid-morning. He asked about the road to Shandong."
"That means we can catch him," said Tang Long.
The two men rested at the inn and departed before dawn, continuing along the winding road. Whenever they saw a white chalk circle on a wall, Tang Long called a halt for food and wine, and to ask the way. At each place they were told the same thing. Xu Ning was anxious to retrieve his armor, and he hastened along with Tang Long.
As daylight again began to wane, they saw ahead an ancient temple. In front of it, Shi Qian had rested his load and was sitting under a tree.
"Good," exclaimed Tang Long. "There, cousin, beneath that tree, isn't that your red sheepskin box?"
Xu Ning looked, then rushed forward and seized Shi Qian. "Impudent scoundrel," he roared. "How dare you steal my armor!"
"Stop, stop. Quit your yelling. Yes, I took your armor. What are you going to do about it?"
"Vulgar beast! You have the nerve to ask me that!"
"See if there's any armor in that box."
Tang Long opened the container. It was empty.
"What have you done with my armor, rogue?" Xu Ning demanded.
"Now listen to me. My name is Zhang. I'm an eldest son and I come from Tai'an Prefecture. A wealthy man in our prefecture knows Old General Zhong of the Border Garrison and learned from him about your goose feather armor and that you don't want to sell. So he hired me and another man called Li the Third to steal it. He's paying us ten thousand strings of cash. When I jumped from that pole in your yard I sprained my leg and I can't walk fast. So I've let Li go on ahead with the armor and have kept only the box. If you pressure me and take me before the court, I won't say a word even if I'm beaten to death. But if you forgive me, I'll go with you and get it back."
Xu Ning hesitated for several moments, unable to decide.
"There's no danger of him flying away, cousin," said Tang Long. "Let's go with him and recover your armor. If he doesn't produce it, you can always state your case to the local magistrate."
"That's quite true, cousin," Xu Ning agreed.
The three men continued along the road and spent the night at an inn. Xu Ning and Tang Long kept an eye on Shi Qian. But Flea on a Drum had bandaged one leg as if it were sprained, and Xu Ning, thinking he couldn't walk very fast, wasn't especially watchful. The following morning they rose and went on. Shi Qian frequently bought them food and drink, by way of apology. They travelled all day.
The next morning Xu Ning was growing increasingly anxious. Was Shi Qian really leading them to the armor? During their march they came upon three or four horses hitched to an empty cart by the side of the road. Behind it stood the driver. A merchant stood to one side. When he saw Tang Long, he dropped to his knees and kowtowed.
"What are you doing here, brother?" Tang Long queried.
"I had some business in Zhengzhou," the merchant replied. "I'm on my way back to Tai'an."
"Excellent. We three would like a ride. We're going to Tai'an, too."
"I wouldn't mind even if there were more of you, to say nothing of only three."
Very pleased, Tang Long brought him over to Xu Ning.
"Who is this?" Xu Ning asked.
"I met him last year when I went to a temple in Tai'an to burn incense. His name is Li Rong and he's a righteous man."
"Since Zhang can hardly walk, I suppose we'd better ride." Xu Ning told the driver to start, and the four men got in the cart.
"Tell me the name of your rich patron," Xu Ning demanded of Shi Qian.
Flea on a Drum stalled for a few minutes, then said: "He's called Lord Guo."
"Do you have a Lord Guo in Tai'an?" Xu Ning asked Li Rong.
"Yes. He's a very wealthy man who hobnobs with big officials," Li Rong replied. "He supports a whole bevy of hangers-on."
Xu Ning said to himself: "Since there is such a person, I needn't be suspicious."
Li Rong chatted about play with weapons, and sang a few songs. The day passed quickly and pleasantly.
Soon they were only little more than two stages from Liangshan Marsh. Li Rong had the driver take the gourd and buy some wine and meat for his three passengers. Li filled a ladle and offered it to Xu Ning, who drained it at one go. Li called for more. The driver, pretending that his hand slipped, let the gourd drop, spilling its contents on the ground. Li shouted at him and ordered him to buy more wine.
Suddenly, Xu Ning began to drool from the corners of his mouth, and fell headlong in the cart. Who was Li Rong? Actually, he was Yue Ho the Iron Throat. He and the other two jumped down and hurried the horses on. They went directly to the tavern of Zhu Gui, the Dry-Land Crocodile, where they all carried Xu Ning to a boat and ferried him across to the Shore of Golden Sands. Song Jiang had already been informed, and had come down the mountain and was waiting with the other leaders.
Xu Ning by then awakened from the drug, and he was given an antidote. When he opened his eyes and saw the men standing around him, he was astonished.
"Cousin," he said to Tang Long, "why have you duped me into coming here?"
"Listen to me, cousin," said Tang Long. "I had heard that Song Jiang accepted bold men from all over. And so in Wugang Town I pledged myself a blood brother to Li Kui the Black Whirlwind and joined the forces in the stronghold. Now Huyan Zhuo is using linked cavalry against us on the battlefield and he's got us stymied. I proposed barbed lances, but you're the only one who knows how to wield them. So I came up with this scheme."
"Cousin, you've ruined me!"
Song Jiang advanced, wine cup in hand, and said apologetically: "I'm here in this marsh only temporarily, just waiting for an imperial amnesty so that I can repay our country with my utmost loyalty and strength. I'm not covetous, I don't like killing, and I never perform unrighteous or un-chivalrous deeds. I devoutly hope you will sympathize with me, Inspector, and join me in acting in Heaven's behalf."
Lin Chong also sought to mollify him. Cup in hand, he said: "I'm here, too, brother. Please don't refuse."
"You duped me into coming." Xu Ning said to Tang Long. "The authorities are sure to arrest my wife. What can I do?"
"Don't let that worry you, Inspector," said Song Jiang. "I personally guarantee her safety. In a few days you will be reunited."
Chao Gai, Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng all apologized to Xu Ning, and a feast was laid in his honor. The most agile of the young brigands were selected to learn the use of the barbed lance. Dai Zong and Tang Long were dispatched to the Eastern Capital at all possible speed to fetch Xu Ning's family.
Within ten days Yang Lin brought Peng Qi's family from Yinzhou, Xue Yong brought Ling Zhen's family from the Eastern Capital, and Li Yun returned with five cartloads of gunpowder and explosives. A few days later Dai Zong and Tang Long led Xu Ning's family up the mountain. Amazed, Xu Ning asked how they had come.
"After you left and were unable to report for roll call, I dispensed a little money and jewelry as bribes," his wife related, "and said that you were sick in bed. So there wasn't any fuss. Then suddenly cousin Tang Long arrived with the goose feather armor. 'We got it back,' he said, 'but cousin fell ill on the road, and he's lying in an inn at death's door. He wants to see you and the children.' I believed him, and we got into the cart. I don't know where we went, but we twisted and turned and ended up here."
"Everything else is fine," Xu Ning said to Tang Long. "It's just too bad my armor had to be left at home."
Tang Long laughed. "You'll be glad to hear, cousin that after sister got in the cart, I went back into the house and got it. I also inveigled your serving girls into wrapping up all your valuables. I put them and your armor on a carrying pole and brought the whole lot."
"It looks as though we'll never be able to return to the Eastern Capital."
"There's one more thing I must tell you. We ran into a party of merchants on the way. I dressed in your armor and smeared my face. Using your name, I robbed them. By now the Eastern Capital must have sent out notices for your arrest."
"You've harmed me grievously, cousin!"
Chao Gai and Song Jiang offered words of apology. "If we hadn't done that, Inspector, would you have been willing to remain with us?"
They allotted a house to Xu Ning and his family. The leaders met to discuss how to deal with the linked cavalry of the enemy. By then the barbed lances manufactured under the supervision of Lei Heng were ready. Song Jiang and Wu Yong requested Xu Ning to teach their men how to use them. "I'll gladly reveal all my secrets. I'll train your junior officers," said Xu Ning. "Let me have the most stalwart." In Fraternity Hall, the leaders watched Xu Ning select men to learn the use of the barbed lance. And as a result, a force of 3000 armoured horses was smashed, and a hero was taken within a designated time.

Now Spots addressed the assembly of leaders as follows: "I was born into a family of weapons makers. On account of this expertise, my father came to serve under His Excellency the Old Field Marshal and was made garrison commander at Yan'an. This system of linked cavalry was used already by the last dynasty to achieve victory. The only way to break it is to use a special hooked spear. Our family inherited drawings of this and if you wanted me to make one I could set my hand to it. But even though I can make you one, I don't know how to use it. If you want someone who can use it, this cousin of mine is the man you need. He is the only person who holds the secret of using these hooked spears: it's a secret art his family have inherited and they won't teach it to any outsider. On horseback or on foot, there's a special way to do it, it's really amazing!"
When he finished, Leopard's Head asked: "Are you by any chance speaking of Xu Ning, instructor of the imperial armoury, known as the Spearman?"
"That's exactly who I mean," said Spots.
"I'm glad you mentioned him. I had forgotten," said Leopard's Head. "This 'hooked spear' method of the Spearman's is quite unique. We saw a lot of each other when I was in the capital, we used to compare fighting techniques. There was a great deal of mutual respect and friendship between us. The only thing is, how can we get him to join us?"
"The Spearman's forebears left him one very important heirloom," Spots continued. "There's nothing else like it in the world. It provides absolute protection. In the days when my father was garrison commander and went to the capital to visit his aunt I often saw it. It is a suit of armour made of wild goose quills bound with metal strips. When you wear it, it is both light and strong, no sword or arrow can pierce it. People have called it the Lion's Pelt. Many a nobleman has asked to have a look at it, but the Spearman has never been keen to let people see it. This armour is as dear to him as his life. He stores it in a leather case which he hangs from a beam in his bedroom. If we can first get our hands on this armour of his, he'll have no choice but to come to us here."
The Professor said: "In that case, there shouldn't be any problem, seeing that we have a very light-fingered gentleman among us. We'll send the Flea off to get it."
"My only fear is that the armour might not really exist," said the Flea. "If it does, you can be sure I won't come back without it."
"If you can steal the armour, I undertake to get its owner here," said Spots.
"How are you going to do that?" Song Jiang asked.
Spots went up close and whispered something in Song Jiang's ear. Song Jiang laughed and said: "That's brilliant!"
The Professor said: "We want three more people to go to the capital with them. One must go to buy smoke-bombs, gunpowder and other supplies needed for the guns. The other two are needed to fetch Thunderer's family."
When he heard this, the Supremo stood up and said: "If someone could be sent to Yingzhou to fetch my family, I should be truly grateful."
"Don't worry, commander," said Song Jiang. "Just write out a letter, each of you, and I shall tell someone to do it."
Panther was now told to take some money and the appropriate letter and go with a small company to Yingzhou and fetch the Supremo's family. The Pill Monger was to disguise himself as a mountebank and go to the capital to fetch Thunderer's family. Green-Eyes dressed as a merchant was to go to the capital to buy gunpowder and other supplies. Lungs would accompany Spots and the Pill Monger would travel with them.
The Flea was sent off first. This done, Spots was asked to prepare a model of the hooked spear. Sergeant Lei would oversee its production, since Sergeant Lei's family had been blacksmiths. Spots produced the example of a hooked spear and showed those in the camp responsible for arms production how to make spears according to the pattern, under the supervision of Sergeant Lei. Of this no more.
A big send-off party was held in the main stronghold, and then Panther, the Pill Monger, Green-Eyes, Lungs and Spots bade farewell and left. The following day the Magic Messenger was also sent down the mountain to keep an eye on things.
It now becomes difficult to tell everything at once.
Let us follow then the Flea, who after leaving Mount Liang, collected all the necessary tools and equipment and secretly, carefully disguised, made his way by a roundabout route to the capital, where he found himself an inn for the night. Next day he strolled into the city and started asking for the address of imperial armourer Xu Ning.
Someone gave him directions: "Go into the government quarters and it's the fifth house on the east side, the one with a black door."
Having entered the compound and located the front door of the house, the Flea strolled round to the back. There was a high wall, and above it two small watch-towers. To one side stood an ornamental column. The Flea inspected this for a while. Then he went back to the street and asked someone: "Is Instructor Xu at home?"
"Most likely he's at work and hasn't come back yet," they replied.
"Do you know when he will return?" the Flea asked.
"Not till evening," they replied. "He goes out early in the morning and works in the palace."
The Flea apologized for troubling the man and went back to his inn. He got his tools and concealed them on his person. Then he said to the waiter: "I probably won't be back tonight."
"Don't you worry," said the waiter. "There won't be any problem."
The Flea entered the city again and got something to eat for his dinner. Then he strolled over to the Spearman's house in the imperial armoury. He looked around but couldn't find anywhere to hide. It was already dark, however, so he slipped inside the compound. It was a cold winter's night and there was no moon. Behind an earthen shrine there was a tall cypress tree. Gripping the trunk with his legs he shinned up it and sat astride a branch at the top. He watched quietly and saw the Spearman return and enter the house. He also saw two men with lanterns enter and close the gate of the compound, drawing the bolt across, before retiring each to his own house.
Soon the drum sounded the hour in the watch-tower. It was cold and overcast and no stars were visible. The dew gradually turned to frost. When all was quiet in the compound, the Flea slipped down to the ground and stole across to the Spearman's back door. He climbed over the wall effortlessly and crept inside. He was in a small garden. He paused outside the kitchen and watched. There was a light on in the kitchen and two maids were still clearing up. By scaling the column he was able to reach the eaves. Here he paused to observe for a while. Looking at the upper floor he saw the Spearman and his wife sitting beside the stove, facing the fire. She was holding a small child, about six or seven years old. He looked at the bedroom. As expected, there was a big leather case tied to a beam. A bow and arrows and a sword were hanging by the door. In the wardrobe hung brightly coloured clothing. At this moment the Spearman called out:
"Peachblossom, come and fold up my clothes!"
A maid came up the stairs and on a small side table proceeded to fold up a robe with purple embroidery and round collar, then another lined with imperial green and with embroidered parted skirts, followed by a brocade kerchief of many colours, a red and green knotted sash, and a handkerchief. She also used a small yellow handkerchief to wrap up a lichee-coloured gold belt with otter tails and put it in the bundle which she placed on the rack near the stove. All this the Flea carefully noted.
Shortly after nine o'clock the Spearman got ready for bed. His wife asked: "Are you on duty tomorrow?"
"Tomorrow is the day the Emperor visits the Dragon Hall. I have to be there before dawn to wait for him."
The wife said to the maid: "The master has to be up before dawn tomorrow and go out to work. You'd better get up at three to warm the water for him and prepare some dim sum for breakfast."
"Obviously that leather case hanging from the beam is the famous armour," the Flea reasoned to himself. "It'll be good if I can get my hands on it during the night. But if I cause any disturbance I won't be able to get out of the city tomorrow and the whole business is likely to fail.... I'd better wait till early morning, that'll be the time to get to work."

The Spearman and his wife went to sleep, while the two maids made up their beds outside the room. A night light was left burning on the table inside.
The five people were sleeping. The two skivvies, having spent the whole day serving till evening, were exhausted and fell fast asleep. The Flea came down from his perch and took out a reed which he poked through a hole in the window and with one puff blew out the night light.
In the early hours the Spearman rose and told the maids to get up and warm his water. When the two girls roused themselves from their dreams they found the light had gone out in the room.
"Oh dear, the light's gone out!" they exclaimed.
The Spearman said: "Then go and ask for a light next door, what are you waiting for?"
The Flea heard them open the door and grope their way down the stairs. He slid down the column and went to wait in a dark place near the back door. When he heard them open the back door, go out, and open the gate in the wall he slipped into the kitchen and squeezed under the kitchen table. The maids returned with the light someone had given them, closed the door and went to light the fire in the stove. They then went to light the charcoal fire upstairs. When the water started to boil they took it upstairs. After washing and rinsing his mouth, the Spearman asked them to warm some wine and bring it up. They prepared food and cakes and took them up. The Spearman ate and then asked them to take food to his orderly who was waiting outside. The Flea heard the Spearman come downstairs and tell his orderly to eat. Then he picked up his bundle, took his steel spear and went out of the door. When the two maids lit a lantern and went out to see him off, the Flea emerged from his hiding-place under the table and went upstairs. By means of the partition he clambered up into the rafters and crouched there. The two maids shut and bolted the door, blew out the light, and went upstairs and undressed. Then they threw themselves down and slept.
As soon as they were asleep the Flea took out his reed again and blew out the upstairs light. He gently lifted the leather case down from its beam. He was about to go downstairs when the Spearman's wife woke up and hearing a noise called out to the maids: "What's that noise in the rafters?"
The Flea made a noise like a rat. One of the maids said: "It's a rat, can't you hear madam? That's the noise they make when they're fighting."
The Flea again imitated the sound of rats fighting. Then he lowered himself down, opened the landing door, very slowly raised the leather case and put it on his back, felt his way down the stairs, and opened the back door. By the time he reached the gate of the compound, the patrol were already out and about. They had unlocked the main gate before dawn. Firmly grasping the leather case, the Flea attached himself to a group of people and took advantage of the general hubbub to slip out of the city unnoticed and return to his inn. It was still dark when he knocked on the inn door. He went to the room and got his luggage. He made up a bundle for the carrying-pole. He paid the bill, left the inn and set off on the road east.
When he stopped at an inn about ten miles out of the city to have some breakfast, he ran into someone he knew. This was none other than the Magic Messenger. When he saw that the Flea had the goods, there was a muttered discussion and then the Magic Messenger said: "I'm going to take the armour back to the camp, you follow on slowly with Spots."
The Flea opened the leather case and took out the precious armour. They rolled it up and made a bundle of it. The Magic Messenger tied it on securely. As soon as he left the inn he started his magic walking and returned to Mount Liang.
The Flea now fastened the empty case on his carrying-pole, in such a way that it was clearly visible. He breakfasted, paid, picked up his pole and left. After six or seven miles he encountered Spots. The two of them went to an inn to talk.
Spots said: "Just do as I say and continue along this road. When you come to an inn or eating place or rest house, look to see if there is a white circle painted with flour. If there is, go in and buy wine or food. If it's a rest house, stop there for the night. Put the case where it can be clearly seen. After a day's travel from here wait for me."
The Flea went off to carry out this plan. Spots calmly had another drink and then set off in the direction of the capital.
It was daylight now, back at the Spearman's house. When the two maids got up they found the door to the upstairs landing open, and the downstairs door and the front door also unlocked. They looked around the house anxiously but everything seemed to be in its place. They ran upstairs and told their mistress: "Somehow the doors are all unlocked, but nothing seems to be missing."
"I heard that noise in the rafters early this morning," said their mistress. "But you said it was only rats fighting. You'd better go and see that nothing has happened to the leather case."
When the maids saw, they raised an outcry: "The leather case has disappeared!"
Panic-stricken, the mistress said: "Quickly, send someone to the palace to tell the master, tell him to come home and look for it as soon as possible!"
The maids rushed away to try and find someone who would go to the palace and tell the Spearman. They asked three or four but they all returned and said: "The armourers are in attendance in the Emperor's inner garden. The entrance is strictly guarded. No one can enter! You'll just have to wait till he comes back."
The Spearman's wife and the maids were like ants on a hot plate. They rushed about aimlessly this way and that, and didn't eat a bite. It wasn't until dusk that the Spearman was able to take off his ceremonial robes and go off duty. He picked up his steel spear and returned home. When he reached the gate of the compound a neighbour told him: "Your wife has been robbed. She's waiting for you. She's frantic for you to get home."
The Spearman had a terrible shock. He rushed to his house, where the two maids met him at the door. "When you went out this morning, master, a thief slipped into the house. The only thing he took was that leather case you keep hanging from the beam."
A great wail arose from the Spearman when he heard this, right from the pit of his stomach it came, rolling up to issue from his mouth.
His wife said: "I really can't imagine when the thief got in."
"Everything else is unimportant," he said. "But this special armour has been handed down through four generations, and has never been lost till now. Marshal 'Flash' Wang offered me thirty thousand for it, but I wouldn't sell. I was afraid that one day I would need it in battle and I was so worried something might happen to it, that's why I tied it to the beam. So many people have asked to see it, but I've always pretended I didn't have it any longer. Now it's been stolen. I shall be a laughing-stock! It's gone, and whatever am I going to do?"
He did not sleep a wink that night. He kept turning it over in his mind. "Who could it possibly have been? It must be somebody who knows about that armour of mine."
His wife gave her opinion. "The thief must have crept in last night, when the light went out, don't you think? There must be someone who envies what you've got, he offered you money and you wouldn't sell, so he got this master thief to come and steal it. You'd better go out and tell someone to make thorough inquiries, it's no good just talking about it. And you want to be careful too not to put the culprit on his guard."
But despite this good advice, when day came the Spearman got up and just sat at home moping.
Around breakfast time, there was a knock on the door, and after going to see who it was the orderly returned and said: "Someone called Tang Long is asking to see you — he says he's the son of Commander Tang who was head of the Yan'an garrison."
The Spearman told him to show the guest in. Spots kowtowed most respectfully to the Spearman and said: "I hope you are keeping well?"
The Spearman replied: "I heard that your father had passed away. But you know I've been so tied up with official duties and it's such a long way too, I just haven't had time to get over there and offer my condolences. And I have had no news of you. Where are you living these days? Where have you come from?"
"It's a long story," said Spots. "Since father died I've been a bit down on my luck. Lately I've been wandering among the rivers and lakes. I was in Shandong. I came to the capital so I thought I'd pay you a visit."
"Won't you sit down?" said the Spearman, calling for wine to be brought.
Spots felt around in his pack and brought out two twenty tael gold ingots in the shape of garlic bulbs, which he gave to the Spearman saying: "Before he died my father left this for you as a memento. I didn't have anyone I could trust to bring it, that's why I didn't send it before. I've come here now specially to give it to you."
The Spearman said: "It was really kind of your father to remember me. I've done nothing to deserve it. How can I ever repay his generosity?"
"Don't say that," said Spots. "When my father was alive he often spoke admiringly of your fighting skills. But unfortunately the world's a big place, so you never happened to meet again. That's why he wanted to leave you this little remembrance."
The Spearman thanked Spots and took the gifts. Then he called for wine. While they were drinking the Spearman remained pensive and gloomy and eventually Spots rose and said: "Why do you look so unhappy? Something seems to be weighing on your mind."
The Spearman heaved a sigh and said: "I ought to explain, but it's a long story. Last night we had a robbery here."
"What exactly was stolen?" Spots asked.
"The thief took just one thing: that special armour bequeathed to me by my ancestors, known as 'the Lion's Pelt.' That's what I lost yesterday, and that's what presses so heavily upon my spirits."
"I can remember seeing this armour of yours," said Spots. "It really is matchless. My father could never stop admiring it. Where were you keeping it when it was stolen?"
"I kept it inside a leather case which I tied to one of the rafters in my bedroom. I really don't know when the thief got in and took it."
"What is it like, this leather case you kept it in?" Spots asked.
"A red sheepskin case," the Spearman replied. "And it was wrapped in scented cotton."
Spots pretended to be very surprised. "A red sheepskin case? Don't tell me it had a white cotton cover decorated with a green sceptre of good fortune? And a lion in the middle playing with an embroidered ball?"
"Good heavens, have you seen it somewhere?" the Spearman exclaimed.
"Last night I stopped at a country inn about fifteen miles from the city to order some wine. I saw a thin dark fellow with prominent eyes. He was carrying it on a pole. When I saw it I said to myself: 'I wonder what he keeps in that leather case?' I asked him as I was going out: 'What do you use that leather case for?' He said, 'It used to be for storing armour in, but now I've just got some old clothes in it.' That must be the man. I happened to notice his legs moved like lightning. He went dashing off. Why don't we follow him?"
The Spearman said: "It will be a miracle if we can catch him!"
"Stop dithering, then, and let's go!"
The Spearman hurriedly changed into his hemp sandals, buckled on his sword, picked up a halberd and he and Spots left the city by the eastern gate. They travelled at a good pace. They came to an inn with a white circle on the outer wall, and Spots said: "Let's have a bowl of wine before we go any further, and we can make some inquiries here."
When they were seated inside, Spots asked: "Tell me landlord, has a thin dark chap with staring eyes, been through here, with a red leather case on a carrying-pole?"
The innkeeper replied: "A fellow like that did come by yesterday evening. Carrying a red leather case he were — seemed to be something wrong with his legs too, he were limping a bit."
"Do you hear that, brother?" Spots said to the Spearman. But the Spearman was too excited to say anything.
They paid up and left. Further along the road they came to another inn with a white circle on the wall. Spots stopped and said: "Brother, I can't go another step. Let's spend the night at this inn. We can start early tomorrow."
The Spearman said: "But I'm a government official. If I don't turn up for duty tomorrow I shall be in trouble."
"It's no good worrying about that," said Spots. "Your wife will make some kind of excuse for you."
When they inquired at the inn that night, the waiter said: "Last night a man like the one you describe stayed here. He only slept till the early hours of this morning, then he left. He kept asking the way to Shandong."
"Then we'll be able to catch him," Spots said. "If we start before dawn we're sure to get the bugger tomorrow. Once we've nabbed him, then we'll see."
They spent the night at the inn and left at dawn to continue the pursuit. Whenever Spots saw a white circle on the wall he went in to buy wine and food and to make inquiries, and everywhere they said the same thing. The Spearman was so desperate to have his armour back he forgot about everything except the chase.
When dusk was approaching they came to an old temple, in front of which, under a tree, the Flea had put down his carrying-pole and was sitting on the ground.
When Spots saw this he cried out: "Got him! Under the tree there, look, isn't that the case your armour was in?"
The Spearman raced ahead and grabbed hold of the Flea, saying: "You villain, what do you mean by stealing my armour?"
"Hold on!" the Flea protested. "Stop shouting. Suppose I did steal your armour, what do you want from me?"
"You ... you shameless animal!" the Spearman spluttered. "How can you ask me that?"
"Why don't you look and see if there's any armour in that case?" said the Flea.
Spots opened the case and looked inside. It was empty.
"What have you done with my armour, you monster?" the Spearman yelled.
The Flea said: "Let me explain. My name is Zhang. I'm the eldest in my family and I come from Tai'an. A certain rich man of this district, who wants to get in with the Old Field Marshal, heard that you had this special armour and wouldn't sell it, so he paid me and a mate of mine, third brother Li, to go and steal it from your house. He promised us ten thousand for it. But when I was climbing down the pillar in your house I twisted my ankle, so I couldn't walk properly. I told friend Li to go on ahead with the armour and leave me to carry just the empty case. If you want to do something to me you can take me to the police, but not even to save my life, not even if you beat me to death, will I confess. It's no good thinking I will betray another person. So if you will spare me the official investigation, I am willing to help you try and get the armour back."
The Spearman hesitated for a long time, unable to make up his mind. Spots said: "Brother, you needn't be afraid he'll get away. Why don't we take him with us to get the armour back? If we haven't got the armour, what's the point of going to the police and making an accusation in this place?"
"You're right," said the Spearman. So now the pursuit continued with all three of them. They stopped at inns to rest. Whenever they spent the night somewhere the Spearman and Spots kept a close watch on the Flea. The Flea, of course, had bandaged his leg to make it look as if it was hurt. The Spearman seeing that he had difficulty walking, was only half on his guard. Next morning they rose early to continue their journey. The Flea paid for all their wine and food, in order to curry favour with them. They travelled all day.
Next day on the journey the Spearman became quite worried. He had begun to wonder if he would ever get his armour back.
As they were walking along, they saw three or four oxen yoked to an empty cart beside the road. Behind was the driver and next to him a merchant, who prostrated himself when he saw Spots.
"What are you doing here, friend?" Spots asked.
"I've been doing business in Zhengzhou and now I'm returning home to Tai'an," the other replied.
"That's great," Spots said. "We'd like to ride in your cart. We're heading for Tai'an also, on holiday."
"Of course I can take three of you. It wouldn't matter if you were more."
Spots was delighted. He called the Spearman over to be introduced. The Spearman asked: "Who is this?"
"Someone I got to know last year when I went to Tai'an to burn incense. He's called Li Rong, and he's a very good man."
"In that case, since our friend Zhang can't walk properly, let's all ride in his cart."
The carter was ordered to drive on, with the four men sitting in the cart.
"Friend Zhang, will you tell me the name of that rich man, please?" the Spearman asked.
The Flea could not be prevailed upon. The first three or four times he made excuses. Then he said in a vague way: "He's the famous Mr. Guo."
The Spearman asked Li Rong: "Do you have a famous official called Guo in Tai'an?"
Li Rong replied: "Our Mr. Guo is both aristocratic and rich. He's on very good terms with all the officials. He shelters all kinds of idlers in his house."
Hearing this the Spearman thought: "If there's someone powerful behind it, we're not likely to be taken seriously."
Li Rong talked as they went about spear and staff play. Sometimes he sang songs. Thus the day slipped past. We needn't bore you with this.
Now they were in fact not more than a couple of stages from Mount Liang when Li Rong told the carter to take a gourd and get a fill of wine and some meat so they could drink a few cups on the wagon. Li Rong got out a dipper and the first measure of wine was ladled out and offered to the Spearman, who drank it off. When Li Rong called for more wine, the carter feigning clumsiness spilt the whole gourd-full of wine on the ground. As Li Rong was cursing the carter and telling him to go and get more, the Spearman collapsed on the floor of the cart with a thud, saliva dribbling from his mouth.
And who exactly was this Li Rong? He was Lungs, of course. The other three jumped down from the cart and drove it on to the Crocodile's inn. They carried the Spearman down to the boat and rowed him across to Golden Sands Landing. Song Jiang had already been alerted and came down the mountain with the other leaders to receive him. The effects of the drug were already beginning to wear off on the Spearman but they also gave him the antidote. He had quite a shock when he opened his eyes and saw everybody. "How did you get me here?" he asked Spots.
"I'd better explain," Spots said. "I had always heard that Song Jiang welcomed good men from every corner of the empire and so I and Li Kui, the Black Whirlwind became brothers in Wugang. I returned with him to the mountain stronghold and joined the band. Recently Twin Rods has been using his linked cavalry against them, and they don't know how to counter it. I suggested the hooked spear method. You are the only one who knows how to use it so we devised this plan. We sent the Flea on ahead to steal your armour. My part was to tempt you to take to the road. Later Lungs played the part of Li Rong. As we were coming through the mountains we drugged you. We want you to join us here and become one of our leaders."
The Spearman said: "So you've really done for me then!"
Song Jiang now stepped forward, cup in hand, and apologized, saying: "I myself for the time being have taken refuge in the marshes, awaiting a future imperial amnesty."
Leopard's Head also came forward cup in hand and apologized. "I sang your praises to everyone here. Please do not refuse."
The Spearman said: "Spots my friend, you have inveigled me here, but at home my wife will be arrested and what then?"
Song Jiang said: "That's no problem. Set your heart at ease, commander, because you can take my word for it that before long we will fetch your family and you will all be together again."
Chao Gai, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun all came forward with conciliatory speeches and a great reception banquet was organized.
Time was now devoted to selecting the strongest of the troops to learn the method of fighting with hooked spears, while the Magic Messenger and Spots were instructed to travel with all speed to the capital and fetch the Spearman's family. In a few days' time Panther was back with the Supremo's family and the Pill Monger returned from the capital with Thunderer's family. Green-Eyes returned to the stronghold with five cartloads of explosives and ammunition. A few more days passed, and then the Magic Messenger and Spots brought the Spearman's family in.
The Spearman was surprised to see his wife and asked her how she had got there. "When you disappeared and didn't turn up at the office for the roll call," she said, "I told them that you hadn't reported for duty because you were ill in bed. Then cousin Tang suddenly appeared with your armour. He said: 'We got it back, but your husband caught an infection on the journey and he is lying desperately ill at the inn. He wants to see you and the children.' He persuaded me to get into a carriage, but I had no idea where it was taking me till we arrived here."
The Spearman said: "Fair enough, friends. But it's a pity you left that armour of mine at home."

Spots grinned. "Cheer up," he said. "As soon as I'd got your wife off in the carriage I went back and got the armour again. I also persuaded these two girls to pack all the valuables in your house into bundles so they could be carried here."
"Then I suppose it's no good my thinking about returning," said the Spearman.
"I have another confession to make, cousin," said Spots. "On the way back here we bumped into a company of merchants. I dressed up in your armour and painted my face. Using your name I stripped those merchants of all their goods. Before long this will be posted up all over the capital and they'll be looking to arrest you."
"Well, you've really done your best to ruin me, haven't you?" said the Spearman.
Chao Gai and Song Jiang now excused themselves, saying: "If we hadn't done these things, how would we ever have got you to stay?"
Following this, accommodation was allotted to the Spearman and his family, and the leaders settled down to discuss how to break the power of the linked cavalry. Sergeant Lei by now had completed the manufacture of hooked spears, so Song Jiang, the Professor and others invited the Spearman to give a demonstration of their use. "I am ready to divulge all I know and train every troop leader," he said. "We must pick the strongest men for it." Everyone sat in the Assembly Hall and looked on while the Spearman selected his recruits and explained the method of the hooked spear. And much was to depend on this for:

3000 armoured cavalry are about to be beaten,
The time has come for a hero's capture.

"MY forefathers earned a living by making weapons," said Tang Long addressing the assembled leaders. "Because my father was skilled in that work he was employed at Yanan Prefecture by the General Old Zhong, Guardian of the Frontier. At that time the battle horses were protected by armor, which was a great success. The only way of defeating such cavalry was by the use of hooked spear. I know how to make those hooked spears, but am not experienced in their use. I have a cousin, however, who understands how to use the hooked spears, and he is a Drill Instructor in the army. He however has kept this knowledge to himself, and his marvelous methods are equally effective either with cavalry or infantry."
Lin Chong asked, "Is that man not Drill Instructor Xu Ning?"
"Yes, that is the man," replied Tang Long.
"If you had not mentioned it I should have forgotten all about him," said Lin Chong. "His skill is undoubtedly the most marvelous. I knew him well in the capital where we often compared our various methods. Only how can we get him to come here?"
"He has a most valuable heirloom at home of which there is no equal anywhere," said Tang Long. "I once went to the capital with my late father, and saw it with my own eyes. It was armor made of gold rings coated with swan feather. This armor is both light and strong, neither sword nor arrow can penetrate it. It was called "Sai Tang Lion." Many senior officials wanted to have a look of it, but he would not let them see it. It is as dear to him as his life, and he kept it locked up in a leather box on the beam of his house. If we could get that armor he would follow us here."
"In that case we can easily arrange matters," said Wu Yong. "We have a capable man here, and for this work we have use of Shi Qian, the 'Flea on the Drum.'"
Shi Qian said, "If the armor is still there I could of course soon get it."
"If you steal the armor," said Tang Long, "I will undertake to bring the man here."
"How could you induce him to come here?" asked Song Jiang.
Tang Long walked across to Song Jiang, and whispered something in his ear. Song Jiang laughed and said, "An excellent plan!"
"For this we must send three men to the Capital," said Wu Yong. "One of them is to purchase gunpowder, and the other two can bring the family of Ling Zhen here."
Upon hearing this Peng Qi stood up and said, "Why should not one man go to Yingzhou and bring my family here?"
"Do not worry about that," said Song Jiang. "We will send a man for your family." He then instructed Yang Lin to go to Yingzhou to do that work. He also deputed Xue Yong and Li Yun to accompany Yue He and Tang Long to the capital; the former to bring Ling Zhen's family and the latter to buy gunpowder. Shi Qian after making preparations departed by himself for the capital. The other four followed some time afterwards.
Shi Qian duly reached the capital, and stayed at an inn. The next day he inquired for Xu Ning's residence and one man told him, "Go through the barracks gate, and you will find his house; it is the fifth house on the east side; it has a black door." Shi Qian did so, and duly found the house. He first examined it both the front and the back door. There was a high wall all round the house with a two-storied tower inside, besides which was a large beam. He then went to the neighborhood, and asked whether Xu Ning was at home and was informed that he attended his duties about 5 A.M. and would not return until evening.
Shi Qian returned to the inn, and changed his dress. He told the innkeeper that he might not return that night, and asked him to look after his room. He went and had his evening meal at another inn. He then went to Xu Ning's house, and prowled around outside. It was soon dark, and became quite cold. It was a bright moonlight night. He saw a big tree in the grounds of a temple for the local earth god, and climbed up and hid himself in the branches. From this vantage point he saw Xu Ning arrive and enter his house. The servant soon came out with a lamp, and fastened the gate. He waited until he heard the drum in the tower sounded for the first watch of the night (9 P.M.). It was very cold, and hoar frost was forming on the tree. Everything was now quiet so he got down the tree, and went to the back door of Xu Ning's house where he climbed over the wall. He found himself in a very small courtyard. He went to the kitchen, where there was a light. Looking through the window he saw two maid servants cleaning and washing the dishes. He went to the tower, and climbed up the beam to a window on the second floor. Looking inside he saw Xu Ning, his wife, and a boy of about seven years of age sitting round a fire. On the rafter of the bedroom where he saw a leather box. He also saw a sword, a bow with arrows, and some clothes hanging on a clotheshorse. At last he heard Xu Ning call to the servant, "Meixiang, fold up the clothes for me." One of the maid servants came upstairs, folded the clothes, and put them away in a wardrobe. About 11 P.M. Xu Ning went to bed and his wife asked him, "Do you attend to duty tomorrow?"
"Tomorrow the Emperor goes to the Dragon Palace and I must go at 5 A.M."
His wife then told the servant, "My husband must be on duty by 5 A.M. tomorrow. You must have breakfast ready by 4 A.M."
Shi Qian had seen and heard all this, and was quite confident that he would get the leather box without any difficulty that night. If he get it too soon he might disturb his people and could not get out of the city so he would wait till nearly 5 A.M. Very soon, everybody in the house was asleep, but there was a lamp still left burning on the table. Breaking a hole in the paper window he took a reed, and blew out the light. About 4 A.M. Xu Ning got up, and called to the maid servant to get breakfast ready. When the servant came they were surprised to find that the lamp had gone out. Xu Ning told them to go to the back chamber and get a light. The woman servant went downstairs, and Shi Qian slid down the beam on which he had been perched so long. He went to the back door, and hid there in the shade. The maid opened the door, and went to the other chamber. Shi Qian slipped into the kitchen, and hid under a table. The maid soon returned with the lamp, shut the door, and lit the fire. The other servant soon took the coal stove upstairs. Very soon the water was boiling, and some was taken upstairs for Xu Ning to wash his face. Breakfast was soon served and finished. Xu Ning came downstairs, and left for his duty. Shi Qian now left his hiding place, went straight upstairs, and took his position on the rafter. The maidservants returned after fastening the gate, and went to bed again. Shi Qian waited until they were asleep, and then taking his reed he blew out the lighted lamp. Shi Qian very quietly got down from the rafter taking the leather box with him when Xu Ning's wife awoke, and hearing the noise called out, "What is that noise?" Shi Qian made a noise like a rat chattering, and one of the servants replied, "It is the rats. They are only fighting." Shi Qian now made a noise like rats fighting to cover his movements with the box. Slowly he got down the stairs, and at last reached the door, and then the outer gate which he opened, and was soon outside. He hurried off with the leather box, through the city gate as it was then nearly 5 o'clock and was open, and soon reached his inn. He immediately packed up his things, paid the innkeeper, and started off on the east road. After he had gone about ten //he stopped at an inn for breakfast. While eating a man entered, and Shi Qian recognized him as Dai Zong. They held a whispered conversation, and Dai Zong then said he would take the "Sai Tang Lion" armor to Liangshan Marsh while Shi Qian could follow and take his time. Shi Qian opened the box, wrapped the armor in a parcel, and handed it to Dai Zong who donned his magic puttees started off for Liangshan Marsh.
Shi Qian continued on his way, and after going about seven //met Tang Long, and explained the position to him. Tang Long told Shi Qian to continue on his way, and that he must only stop at inns where there was a white circle chalked on the door. At those inns he must display the leather box so that everybody could see it. Shi Qian agreed to do this, and started off while Tang Long went on his way to the capital.
Early in the morning when the maidservants in Xu Ning's house got up they found the house door open, and also the outside gate unfastened. They did not notice anything missing, and going back upstairs said to Madame Xu Ning, "It is strange that the gate is unfastened, but there does not seem to be anything missing."
"About 5 A.M. I heard a noise on the rafter, but you said it was some rats fighting. Go to see if the leather box is still there?"
The servants looked up, and were astonished. "We do not know where it has gone to!"
The wife upon hearing this got up quickly and said, "We must send a messenger to the palace to ask my husband to come back as soon as possible."
The maidservant found a messenger and sent him off. When he returned he said that Xu Ning was on duty inside the palace. Outside were guards who would not allow anyone to enter. The servants were very much upset, and hunted all round the house for the leather box like a lot of ants in a hot pan.
When the Emperor had retired from the palace, Xu Ning took off his uniform and returned home. When he was near the house a neighbor said, "There has been a thief in your house. They sent a messenger to tell you, but you did not come back immediately." Xu Ning was surprised at this, and hurried to his home. At the gate he met the servants who said, "You left home at 5 A.M. and presently a thief secretly entered the house, and stole the leather box on the rafter. He did not take anything else."
Xu Ning was dumbfounded at the loss. His wife said, "We do not know at what time the thief got into the house."
"Other things do not matter," said Xu Ning. "Only our precious family heirloom has been stolen. Marshal Hua Erwang offered me 30,000 strings of cash for that, but I refused to sell. I was so afraid of losing it that I hid it away on the rafter. Many men came to get a look at it, but I always said I had not got it. Now if people hear that it has been stolen, they will laugh at us. What shall we do?" Xu Ning could not sleep, but was continuously thinking the matter over. "Who could have stolen it?"
"I think it was stolen by someone who coveted the armor," said his wife. "Perhaps he stole it because you would not sell it. You had better make inquiries in all directions, and see if we can get a clue as to who has stolen it. At present, 'we must not beat the grass to startle the snake.'"
The next day Xu Ning was very downcast and stayed at home. After breakfast he heard someone knocking at the outer gate. A servant answered the door, and then announced that a man named Tang Long of Yanan Prefecture wished to see Xu Ning. Xu Ning told the servant to show him into the guest chamber. Upon meeting there they saluted each other. Xu Ning said, "I heard of the death of your father, but owing to my official duties I could not come to see you. Your place was also such a long way off, and I could not go. Where have you been working, and what brings you here today?"
"I cannot tell you all that has happened since in one sentence," replied Tang Long. "After my father's death I was very hard up, and in fact was at a loose end. I have just come from Shandong on a visit to you."
Xu Ning ordered the servant to bring in food and wine. Tang Long opened his bundle, and gave Xu Ning two ingots of silver weighing about twenty taels, saying, "Just before his death my father told me to hand you this silver. I had no intimate friend whom I could have asked to bring this present to you, so I had to keep it until I could give it you myself."
"I am extremely grateful to your late father for remembering me, and making such a valuable present," replied Xu Ning. "I have been very undutiful to your father, and shall never be able to recompense him."
"Never mind that," said Tang Long. "Before his death my father often spoke to me of your great skill. He could not come to see you as you lived so far away, so he decided to send you this thing as a memento."
Xu Ning thanked Tang Long, and asked him to dine with him. During the meal Xu Ning several times looked troubled, and even frowned. At last Tang Long said, "I see that you are worrying about something. What has upset you?"
Xu Ning sighed, "Younger brother, you do not know, but last night a thief got into this house."
"Did you miss anything?" asked Tang Long.
"He took the armor which is our great heirloom. Because of that I am rather annoyed."
"I remember seeing it some time before," said Tang Long. "It was a very rare thing. My father often spoke of it as a splendid work of art. Have you any clue as to who took it?"
"The armor was in a box which I hid on the rafter of my own bedroom. I have no idea who can have stolen it."
"What kind of box was it?" asked Tang Long.
"It was red deerskin box, and the armor was wrapped in fine silk inside."
Tang Long was startled. "A red deerskin box! Outside covered with white silk embroidered with a design of clouds in green, and lions playing with a ball!"
"Younger brother! Where did you see it?" asked Xu Ning.
"Elder brother, last night I stopped at an inn about thirteen //from here, and there I saw an old man with a sallow complexion who was carrying such a box on a pole. At the time I particularly noticed the box, and wondered what was inside. I even asked the man what was in the box. He replied that originally there was armor stored in it, but now there was only some clothes. That must be the thief with your box. I noticed that the man limped, and walked along very slowly. We must pursue him at once."
"If we succeed in arresting him it will be by Heaven's assistance," said Xu Ning.
"We had better waste no time, but get away at once," said Tang Long.
Xu Ning quickly put on his boots and weapons, and left immediately with Tang Long. When they had gone some distance on the road they came to an inn with a white circle on the door, and Tang Long suggested that they might make inquiries there. They entered and sat down. Tang Long asked the innkeeper whether he had noticed a man with a red deerskin box. The innkeeper remembered the man well, and said he had been there the previous night.
The two men started off again, and that evening they stopped at an inn which also had a white circle on the door. Xu Ning wished to push on, but Tang Long said he was too tired. There again they made inquiries, and the waiter remembered the man, and even told them that the man had said he was going to Shandong.
"Then we shall overtake him," said Tang Long.
After sleeping there the two men started off again early the next morning.
Again they made inquiries at the inns on the way, and always got news of the deerskin box. As it grew dark they came to an old temple, and there they saw a man resting with a load under a tree. Xu Ning ran forward and seized hold of Shi Qian (for he was the man). "How brave you are! Why did you steal that box from my home?"
"Wait a bit!" said Shi Qian. "Do not get excited! I stole the box, but what do you want me to do now?"
"You have no decency," said Xu Ning. "How can you ask such a question?"
"Well, look in the box, and see whether the armor is there," replied Shi Qian.
Xu Ning opened the box, but found it empty. "Where is the armor?" he asked.
"I will tell you," said Shi Qian. "My name is Zhang Da, and I am a Taian Prefecture man. In our town is a wealthy man who is a friend of General Old Zhong, Guardian of the Frontier. He knew of the armor you had, and wished to present it to the General. But he knew that you would not sell it, and therefore engaged me and another man named Li San to go to your home and steal it. In getting the box I had a fall and hurt my leg so that I could not walk very quickly. So Li San took the armor away, and left me behind to bring the empty box. If you now beat me, or send me to the yamen I will not say a word as to where the armor has gone to. If you will forgive me I will go with you to get back the armor."
Xu Ning was undecided how to act, and did not speak for some time. Tang Long interposed and said, "Elder brother, you need not be afraid of him running away. We can go with him, and get the armor. If we cannot get the armor we can send him to the yamen."
Xu Ning agreed to this. All three then went on the road, and stayed that night at an inn. Xu Ning and Tang Long were careful that Shi Qian did not escape. Shi Qian's leg was not injured, he only wrapped much silk round his leg. Because Shi Qian limped Xu Ning at last decided that it was not necessary to watch him closely. The following day they traveled far. They came at last to a place where the road divided, and there they met two men pushing a barrow, accompanied by a man who simply walked. They stopped and saluted Tang Long who asked them what they were doing at that spot.
The man replied, "I have been trading at Zhengzhou, and am now on my way back to Taian."
"That is fine," said Tang Long. "We are also going to Taian and wish to hire a barrow."
"Our barrow could carry all three of you," replied the man.
Tang Long then introduced Xu Ning, and told him that last year he had been to Taian on a pilgrimage, and while there had met this merchant, Li Rong. He knew him as a chivalrous man.
"In that case," said Xu Ning, "our man Zhang Da can ride on the barrow, and we can make haste." This was done. On the way Xu Ning asked Li Rong whether he knew a wealthy man, named Guo at Taian. Li Rong said he knew him, and this settled Xu Ning's mind as he felt that now he was sure to get the armor.
That day they were not far from Liangshan Marsh, and they stopped on the road while Li Rong sent his men to buy wine and food and bring it to them. When it arrived Li Rong took a gourd off the barrow, and filling it with wine offered it to Xu Ning who drunk it off. Li Rong was filling the gourd a second time for the others when apparently the jug slipped, and fell to the ground, and all the wine was lost. Li Rong shouted to his man to go and buy some more wine. Before the man returned Xu Ning was foaming at the mouth, and was lying down on the barrow. Who was this man Li Rong? He was Yue He from Liangshan Marsh. The men now wheeled the barrow off with Xu Ning, and soon reached Zhu Gui's inn. There they put Xu Ning on a boat, rowed him across the lake, and carried him up the mountain. There they were met by Song Jiang and the other leaders. A drug was now administered to Xu Ning who recovered his consciousness. Seeing such a crowd of men all around, Xu Ning asked Tang Long, "Brother, why did you deceive me and bring me to this place?"
"Elder brother, I will explain," replied Tang Long. "I heard that Song Jiang, the chief of these heroes, is always looking out for heroes to join his band. For this reason I came here and joined him. We have been attacked by troops under General Huyan Zhuo, and defeated. It was then I thought of the armor you had." He explained fully how the armor had been stolen, and brought to Liangshan Marsh. He also invited him to join the bandits as a leader.
"Brother, you have seriously injured me."
Song Jiang now stepped forward and spoke to Xu Ning. "I, Song Jiang, wait here with my men for the Emperor to admit us to citizenship. We are quite loyal, and will devote our life to our country. We do not covet riches, and have no desire to kill anybody. Our motives are of the best, and will stand your closest scrutiny. We request you to join us to act as agents for Heaven."
Xu Ning however again addressed Tang Long. "You deceived me in bringing me here, and have exposed my wife and family to arrest."
"That is already arranged," said Song Jiang. "You need not worry. I will be responsible, and see that no trouble happens to your family. I will see that they are all safely brought here."
Within a few days Xu Ning's wife and family arrived. Xu Ning was surprised, and asked his wife how she came there. She replied, "When you had left, there were many inquiries as to why you had not turned up for duty. I said that you were sick, and gave them money to silence the matter. Then some days afterwards Tang Long came, and said that you had fallen sick in an inn on the road. He told us all to go with him quickly in order to see you before you died. He induced us to start at once, and brought us here."
Xu Ning was pleased to see them, but said that now he could not go back to the capital. Chao Gai and Song Jiang both pressed him to stay with them, and gave him a separate house for his family. The leaders held a conference regarding further military operations, and they asked Xu Ning to instruct their men how to use the hooked spears, or halberds. He agreed to do this, and selected the strongest men for his purpose.

3000 troops defeated at one battle,
A great hero surrendered on the spot.

The Spearman Xu Ning Teaches How to Use the Barbed Lance, the hooked spear, & Drills the Brigands; Song Jiang Breaks & destroys the Linked-Up Cavalry & Gains a Victory

In Fraternity Hall, the chieftains requested Xu Ning to demonstrate the barbed lance. He was a fine figure of a man. Tall, broad-shouldered and thick at the middle, he had a round fair face adorned by a mustache and goatee. After selecting his trainees, he went outside the Hall, picked up a barbed lance and showed how it was done. The spectators cheered.

"If you're using this weapon on horseback," he said, "you must swing from the waist. Advance in seven moves—three hooks and four parries. Then, one stab and one cleave. A total of nine changes. If you're on foot, the best way is to advance eight steps and parry four times. This will open the door. At the twelfth step, change. At the sixteenth, turn completely around, alternately hooking and stabbing. At the twenty-fourth, push your opponent's weapon up, then down. Hook to the east and parry to the west. At the thirty-sixth, making sure that you're well covered, seize the tough and fight the strong. This is the correct method of using the barbed lance. We have a jingle that goes:

Four parries, three hooks, seven in all,
Nine changes in total weave a magic spell,
At step twenty-four parry forward and back,
At step sixteen do a big turn as well."

As Xu Ning demonstrated, stage by stage, the chieftains watched. The fighters were delighted by the way he plied the lance. From then on, he taught the deftest of them day and night. He also showed infantry how to hide in brush and grass and snag the legs of horses, instructing them in three secret methods.

In less than half a month, he had taught five to seven hundred men. Song Jiang and the other leaders were extremely pleased. They made preparations to break the foe.

Huyan Zhuo, since the capture of Peng Qi and Ling Zhen, had been riding forth with his cavalry every day to the edge of the river and hurling challenges. But the brigand leaders near the shore only continued holding the various beach heads and installing sharp stakes under the water. Huyan was able to send scouts along the roads west and north of the mountain, but he had no way of getting to the stronghold.

Inside the brigand fortress Ling Zhen was directed to manufacture several types of cannon, and a day was set for the attack against the enemy. The men who had been learning the use of the barbed lance were by now quite adept.

"I'm neither clever nor far-sighted," Song Jiang said to the other chieftains. "I wonder whether my idea will meet with your approval."

"We'd like to hear it," said Wu Yong.

"Tomorrow we won't use our cavalry, but will fight entirely on foot. The military tactics of Sun and Wu are very suited to wooded and watery areas. We'll take the infantry down, divide them into ten units and lure on the enemy. When they charge with their cavalry, we'll withdraw into the reeds and brush. Our men with the barbed lances will already be there lying in ambush. For every ten of these will be an equal number with big hooked poles. The lances will bring down the horses, the poles will snag the riders. We'll prepare similar ambushes on the open plain and in the narrow defiles. How does that plan strike you?"

"I think that's how we ought to do it," said Wu Yong. "Conceal our soldiers and seize their officers."

"Barbed lances and hooked poles together. Exactly the way," said Xu Ning.

Song Jiang then formed ten infantry units, with two leaders in command of each to go down the mountain and lure the foe. Naval craft to serve as reinforcements were put under the command of nine chieftains. Six cavalry units were also dispatched under six chieftains. Their function was to shout challenges at the enemy from the side of the mountain. Ling Zhen and Du Xing were to have charge of the cannons.

Xu Ning and Tang Long were given leadership of the men with the barbed lances. The main army was under Song Jiang, Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng, Dai Zong, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng. They issued all general orders and commands. The remaining chieftains were to defend the various forts.

That night at the third watch the barbed lancers crossed the river, spread out and went into ambush. At the fourth watch the ten infantry units moved across. Ling Zhen and Du Xing took with them Fiery Wind cannon and mountings, and set them up on a height. Xu Ning and Tang Long, as they crossed to the opposite shore, each carried a trumpet in a bag.

Dawn found Song Jiang and the main army lined up along the river. They beat drums, shouted and waved their banners.

When news of this reached Huyan Zhuo in the headquarters tent of his central army, he directed Han Tao of his vanguard to go out and scout. Then he ordered that the horses of his armored cavalry be linked together. He put on his armor, mounted his snowy-hoofed black steed, took up his double rods, and rode forth towards Liangshan Marsh with his men and horses.

He saw Song Jiang with a large force on the other side of the river and spread his troops out in battle formation. He conferred with Han Tao, who said: "They have a detachment of infantry, I don't know how large, due south of here."

"Who cares how large! Charge them with our linked cavalry!"

Han Tao galloped forth with five hundred horsemen. But to the southeast another force of infantry appeared. Han Tao was about to send part of his cavalry against them, when to the southwest he saw still another detachment, waving pennants and shouting. He pulled his entire unit back.

"There are three bandit detachments to the south," he told Huyan. "They've all got Liangshan Marsh banners."

"For a long time those rascals have refused to come out and fight," Huyan mused. "They must be up to something."

Before the words were out of his mouth, to the north was heard the boom of cannon. Huyan swore. "Ling Zhen has gone over to the bandits! They've got him to bombard us!"

While they were all watching south, three more units welled up in the north. "Those bandits surely are hatching some scheme," Huyan said to Han Tao. "We'll divide our army in two. I'll fight north with one column, you fight south with the other."

They were about to do this when four more enemy units appeared to the west. Huyan began to grow panicky. Northwards, a volley of cannon fire erupted, and projectiles landed upon the bluffs. They were shot from one large and forty-nine smaller cannons, which is why the battery was called Mother and Sons. The shells burst with an overpowering roar. Huyan's soldiers, confused before the combat even started, dashed wildly amid the cavalry and troops led by Han Tao.

The ten brigand infantry units ran east when chased east, and west when chased west. Huyan was furious. He advanced north with his army. Song Jiang's men plunged into the reeds. Huyan came tearing after them with a large contingent of linked cavalry. The armored steeds, galloping in tandem, could not be checked. They crashed in among the dry reeds, tall grass and tangled thickets. A shrill whistle rent the air, and barbed lances on both ends of the linked lines snagged the horses' legs and brought them tumbling to the ground. The animals in the middle whinnied in fright. Long poles snaked out of the reeds and hooked the riders.

Huyan, realizing he had been tricked, gave his horse free rein and raced back south after Han Tao. To the north behind him Fiery Wind cannon thundered. Here, there, all over the hills and plain, brigand infantry gave chase. Linked armored cavalry rolled and fell everywhere amid the reeds and grasses, and everywhere were caught.

Han Tao and Huyan knew they had been duped. They rode madly about after their mounted men, seeking an escape route. But every path was thick as flax with the banners of Liangshan Marsh. No path was safe, and they headed northwest.

Before they had gone five or six li they were confronted by a strong unit with two bold fellows in the lead—Mu Hong the Unrestrained and Mu Chun the Slightly Restrained. Both carried halberds, and they shouted: "Defeated generals, stand where you are!"

Huyan, enraged, charged the two, brandishing his rods. They fought four or five rounds, then Mu Chun withdrew. Fearing a trap, Huyan did not pursue, but rode due north along the road.

Another powerful band came down the slope and blocked his way. It was led by Two-Headed Snake Xie Zhen and Twin-Tailed Scorpion Xie Bao. They raced towards him, each gripping a steel fork. Flourishing his rods, Huyan clashed with them in combat. They fought six or seven rounds, and the two brothers retreated.

Huyan chased them less than half a li when from both sides suddenly twenty-four men with barbed lances surged forth. Huyan had no more heart for battle. He turned his mount and hurried off, northeast.

Again he was stopped, this time by Stumpy Tiger and Ten Feet of Steel, husband and wife. The road clearly was perilous, but the thorns and brambles on all sides were even worse. He kicked up his steed, brandished his rods, and charged through his interceptors. Stumpy Tiger and Ten Feet of Steel were unable to catch him. He rode pell-mell northeast, his army in ruins, his men scattered like raindrops and stars.

Song Jiang's trumpets sounded a return to the mountain, where each warrior came forward to claim his reward. Of the three thousand linked armored steeds, a troop and a half—brought down by the barbed lances—had their hoofs damaged. These were stripped of their armor and kept for eating purposes. But the mounts of more than two troops were in fine condition. These were led up the mountain to be fed and cared for and used as brigand mounts. All the armor-bedecked cavalrymen were captured alive and taken to the stronghold.

Five thousand imperial infantry, pressed fiercely on three sides, tried to flee back into the midst of their main army, but were all brought down by the barbed lances and caught. Those who ran to the river were rounded up by the naval chieftains, put on boats, ferried across, and escorted up the mountain under guard.

The men and horses previously captured by the imperial forces were recovered and returned to the fortress. Huyan's palisades were dismantled and new forts were built along the banks. Two inns were again erected to serve as eyes for the brigands, and as before Sun Xin, Gu Dasao, Shi Yong and Shi Qian were put in charge.

Liu Tang and Du Qian brought Han Tao to the stronghold, a bound captive. Song Jiang personally untied him and invited him into the Hall. He apologized and had a feast laid in his honor. Peng Qi and Ling Zhen, at Song's behest, urged him to join them. Han Tao, who originally was one of the stars of Earthly Fiends, was naturally of the same persuasion, and he promptly became a chieftain of Liangshan Marsh. Song Jiang had him write a letter to his family, then dispatched men to Chenzhou to bring them to the fortress, where they and Han Tao were reunited.

Song Jiang rejoiced. He had broken the linked cavalry, captured many men and horses, and collected large quantities of armor and weapons. Every day he and his cohorts feasted in celebration. But as usual they guarded all approaches against possible attack by imperial soldiers. Of that we'll say no more.

Huyan, having lost so much of his imperial army, dared not return to the capital. He rode alone on his black steed with the snowy hoofs, his armor hanging over the pommel as he hastened from the scene of his disaster. Without money, he had to take the gold belt from around his waist and sell it for silver.

"It happened so suddenly," he said to himself. "Who can I look to for refuge?" Then he remembered. "Murong, the prefect of Qingzhou is an old friend. Why not go to him? His sister is an imperial concubine. If, through her influence, I can be given another army. I may still get my revenge."

Towards evening of his second day on the road, he was hungry and thirsty. He dismounted at a village inn by the roadside and tied his horse to a tree near the front door. He went in, placed his rods on a table, sat down and told the host to bring wine and meat.

"We've only wine here," said the host. "But they just slaughtered a sheep in the village. If you want meat, I'll buy you some."

Huyan opened the ration bag at his waist and took out some of the silver he had exchanged for his gold belt. He gave this to the host.

"Get a leg of mutton and boil it for me. And mix some fodder and feed my horse. I'll spend the night here. Tomorrow, I'm going on to Qingzhou."

"There's nothing against staying here, sir. But we don't have a good bed."

"I'm a military man. Any place I can rest will do."

The host took the silver and went off to purchase the mutton. Huyan removed his armor from his horse's back and loosened its girth straps, then sat down outside the door. He waited a long time. At last the host returned with the sheep leg. Huyan told him to boil it, knead three measures of flour for griddlecakes, and draw two drams of wine.

While the meat was cooking and the griddlecakes were on the pan, the host heated water for Huyan to wash his feet and led the horse to a shed in the rear. The host chopped grass and boiled fodder. Huyan warmed some wine and imbibed a while. Soon the meat was ready, and Huyan invited the host to eat and drink with him.

"I'm an officer of the imperial army," Huyan said. "Because I've had a setback in arresting the bandits of Liangshan Marsh, I'm going to join Prefect Murong of Qingzhou. Take good care of my horse. It was given to me by the emperor, and is called the Ebony Steed Which Treads in Snow. I'll reward you handsomely later on."

"Thank you, Excellency. But there is something I must tell you. Not far from here is Peach Blossom Mountain. On it is a band of robbers. Their leader is Li Zhong the Tiger-Fighting General. Second in command is Zhou Tong the Little King. There are about six or seven hundred of them, and they rob and pillage. Sometimes they raid this village. The authorities have sent soldiers to capture them time and again, but always without success. You must sleep lightly during the night, sir."

"I'm a man of matchless courage. Even if those knaves came in full force it wouldn't matter to me. Just make sure to feed my horse well."

He dined on meat and wine and griddlecakes. Then the host spread a pallet and Huyan lay down to sleep.

Because he had been depressed for several days, and because he had drunk a few cups of wine too many, Huyan reclined without taking his clothes off. Around the third watch he awakened. He heard the host, to the rear of the house, lamenting. Huyan jumped up, seized his twin rods and went into the back yard.

"What's the trouble?" he demanded.

"I went out to add some hay and I found that the fence had been knocked down. Someone has stolen Your Excellency's horse! Look, there—torch light three or four li off in the distance. They must be heading for that place."

"What place are you talking about?"

"The robbers you see on that road are bandits from Peach Blossom Mountain!"

Huyan was startled. He ordered the host to lead the way, and they gave chase for two or three li along the edges of the fields. But the torches had vanished. There was no telling where they had gone.

"This is terrible," said Huyan. "I've lost the emperor's gift horse!"

"Go into the prefecture tomorrow and report the theft," advised the host. "They'll send soldiers to catch the robbers. That's the only way you'll get the animal back."

Sunk in gloom, Huyan sat until daybreak. Then he set out for Qingzhou, instructing the host to carry his armor. It was dark by the time they reached the city, and they put up at an inn for the night. Early the following morning Huyan presented himself at the prefectural court and kowtowed before Murong.

The prefect was astonished. "I heard that you had gone to catch the bandits in Liangshan Marsh, General," he said. "What are you doing here?"

Huyan related what had transpired.

"Although you lost many men and horses, it was not through lack of diligence," said Murong. "The bandits tricked you. It wasn't your fault. The area under my administration has often been raided by them. Now that you're here you can first clean out Peach Blossom Mountain and retake the steed presented you by the emperor. Then you can capture the robbers on Two-Dragon Mountain and White Tiger in one fell swoop. I'll report your exploits to the emperor, and you'll again be given command of an army and can get your revenge. How will that be?"

Huyan again kowtowed. "I'm deeply grateful for your concern. If you'll be kind enough to do this, I'll repay you with my life."

Murong invited him to accept temporary quarters in a guestroom, where he could change his clothes, eat and rest. The prefect told the host who had been carrying Huyan's armor to return home.

Three days passed. Huyan, anxious to retrieve the imperial gift horse, entreated Murong to give him soldiers. The prefect mustered two thousand infantry and cavalry, which he put under Huyan's leadership, and presented him with a black-maned charger. Huyan thanked him, donned his armor, mounted, and marched off with his men to recapture his horse, heading straight for Peach Blossom Mountain.

On the mountain Li Zhong the Tiger-Fighting General and Zhou Tong the Little King, having obtained the Ebony Steed Which Treads in Snow, feasted and celebrated every day. A scout who watched the road reported: "Soldiers and horses from Qingzhou heading this way."

Zhou Tong rose and said to Li Zhong: "Brother, hold the fort. I'll go and drive back the government forces."

He mustered a hundred brigands, took his lance, mounted, and rode down to meet the foe.

Huyan Zhuo approached the mountain with two thousand infantry and cavalry and spread out in battle position. Riding forth, he shouted: "Robbers, come and be bound!"

Zhou Tong the Little King deployed his men in a single line and cantered out with levelled lance. Huyan gave his mount rein and advanced to do battle. Zhou Tong spurred his animal. Soon the two horses drew together.

The riders fought six or seven rounds. Zhou Tong wasn't strong enough. He pulled his steed around and headed up the slope. Huyan chased him a while. But he was afraid of being tricked. He rode hastily down the mountain and set up a camp. There he waited for the next opportunity to fight.

Zhou Tong returned to his stronghold. "Huyan Zhuo is a highly skilled warrior," he told Li Zhong. "I couldn't stop him. I had no choice but to come back. If he pursues right to our fort, what can we do?"

"I hear that Zhishen the Tattooed Monk is in the Precious Pearl Monastery on Two-Dragon Mountain with a large band of men. With him, what's more, is some fellow called Yang Zhi the Blue-Faced Brute, and a newly arrived pilgrim Wu Song. They're all formidable fighters. I'll send a letter requesting their aid. If we get out of this danger thanks to their efforts, I'll be glad to pay them tribute every month."

"I've known about those brave fellows for some time. I'm just afraid that monk still remembers the first time we met, and won't want to help."

Li Zhong laughed. "Never mind. He's a good man, very forthright. When he learns of the fix we're in, he'll sure come with warriors to the rescue."

"Yes, that's true."

The letter was written and two competent brigands were picked to deliver it. They rolled down the rear slope and struck out for Two-Dragon Mountain. They reached the foot of it in only two days. The brigands on guard there questioned them closely on the nature of their business.

Three chieftains sat in the main hall of the Precious Pearl Monastery. Zhishen the Tattooed Monk was first in command. Yang Zhi the Blue-Faced Brute was second. Third was Wu Song the Pilgrim.

In the building at the entry gate were four lesser chiefs. One was Shi En the Golden-Eyed Tiger Cub. The son of the warden of Mengzhou Prison at the time Wu Song killed General Zhang and his entire family, he and his father had been made responsible for apprehending the culprit. Rather than do this, Shi En had abandoned his home and fled. For some time he was a wanderer. Later, his parents died, and he heard that Wu Song was on Two-Dragon Mountain. He had hurried to join him.

Another lesser chief was Cao Zheng the Demon Carver. He had been with Lu Zhishen and Yang Zhi when they took Precious Pearl Monastery and killed Deng Long. He too subsequently joined the band.

The third was Zhang Qing the Vegetable Gardener. The fourth was Sun the Witch. These two, husband and wife, had sold dumplings stuffed with human flesh at Crossroads Rise on the Mengzhou Road. They had joined in response to repeated letters from Lu Zhishen and Wu Song.

Cao Zheng, hearing that there was a letter from Peach Blossom Mountain, carefully questioned the messengers, then went up to the hall and reported to the three chieftains.

"When I left Mount Wutai I put up in Peach Blossom Village, and there I gave that prick Zhou Tong a good drubbing," Lu recalled. "Then Li Zhong came and recognized me. He invited me up to their mountain for a day of drinking. He pledged me his blood brother and wanted me to stay and be their chieftain. But the stinginess of those two annoyed me. I collected some of their gold and silver drinking vessels and left. Now they send messengers pleading for aid. Let them come up. We'll hear what they have to say."

Cao Zheng soon returned with the two emissaries. They hailed the chieftains respectfully and said: "Murong, prefect of Qingzhou, has recently been entertaining Two Rods Huyan Zhuo, who failed in an attack on Liangshan Marsh. The prefect has sent him to clean out our mountain strongholds on Peach Blossom, Two-Dragon and White Tiger, so that he may be given another army and take Liangshan and get his revenge. Our leaders beseech you great chieftains to come with armed forces and save us. When all this is over, we will be glad to pay tribute."

"We defend our own mountain and fortress. As a rule we don't go to anyone's rescue," Yang Zhi said to Wu Song and the Tattooed Monk. "But if we don't help, we'll damage the prestige of the gallant fraternity, for one thing. For another, if we let that lout capture Peach Blossom Mountain, he'll look on us with contempt. Let's leave Zhang Qing, Sun the Witch, Shi En and Cao Zheng to hold the fort. Then we three can take a little trip."
He mustered five hundred foot soldiers and sixty cavalrymen. Each donned his armor and equipment, and all headed for Peach Blossom Mountain.
When Li Zhong heard the news from Two-Dragon Mountain, he led three hundred brigands down as reinforcements. Huyan Zhuo rushed his entire complement to block their path. He deployed his men and, brandishing his rods, rode out against Li Zhong.
Li was from Dingyuan in Haozhou Prefecture, where his family, for generations, had earned their livelihood by their skill at arms. Because of his stalwart physique, he was known as the Tiger-Fighting General. But in his clash with Huyan he discovered he had met his match. After ten rounds or so, he could see it was going badly. He parried his adversary's weapons and fled.
Huyan, with a low opinion of Li's fighting ability, chased him up the mountain. Zhou Tong the Little King was at mid-point on the slope. He promptly threw down stones like goose eggs. Huyan hurriedly turned his mount and returned to the foot of the mountain. He found his government soldiers shouting in alarm.
"What are you yelling about?" he demanded.
"There, in the distance. A body of men and horses racing this way!" exclaimed the rear guard.
Huyan looked beyond them. A big fat monk on a white horse was leading a contingent, trailed by a rising cloud of dust. It was Zhishen the Tattooed Monk.
"Where is that prick who was beaten at Liangshan Marsh?" he was roaring. "How dare you come here and bluster?"
"I'm going to kill you first, bald donkey," Huyan responded, "to work off the rage inside me!"
Lu twirled his iron Buddhist staff, Huyan waved his rods, the horses met, the opposing forces shouted. The two men fought forty or fifty rounds with neither emerging the victor.
"This monk is fantastic," Huyan marvelled to himself.
On both sides trumpets blared and the contestants withdrew to rest. But after a short interval, Huyan grew impatient. Again he rode his steed into the arena. "Come out, thief of a monk," he cried. "Let's fight to a finish!"
Lu was about to meet the challenge when Yang Zhi said: "Rest a bit longer, brother. Watch me nab this oaf!"
Waving his sabre, he rode forth and clashed with Huyan. Forty or fifty rounds they fought with neither vanquishing the other.
Huyan was filled with admiration. "Where did they get two like these?" he wondered. "Truly remarkable. They never learned such jousting in the greenwood!"
Impressed by Huyan's superb skill with arms, Yang Zhi broke off the engagement, turned his horse and galloped back to his position. Huyan didn't give chase, but also turned his mount around. Both sides withdrew their forces.
"This is our first venture here," Lu Zhishen said to Yang Zhi. "We'd better not camp too close to them. Let's pull back another twenty li. We'll come out and fight again tomorrow."
With their men, they crossed to a nearby hollow and there set up a camp.
Huyan brooded in his tent. "I expected taking this gang of cheap robbers would be as easy as snapping bamboo," he thought. "Who knew I'd ran into such adversaries. What rotten luck!"
He could see no way out of his dilemma. Just then a messenger arrived from Prefect Murong.
"The General is ordered to return at once with his soldiers and defend the city," the man said. "Bandits from White Tiger Mountain under Kong Ming and Kong Liang are on their way to raid the prison. To prevent anything from happening to the prefectural government, the General is requested to hurry back with his forces."
This was just the excuse Huyan was looking for. He set out for Qingzhou with his infantry and cavalry that very night.
The next day Lu Zhishen, Yang Zhi and Wu Song led their brigands, waving banners and yelling, down the mountain. To their astonishment, there was not a sign of their foe. Li Zhong and Zhou Tong came down with men from their own mountain and invited the three chieftains to their stronghold. There, they slaughtered sheep and horses and spread a feast in their honor. At the same time they dispatched scouts to find out what was happening on the road beyond.

As Huyan was leading his contingent back to the city he saw a body of men and horses already on the outskirts of Qingzhou. At their head were Kong Ming the Comet and Kong Liang the Flaming Star—sons of Squire Kong who lived at the foot of White Tiger Mountain. In a quarrel with a local rich man, they had slaughtered him and his entire household. Next, they gathered six or seven hundred men, occupied White Tiger Mountain, and took to pillage and plunder. Prefect Murong arrested their uncle Kong Bin, who lived in the city and threw him into jail. They had been heading for Qingzhou to get him out. Now, they found themselves confronted by Huyan Zhuo and his contingent.
The two sides spread out and engaged in battle. Huyan rode to the front of his position. Prefect Murong, watching from a tower on the city wall, saw Kong Ming, with levelled lance astride a charger, attack Huyan. They met and fought over twenty rounds. Huyan wanted to display his prowess before the prefect. He noted that Kong Ming, whose skill with arms was not exceptional, was now entirely on the defensive. Huyan drove in close and snatched him off his horse.
Kong Liang and his men turned and fled. Murong, from the tower, shouted for Huyan to go after them. The government soldiers pressed hard and captured more than a hundred of the foe. Badly defeated, Kong Liang and the rest of his forces ran in all directions. Towards evening, they put up in an ancient temple.
After capturing Kong Ming, Huyan led him into the city and presented himself before the prefect. Murong was delighted. He directed that a cangue be placed around the prisoner's neck, and that he be confined in the same jail as his uncle Kong Bin. The prefect rewarded the troops and entertained Huyan. He asked about the brigands on Peach Blossom Mountain.
"I thought I had only to stretch out my hand and take them, as easily as catching turtles in a jug," said Huyan. "But unexpectedly a band of robbers came to their rescue. Among them was a monk and a big blue-faced fellow. I fought them both, but couldn't defeat either. Their skill is out of the ordinary. It's not the usual style of robbers in the greenwood. So I was prevented from capturing the bandits."
"That monk," said Murong, "is Lu Da, who was a major under Governor-General Zhong of the Yanan border region. Later, he shaved off his hair and became a monk, and he's now known as Zhishen the Tattooed Monk. The big fellow with blue tinged complexion was once an aide in the palace in the Eastern Capital. He's called Yang Zhi the Blue-Faced Brute. Their third leader is Wu Song, known as the Pilgrim. He's the Constable Wu who killed the tiger on Jingyang Ridge.
"These three occupy Two-Dragon Mountain, from where they rob and plunder. We've sent troops to catch them several times, but they killed four or five of our officers. We haven't caught one of them to this day!"
"Their skill is superb. So that's who they are—Palace Aide Yang and Major Lu. They certainly deserve their reputation! But don't worry, Excellency. You have me here. I'll nab every one of them and turn them over!"
The prefect was very pleased. He gave a feast in Huyan's honor, then invited him to rest in a guest-house. Of that we'll say no more.

Kong Liang was leading the remnants of his beaten unit along the road. Suddenly, a band of men and horses emerged from among the trees. The bold fellow at their head was Wu Song the Pilgrim. Kong Liang rolled from his saddle and kowtowed.
"I trust all has gone well with you, sir warrior!"
Wu Song hastily returned the salutation. He raised Kong Liang to his feet.
"I heard you two brothers had occupied White Tiger Mountain and formed a righteous gathering," he said. "Several times I intended to pay my respects. But I wasn't able leave our stronghold, and the road to your place is difficult, so I couldn't get to see you. What brings you here today?"
Kong Liang told how his brother was captured while trying to rescue their uncle Kong Bin.
"Don't be upset, friend," said Wu Song. "I have six or seven brothers with me in our band on Two-Dragon Mountain. The other day Li Zhong and Zhou Tong on Peach Blossom Mountain were strongly attacked by government troops from Qingzhou, and they asked for our assistance. Lu and Yang went with some of our forces and fought Huyan Zhuo all day. For some reason, he and his men suddenly left in the night. The Peach Blossom Mountain people feasted Lu and Yang and me and presented us with a snowy hoofed steed. I'm taking our first contingent back to our stronghold. Lu and Yang are following and will soon be here. I'll tell them to raid Qingzhou and save your uncle and brother. How will that be?"
Kong Liang thanked Wu Song. After a considerable wait, Lu Zhishen and Yang Zhi arrived with their cavalry. Wu Song introduced Kong Liang.
"I once met Song Jiang in his manor and put him to a lot of trouble," Wu said. "Today, for the sake of chivalry, we can combine the forces of the three mountain strongholds, attack Qingzhou, kill the prefect, capture Huyan Zhuo, and divide the money and grain in the storehouses for the use of our various bands. What do you say?"
"Just what I was thinking," asserted Lu Zhishen. "Let's notify Peach Blossom Mountain, and ask Li Zhong and Zhou Tong to bring their men. The three bands can strike Qingzhou together."
"It's a sturdily built city, its armed forces are strong, and Huyan Zhuo is a courageous fellow," mused Yang Zhi. "I don't mean to disparage us, but if you want to succeed you'd better take my advice."
"Let's hear your strategy, brother," said Wu Song. Yang Zhi spoke briefly, he wasted no words. And as a result, smoke rose from the ruins of every house of the citizens of Qingzhou, and the heroes of the Marsh ground their fists into their palms as they advanced belligerently.

Now in the Assembly Hall Chao Gai, Song Jiang, the Professor, Taoist Gongsun and the rest had requested the Spearsman to teach them the moves with the hooked spear. The Spearsman was as might be expected a fine figure of a man, extremely tall, with a pale face and a fine black moustache and whiskers, a solid trunk and broad shoulders.
When the Spearsman had chosen his trainees, he left the Assembly Hall and taking up a hooked spear started to do exercises with it. The onlookers applauded. Then he began to instruct them: "Generally when we use this weapon on horseback we strike from the waist and it goes step by step: seven forward moves — three hooks and four parries, followed by a thrust and a slash, making nine moves in all. If you are using the hooked spear on foot, then it's even better. First eight steps and four thrusts. That opens the gate. On the twelfth step, the first change. On the sixteenth turn about, hooking with the spear. On the twenty-fourth push up, then down. Hook to the east, parry to the west. On the thirty-sixth step keep your guard up and you've got 'em. That's how you fight with the hooked spear."
The Spearsman explained the method move by move, demonstrating each one to the assembled leaders, who were highly appreciative of the performance. From that day on those who had been selected, the nimblest and strongest, practised from dawn to dusk, while the infantry were also taught how to conceal themselves in the woods and trip the enemy horses. In less than a fortnight six or seven hundred had been trained, to the great satisfaction of Song Jiang and the other leaders. They were now ready to take on the enemy.
Now since the loss of the Supremo and Thunderer, Twin Rods had been coming daily to the water's edge to challenge his opponents to combat. But the mountain stronghold only gave orders for the boat captains to strengthen all shore defences and to fix concealed stakes in the water. Although Twin Rods had reconnoitred the roads on the north and west of the mountain, he could find no way of reaching the main stronghold.
Mount Liang now gave Thunderer a fixed time-limit for preparing various kinds of missile to be taken down and used against the enemy. Those who were to use the hooked spear technique had already completed their training.
Song Jiang said: "I may well be wrong, but I have a plan and I'd like everyone's opinion."
The Professor said: "We would like to hear your plan."
"For the coming engagement, let us not use cavalry. Let everyone fight on foot. We will use a tactic of Sunzi's, taking advantage of the rough and marshy terrain. The infantry will march down the mountain in ten divisions, with the objective of luring the enemy on. When their attack starts, everyone will take off into the reeds and undergrowth. Troops with hooked spears will already be lying in ambush there, and with every group of ten trained in the use of the hooked spear there will be ten more with snaring hooks. When the cavalry charge they will throw them down with their thrusting and hooking, and the others will use their snaring hooks to snag them. We will also have ambushes like this along the narrow paths in the flat areas. What do you think of it?"
"A great way to preserve our numbers and capture their leaders," said the Professor.
"This is exactly the right way to employ hooked spears and snaring hooks," said the Spearsman.
Song Jiang divided his troops into ten sections. The Red-Haired Devil and Skyscraper led one section; the two Mu brothers led another; one was led by Morbid and the Nine-Tailed Turtle; another by Whiskers and Redeye; one by Snake and Scorpion; one by the Forester and Rhinoceros, uncle and nephew; one by Steelbright and Short-Arse, the husband and wife team; one by the Pill Monger and the Flautist; one by the Dandy and Whitey; one by Panther and Green-Eyes. These ten sections of foot soldiers went down the mountain first, to draw the enemy on. After them went the White-Water Dragon, the Pilot and White Eel, the three Ruan brothers, the two Tong brothers and Flagpole. These nine boat captains were to support the campaign in boats. Then six leaders on horseback, Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, Skyhawk, Mr. Chai, Colonel Sun and Golden Wings were to challenge the enemy on the slopes of the mountain. Thunderer and Uglymug were to command the artillery. The Spearsman and Spots were in charge of the troops with hooked spears; the troops of the main contingent were led by Song Jiang, the Professor, Taoist Gongsun, the Magic Messenger, the Little Duke and the Halberdier. These dispositions were announced and the remaining leaders were charged with guarding the various camps.
When Song Jiang had completed these arrangements, in the middle of the night, the troops with the hooked spears went down first and were ferried across the water and placed in ambush all about. In the early hours of the morning the ten contingents of infantry set off. Thunderer and Uglymug took wind shells and set up their guns on a high point, erecting racks and placing the shells on them. The Spearsman and Spots crossed the water with their signals. At first light Song Jiang surrounded by his troops beside the water, began drumming, shouting and waving banners.
Twin Rods inside his tent heard the noise. After receiving the reports from his lookouts, he sent Victorious with the advance guard to reconnoitre. The cavalry units were now linked together and Twin Rods himself donned full armour and mounted his famous black charger with the white socks. Brandishing his two rods and urging on the horses and carts he thundered towards the Marshes of Mount Liang.
Song Jiang could be seen beside the water, leading a detachment of his troops. Twin Rods ordered his forces to deploy. Victorious, leader of the vanguard, rode up to consult him: "Over there to the south there's a company of infantry. Do we know how many there are?"
"Don't worry about that," said Twin Rods. "Just get the linked cavalry to charge!"
Victorious took five hundred troops to make a quick reconnaissance and found that another group of enemy infantry had appeared to the south-east. He was about to send some of his men to investigate when he noticed another cluster of banners over to the south-west, where a great deal of flag-waving and shouting was going on. He led his troops back and reported to Twin Rods: "There's three companies to the south all with Mount Liang banners."
Twin Rods said: "The blighters have been lying low for such a long time. They must have some plan."
He had hardly finished speaking when a loud explosion was heard to the north. Twin Rods began cursing. "That must mean Thunderer's gone over to the bandits and taught them gunnery."
Now they all turned from the south and saw the banners of three divisions waving to the north. Twin Rods said to Victorious: "So that's their dastardly plan. We'd better divide our army in half. I'll attack the ones on the north and you attack the lot to the south."
But before they could put this plan into action, four more divisions appeared to the west. Twin Rods began to feel uneasy. A whole string of explosions was now heard from the north and shots began landing on the hillside nearby. The firing came from a big gun that was surrounded by forty-nine smaller ones, known as the "Mother and Sons." The noise when it fired was truly awesome. Twin Rod's troops were thrown into confusion before the fighting had even begun. Running this way and that, they become mixed up with the troops led by Victorious.
The ten divisions of enemy infantry, when attacked, simply melted away on every side. Enraged, Twin Rods concentrated his attack on the north. Song Jiang's men ran in all directions taking cover in the reedbeds. Twin Rods now attempted to sweep them away with his linked cavalry. The armoured horses galloped all together and had no means of stopping. They galloped straight into this tangle of withered reeds, and dead undergrowth. There amid a cacophony of whistled signals the experts with the hooked spears went into action. They attacked the legs of the horses on either end of the row and those in the middle panicked. The troops with the snagging hooks then subdued them and all over the wasteland people busied themselves tying up the prisoners.
Twin Rods realized that he had been caught in a trap with the hooked spearsmen. He pulled up his horse and galloped away south to look for Victorious. From behind him the wind shells began to whistle over his head. On this side and that, on every hill or stretch of wasteland, it was nothing but pursuing infantry. The linked cavalry of Victorious and Twin Rods had galloped pell-mell into the undergrowth where they were tripped and taken. Both leaders now realized that they had been outwitted. They galloped about in all directions trying to locate their cavalry and find a way out. But all these paths were thick with the banners of Mount Liang and there was no route they could take with any confidence. In the end they turned north-west. When they had gone not much over a mile a group of bandits appeared. The two fellows who commanded them blocked the road. One was Mu the Unstoppable and the other was Mu the Irrepressible. Each held a stout halberd. "You're defeated!" they shouted. "It's useless trying to escape."
Twin Rods was furious. Weaving his rods he galloped straight at them. After four or five bouts Mu the Irrepressible galloped off. Fearing a trap Twin Rods did not give chase but took the main route to the north.
At this point another group of bandits appeared on the mountainside and blocked his path. One was Snake and the other was Scorpion. They bore down on him, each armed with a trident. Twin Rods whirled his rods again and attacked. After five or six bouts Snake and Scorpion broke off and fled. But Twin Rods had not gone more than a few hundred metres when twenty-four hooked spear specialists appeared from either side and swept towards him. Twin Rods had no more stomach for the fight. He turned his horse's head north-eastward and fled along the road. Here he came upon the husband and wife pair, Short-Arse and Steelbright, standing in the way. His road was blocked and in addition escape on either side was hindered by thorny grass. Twin Rods slapped his horse, whirled his rods, and tried to force a way through. Short-Arse and Steelbright followed, but they couldn't catch him. He got away to the north-east.
Twin Rods had suffered a huge defeat and his forces had been scattered like raindrops.

The foe like a threatening storm appear;
The black horse turns and gallops free.
Linked cavalry fall to the skill of the spear.
The general into the wilds must flee.

Now our story divides. Song Jiang ordered the gong to be sounded, signalling withdrawal to the mountain stronghold, where all claimed their reward. Of the three thousand linked cavalry, a good half had been demolished by the hooked spears. The dead and dying horses were flayed and then used for food. The remaining good horses were taken up the mountain and fed well, to be used for riding. Their armoured riders were captured alive and also taken to the mountain. The five thousand foot soldiers found themselves surrounded on three sides and fled towards the army in the centre, where they were thrown down and captured by men with hooked spears. Those who fled towards the water were cut off by the sailors and picked up in their boats, after which they were rowed across to the landing and taken up the mountain.
All the horses and men previously captured by the government troops were rescued and returned to the stronghold. The camp that Twin Rods had set up was razed to the ground. The small camp at the water's edge was rebuilt, as were the two inns and other buildings that served as the stronghold's eyes, with Blackface and Auntie Gu, the Guv and the Flea reinstated as the landlords. The Red-Haired Devil and Skyscraper having captured Victorious bound him and took him a prisoner to the mountain stronghold. When Song Jiang saw him he personally loosed his bonds and invited him into the hall, where he courteously apologized and entertained him with a banquet. They got the Supremo and Thunderer to encourage him to join the company. Victorious was in fact one of the seventy-two baleful stars, so it is no surprise that he willingly consented to join them and became one of the leaders on Mount Liang. Song Jiang then prepared a letter and sent someone to get the family of Victorious and bring them to join him on the mountain. Song Jiang was delighted to have broken up the linked cavalry and to have gained new troops, armour, helmets and weapons, and there was feasting every day. The stronghold's defences and lookouts were put back on their old footing. Of this no more.

As for Twin Rods, having lost many troops, he dared not return to the capital. He rode away by himself on the black horse with white socks, his armour tied on the horse's back. He was looking for a refuge, but he had no money for his expenses. He unfastened his silver belt and sold it to provide himself with funds. As he rode along he thought to himself: "Who would have thought that today I would be so down on my luck? Where can I take refuge?"

Suddenly the thought came to him: "Governor Murong of Qingzhou and I have known each other many a year, why don't I go to him? If I can get his sister the imperial concubine on my side I may be able to get hold of another army to avenge all this."

After travelling for two days he found himself hungry and thirsty when evening came. Seeing a country inn beside the road, he dismounted, tethered his horse to a tree outside and entered. He laid his two rods on the table and sat down. He asked the waiter to bring him wine and food.

"We only sell wine here," the waiter said. "But if you want meat, they've just killed a sheep in the village. I can go and buy some mutton if you like."

Twin Rods unslung his provisions bag and took out some money in loose silver which he gave to the waiter, saying: "See if you can get a mutton leg to cook for me, and make sure you feed my horse. Tonight I shall stay here in your place. Tomorrow I go on to Qingzhou."

The waiter said: "Your Honour, you can stay here if you like, but I can't offer you a good bed."

"I'm a soldier," said Twin Rods. "So long as there's somewhere to lie down it'll be good enough."

While the waiter went off with the silver to buy mutton, Twin Rods unloaded his armour from the horse, loosened his belt and sat down in front of the door. It seemed a long time before the waiter reappeared, bearing a leg of mutton. Twin Rods told him to boil the mutton, make some pancakes with three catties of flour and bring three measures of wine. While he was cooking the meat and making the pancakes the waiter also heated water for Twin Rods to wash his feet. Then he put the horse in a little stable at the back of the house. He cut grass and cooked some oats for the horse. Twin Rods told him to warm some wine so he could have a drink first. Soon the meat was done and Twin Rods asked the waiter for more wine to drink with the meat. Then he said: "I am an officer of the imperial guard. Because I have suffered a setback in my plan to destroy Mount Liang I am heading for Governor Murong's in Qingzhou. Make sure you take good care of my horse. He's a very special horse, known as a snowy-footed black steed, a gift from the Emperor himself. You can be sure that I will reward you well."

"I am very grateful to Your Honour," said the waiter. "But there is something Your Honour should know. Not far from here there's this mountain, called Mount Peachblossom. There's a band of robbers up there. The chief is called Li Zhong, the Tiger-Killer, and his henchman is Zhou Tong, the Big Chief. They've got together an army of six or seven hundred and they go around robbing and plundering. They're always stirring up trouble in the region. The authorities keep sending out special troops to catch them but they've never been able to. You'd best be on your guard, Your Honour, and sleep lightly tonight."

Twin Rods said: "Ten thousand men could not stand up against me, let them all come, if they like, the whole bloody lot of them, who cares? You just make sure you look after my horse properly."

When he had eaten and drunk enough, the waiter made up a bed for him.

Now partly because Twin Rods had been having such a wearisome time, and partly because he had drunk a few cups too many, he lay down without even bothering to undress. He slept undisturbed till around midnight, when he awoke suddenly to hear the waiter cursing away to himself at the back of the house. He jumped up at once, grabbed his two rods and ran to the back of the house. "What are you making such a noise for?" he asked.

The waiter replied: "I got up to fetch grass and I saw that the fence was broken and Your Honour's horse had been stolen. I could still see some torches away in the distance. That must be where they're heading."

"Where do you mean?" Twin Rods asked.

"It's the road those robbers from Mount Peachblossom take, no doubt about it," said the waiter.

Twin Rods was devastated. He made the waiter lead him across the rice fields for several miles, but the torches had vanished and they had no means of knowing which way to go.

Twin Rods said: "I've lost the Emperor's horse! Now what am I going to do?"

"Tomorrow Your Honour must go to the authorities and report it," the waiter said. "They'll send troops to catch them and then you'll get your horse back."

But Twin Rods' sorrow knew no bounds. He sat there till day came and then, telling the waiter to carry his armour, set out for Qingzhou. It was getting dark when they reached the city and they spent the night at an inn. Next day at dawn he was outside the courtroom asking to see Governor Murong. The Governor had quite a surprise. "I was told you had been sent to apprehend the bandits of Mount Liang, Commander," he said. "What are you doing here?"

Twin Rods told him all that we have just recounted. Governor Murong said: "Although you've lost a lot of troops, it wasn't deliberate, you were caught out by the bandits' wiles, there was nothing you could do about it. In this district which I govern we have suffered many depredations from bandits. Since you are now here, you can clean up Mount Peachblossom and get the Emperor's horse back. Then you can go on to Twin Dragon Peak and White Tiger Mountain and hunt down the robbers in those two hideouts. When you've dealt with that mess, I will do my utmost to have you reinstated to lead a force against Mount Liang and have your revenge. How about that?"

Twin Rods prostrated himself again and said: "I am deeply grateful to you for your concern in this matter. If you will do this I shall be indebted to you till my dying day."

Governor Murong invited Twin Rods to go to a guest-room and rest. He provided him with clothing, lodging and food. The waiter who had carried the armour was sent home.

After three days, Twin Rods was impatient to recover the Emperor's horse, and kept asking Governor Murong for the troops. The Governor accordingly let him have two thousand infantry and gave him a black horse. Twin Rods thanked him, armed himself and mounted and led his troops forth in search of the missing horse, heading for Mount Peachblossom.

Now on Mount Peachblossom the Tiger-Killer and the Big Chief had spent every day since the capture of the Emperor's horse in carousing. That day one of their hidden scouts returned and reported: "Troops from Qingzhou are heading this way!"

The Big Chief rose to his feet and said: "You look after the camp, brother, while I go and send them packing!" He chose a hundred troops, grasped his spear, mounted and rode off down the mountain to encounter the government forces.

When Twin Rods and his two thousand government troops reached the mountain, they deployed in battle formation. Twin Rods rode out in front and bellowed: "Come out and surrender, you thieves and robbers!"

The Big Chief ordered his troops to spread out in a straight line. Then he rode out in front with his spear at the ready. Twin Rods charged him. The Big Chief urged his horse on to the encounter. The two horses clashed, but after only half a dozen bouts the Big Chief feeling that his strength was failing turned his horse's head and galloped off up the mountain. Twin Rods pursued him some way, but fearing a trap hurriedly turned back and set up camp at the bottom to wait and fight another day.

When the Big Chief returned to the stronghold, he told the Tiger-Killer: "Twin Rods is a great fighter. We can't handle him. All we can do is withdraw up the mountain, and if he follows us up here I don't know what we are going to do!"

The Tiger-Killer said: "I have heard that Lu Zhishen, the Flowery Monk, is at the Temple of the Precious Pearl on Twin Dragon Peak. He's got a lot of followers. And there is also someone called Yang Zhi, the Blue-Faced Beast. And there's a new arrival there, 'Pilgrim' Wu Song, who's got the courage of ten thousand. We'd better write them a letter, asking them to send troops to relieve us. To get ourselves out of this mess we'd better accept their authority over us. At the end of the month we can pay them some tribute."

"I know only too well how courageous they are. I'm just afraid that that monk may remember about what happened before and not want to help us," said the Big Chief.

The Tiger-Killer laughed and said: "Remember how he beat you up and stole a whole lot of our gold and silver cups? But why should he bear us any grudge? He has a generous nature. If he sends troops here to help us, I'm sure he will lead them himself."

"No doubt you're right," said the Big Chief.

They wrote the letter and sent two quick-witted men with it. The messengers stole down the far side of the mountain and headed for Twin Dragon Peak. They reached it in two days. First they made detailed inquiries. They were told that there were three leaders in the great hall of the Temple of the Precious Pearl. Chief of them was Lu Zhishen, the Flowery Monk, second in command was Yang Zhi, the Blue-Faced Beast, third was "Pilgrim" Wu Song.

There were four lesser chiefs on the gate lower down the mountain: one was Shi En, the Young Master (this was the son of the Warden of the Mengzhou prison camp. After Wu Song killed General Zhang and all his family, he fled with all his family and took refuge in the rivers and lakes. Later his parents died and hearing that Wu Song was on Twin Dragon Peak he rushed off to join them). Another was Cao Zheng, the Knife (he was the butcher who had been with Zhishen and the Blue-Faced Beast at the outset, when they seized the Temple of the Precious Pearl, after killing Deng Long). Also there were Zhang Qing, the Gardener and Sister Sun, the Ogress (these two were husband and wife. They had resided at Crossways Rise on the Mengzhou road, selling meat pies made with human flesh. They had joined the band because the Monk and the Pilgrim had written many letters inviting them).

When the Knife heard there was a letter from Mount Peachblossom, he asked for details, and then sent some one up to the great hall to inform the three chiefs. Zhishen, the Flowery Monk, said: "When I first left Mount Wutai, I spent the night in the neighbourhood of Mount Peachblossom, and I gave that Big Chief a bloody good hiding. As for that Tiger-Killer, when he knew it was me he invited me up the mountain for a day's drinking and called me his brother, wanted me to join them as one of their leaders. But they were stingy bastards, so I decamped with some of their silver. Now they're asking for help. Well, let's see what they have to say. Let their men come on up."

The Knife had only been gone a few moments when the messengers appeared in the hall. They saluted and said: "Governor Murong has recently received Commander Huyan known as Twin Rods, after his defeat at the hands of Mount Liang. Governor Murong has now ordered the destruction of the three strongholds, that is to say, our Mount Peachblossom, Twin Dragon Peak and White Tiger Mountain, and is going to let Twin Rods have troops to subdue Mount Liang and have his revenge on them. Our leaders are now asking you to come and help them. Later, when things are quieter we will pay you some tribute."

The Blue-Faced Beast said: "Supposing we just guard our own stronghold and protect the mountain, without offering them any help. I see two problems: firstly it will not improve relations between the heroes of the rivers and lakes, and secondly, if those bastards capture Mount Peachblossom, they will not have much respect for us here. Let us leave the Gardener, Sister Sun, the Young Master and the Knife to look after our stronghold while we three go and lend them a hand."

Accordingly five hundred foot soldiers and more than six hundred cavalry, fully equipped and armed, were detailed to go to Mount Peachblossom.

When the Tiger-Killer heard the news from Twin Dragon Peak he took three hundred troops down the mountain to meet them. But Twin Rods heard about this and quickly drawing his troops up to block the way, rode out to receive the Tiger-Killer, whirling his rods.

This Tiger-Killer was a native of Dingyuan in Haozhou and his family had always made their living by giving demonstrations with spear and staff. People called him the Tiger-Killer because of his great bodily strength. But when he came down the mountain to join battle with Twin Rods, how would he fare? After ten bouts he saw that things were not looking good for him, so he put up his weapon and fled. This behaviour was contemptible to Twin Rods, who galloped in pursuit. The Big Chief, who was stationed halfway up the mountain, began raining down ballista missiles the size of goose eggs and Twin Rods was obliged hurriedly to turn his horse and gallop down again.

The government troops were now raising a continuous outcry. "What's all the shouting about?" Twin Rods asked. "A column of troops is approaching," they told him.

He rode to the rear to see for himself. He saw a cloud of dust and at the head of the troops a big monk, riding a white horse. Now who was this? Well, listen:

Since the day he was shaved, when he came to the monkhood, far and wide has he wandered, in search of good men. There's huge strength in those shoulders, violence is his birthright. He'll swindle the Buddha and shout at Guanyin! His monk's knife and staff give off a cold glint. Scripture is unknown to him, he's a stranger to fasting. It's the Flowery Monk, of course, it's Lu Zhishen.

Monk Lu Zhishen shouted out: "These fuckers are the rabble defeated by the company from the Marshes of Mount Liang, and they think they can come here and frighten us!"

"You're the first I'll kill, you bald scoundrel!" Twin Rods shouted back. "You've really wound me up!"

The two horses converged, with Zhishen twirling his monk's staff and Twin Rods flourishing his rods. They fought forty or fifty bouts but neither had the advantage. Twin Rods was secretly admiring his opponent: "What skill he has, this monk!"

Gongs were now sounded on either side and the two rejoined their armies to rest awhile. After a brief respite, Twin Rods urged his horse forward again and cried: "Come out and meet me again, you bald scoundrel! Your hour has come, you're going to taste defeat!" The Monk was about to ride forth, but another hero had taken offence and shouted: "Take a rest brother, I'll capture the bugger for you!"

Who was this then, charging at Twin Rods with whirling sword? Listen:

Once a commander of the imperial guard in the capital, disaster struck when he was involved in the transport of precious plants and stones: the stars were unpropitious. His sword can subdue the universe, his bow can settle the world. His strength combines the tiger's ferocity, the wolf's flexibility, the monkey's agility; he rides a fiery stallion, seated firmly on an embossed saddle. This hero's fame will enhance Mount Liang. This is the leader whom men call Yang Zhi, the Blue-Faced Beast.

And so the Blue-Faced Beast rode out to do battle with Twin Rods. They fought more than forty bouts but neither could prevail. When Twin Rods saw how skilful his opponent was, he said to himself: "Where have these two come from? They're real professionals! This is not the kind of thing you'd expect from the greenwood."

When the Blue-Faced Beast saw that Twin Rods fought with such spirit, he feinted and then turned his horse and galloped back to his own ranks. Twin Rods likewise reined in his horse. He did not give chase. Both sides now withdrew their troops.

The Monk discussed matters with the Blue-Faced Beast. "We have got this far, but we must not try to reach the lower camp. Let us withdraw a few miles and tomorrow we will come to fight again." They withdrew their troops to a camp at the foot of a nearby ridge.

Twin Rods sat in his tent, gloomily turning things over in his mind: "I had thought it would all be as simple as splitting bamboo to capture this bunch of rebels. Who would have thought I was going to meet adversaries like these! It's just my luck!" He had got no further when a messenger from Governor Murong suddenly appeared and shouted: "You are to bring your troops back to protect the city, General! Two bandits from White Tiger Mountain, 'Blazing Comet' Kong Ming and 'Red Star' Kong Liang are marching with their troops on Qingzhou in search of provisions. The provincial stores are at risk. I am sent to ask you to return and organize the city's defences."

Twin Rods needed no further prompting. He led his troops back to the city by forced marches.

Next day the Monk, together with the Blue-Faced Beast and the Pilgrim, led the army forth with much cheering and waving of banners. When they reached the foot of the mountain, not a single enemy soldier was to be seen. They were quite amazed. The Tiger-Killer and the Big Chief led their troops down from the mountain and invited the three leaders up to their stronghold. Oxen and horses were slaughtered and a big feast was held in the guests' honour, while scouts were sent down to find out what was going on in the area.

When Twin Rods arrived back in the city with his army, he saw a column of troops approaching. Heading it were the two sons of Squire Kong of White Tiger Mountain, Blazing Comet and Red Star. These two because they had a quarrel with a rich man of the district, had killed his whole household, worthy and base, had gathered six or seven hundred men and set up shop on White Tiger Mountain, robbing and pillaging. Because their uncle, Kong Bin, lived in Qingzhou City he was arrested and imprisoned by Governor Murong. So Blazing Comet and Red Star marshalled their troops in the stronghold and moved to attack Qingzhou, with the aim of rescuing their uncle. Now they came up against the army of Twin Rods. The two sides engaged in a furious skirmish. Twin Rods rode out in front of his troops. Governor Murong, watching from the city gate tower, saw Blazing Comet lead the attack, charging with levelled lance straight at Twin Rods. The two horses clashed and they fought some twenty bouts. Twin Rods was eager to show off his skill in front of Governor Murong. Not rating Blazing Comet's fighting ability particularly highly, he contented himself with blocking and parrying. At the height of the contest, Twin Rods suddenly took Blazing Comet prisoner. Red Star could only lead his men off the field. Governor Murong from his tower signalled to Twin Rods to give chase. The government troops ambushed and captured a hundred or more, while Red Star's troops were routed and fled in disarray. At nightfall they found refuge in an old temple.

Having captured Blazing Comet, Twin Rods brought him into the city and went to see the Governor. The Governor was well pleased. He ordered Blazing Comet to be fitted with a heavy cangue and confined to prison, in the same cell as his uncle. The troops were rewarded and Twin Rods was entertained and questioned about Mount Peachblossom.

Twin Rods said: "I had thought it was just a case of 'To catch a turtle in a jar, put your hand in and there you are.' But a whole gang of bandits came to their rescue, one of whom was a monk, and another a big blue-faced fellow. I fought them both and had no success. Both have skills that are quite out of the ordinary, not at all what you would expect from outlaws. Otherwise I would have beaten them."

"That monk," said Governor Murong, "is the Old Field Marshal's former camp commandant in Yan'an, Major Lu Da. Nowadays he has shaved his head and become a monk under the name of Lu Zhishen, also known as the Flowery Monk. The one with the blue face is a former colonel of the palace guard, Yang Zhi, known as the Blue-Faced Beast. And there's another one, a wandering monk called Pilgrim Wu Song, who used to be Captain Wu Song, the one who killed the tiger on Jingyang Pass. These three have occupied Twin Dragon Peak, and devote themselves to plundering and pillaging. They have repeatedly clashed with the government forces and killed four or five hundred personnel of the anti-brigand brigade. Until now we haven't been able to capture them."

"Well, I can vouch for their military prowess," said Twin Rods. "So it's Colonel Yang and Major Lu, is it? Their reputation is no lie! But put your heart at rest. I know all about their skills now. Sooner or later I will capture all of them, one by one."

This was just what the Governor wanted to hear. He held a banquet in Twin Rods' honour and then invited him to rest in a guest-room.

Meanwhile Red Star was leading the shattered remnants of his army through a wood when he suddenly came upon a body of troops, led by a fine-looking warrior.

When this turned out to be Pilgrim Wu Song, Red Star quickly slid from the saddle and prostrated himself. "I trust you are in good health, sir?" he said.

Pilgrim Wu Song hastened to raise him up, saying: "I have heard about you and your brothers occupying White Tiger Mountain and raising a company. I often wanted to come and see you, but either I couldn't get down the mountain or the way was not clear, and so we were not able to meet. What brings you here today?"

Red Star told all about how they had wanted to rescue his uncle and how he had lost his brother.

Wu Song said: "Don't worry. There are six or seven of us who have a company on Twin Dragon Peak. We have been asked for help by the Tiger-Killer and Big Chief of Mount Peachblossom who were being attacked by the government forces. Our two leaders, Lu Zhishen and Yang Zhi took the men out to fight General Huyan, known as Twin Rods. They fought for a whole day, but then in the evening Twin Rods took himself off. The Mount Peachblossom lot gave us a banquet and made us a gift of the Emperor's horse. Now we are all heading for home. The other two are not far behind. Suppose I get them to go and attack Qingzhou and rescue your uncle and brother?"

Red Star thanked the Pilgrim most humbly. After a long wait, Monk Lu Zhishen and the Blue-Faced Beast came riding up. The Pilgrim introduced Red Star to them and said: "That time when I was with Song Jiang at the Kong's we were in all sorts of trouble. Now I think we should put honour first and combine the troops of all three mountain strongholds in order to attack Qingzhou, kill Governor Murong, capture Twin Rods, and seize enough government stores and money to supply all of us. How about it?"

"I am of the same opinion," said the Monk. "Let us send someone to inform them on Mount Peachblossom and tell the Tiger-Killer and Big Chief to bring their men here and we'll all of us go and attack Qingzhou."

But the Blue-Faced Beast said: "Qingzhou is strongly defended, it has good troops. And besides, there's Twin Rods who is a brave fighter. I'm not trying to belittle our strength, but if you want to attack Qingzhou, the only way is to do as I say. If you do, we'll succeed in due course."

"What do you suggest, then, brother?" said the Pilgrim. The Blue-Faced Beast replied briefly, but his words cannot be given in one sentence, and they were to have an important result:

In Qingzhou, a mass of broken isles and the smoke rising;
In the Marshes, each hero will rub his hands with glee.

ONE day after choosing his men for the use of the hooked spears Xu Ning entered the hall and took a hooked spear himself, and showed the assembled leaders some of his tricks. They applauded his skill. He then said to his men, "On horseback there are nine ways of handling the hooked spear, but on foot there are changes in every twelve paces." He then went through all these movements, and explained them. The leaders were much pleased at the exhibition and arrangements were made for a special company to be drilled in these methods from early morning till night. Within a fortnight there were fully five hundred men who could use the hooked spear.

During this time General Huyan Zhuo marched his men daily to the banks of the lake without meeting any opposition.

The bandits were in hiding watching these movements without showing themselves. Song Jiang said, "Friends, I have a plan, but do not know whether you will approve of it. I propose that tomorrow we should attack on foot, not a single man should be mounted on horseback. The men will be divided into ten companies and when the enemy advances our men must retreat into the reeds and brambles. Then as the enemy is close our men must use their halberds and hooked spears, and drag them off their horses, and make them prisoners. We must select an open plain with many narrow paths leading off on all sides into grass. What do you think of my plan?"

"It is a good idea," said Wu Yong.

Xu Ning also agreed with this. That day Song Jiang divided his men into ten companies, and they all left the mountain and crossed the lake. By 3 A.M. the following morning they had all found their hiding places. The cannons had also been transported and stationed on high ground.
The next day about 10 A.M. Song Jiang gave the signal, and all the men showed themselves with flags, and much beating of drums and gongs. General Huyan Zhuo was duly informed of this display, and sent Colonel Han Tao forward to attack. The horses were covered with armor. General Huyan Zhuo mounted his horse, and held an iron bludgeon in each hand. He ordered a general advance as he wished to annihilate the bandits. Colonel Han Tao came to have a final talk before the attack. He said, "On the south side there are many bandits on foot."
"Never mind how many there are," replied General Huyan; "attack them at once with the cavalry."
Colonel Han Tao led five hundred cavalry to the attack, but before he had gone far he saw two large bodies of men on foot towards the southeast and west. He therefore halted, and dividing his cavalry into three, gave each body its objective. He himself, however, returned to General Huyan Zhuo, and reported the position. The General said, "These bandits have not faced us for a long time, and they may employ some strategem." While he was saying this the bandits' artillery began to boom. "Those guns must be the work of Ling Zhen who has surrendered to the bandits." Looking round they now saw many bandits towards the north. He continued, "This must be a trick of the bandits, I will divide our troops with you. I will take half to the north while you take the rest towards the south." Again looking round he saw many brigands on the west side, and was surprised. There were booms on the north side, which sent shots quite near where they were then standing.
The shells exploded with great noise and about nine shots were thrown in all directions. Orders were given for a divided attack in all four directions, but as the troops advanced the bandits retreated on all sides. General Huyan Zhuo was annoyed at this, and galloped off towards the north side. He urged his cavalry to pursue the retreating bandits. When they reached a place full of reeds and bushes the cavalry became split up to follow the small paths. When they had gone some distance like this the troops heard a whistle blown in their rear, and immediately men sprang from hiding places, armed with hooked spears. The troops on the two wings were surrounded, and dragged off their horses in less than no time.
General Huyan Zhuo seeing the position extracted himself, and galloped off towards the south side of the plain. Upon reaching there he found that Colonel Han Tao had met with the same fate. The two saw brigands on all the roads, but seeing a weak spot towards the northwest they galloped off in that direction followed by a few of their cavalry. However they had only gone about two li when they found further progress blocked by a body of bandits in charge of two leaders who shouted out, "Defeated generals cannot pass!" General Huyan Zhuo was angry, and dashed forward to attack the two leaders. After about five bouts one leader retreated, but General Huyan Zhuo suspecting a trick did not pursue him. Instead he galloped off towards the north. Soon however he met another body of bandits with two leaders, and again he galloped to engage in combat. After about five bouts both leaders retreated. Huyan Zhuo pursued them, and he had only gone about a quarter of a li when he was attacked on both sides by about twenty-four men with hooked spears. General Huyan had no mind to fight with them so he turned his horse and galloped off. He, however, found that Wang Ying and Hu San Niang now blocked the road he had come. He saw that on either hand were many brambles so that there was no way of escape. He therefore urged the horse forward, and whirled aloft his two iron bludgeons.
He dashed past the two leaders who followed him. General Huyan Zhuo was now looking out for some of his men, but could not see a single one.
Just then Song Jiang gave the signal for a general return to Liangshan Marsh. About fifteen hundred horses had been wounded, and these were killed, and flesh used as food. An equal number of horses were captured, and were added to the bandits stock. About five thousand soldiers were taken prisoners. The camps of General Huyan Zhuo were all destroyed, and the new buildings were erected as inns at the foot of the mountain. When Song Jiang saw the prisoners he at once released Colonel Han Tao and many officers and he got Peng Qi and Ling Zhen to persuade them to join the bandits. Colonel Han Tao agreed to this, as he was destined to be one of the seventy-two leaders at Liangshan Marsh.
General Huyan Zhuo had escaped but having lost all his men he was very despondent as he rode by himself. He realized that he could not return to the capital. He thought, "I never expected to be in such an awful predicament. Where can I go now? The only place is Qingzhou where my old friend Prefect Murong may assist me. He may arrange the matter with the government, and then I may be able to find means of getting my revenge for this defeat."
He traveled in that direction for two days, and then in the evening he came to an inn by the roadside. He was both hungry and thirsty so he tied up his horse, and entered the inn. He sat down, placed his whip on the table, and ordered food. The waiter said that they had only wine, but if Huyan Zhuo would give him the money he would go into the village and buy some meat and food.
Huyan Zhuo did so, and asked him to buy some mutton. He also asked him to give his horse some fodder. He would stay there for the night, and go to Qingzhou in the morning.
"Sir, we have no beds here either," replied the waiter.
"That does not matter as I am an old soldier, and can sleep anywhere," said Huyan Zhuo.
The waiter went to buy the food, and Huyan Zhuo went to look after his horse. He then sat down outside the inn waiting for the waiter to return. Soon the waiter came, and Huyan Zhuo sat down for his evening meal. He told the waiter who he was, and said that he would depart for Qingzhou Prefecture the following day.
"Sir, I will tell you something. Not far from here is Taohua Mountain where there are some bandits named Li Zhong, nicknamed 'Tiger Fighting General,' and his company. There are about five hundred men in that band, and they are always raiding the surrounding villages. In fact they come here often so that tonight you must be wary."
"That will not upset me," said Huyan Zhuo, "I should not be afraid even if all of them came. You just take care of my horse."
As Huyan Zhuo had now finished his supper, the waiter prepared a temporary bed for him. That day he had been very melancholy, and in addition he had drunk rather a lot of wine so that he lay down to sleep without taking off his clothing. About 4 A.M. he was awakened, and heard the waiter complaining at the back of the inn. He jumped up, and taking his two whips he went to the door, and called out, "Why are you complaining like that?"
"I came out to feed your horse," replied the waiter, "and saw that a part of the fence had been broken down. I found that your horse had been taken away. I saw a torchlight about a li away, and it must have been the man stealing your horse."
"What place is in that direction?"
The waiter said it was Taohua Mountain, and Huyan Zhuo insisted upon his going with him to find the road. After they had gone a li the light in front vanished.
"This is a great disaster to me," said Huyan Zhuo, "as that horse was presented to me by the Emperor himself."
"Sir, we cannot do anything further tonight, so we must go back. Tomorrow you can go on to Qingzhou Prefecture, and there get soldiers to recapture the horse for you."
So they returned to the inn, but Huyan Zhuo could not sleep. Early the next morning he asked the waiter to accompany him, and carry his armor. They both set out for Qingzhou Prefecture where they reached after dusk.
Early the next morning General Huyan Zhuo went to the yamen of the Prefect Murong who was surprised to see him, and said, "I have heard that you went to attack the bandits at Liangshan Marsh. How is it that you come here?"
General Huyan Zhuo told the Prefect what had happened, and the latter said, "It was evidently not your fault that your army was defeated and destroyed, but was due to the vile strategy of the bandits. In this district there are many bandits. I want to use you against the brigands at Taohua Mountain, and there you can recover your horse as well. After that I shall ask you to clear the bandits from the Lianglong Mountain, and also the Baihu Mountain. Then if successful I will report the whole matter to the Emperor, and reestablish your command in the army, Then you can take your revenge on the bandits at Liangshan Marsh. What do you say to my proposal?"
"I am deeply grateful for Your Excellency's kind consideration, and shall be much pleased to undertake the task," replied General Huyan Zhuo. "I will pledge my life to repay you."
The Prefect gave him a room in his quarters, and supplied food and clothing. The waiter returned to the inn. After about three days General Huyan Zhuo got three thousand troops from Prefect Murong, and advanced upon Taohua Mountain.
The bandits at Taohua Mountain were delighted at having captured a general's horse, and they celebrated the event with several days' feasting. One day a bandit scout reported that a great many soldiers were approaching. The second leader in command Zhou Tong offered to meet the army, and he took about a hundred men and went down the mountain to meet the opposing army.
General Huyan Zhuo upon seeing the bandits, halted his soldiers and rode forward. He called out to the brigands, "Robbers, be quick to surrender." Upon hearing this challenge Zhou Tong arranged his men, and then riding forward engaged General Huyan Zhuo in conflict. After about seven bouts, however, Zhou Tong realized his own weakness, and retreated giving his men orders to retire to the stronghold on the mountain. General Huyan Zhuo seeing the bandits retiring, remembered his previous experience, and he ordered his army to stop pursuit.
Upon seeing Li Zhong, Zhou Tong explained what had happened, and asked what must be done if the soldiers advanced upon the stronghold. Li Zhong said, "We must get assistance from Lu Da, Yang Zhi, and Wu Song who are famous heroes at the Lianglong Mountain. I will write a letter at once, and send it by messenger. I will tell them that we will compensate them for any losses, and amply reward them for a success."
"I know there are many heroes there," said Zhou Tong, "but I am afraid that the leader Lu Da has an old grudge against us."
Li Zhong laughed at this, "Lu Da is a very straightforward man, and he may not treat us like that. I think that he will come and assist us when the position is fully explained by our messenger." He wrote the letter forthwith, and sent two men with it.
The letter reached the Lianglong Mountain within two days, and the leaders had a conference at the headquarters. The messenger explained that General Huyan Zhuo had been defeated at Liangshan Marsh, and was now endeavoring to retrieve his fortunes by attacking Taohua Mountain and other brigand's strongholds. After listening to the full statement Yang Zhi spoke, "We are independent and each protects his own stronghold. But it is true that if Huyan Zhuo destroys the Taohua Mountain stronghold it will be our turn next. We should therefore go with all our men, and fight together in this common cause."
This was agreed to, and that day five hundred bandits set out for Taohua Mountain.
When Li Zhong at Taohua Mountain heard of the arrival of the reenforcements he marched to meet them with three hundred men. General Huyan Zhuo being informed of this movement assembled his men on the main road. When the two forces met he rode forward to challenge Li Zhong to single combat. Li Zhong was a descendant from military ancestors, and he rode forward to keep up his reputation. After about ten bouts, however, he knew that General Huyan Zhuo was more than his equal, and therefore retired. Huyan Zhuo, however, pursued him up the mountain as he was confident of victory. Zhou Tong, however, seeing this gave orders to his men to throw stones at General Huyan Zhuo, and this hail of stones forced General Huyan to retire also. As he rode back, however, he was surprised to hear loud shouts from the rear of his own army. He then saw there was a large cloud of dust under which a troop of bandits were advancing. He rode forward, and saw that in front of the bandits rode a big fat monk. It was Lu Da, who shouted out, "Where is that prick that was defeated by the heroes at Liangshan Marsh? How dare you come here to disturb us?"
"I will first kill you bald-headed donkey," replied General Huyan Zhuo. "That will appease my anger."
Lu Da advanced flourishing his iron monk's staff, and was met by the General. They fought for about fifty bouts without either gaining an advantage, and at last General Huyan recognized that he had a skillful opponent. Gongs were sounded on both sides as a signal for an interval of rest for both combatants. After a brief rest General Huyan Zhuo dashed forward again, shouting, "Come on, you priestly thief."
Lu Da was on the point of returning to fight when Yang Zhi called out, "Brother, take a rest and I will engage this man." He then urged his horse forward, and met General Huyan Zhuo. They fought for about fifty bouts without either gaining any advantage, and then General Huyan thought, "This is the second man I cannot beat. But where do they come from? They do not look like brigands."
Yang Zhi seeing the skill of his opponent turned his horse to retire. General Huyan did not pursue him, and also retired.
Lu Da spoke to Yang Zhi, "We have just come and cannot encamp so close to this opposing army. Let us withdraw about seven li; and come again tomorrow." This was agreed to, and the bandits retired.
General Huyan Zhuo in his tent felt disappointed, as he had expected to deal with these bandits just as one breaks a piece of bamboo, but he had actually met his equals. He must be ill-fated to get such results. But what could he do just then? However a messenger came from Prefect Murong ordering him to bring the troops back to guard the town. The brigands from Baihu Mountain had arrived and were threatening the town. General Huyan gave orders immediately for a general retreat, and that night all the troops arrived near Qingzhou Prefecture.
The next day when Lu Da, Yang Zhi, and Wu Song led their bandits to the foot of Taohua Mountain, they were very surprised to find that the troops had all gone. It was not long however before Li Zhong and Zhou Tong arrived, and invited the three leaders to go to their stronghold on Taohua Mountain. There a feast was prepared, and matters discussed.
When General Huyan Zhuo reached Qingzhou Prefecture he saw a large body of men was approaching outside the town. They were the brigands from the Baihu Mountain under the leadership Kong Ming and Kong Liang. These two leaders had had a dispute with a wealthy man whom they had killed, and had then escaped to Baihu Mountain where they assembled about five hundred bandits. Because of this murder the Prefect Murong had arrested Kong Bin, the uncle of Kong Ming, and had put him in prison. Kong Ming therefore took the brigands against Qingzhou Prefecture to try to release his uncle from prison.
When General Huyan Zhuo arrived with his army he at once led them against the bandits. Prefect Murong having been informed of the arrival of the troops had taken up his position in a tower gate to watch the battle. General Huyan Zhuo rode out in front of the army, and his challenge was accepted by Kong Ming. The general soon found that his opponent was not very skillful, and soon succeeded in unhorsing him, and taking him prisoner. Upon seeing this Kong Liang gave orders for all the bandits to retreat.
Prefect Murong sent orders for the troops to pursue the brigands, and this was done, capturing about a hundred of them. The other brigands were scattered in all directions, and at last Kong Liang found himself alone, and slept that night in an old temple he came across.
Prefect Murong was much pleased that Kong Ming had been captured, and sent him to prison to join his uncle. The prefect rewarded the troops, and then sat down with General Huyan Zhuo to hear the news of the Taohua Mountain expedition. General Huyan Zhuo said, "The bandits at Taohua Mountain were cornered like a tortoise in a jar, but a strange thing happened. Another body of brigands arrived to attack us. They were led by a big fat monk, and a sallow complexioned man with both of whom I fought, but without success. Their military skill was quite unusual, and the were quite capable of defending themselves."
"I know that monk," said Prefect Murong; "He is Lu Da, who was previously a Major in the army, but afterwards became a monk and then a bandit. The other leader is Yang Zhi who was also previously an officer in the army. There is also another leader Wu Song, an ex-army man also, who is famous for having killed a tiger on Jingyang Ridge. They are now at the Lianglong Mountain, and although we have tried to dislodge them, our troops have failed, and have always been defeated."
"I also have heard of those men," said General Huyan Zhuo, "and certainly they are equal to their reputation. But I am here now, and will see to it that those men are captured."
The next morning when Kong Liang was riding in a forest, he met a body of bandits in charge of Wu Song. He dismounted, saluted, and inquired after his health. The two exchanged compliments and related what had happened on both sides.
At last Wu Song suggested that Kong Liang and his men should join with the bandits of Taohua Mountain in an attack on the government troops. Kong Liang agreed to this, and was taken and introduced to Lu Da and Yang Zhi.
When discussing the proposed attack on Qingzhou Prefecture by the combined bandits from the three mountains Yang Zhi said, "The town is strongly fortified, and has a General like Huyan Zhuo in charge of the defense so it will not be easy for us to take. But I have a plan that I think will succeed." He then explained how to take the town, and they were highly pleased with his proposal.

Tiles are broken; town in flames;
Pity the people of Qingzhou.
Smashing fists and crushing blows,
Admire the bandits and heroes.

The Bandits from the 3 Mountain Bands join forces against & Attack Qingzhou; All the tigers agree to repair to the Marshes, all the Heroes Cast Their Lot with Mount Liang Marsh, & the Warriors Return to the Marsh, United

"A large force is needed to take Qingzhou," said Yang Zhi. "We know that the famous Song Jiang, called the Timely Rain in the gallant fraternity, is in Liangshan Marsh. Huyan Zhuo is his enemy. Our Two-Dragon Mountain band will co-operate with the Kong brothers' band. We will wait here till the men from Peach Blossom Mountain arrive, and go with them to assault the town. Brother Kong Liang, you must travel at top speed to Mount Liangshan and beseech Song Jiang to join our attack. That is the best plan, because you and he are great friends. What do you brothers think?"
"Sounds all right to me," said Lu Zhishen. "I've heard a lot of good things about Song Jiang, though I'm sorry to say we've never met. People chatter about him so much they've nearly made me deaf. He must be quite a man, to be so famous. I went to see him when he was with Hua Rong in Fort Clear Winds. But by the time I got there, he was gone. Never mind. Kong Liang, you want to rescue your brother. You'd better hurry and ask Song Jiang's help. We'll stay here and start the battle against those pricks."
Kong Liang directed his men to remain with Lu Zhishen. He took only one companion. Disguised as a merchant, he set out swiftly for Liangshan Marsh.
Lu Zhishen, Yang Zhi and Wu Song went to their mountain strongholds and fetched Shi En and Cao Zheng and about two hundred fighters. On Peach Blossom Mountain when Li Zhong and Zhou Tong received the news they brought their entire force, except for forty or fifty left to hold the fort. All contingents converged outside the town and prepared for the assault. Of that, we'll say no more.

*

On leaving Qingzhou, Kong Liang followed a winding road till he came to the tavern on the edge of Liangshan Marsh run by LiLi, who was called Hell's Summoner. There he stopped to buy some wine and ask the way. Kong Liang and his companion were strangers to Li. He invited them to be seated.
"Where are you from?" he queried.
"Qingzhou," said Kong Liang.
"Who is it you wish to see in the Marsh?"
"A friend of mine, on the mountain."
"Important chieftains live in that fortress on the mountain. How can you go there?"
"It's a chieftain I'm seeking—Song Jiang."
"In that case I have an obligation to you." LiLi ordered his attendants to serve wine.
"We've never met," said Kong Liang. "Why so courteous?"
"Anyone seeking a chieftain in the fortress is sure to be one of our kind, an old friend. He must be properly received and his arrival reported."
"I am Kong Liang, from a manor at the foot of White Tiger Mountain."
"I've heard brother Song Jiang mention you. We'll escort you to the stronghold today."
The two drank ceremonial cups of wine. LiLi opened a window overlooking the water and shot a whistling arrow. From the reeds on the opposite side of the cove a brigand propelled a boat. It stopped beside the tavern. LiLi invited Kong Liang on board. The craft was sculled to the Shore of Golden Sands, and the men began to climb.
Kong Liang was impressed by the bristling array of weapons at each of the three gates through which they had to pass. "I heard that the stronghold was well equipped," he said to himself, "but I never thought it was on such a scale!"
Brigands had gone ahead to report, and Song Jiang came down to greet him. Kong Liang hastily knelt and kowtowed.
"What brings you here, brother?" Song Jiang asked. Kong Liang burst into tears. Song Jiang said: "If you're in any danger or difficulty, don't hesitate to speak. We'll help you, no matter what it is. Brother, please rise."

"After we parted, my old father died. My brother Kong Ming quarreled with a well-to-do neighbor and killed him and his entire family. The authorities were hot on his trail, so we went up White Tiger Mountain and formed a band of six or seven hundred. We lived by robbery and pillage. Murong, the prefect of Qingzhou, arrested Kong Bin, our uncle whose home was in town, and threw him into prison with a heavy cangue around his neck. My brother and I staged a raid to rescue him, but outside the walls we were met by Huyan Zhuo who wields two rods. Brother fought, and Huyan captured him. They took him into Qingzhou and put him in prison also. There's no guarantee they won't kill him.

"I was chased and had to run. The next day, I met Wu Song. He introduced me to his companions. One was Lu Zhishen the Tattooed Monk. The other was Yang Zhi the Blue-Faced Brute. We were like old friends the moment we met. We discussed the rescue of my brother. Wu Song said: 'We'll ask Lu and Yang to get Li Zhong and Zhou Tong from Peach Blossom Mountain, and join the forces from three strongholds in an attack on Qingzhou. You hurry to Mount Liangshan and request Song Jiang to help save your uncle and your brother.' That's why I'm here. I pray, for the sake of my departed father, that you rescue them. I'll be eternally grateful."

"It will be easy. Don't worry. Come pay your respects to our leader Chao Gai. We'll talk it over together."

Song Jiang presented Kong Liang to Chao Gai, Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng, and the other chieftains. He related that Huyan Zhuo had gone to Qingzhou and cast his lot in with Prefect Murong and had recently captured Kong Ming, and that Kong Liang was seeking his rescue.

Chao Gai said: "Since the two brave brothers out of chivalry and righteousness, desire to rescue their uncle, and since you, brother Song, are their friend, we should indeed assist them. But you've ridden forth on expeditions many times, brother. This time you hold the fort and let me go."

"You're our highest leader. We mustn't lightly put you to any trouble," said Song Jiang. "This is a personal matter. Kong Liang has come all this distance to see me. He'd be embarrassed if I didn't go personally. I'd prefer to handle this alone with a few of our brothers."

Immediately, chieftains high and low pushed forward and volunteered. "We'll give our all," they cried. "Only take us along!"

Song Jiang was very pleased. That day a feast was given for Kong Liang, and Song Jiang direct Pei Xuan to muster men for the expedition and divide them into five contingents. The vanguard was to be led by Hua Rong, Qin Ming, Yan Shun and Stumpy Tiger Wang. The second unit was under Mu Hong, Yang Xiong, Xie Zhen and Xie Bao. The chief generals Song Jiang, Wu Yong, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng commanded the central force. The fourth contingent was headed by Zhu Tong, Chai Jin, Li Jun and Zhang Heng, while the unit bringing up the rear was under Sun Li, Yang Lin, Ou Peng and Ling Zhen.

When the five battalions were mustered they had fighters on horse and on foot totalling three thousand, under twenty commanders. The other chieftains remained with Chao Gai to hold the fortress. Song Jiang took his leave of Chao Gai and went down the mountain with Kong Liang and the brigand force.

Their march was uneventful, and they harmed none of the prefectures and counties along the way. They soon reached Qingzhou. Kong Liang went on ahead and informed Zhishen. The Tattooed Monk and his companions prepared a welcome. When Song Jiang and his central battalion arrived, Wu Song led Lu Zhishen, Yang Zhi, Li Zhong, Zhou Tong, Shi En and Cao Zheng forward to greet him. Song asked Zhishen to be seated.

"I've long known of your fame, brother," said the monk, "but I never had the chance to pay my respects. I'm very happy to meet you today."

"I don't deserve such courtesy," Song Jiang protested. "In the gallant fraternity your virtue is well known, Reverend. To be able to look upon your benevolent face is the greatest joy of my life!"

Yang Zhi rose and bowed. "I passed through Liangshan Marsh earlier," he said, "and the chieftains were kind enough to ask me to stay. But I stupidly declined. Today, you call here within sight of our mountain lair. Nothing under Heaven could please me more!"

"Everyone in the gallant fraternity has heard of Yang Zhi. My only regret is that we hadn't met sooner!"

Lu Zhishen ordered that wine be served, and introductions were made all around.

The next day Song Jiang asked about the situation in the prefectural town.

"After Kong Liang left, we had four or five clashes, with no clear result," said Yang Zhi. "Qingzhou's mainstay is Huyan Zhuo. If we capture him, we can push into that town like hot water through snow."

Wu Yong laughed. "He can be taken, but by guile, not by force."

"How do you propose to do it?" Song Jiang asked.

Wu Yong softly outlined his plan. Song Jiang was delighted.

"Very shrewd!"

That day he issued his instructions, and the next morning they proceeded to the walls of Qingzhou. They surrounded the town, beat their drums, waved their pennants, shouted, and shook their weapons. Murong was informed, and he hurriedly summoned Huyan Zhuo.

"Those bandits have brought help from Liangshan Marsh. What are we going to do?" demanded the prefect.

"Don't worry, Your Excellency," said Huyan. "By coming here they've lost their favorable terrain. It's only in the marsh that they can act up. Now that they've left their lair, we can nab them as fast as they come. They've nowhere to deploy. Please go up on the ramparts, Prefect, and watch me slaughter those rogues!"

Huyan quickly donned his armor and mounted his charger. He shouted for the gates to be opened and the drawbridge to be lowered. He rode forth at the head of a thousand infantry and cavalry, and spread them out in battle formation. From Song Jiang's contingent a horseman emerged. He was carrying a wolf-toothed cudgel. In a stentorian voice he cursed the prefect.

"Grafter! People-injuring thief! You've destroyed my home, and today I'm going to get my revenge!"

Murong recognized Qin Ming. "You were an officer of the imperial court," he shouted. "The state treated you well. How dare you rebel! When I capture you I'll have you smashed into ten thousand pieces! Nab that outlaw for me, first!" he yelled to Huyan.

Flourishing his rods, Huyan rode towards his objective. Qin Ming gave his steed full rein and galloped to meet Huyan, waving his wolf-toothed cudgel. They were a well-matched pair, and they fought nearly fifty rounds with neither vanquishing the other.

Murong felt the contest was lasting too long. He was afraid Huyan would lose. Hurriedly, he had the gongs summon his troops back to the town. Qin Ming did not pursue the departing foe, but returned to his own position. Song Jiang instructed his commanders to withdraw fifteen //and make camp.

Inside the town, Huyan got off his horse and reported to the prefect. "I was about to take that Qin Ming," he said. "Why did you sound retreat, Your Excellency?"

"You'd fought many rounds. I feared you were tired, so I called our forces back to rest, temporarily. Before he and Hua Rong rebelled, Qin Ming was commanding general here. The knave is not to be underestimated."

"I'll take that treacherous bandit, Your Excellency, rest assured. When I fought him just now he was getting clumsy with his rods. Next time, watch me smash him!"

"I know what a hero you are. But tomorrow, I want you to break open a gap in the enemy lines so that I can send out three men. I shall dispatch one to the Eastern Capital to ask for assistance, and two to neighboring districts and prefectures to raise troops to help capture the bandits."

"Your Excellency is indeed far-sighted."

The prefect wrote out a request for assistance, selected three officers, and made the necessary arrangements.

Huyan returned to his quarters, removed his armor and rested. Before dawn the next day an officer entered and reported: "On a hill outside the north gate three horsemen are observing the town. The one in the middle is wearing a red gown and is riding a white steed. The man on the right is Hua Rong. We don't recognize the man on the left, but he's dressed as a Taoist."

"That man in red is Song Jiang. The Taoist must be his general, Wu Yong. Don't alert them. Muster a hundred cavalry and bag all three."

Huyan hastily put on his armor and mounted. Rods in hand, leading his hundred horsemen, he had the north gate quietly opened and the drawbridge lowered, and rode swiftly towards the hill. Song Jiang, Wu Yong and Hua Rong continued staring at the town. Huyan raced up the slope. Only then did the three turn their mounts and walk them slowly away.

Before a grove of withered trees they again reined in. In hot pursuit, Huyan had just raced to the edge of the grove when shouts rang out and horse and rider dropped into a concealed pit. From both sides fifty or sixty men snared Huyan with hooked poles, hauled him out, and tied him up. Others extracted his horse.

By then the rest of Huyan's troop came charging up. Calmly fitting arrows to his bow, Hua Rong brought down the first five or six. Those behind halted abruptly, yanked their steeds around and, yelling, galloped off.

Song Jiang returned to camp and took his seat. Knife-wearing attendants pushed Huyan Zhuo before him. Song immediately rose and ordered that his bonds be removed. He personally conducted Huyan to a chair and greeted him respectfully.

"Why are you doing this?" Huyan asked.

"Would I be ungrateful to the imperial court?" Song Jiang retorted. "I was hard pressed by corrupt officials and forced to commit a crime. I've had to seek refuge in this marsh while awaiting an imperial pardon. I never expected to stir into action so mighty a general, for whom I have such great admiration. It was very wrong of me, and I beg your forgiveness."

"I am your prisoner. Ten thousand deaths would be too light a punishment. Yet you treat me with such courtesy!"

"Never would I presume to harm you. Heaven is my witness."

"Is it your wish, respected brother, that I should go to the Eastern Capital and ask for a royal pardon to bring to your mountain?"

"You couldn't possibly do that, General! Marshal Gao is a narrow-hearted villain. He forgets a man's large accomplishments and remembers only his small failings. You've lost a lot of troops, money and grain. He'd surely hold you culpable. Han Tao, Peng Qi and Ling Zhen have all joined our band. If you don't scorn our mountain stronghold as too humble, I'd be happy to relinquish to you my place as chieftain. When the court has use for us and issues its imperial pardon, we can once again serve our country with our utmost efforts."

Huyan hesitated for several minutes. But, firstly, since he was one of the stars of Heavenly Spirits, he naturally was of the same chivalrous mentality. And, secondly, he was overwhelmed by Song Jiang's courtesy and reasonableness. With a sigh, he knelt.

"It's not that I lack loyalty to the government. But your exceeding gallantry leaves me no choice but to agree. I'll follow you faithfully. The situation being what it is, there's no alternative."

Song Jiang was very pleased. He introduced Huyan to the other chieftains and directed Li Zhong and Zhou Tong to return his mount the Ebony Steed Which Treads in Snow. Then the chieftains conferred on how to rescue Kong Ming.

Wu Yong said: "If Huyan can trick them into opening the gates, we'll take the town easily. It will also put an end to any thought he may have of rejoining them."

Song Jiang went to Huyan and said: "It's not loot I'm after, but Kong Ming and his uncle are imprisoned in Qingzhou. We can't save them unless you get the town to open the gates."

"Since you've been kind enough to accept me, of course I'll do my best."

That night ten chieftains disguised themselves as government troops and rode forth with Huyan at their head. At the town moat they halted.

"Open the gates," shouted the general. "I've escaped and returned!"

Soldiers on the wall recognized Huyan's voice and hastily reported to Murong. The prefect had been brooding over the loss of the general. Now, hearing that he had come back, Murong was delighted. He jumped on his horse and rode to the town wall. He saw Huyan with about a dozen mounted men. He couldn't make out their faces in the dark, but he knew the general's voice.

"How were you able to return?" Murong called.

"Those knaves trapped my horse and took me to their camp. Some of my commanders sneaked this mount to me, and we got away together."

Murong ordered his soldiers to open the gates and lower the drawbridge. As the chieftains entered the town, he came forward to greet them. With one blow of his cudgel, Qin Ming knocked the prefect from his saddle. The Xie brothers set the town to the torch. Ou Peng and Stumpy Tiger Wang dashed up the wall and killed or scattered the defenders.

Song Jiang and the main force, seeing that Qingzhou was on fire, surged in. He transmitted an urgent order that the townspeople were not to be harmed, but to empty the town's treasury and grain stores. Kong Ming and his uncle and Kong Bin's family were rescued from the prison. Song Jiang directed that the fires be extinguished. The prefect's entire family, young and old, were killed, and all their possessions distributed among the marauders.

At daybreak a count was made of those families whose homes had been damaged by the fires, and they were given grain as relief payments. The money and grain taken from government stores came to nearly six hundred cartloads. Over two hundred good horses were also captured. A great feast of celebration was held in the main hall of the prefectural government, and the leaders of the three mountain strongholds were invited to go together to the fortress on Mount Liangshan.

Li Zhong and Zhou Tong sent people to Peach Blossom Mountain with orders to collect men and horses, and as much money and grain as possible, and then set fire to the stronghold and abandon it. Lu Zhishen dispatched Shi En and Cao Zheng to Two-Dragon Mountain. There, with Zhang Qing and his wife Sun the Witch, they assembled the brigands, loaded their money and grain, and burned down their stronghold in Precious Pearl Monastery.

In a few days time, the forces from the three mountains completed their preparations, and the entire body, led by Song Jiang, set out for the Mount Liangshan fortress. Song put Hua Rong, Qin Ming, Huyan Zhuo and Zhu Tong in the van to clear the way. Not a single prefecture or county was harmed during the march. Villagers, carrying their babes and supporting their old folk, burned incense and kowtowed in greeting.

The cavalcade reached Liangshan Marsh several days later. Chieftains of the water forces met them with boats, and Chao Gai and the leaders of the infantry and cavalry were awaiting them when they landed on the Shore of Golden Sands. They climbed together to the big stronghold, entered Fraternity Hall and took their seats.

A big feast was laid to celebrate the addition of twelve new chieftains: Huyan Zhuo, Lu Zhishen, Yang Zhi, Wu Song, Shi En, Cao Zheng, Zhang Qing, Sun the Witch, Li Zhong, Zhou Tong, Kong Ming and Kong Liang.

During the banquet Lin Chong told how the Tattooed Monk had once rescued him.

"I've thought about you a lot after we parted in Cangzhou," said Zhishen. "Has there been any news of your wife?"

"After I took over from Wang Lun, I sent someone home to fetch her. He found that Marshal Gao's wicked son had kept after her so hard that she finally killed herself. Her father was very depressed, and took ill and died."

Yang Zhi related how he met with Lin Chong when Wang Lun was still in control of the lair. All agreed that this had been fated. It was no accident. Chao Gai told the story of the capture of the birthday gifts on Yellow Earth Ridge. Everyone laughed heartily.

More feasts were given for several successive days. Of that we'll say no more.

The fortress had been strengthened by many men and horses, and Song Jiang was exceedingly pleased. He ordered Tang Long to oversee all metalwork and manufacture many kinds of weapons and armor. Hou Jian, who he put in charge of banners and clothing, added flags and pennants of every size and shape, embroidered with dragons, tigers, bears and leopards, and decorated with golden standards, white tassels, crimson fringes and black covers. On all sides of the mountain broad glacis were constructed. On the western and southern roads two taverns were rebuilt, both to receive visiting gallants and to listen for and quickly report the approach of government troops. Zhang Qing and his wife Sun the Witch, who originally had been innkeepers, were given charge of the tavern on the west. The south side tavern remained under Sun Xin and his wife Gu Dasao. Zhu Gui and Yue Ho continued to run the tavern on the east side, and LiLi and Shi Qian the one on the north. More barricades were set up in each of the three passes, and chieftains assigned to their defense. All were abjured to perform strictly their defined duties.

One day the Tattooed Monk spoke to Song Jiang. "I have a friend, a pupil of Wang Jin, called Nine Dragons Shi Jin," he said. "He's now on Mount Shaohua in Huayin County in the prefecture of Huazhou. With him, joined in brotherhood are Zhu Wu the Miraculous Strategist, Chen Da the Gorge-Leaping Tiger, and Yang Chun the White-Spotted Snake. I think of Shi Jin often. He saved my life in the Waguan Monastery, and I won't forget it. I'd like to go and see him, and bring him and the other three back to join us. How does that idea strike you?"

"I've heard of Shi Jin's fame. It would be fine if you could bring him here. But don't go alone. Take Wu Song. He's a pilgrim monk. He'll be an appropriate companion."

Wu Song expressed his willingness to go. Zhishen collected his luggage and put on his slanting hat and waist bag, as suited a meditation monk. Wu dressed as a pilgrim. The two bid farewell to the chieftains, left the mountain and crossed the Shore of Golden Sands. Starting early and resting late, they travelled many a day until they came to the border of Huayin County in the prefecture of Huazhou. They headed directly for Mount Shaohua.

Song Jiang was worried about them after they left. He directed Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller to follow and keep an eye on them.

Lu Zhishen and Wu Song reached the foot of Mount Shaohua. Brigands in ambush stepped out and barred the road. "Where are you monks from?" they demanded.

"Is there an Excellency Shi Jin on this mountain?" countered Wu Song.

"You're asking for Chieftain Shi? Wait here a while. I'll report your arrival to our leaders and they'll come down and greet you."

"Just say Lu Zhishen is here."

The brigand wasn't gone long. He returned with Zhu Wu the Miraculous Strategist, Chen Da the Gorge-Leaping Tiger and Yang Chun the White-Spotted Snake, who welcomed the two callers. But Shi Jin was not among them.

"Where is His Excellency?" queried Zhishen. "Why isn't he here?"

Zhu Wu stepped forward. "Aren't you Major Lu Da from the district of Yanan?"

"I am. And this pilgrim is the Constable Wu Song who slew the tiger on Jingyang Ridge."

The three chieftains hastily bowed. "We've long known the fame of you both! We heard that you'd set up a stronghold on Two-Dragon Mountain. What brings you here today?"

"We're not there any longer," said Zhishen. "We've joined Song Jiang in the big fortress on Mount Liangshan. Today we've travelled specially to see Excellency Shi."

"Please come to our stronghold on the mountain, then," said Zhu Wu, "and I'll tell you all about him."

"If you've got anything to say, say it! Waiting is too much of a friggin nuisance!"

"The reverend is an impatient man," Wu Song explained. "Why not tell him now?"

"After Excellency Shi joined us three on this mountain, we prospered," said Zhu Wu. "Recently, he went down and met an artist, a man named Wang Yi, from the Northern Capital in Taming Prefect. Wang had been painting some murals he had promised the Emperor of Golden Heaven Temple on Mount Huashan in the Western Range. He'd gone there with his daughter Jade Branch. Ho, the prefect of Huazhou—a crooked grafter who harms the people, one of Premier Cai's clique—went to the temple one day to burn incense and was struck by the girl's beauty. He sent emissaries several times to ask for Jade Branch as his concubine. Wang Yi wouldn't agree, so he took her by force and ordered the father exiled to a distant military region. Wang Yi, while passing through here on the way to exile, met Shi Jin and told him the story.

"His Excellency rescued him and brought him up the mountain, killing his two escorts. Then he went to the prefectural office to destroy Ho. But he was discovered, seized, and thrown into prison. The prefect is also mustering a force to wipe us out. We've nowhere to go and no way to cope. Our situation is bitter!"

"That prick has no manners! How dare he act so tough!" cried Zhishen. "I'll finish him off for you!"

"Please come to our stronghold for a conference," said Zhu Wu.

Zhishen was unwilling, but Wu Song pointed and said: "Can't you see the sun is already settling on the treetops?"

The Tattooed Monk roared impatiently and blew out a gusty breath. Reluctantly he went with the others to the Mount Shaohua fort. The five sat down together. Wang Yi was introduced to Zhishen and Wu Song. He told how Prefect Ho extorted decent people's money and seized their daughters. The three chieftains had cows and horses slaughtered and entertained the two visitors at a feast.

Zhishen refused to drink. He said: "Brother Shi isn't here, so I won't touch a drop. All I want is a good night's sleep. Tomorrow I'll go into town and kill that oaf!"
"Don't stir up any trouble, brother," Wu Song urged. "You and I can hurry back to Mount Liangshan and report. We'll request Song Jiang to lead a large force against Huazhou. In that way we'll rescue Excellency Shi Jin."
"By the time we get men from the fortress brother Shi Jin's life will have vanished!"
"Will you save him by killing Ho?" Wu Song was strongly opposed to the monk's going.
"Calm yourself, Reverend," said Zhu Wu placatingly. "Constable Wu Song is right."
"It's calm people like you who are going to be the death of brother Shi," cried Zhishen. "His life is in that fellow's hands and you sit here drinking and piddling over details!"
They finally persuaded him to drink a cup or two of wine. Lu went to bed with his clothes on. He rose at the fourth watch the next day, took his Buddhist staff and knife and set out swiftly for Huazhou.
"He wouldn't listen to me," said Wu Song. "He's sure to get into a jam!"
Zhu Wu instructed two discreet brigands to follow and keep track of the impetuous monk.
Zhishen rushed directly into town and asked where he could find the prefectural office. "Across that bridge and to the east," he was told.
He had just reached the pontoon bridge when someone advised him: "Get out of the way, monk. His Excellency the prefect is coming!"
"I was looking for him, and here he drops right into my hands," Zhishen said to himself. "That lout is a dead man!"
The prefect's escort of honor passed in pairs. His enclosed sedan-chair was guarded on either side by ten captains carrying whips and spears and iron chains.
"It won't be easy to get at the wretch," thought Zhishen. "And if I try and fail, I'll be a laughing stock!"
The prefect looked through the window of his sedan-chair and saw Zhishen, who was obviously hesitating whether to approach him. Ho crossed the bridge and at the prefectural office got out of his chair and summoned two of his captains. "Invite that big fat monk on the bridge to come to my residence for a vegetarian meal."
The captains went to the bridge and said to Zhishen: "The prefect invites you to a meatless repast."
"The knave is sure to die by my hand," thought Zhishen. "I wanted to strike him, but because I was afraid I couldn't get at him I let him pass. I'm still after him, and now he invites me!" He followed the captains to the prefectural compound.
Ho had already left instructions. When Zhishen arrived at the front of the hall he was told to leave his staff and knife and go to a rear building for his vegetarian meal. Zhishen demurred. Everyone berated him.
"For a monk you don't know very much! How can you carry weapons deep into the prefectural compound?"
Zhishen thought, "With my two fists alone I can crush that oaf's skull!"
He left his staff and knife on the porch and followed the captains inside. Prefect Ho was seated in a rear building. He shouted: "Seize that bald robber!" 30 or 40 police officers poured out of closets on both sides and pounced on Zhishen. Even if he were Prince Nezha, how could he avoid Earth's net and Heaven's snare? Indra himself couldn't escape from such a dragon's lair and tiger's den! Truly, the moth destroys itself in the flame; the angry turtle must die when it swallows the baited hook.

When Wu Song took Red Star to meet Monk Lu Zhishen and the Blue-Faced Beast and he asked them to rescue his brother and uncle, the Monk wanted to attack at once with the combined troops of the three mountain strongholds. But the Blue-Faced Beast said: "You can't take Qingzhou without a very big army. We know the reputation of Song Jiang on Mount Liang. Among the rivers and lakes he's known as the Opportune Rain. Twin Rods, moreover is his special enemy. We can combine our forces with those of the Kong brothers. I shall wait here till the troops from Mount Peachblossom are ready and then go to attack Qingzhou. Red Star, you go as fast as you can to the Marshes of Mount Liang and ask Song Jiang if he will come and help us mount a determined assault on the city. That's my idea. After all, Song Jiang is a good friend of yours, isn't he? What does everyone say?"
The Monk said: "Well, this is how it is. All the time I hear this one say Song Jiang is a good man and that one say Song Jiang is a good man, but unfortunately I've never met the gentleman. His name is on everyone's lips, it's perpetually buzzing in my ears. I'm sure the person in question really is a good man, or he wouldn't have such a reputation. Previously when he was with Colonel Hua on Windy Mountain I had the idea of going to see him. But just as I was about to start I heard that he had moved on, and it turned out once again that I didn't meet him. So there you are! Red Star, if you want to save your brother, go there quickly and ask them for help. The rest of us will stay here and have a go at the buggers first."
So Red Star handed over his forces to the Monk and disguised as a merchant, with just one companion, travelled night and day to Mount Liang.
The Monk, the Blue-Faced Beast and the Pilgrim went back to Twin Dragon Peak and told the Young Master and the Knife to bring several hundred more troops down in support. The Tiger-Killer and Big Chief on Mount Peachblossom heard the news and came with nearly all their troops, leaving only fifty or so to guard the camp. They all assembled before Qingzhou city and mounted a joint attack. But of this we shall say no more for the moment.
We turn now to Red Star and his companion, as they leave Qingzhou and travelling towards Mount Liang arrive at the inn of Li Li the Executioner where they stop for wine and to ask the way. Since their faces were unfamiliar, the Executioner invited them to sit and then asked: "Where have you gentlemen come from?"
"From Qingzhou," Red Star replied.
"Who do you want to see on Mount Liang?" the Executioner asked.
"There is someone I know there. It's him I want to see," said Red Star.
"The main stronghold on Mount Liang is where all the chief leaders live, why should you go there?" the Executioner asked.
"It is Song Jiang I want to speak to," said Red Star.
"If you are looking for Song Jiang, then I've got something special for you," the Executioner said, and he called the waiter to bring some special wine.
Red Star said: "We've never met before, what makes you so hospitable?"
"Well, you see, if you are looking for one of the leaders on the mountain, you must be one of us and an old friend of the company, so how could I be neglectful towards you?" said the Executioner. "I must go and report this."
Red Star said: "I am Kong Liang, and I come from a manor at the foot of White Tiger Mountain."
"I have heard Song Jiang speak highly of you, welcome to Mount Liang!"
When they had drunk the special wine, a window was opened in the water pavilion and a whistling arrow fired off. From the reeds on the other side of the creek a boat was rowed across. The Executioner motioned Red Star into the boat and they rowed across to Golden Sands Landing and then headed up the mountain.
Looking at the defensive strength of the three gates, with their forests of spears, swords, halberds and pikes, Red Star said: "I had heard that things were prospering in the Marshes of Mount Liang, but I didn't realize the setup was as big as this!"
A soldier had already reported their arrival, and Song Jiang hastened down to meet them. Red Star immediately prostrated himself.
"Why have you come here, my dear friend?" Song Jiang asked.
As soon as Red Star finished paying his respects, a great sob escaped him. Song Jiang said: "Obviously some painful thought assails you, my friend. Please feel free to tell me about it. No one can escape trouble, one must always do one's best to help others, so please rise, my friend, we want to help you."
Red Star said: "After you left us, Master, and my father passed away, my brother Blazing Comet became embroiled in a petty dispute with a local landowner and killed him and all his family. The authorities came to arrest him so we ran off to White Tiger Mountain and collected a band of six or seven hundred men, and set up as robbers. We have an uncle in Qingzhou called Kong Bin. He was placed under arrest by Governor Murong and thrown into prison with a heavy cangue round his neck. So we went to attack the city, aiming to set our uncle free. Unfortunately outside the city we ran into a chap known as Twin Rods, because he fights with a pair of rods. My brother fought him and got captured and taken into the city. He's in prison there now, I don't know whether alive or dead. They chased me also and destroyed my army. A day or so later I ran into Pilgrim Wu Song who spoke about you and introduced me to his companions. One of them is the Flowery Monk Lu Zhishen, another is the Blue-Faced Beast Yang Zhi. We hit it off immediately and I discussed with them how to rescue my brother. The Pilgrim said: 'I will ask my two friends, along with the Tiger-killer and Big Chief from Mount Peachblossom and the combined forces from the three mountain strongholds, to attack Qingzhou. You ride as fast as you can to the Marshes of Mount Liang to tell Song Jiang about it and ask him to come and help rescue your uncle and brother.' And that's why I'm here."
Song Jiang said: "It's quite a simple matter. Don't worry about it. First come and meet Chao Gai so we can all discuss it together."
Song Jiang took Red Star to meet Chao Gai, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun and the other leaders. He told them all how Twin Rods was in Qingzhou, staying with Governor Murong, how the Governor had captured Blazing Comet and how Red Star had come to ask for help.
Chao Gai said: "Well, seeing that there are good men, honourable and humane, in both those places and they are your friends, how could we not go and help? But my good friend, you have been down the mountain many times in succession, this time you should stay here to guard the camp and let me go instead."
Song Jiang said: "You are our chief. You mustn't go anywhere. Besides, this is entirely my business. Since he has taken the trouble to come all this way, they naturally would not be happy if I didn't respond myself. I'd just like to ask a few of our comrades to go with me."
Before he had finished speaking, everyone in the hall was clamouring to go, saying they'd give an arm or a leg to be part of it.
Song Jiang was well pleased. That day a banquet was held in Red Star's honour. While they were eating, Song Jiang asked Sterling to draw up a list of those who were to accompany him down the mountain. The group was divided into five contingents. The first, commanded by Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, the Dandy and Short-Arse, was to lead the attack. The second was led by the Unstoppable, Morbid, Snake and Scorpion. The main force was under the command of Song Jiang, the Professor, the Little Duke and the Halberdier, the fourth contingent was led by Whiskers, Mr. Chai, the White-Water Dragon and the Pilot, while Colonel Sun, Panther, Golden Wings and Thunderer were entrusted with forming the rearguard. These were the five forces under twenty leaders appointed by Mount Liang, together with two thousand men, horse and foot. The remaining commanders were to remain with Chao Gai and guard the stronghold.
Song Jiang now bade Chao Gai farewell and accompanied Red Star down the mountain. When the forces of Mount Liang set out in their five columns it was like this:
As they march out from the Marshes it is like a great dragon uncoiling out of the ocean. As they leave Mount Liang it is like tigers and leopards rampaging through the sky. Led by their twenty heroes, the five columns advance. Each unit comprises thirty officers and men. Brilliantly coloured banners wave in dense clouds. Deadly steel blades glitter like frost and snow. Warhorses gallop forward with jingling bridles, warriors march proudly to the beat of ceremonial drums. Dust is raised in copious clouds, filling the sky with murk and gloom. Multi-coloured banners throng about the clever and resourceful Professor Wu Yong: upright under the green oiled umbrella sits Song Jiang the Just, he who does heaven's will. Passing spirits bestow respectful greetings; bystanders sing songs of celebration.
Thus Song Jiang marched out from Mount Liang, at the head of twenty leaders and two thousand men, drawn up in five columns. Nothing of importance happened on the way. They passed through the province causing not the slightest harm to any of the people.
When they reached Qingzhou, Red Star first made contact with Monk Lu Zhishen and the leaders of the other force and a reception banquet was organized. When Song Jiang and his army arrived, Pilgrim Wu Song took his six comrades along to introduce them. After Song Jiang had persuaded him to be seated, the Monk said: "I have heard so much about you, yet for some reason we have never met. I am delighted finally to make your acquaintance."
Song Jiang replied: "You are too kind! Men of honour among the rivers and lakes are loud in their praise of your clear virtue. I count myself forever blessed to have seen you for myself."
The Blue-Faced Beast also stood, prostrated himself again, and said: "I once passed by Mount Liang and was honoured with an invitation to stay, but in my folly I declined. Now it is my great good fortune to see you here in our stronghold. This is the greatest favour heaven could show me."
Song Jiang said, smiling: "Your reputation is universal among the rivers and lakes. My only regret is that it has taken so long for us to meet."
The Monk now ordered wine and all the leaders introduced themselves to each other.
Next day Song Jiang asked: "Tell me about Qingzhou, how has the campaign fared?"
The Blue-Faced Beast replied: "Since Red Star left we have fought four or five times but have not defeated them. Their fortunes depend entirely on Twin Rods. If we could only capture him I believe we'd have them in the palms of our hands."
The Professor smiled craftily. "You won't take that one by force," he said. "We must use guile."
"What can we do to capture him?" Song Jiang asked.
"The only way is this," said the Professor and whispered something.
"Brilliant!" said Song Jiang delightedly.
Troops were given their orders that day, and next morning they marched. Arriving before the city all the troops deployed around it. Drums were beating, banners waving, the sound of cheering and challenges filled the air. When report of this reached Governor Murong's ears, he hurriedly demanded the presence of Twin Rods.
"These bandits have now gone and brought Song Jiang of the Marshes of Mount Liang here to help them," he said. "What are we going to do about it?"
"Rest easy, Your Excellency," said Twin Rods. "If the bandits come here they lose their advantage. These scum can only afford to be insolent within their marshes. Now that they have ventured out of their den we shall catch them one by one, they'll have no chance to show off round here. You can stand on the city walls and watch me slaughter them."
Twin Rods armed himself at once and mounted. He ordered the city gates to be opened and the drawbridge lowered and led out a thousand cavalry. He deployed his troops under the city walls.
A certain warrior now rode out from Song Jiang's ranks. He was carrying a wolf's-tooth mace, and he berated the Governor in stentorian tones: "You thieving bureaucrat, you scourge of the people! You murdered all my family! Now I'm going to have my revenge and wipe out your offence!"
Governor Murong recognized Thunderclap and replied in kind: "You, an officer of the imperial guard, the state never broke faith with you yet you had the nerve to turn rebel! When we catch you, you shall die the death of a thousand cuts! Bring me that villain!"
In obedience to the command Twin Rods galloped forward with whirling rods, intending to capture Thunderclap. The latter, brandishing his mace, rode to the encounter. Their horses met.
What a contest it was! Forty or fifty bouts they fought, and neither had the advantage. Finally Governor Murong, fearing that Twin Rods might lose, ordered the gong sounded for his troops to withdraw into the city. Thunderclap made no attempt to pursue them and also retired to his own lines. Song Jiang ordered all the leaders and field commanders to pull their troops back five miles or so and pitch camp.
Back in the city, Twin Rods dismounted and went to see the Governor. "I was on the point of capturing Thunderclap," he said. "Why did Your Excellency order the troops to withdraw?"
"You had fought so many bouts," said the Governor. "I was afraid you were tired. That's why I ordered the army back to take a break. That villain Thunderclap used to be my commander-in-chief. He turned traitor along with Colonel Hua. But you shouldn't underestimate him."
"Don't worry, Your Excellency. I will certainly get the better of that shameless turncoat. When I was fighting him just now, I noticed a flaw in his technique. In a few days' time you'll be able to see me dispatch him!"
"Since you're so brave," said the Governor, "open up a passage next time you're fighting and we'll send out three messengers. One can go to the capital to request reinforcements. The other two can go to neighbouring provinces to ask them to recruit troops to assist us in suppressing the bandits."
"You are a master strategist, Your Excellency," said Twin Rods.
The Governor wrote the letter that same day to request reinforcements and three officers were picked to set off when the opportunity arose.
Twin Rods after returning to his residence, took off his armour and went to bed. Before it was fully light an officer came to report: "There's three horsemen up on that little hill outside the north gate, spying on the city. One of them has a red robe and is riding a white horse. There's two others, one on each side of him. I know the one on his right is Colonel Hua, the Archer. The one on his left is dressed like a scholar."
"The one in red must obviously be Song Jiang," said Twin Rods. "The one dressed like a scholar must be the Professor. Don't do anything to frighten them. Find me a hundred cavalry and we'll ride out and get them."
Twin Rods armed himself and mounted immediately and put himself at the head of a hundred or more cavalry. The north gate was unobtrusively opened and the drawbridge lowered and they trotted up the hill. Song Jiang, the Professor and Colonel Hua seemed quite lost in their contemplation of the city. But when Twin Rods slapped his mount and urged it forward up the slope, the three turned their horses' heads and slowly rode off. As Twin Rods raced towards them they simultaneously reined in their horses beside a clump of ancient trees. Just as Twin Rods drew level with the trees a loud shout was heard and he plunged into a pit. Horse and rider both went in. Fifty hooks reached out on either side and pinned Twin Rods down while they bound him and took him away. The horse was led off after him. Of the cavalry who had also been in the pursuit, the leaders were shot down by Colonel Hua with his bow, while the rest managed to rein in their mounts and flee.
Song Jiang returned to the camp and seated himself, while his guards pushed Twin Rods into the room. Immediately Song Jiang stood up and shouted: "Untie him at once!" And with his own hands he raised Twin Rods up and seated him. Then he prostrated himself.
Twin Rods said: "Why are you doing this?"
"How should I dare to go against the Emperor? It is only because of a corrupt official, who oppresses the people and perpetrates injustices that I have been forced for the time being to take refuge in the marshes, and only until such time as the Emperor declares an amnesty. I have had the misfortune to offend you and provoke your fearsome anger. I am a true admirer of your valour. For this unintentional offence, I humbly beg you to pardon me."
Twin Rods said: "A prisoner must count death a trifle, why do you offer me courtesy and consoling words?"
"How could I dare to do anything prejudicial to your life?" Song Jiang said. "I pray to heaven that my simple thoughts may find favour and my humble request be heard."
Twin Rods said: "Can it be that you want me to go to the capital and plead for your amnesty?"
"But how could you do that?" said Song Jiang. "The infamous Marshal Gao is a mean-spirited man. He forgets any favours he owes, and remembers everyone's faults. You have lost many troops, money and materials, how could he not hold you responsible? But now Victorious, the Supremo and Thunderer have all consented to join our company on the mountain. If you do not regard our stronghold as too unworthy I would like to offer you a place among our leadership — but only until the Emperor sees fit to grant an amnesty. After that we will all be able to dedicate our services to the country."
Twin Rods gave it long and careful consideration. Well, he was, you see one of the baleful stars, so he was naturally favourable to their spirit of righteousness! And then, Song Jiang was so courteous and so persuasive!
Twin Rods sighed and then knelt on the ground and said: "It is not that I wish to be disloyal to my country. But I feel you are exceptionally honourable, it is impossible for me not to trust you. I agree to serve you. In the circumstances, I can have absolutely no argument against it." There is a poem about this:

Sent by the Emperor to clean out the stable,
Soon he's a henchman, not a new broom.
To explain such disloyalty how is one able?
Evil doings in the palace this puzzle illume.

Song Jiang was delighted. He presented Twin Rods to all the other leaders, and ordered the Tiger-Killer and Big Chief to bring the black horse with white socks, the Emperor's gift, for Twin Rods to ride on.
A meeting was now held to discuss plans for rescuing Blazing Comet. The Professor said: "If Twin Rods can persuade them to open the gates it will be easy as falling off a log. It will have the added advantage of cementing him to our cause."

Song Jiang listened and then reassured Twin Rods with these words: "It is not because I want to gain control of the city. It is simply that the Kongs, uncle and nephew, have been locked up there, and it is impossible to do anything for them if you don't get those gates opened."
Twin Rods said cheerfully: "Since you have enlisted me, I shall certainly do my best."
It was agreed that evening that ten leaders should go with Twin Rods, namely Thunderclap, Colonel Hua, Colonel Sun, the Dandy, the Little Duke, the Halberdier, Snake, Scorpion, Golden Wings and Short-Arse — all dressed in army uniform. When these eleven horsemen reached the city, Twin Rods rode right to the edge of the moat and shouted across: "Ahoy there, guards! Open up! I've escaped!"
When they heard in the city that it was the voice of Twin Rods, they rushed to report it to the Governor. The loss of Twin Rods had plunged the Governor into gloom. When they told him that Twin Rods had escaped and come back, he cheered up at once. He immediately mounted and rode to the battlements. As he could see there were another dozen or so riders and could only hear Twin Rods' voice, not see his face, he asked: "How did you manage to escape, commander?"
Twin Rods replied: "The bastards tripped my horse. They captured me and took me into their camp. There was an officer there who had served with me before, and he managed to steal the horse for me and we escaped together."
Reassured, the Governor ordered the gates opened and the drawbridge lowered. The other ten followed Twin Rods in, and when they drew level with the Governor, Thunderclap knocked him from his horse with one blow of his mace. Snake and Scorpion started a fire. Golden Wings and Short-Arse rushed into the city, killing and scattering the enemy officers. Song Jiang's main force saw the fires in the city and all came pouring in. Song Jiang hurriedly issued orders for the people not to be molested in any way; stores and money were to be taken from the government coffers only. They went to the gaol and released Blazing Comet and his uncle, with all his family. Next they put the fire out. Governor Murong and his family were executed and their property seized and divided among the troops. When it was light a list was made of people whose houses had been burnt in the fire and provisions were distributed in compensation. The contents of the government coffers and grain stores were loaded onto five hundred or so carts. More than two hundred horses were rounded up. A big feast was organized in the government office to celebrate and the chiefs of the three mountains were invited to join the main stronghold. The Tiger-Killer and Big Chief sent someone back to Mount Peachblossom to fetch out all the horses, money and provisions, after burning down the camp. Monk Lu Zhishen sent the Young Master and the Knife back to Twin Dragon Peak to help the Gardener and Sister Sun collect up people, horses, money and stores and burn down the compound of the Temple of the Precious Pearl.
It took a few days to assemble all the troops from the three mountains. Then Song Jiang led this large contingent of troops and comrades back to Mount Liang. Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, Twin Rods and Whiskers were sent on ahead to clear the road. They passed through the province without any disturbance. The villagers, old and young, flocked to see them, offering incense and falling on their knees before them.
In a few days, they had reached the Marshes of Mount Liang. All the boat captains came across to meet them. Chao Gai and the other leaders from the main camp were at Golden Sands Landing to receive them. On reaching the stronghold, they all went to sit in the Assembly Hall of the Heroes and a great feast was organized to celebrate the arrival of new leaders: Twin Rods, Monk Lu Zhishen, the Blue-Faced Beast, Pilgrim Wu Song, the Young Master, the Knife, the Gardener, Sister Sun, the Tiger-Killer, Big Chief, Blazing Comet and Red Star — altogether there were twelve of these new arrivals. During the banquet Leopard's Head told how the Monk had once rescued him. The Monk asked: "After I left you in Cangzhou, Instructor, did you ever have news of your wife?"
"After we had that dust-up with Wang Lun, I naturally sent someone back to fetch my family, but I heard that my wife had been forced by Marshal Gao's son and had hanged herself. Her parents fell ill with grief and also died."
The Blue-Faced Beast then recalled the time when they had gone to the mountain while Wang Lun was in charge, and everyone said: "Something like this must be preordained; it was no accident!"
Chao Gai recounted the story of robbing the birthday convoy on Yellow Mud Ridge, which caused great mirth.
They took turns to organize the banquet on the days that followed. Of this no more.
Song Jiang was naturally well pleased to see so many additions to the company on the mountain. He made Spots overseer of the blacksmiths, with responsibility for supervising the manufacture of arms of every sort, including linked chain-mail armour. The Ape was manager of banners and clothing with orders to produce flags depicting the three powers, the nine planets, the four polar stars, the five directions, the twenty-eight constellations of the zodiac, together with flying dragons and pards, yellow halberds and white long-tailed banners, scarlet tassels and black umbrellas. Beacons were constructed on all four sides of the mountain and two more inns to the west and south were built to receive good men heading for the mountain, as well as to gather military intelligence. The inn on the west was put in the hands of the Gardener and Sister Sun — since this husband and wife team had originally kept an inn. The inn on the south was committed as before to the other husband and wife team — Blackface and Auntie Gu. The inn on the east was still to be run by the Crocodile and Lungs while the Executioner and the Flea were still at the inn on the north. The three gates leading up the mountain were reinforced and leaders appointed to man them. Everyone complied with these new regulations. Of this no more.
One day Lu Zhishen, the Flowery Monk, suddenly announced to Song Jiang: "I have a friend called Shi Jin, the Tattooed Dragon; the Tiger-Killer is also acquainted with him. He is on Little Mount Hua near Huayin in Huazhou. He is with Zhu Wu, known as the Strategist, and also one Chen Da, the River-Jumping Tiger, and Yang Chun, the White-Spotted Snake. They have formed themselves into a company there. I often think of my friend. He came to my rescue once, in the Temple of the Ceramic Tiles, I shall never forget it. I would like to go and pay him a visit, and persuade all four of them to join us here. What do you say?"
Song Jiang said: "I have heard good things of the Tattooed Dragon. I think it's a great idea for you to go and invite him to join us. However, I don't think you should go alone. I would like to ask Pilgrim Wu Song to accompany you. He is got up as a pilgrim, a kind of monk, you'll make a good pair."
"Certainly I will go with the master," said the Pilgrim.
So that same day they packed their bags. The Monk just went as a contemplative and the Pilgrim took on the role of his attendant priest. They bade farewell to the assembly of leaders on the mountain, and crossed over at Golden Sands Landing. Starting early, resting late, and travelling every day, they soon reached Huayin and headed for Little Mount Hua.
After the two of them had left, Song Jiang found himself uneasy, so he told the Magic Messenger to follow after them and listen out for news.
As they approached Little Mount Hua a guard sprang out and stopped them. "Where have you two monks come from?" he asked.
"Is a Mr. Shi to be found here on the mountain?" Wu Song asked in reply.
"If it's chief Shi you want, you'd better wait here a bit," the man said. "I'll go up and report to the leaders and they'll come down to see you."
"Tell them Monk Lu Zhishen has come to visit," said the Pilgrim.
The soldier had only been gone a little while when Zhu Wu, the Strategist appeared, with the River-Jumper and the White-Spotted Snake. But there was no sign of the Tattooed Dragon.
The Monk asked: "Where is Mr. Shi? Why can't I see him?"
"Excuse me, but are you Major Lu from Yan'an?" the Strategist asked.
"I am indeed," said the Monk. "And my attendant here is Captain Wu Song, killer of the tiger on Jingyang Pass."
The other three hurriedly saluted and said: "Your reputation is well known to us. We heard that you had set up camp on Twin Dragon Peak. What brings you here today?"
The Monk said: "We are not on Twin Dragon Peak any longer. We have joined Song Jiang's company on Mount Liang. We have come here to see Mr. Shi."
The Strategist said: "Since you are here, please come on up to our stronghold and let me explain everything to you properly."
The Monk said: "If you've something to say, then say it! All this messing about, who the fucking hell is going to put up with it?"
The Pilgrim said: "My friend is a little impatient. But if you've something to say, there's nothing to stop you saying it."
The Strategist said: "We had been doing very well in our stronghold here, ever since Mr. Shi came to us. Then he happened to meet a painter called Wang Yi, a native of the northern capital, who had come to fulfil a promise he had made to paint a mural at the Temple of the Golden Lord of Heaven on the western peak of Mount Hua. He had also brought his daughter, whose name was Jade, to keep him company. The district governor, Ho by name and originally a member of Grand Preceptor Cai's staff, a greedy official who unjustly persecuted the people, happened to visit the temple one day to burn incense. He saw the girl and fell for her, just like that. He kept sending people to say that he wanted her as a wife. When her father would not hear of it this governor abducted and raped her and sentenced the father to exile in a distant frontier post. The father passed through here on his way and met Mr. Shi, to whom he recounted the whole affair. Mr. Shi rescued him and gave him refuge on the mountain. He killed the two guards who had been sent with him, and then went to the government office with the intention of killing Governor Ho, but he was detected first and arrested and imprisoned. Now they intend to raise an army to wipe out our camp here, and we simply don't know what to do about it!"
The Monk was outraged: "Those fucking officials are shameless! The harm they do! You and I will go and kill the bastard!"
The Strategist said: "Please come up to the stronghold and discuss it all first."
When this party of five leaders had arrived in the stronghold and seated themselves, the offended father was invited in to explain to them what a greedy drunken despot Governor Ho was and how he made a habit of raping the daughters of respectable families. The Strategist and his comrades had oxen and horses slaughtered to provide a banquet for the other two visitors. As they were feasting, the Monk gave his views: "This bloody Ho is an utter disgrace, I shall go with you to the city and execute him!"
The Pilgrim said: "Don't be so hasty, brother. Let us ride back with all haste to Mount Liang and report the matter. We can ask Song Jiang to bring a big army to attack Huayin and rescue the Tattooed Dragon."
"If he has to wait while we go all the way back to the stronghold and fetch an army, who knows what will happen to the Tattooed Dragon," the Monk objected.
"But even if you kill the governor," said the Pilgrim, "how will you rescue the Tattooed Dragon?" He was totally opposed to letting the Monk go.
The Strategist also advised against it: "Please calm down, Master. Captain Wu is absolutely right."
The Monk grew even more angry: "You're such a cold unfeeling bunch, you'd let our friend Mr. Shi perish. Well, you needn't go back to Mount Liang, you can just stay and watch me!"
No one could dissuade him from it, their pleas that evening fell on deaf ears. In the morning he was up before dawn. He took his monk's staff and sword and hurried off to Huayin.
Pilgrim Wu Song said: "He refuses to listen to anyone. No good will come of this!" He sent off two sharp-witted soldiers to listen out for news.
As for the Monk, he went rushing into Huazhou and started asking for the government office. "Over the city bridge, and then turn east," they directed him. He was just crossing this pontoon bridge, when people started shouting: "Out of the way monk, His Excellency the Governor is about to pass."
"Well," he thought, "I was just looking for him, and here he is coming to find me! It really seems he's fated to die!"
The guard of honour began to pass in pairs, one after another, and then the Governor, in a luxury sedan. On either side the windows were protected by a dozen or so guards tightly packed around it, each carrying a steel-shafted spear.
"It's not a good idea to attack those bastards," the Monk thought, "because if I failed I should be laughed at."
Now the Governor happened to be looking out of the window and he saw the Monk, apparently hesitating about whether to approach. They went on over the bridge, and when he got out at the government office he told two of the guards: "Go and invite that big fat monk on the bridge to come and have a vegetarian meal here at the office." Accordingly the guards went up to Monk Lu Zhishen on the bridge and said: "His Excellency the Governor invites you to a vegetarian meal."
"The bugger has fallen right into my hands," the Monk thought. "I wanted to kill him but I couldn't think of a way to reach him so I let him go. I was wondering how to get to him, and he goes and invites me!" He followed the guards to the government office. The Governor had already made his arrangements. As soon as the Monk was outside the courtroom he was ordered to put down his staff and surrender his sword and then invited to go to have his meal in an inner chamber. The Monk was unwilling to comply at first, but they all told him: "We know you're a monk, but how can you be so ignorant of etiquette? How could you be allowed inside carrying a sword or a staff?"
The Monk thought: "Anyway, my two fists are enough to beat the bugger's brains out!" So he put down his staff, took off his sword in the corridor, and followed the guards inside. The Governor was sitting there waiting. He made a gesture with his hand and shouted: "Seize the bald scoundrel!" Forty police officers leapt from the wings and pulling him this way and that secured the Monk.
Well now, you can be Ogre in Chief, but you won't escape Heaven's net! You can be the fiery-headed door-god, but you won't come whole from the dragon's pool and the tiger's den! It was truly a case of YANG ZHI said that it would be better if they had the support of the brigands at Liangshan Marsh, and he suggested that Kong Liang should go to Song Jiang to ask for his assistance.

"That is a good idea," said Lu Da. "I very often hear of the fame of Song Jiang, but so far I have not met him. I have heard of him so much that I am almost made deaf with hearing his name. I hope our brother Kong Liang will go, and bring that famous man to join us. We will proceed with our attack on those pricks at Qingzhou in the meantime."
Kong Liang agreed, and handed over all his men to Lu Da. He then departed for Liangshan Marsh.
Lu Da then sent to his stronghold to summon all the 200 bandits upon hearing of the news from Qingzhou Prefecture. Li Zhong also got all his 500 men from Taohua Mountain. When these bandits arrived they joined to attack Qingzhou.
Kong Liang was allowed to pass the outposts upon reaching Liangshan Marsh and was conducted up the mountain. There he explained his mission to Song Jiang, and the other leaders, who unanimously agreed to join in the attack upon Qingzhou. The bandits were soon ready, and Song Jiang divided them up into five companies in charge of twenty leaders. They left the mountain the same day, and duly joined the other bandits in the neighborhood of Qingzhou Prefecture. There all the leaders were introduced, and were pleased to meet each other.
Song Jiang introduced the question as to how they were to attack the town, and Yang Zhi spoke, "Before you arrived we had attacked the town about five times without gaining any advantage. The defense of Qingzhou Prefecture evidently depends upon one man, General Huyan Zhuo and if we can capture him, his army would disappear like snow when hot water is thrown on it."
Wu Yong laughed and said, "To use force against such a man is useless. We must use strategy."
"How could that be done?" asked Song Jiang.
Wu Yong explained a trick he had thought of, and Song Jiang was delighted as he considered the plan excellent.
Early the next day all the bandits surrounded the town with much noise of gongs and drums. Inside the town the Prefect Murong upon hearing of this sent for General Huyan Zhuo. "Evidently," he said, "these men have now got the bandits from Liangshan Marsh to assist them, and we are surrounded. What shall we do?"
"These brigands are skilled in fighting on water," replied Huyan Zhuo, "but now they are out of their element and far away from their stronghold. I will capture them one by one. I request you to go to the gate tower, and watch me defeat them."
General Huyan put on his armor, mounted his horse, and led about one thousand men out the gates to meet the banaits.
Out of Song Jiang's forces Qin Ming rode forth armed with a spiked mace and he cursed the enemy. "You covetous and malicious thieves of the people. You have ruined my family, and today I come for revenge."
Prefect Murong on the wall recognized the man as ex-general Qin Ming, and shouted, "You were an official appointed by the Emperor, and were well treated. So why are you now a rebel? If I capture you I will have you hacked into a thousand pieces. General Huyan, please arrest that man."
General Huyan at once galloped forward towards Qin Ming who also advanced. They met, and were well matched. After about fifty bouts neither had gained any advantage.
Murong being afraid that General Huyan would not succeed in single combat had a gong sounded as a signal for the General to return inside the gate. As General Huyan retired, Qin Ming also withdrew without pursuing his opponent. Song Jiang issued an order for all the bandits to withdraw about five //from the town.
When General Huyan had dismounted inside the city he spoke to Prefect Murong, "I wanted to defeat Qin Ming. Why did you give the order for a retreat?"
"I saw that you had not succeeded after many attempts, and fearing that you would be tired, I thought it better that you should have a rest. That man Qin Ming was previously in charge of the troops here, but he and an officer Hua Rong deserted. You must not treat them lightly."
"You need not worry," said General Huyan, "as I can easily defeat that fellow. While we were fighting I noticed his weak spots. If he comes tomorrow I will certainly overcome him and kill him."
"In that case we must open a way through these bandits and get three messengers through. One can go to the capital, and beg for assistance there, and the other two can go to the towns in the neighborhood, and ask them to help us."
"Your proposal is excellent," replied General Huyan Zhuo.
The Prefect wrote his dispatches accordingly, and selected three reliable men to act as messengers. General Huyan retired to his quarters, undressed, and was soon asleep. Early the next morning before dawn he was awakened by a messenger knocking at his door. The man reported, "Just outside the North Gate there is a mound, and three horsemen are there overlooking the town. One on the right we recognize as Hua Rong, the one in the middle is dressed in red, and another one is dressed like a Taoist priest."
"That priest will be Wu Yong, and the one in red will be Song Jiang," remarked General Huyan. "They must not be disturbed at present. Let one hundred cavalry be mustered at once, and I will capture these three men." He quickly dressed, mounted, and led his cavalry to the North Gate. The gate was opened, and the drawbridge was lowered quietly. General Huyan and his men rode forth towards the mound. The three brigand leaders were still there looking towards the town, but as soon as the troops were near they turned their horses and rode away. General Huyan galloped after them, but as the men reached a clump of dead tree they halted. As General Huyan approached, his horse tripped and fell into a hidden pit. At the same moment there were many loud shouts from bandits who had lain in ambush at that spot. He was seized, and bound with ropes; and taken off as a prisoner in next to no time. As the troops came forward Hua Rong shot arrows, and killed several men at the head. The cavalry, seeing this, swung round and retreated in great confusion. When Song Jiang returned to his camp the executioners led the prisoner to meet Song Jiang who ordered that the prisoner should be set free. He then conducted him into his tent, requested him to be seated, and then saluted him with both hands.
"What is this done for?" asked General Huyan Zhuo.
"How dare I, Song Jiang, to disobey the Imperial Court? It is only the corrupt officials who force us to seek refuge at Liangshan Marsh. We will wait until the Emperor pardons us. I do not expect that we would give much trouble to you and have offended you, and I therefore beg you to forgive us this time."
"I am a prisoner," replied General Huyan, "and quite ready for death. Why do you treat me in this polite manner?"
"We have no desire to injure you," said Song Jiang. "Heaven knows that our intentions are good." He again saluted, and begged General Huyan to forgive him.
"Is it your idea to ask me to go to the capital and put your case before the Emperor and beg for a pardon?" asked General Huyan Zhuo.
"How could you go?" said Song Jiang. "There is still the Marshal of the Imperial Guard, Gao Qiu, in office. He is a mean fellow; always forgets meritorious deeds, and never overlooks a minor fault. As you have been defeated after great expenditure of money he will undoubtedly seek to punish you. Moreover, your three assistants, Colonels Han Tao, Peng Qi, and Ling Zhen, have already joined us. If you have no objection to join us, I will retire, and offer you my position as second-in-command here. If in the future the Emperor pardons us you can still be of service to the court."
General Huyan Zhuo for some time did not reply to this, and was evidently undecided. He saw that Song Jiang was treating him with great respect, and that there was some force in his arguments.
At last he sighed, and kneeling replied, "If I agree to your proposal you must not think me disloyal to the Emperor, because your generosity obliges me to comply with you. I will gladly 'hold your whip and stirrup,' and will never return."
Song Jiang was much pleased at this, and introduced General Huyan to the other leaders as one of their band. He then asked Li Zhong to return the horse stolen from General Huyan, and this was done. They then discussed how they were to rescue Kong Ming who was still in prison. "There is only one way," said Wu Yong "General Huyan must get the town gate open by some deception, and the rest will be easy. That will complete the estrangement between General Huyan and the Prefect."

Song Jiang addressed General Huyan Zhuo, "We do not wish to loot the town, but only get inside, and release Kong Ming and his uncle who are still in prison there. If it was not for that I would not ask you to get the town gate open by deception."
"As you have treated me with great hospitality," replied General Huyan. "I must do as you suggest."
About ten of the leaders disguised as soldiers and accompanied General Huyan Zhuo on horseback. They reached the town moat in the evening, and General Huyan called out, "Open the gate! I have just escaped with my life." The gatekeepers recognized the voice of General Huyan, and at once reported the matter to the prefect.
The Prefect Murong had been distressed at the capture of General Huyan, but when he heard this report he was delighted, and mounting his horse rode to the gate. In the dark he saw eleven horsemen, and could not make out who they were. He however called out, "General Huyan, how did you escape?"
"The bandits seized me, and took me as a prisoner to their stronghold," replied General Huyan. "There, however, was an old attaché of mine, and he secretly helped me to escape, and also gave me my old horse, and has accompanied me here."
The Prefect hearing this gave orders for the drawbridge to be lowered and the gate opened. Then the ten brigands were inside the gate, and Qin Ming struck at Prefect Murong and killed him on the spot. The other leaders soon scattered the guard. A fire was at once set in the city and Song Jiang and the other brigands outside, immediately advanced, and were soon all inside the town. Song Jiang immediately gave orders that the people were not to be troubled, and deputed a part of his men to seize the government granary and treasury. Another party attacked the prison, and soon rescued Kong Ming and Kong Bin and their relatives. The fire was extinguished. The members of the Prefect's family were all killed, and his residence were looted. When it was daylight, Song Jiang ordered that all civilians whose houses had been burnt should be compensated. The loot was placed on about five hundred carts, and sent to Liangshan Marsh. The bandits then held a great feast in the town, and afterwards Song Jiang invited all the brigands from the other three mountains to join together at Liangshan Marsh, and this they agreed to. It took several days before they all assembled at Liangshan Marsh. Altogether this adventure brought twelve new leaders to Liangshan Marsh.
After a time Lu Da spoke to Song Jiang about the bandits at Mount Shaohua, at Huayin County under the leadership of Shi Jin, and he asked to be allowed to visit his old friends there. He said perhaps he could induce them to come to Liangshan Marsh.
Song Jiang agreed to this, and appointed Wu Song to accompany Lu Da. The two leaders set off on their journey, but shortly after they had gone, Song Jiang thought that there might be risks on the way, and therefore dispatched Dai Zong, the Divine Traveler, to follow them.
Upon reaching Mount Shaohua, Lu Da and Wu Song were stopped by a sentinel bandit who asked what their business was. Wu Song said they wished to see Shi Jin, and a messenger was at once sent up the mountain to report the matter. Within a short time they saw the leaders Zhu Wu, Chen Da, and Yang Chun coming down the mountain to meet them, but Shi Jin was not with them. When they had been introduced, Lu Da asked where Shi Jin was, and Zhu Wu without replying invited them to come to their headquarters where matters could be discussed. But Lu Da objected to this, "If you have anything to say, goddamn say it at once. I came to see Shi Jin, but he is not here. I am not going further until you explain the position."
"We three were in charge of the stronghold, and then were joined by Shi Jin who became our chief," said Zhu Wu. "Everything went smoothly until one day he went down the mountain, and happened to meet an artist named Wang Yi who was traveling with his daughter. Sometime before Wang Yi had been sick, and had then taken a vow that if he recovered he would paint a special screen for a temple in that neighborhood.
"One day while doing this work the Prefect He came to the temple to burn incense before the god. He had been struck by the beauty of Wang Yi's daughter, and had sent a go-between to ask her to become his concubine. Wang Yi objected to this, and then the Prefect sent his soldiers to take the girl by force. A false charge was made against Wang Yi, and he had been banished to a distant prison. On the way as a prisoner he passed this spot, and so met Shi Jin to whom he told this story. Shi Jin was so annoyed that he attacked the escort of two soldiers, and killed them. He then went himself into the town to kill the Prefect, but was arrested and placed in prison, but I," continued Zhu Wu, "have no plan to solve this problem."
"This prick, the Prefect, is without decency," said Lu Da. "Why is he so brutal? I will go and kill him myself."
"Let us first go to our stronghold to discuss this question," said Zhu Wu.
Lu Da wanted to go at once, but Wu Song seizing hold of the monk's iron staff pointed to the sky, "Elder brother, you can see that the sun is almost touching the top of the trees, and it will soon be dark."
Lu Da saw this, but although still angry, he agreed to go up the mountain with them.
A feast was arranged, but Lu Da refused to join the others. "As long as our younger brother Shi Jin is absent, I will not eat or drink anything," he said. "I will sleep here for one night, but tomorrow I will go into the town, and kill that fellow."
"Do not be reckless," said Wu Song. "Tomorrow we must go to Liangshan Marsh, and ask Song Jiang to help us to attack Huazhou," he said to Lu Da.
"I am afraid that Shi Jin will be killed before the men come from Liangshan Marsh," said Lu Da.
"Even if you killed the Prefect," said Wu Song, "you would not then be sure of releasing Shi Jin from prison. I object very strongly to your going."
"Elder brother," interposed Zhu Wu, "what Wu Song says is quite right. Please keep cool in this matter."
"It is you indolent people that involves our younger brother Shi Jin!" replied Lu Da. "Now he is in prison, and yet you drink wine and eat food here as though nothing unusual had happened." He then left them, and went to bed. He was up early the next morning, and went away without speaking to any one.
As soon as this was found out, Wu Song considered that there would be immediate danger, and Zhu Wu at once sent two bandits to spy.
When Lu Da reached the town, he asked an average person where the yamen was. He was told to cross a bridge and then go east. Upon reaching the bridge, however, there were many men there who said, "You can't pass this way as the Prefect is coming." Lu Da thought, 'I come here to look for this man but there he is coming straight into my arms. He deserves death!" Soon the Prefect came along in his winter sedan chair and was attended by his guard on both sides. Lu Da seeing this realized that he could not carry out his plan. He thought if he made an attempt he might fail, and would only be laughed at.
Just at the moment the Prefect looked through the window of the chair and noticed Lu Da take a step forward and then withdraw as if undecided about something, so when he reached the yamen he told a messenger to go, and bring the big monk to see him. The messenger soon found Lu Da, who was surprised but pleased when he heard the message. Upon reaching the yamen he was asked to lay aside his broad sword and iron monk's staff, and was then asked to go into the Prefect's quarters to dine there. Upon reaching the room, the Prefect told his attendants, "Arrest that thief!" And Lu Da was arrested as a prisoner.

The policemen rushed Lu Zhishen to the foot of the prefect's platform. "Where are you from, bald donkey?" shouted Ho.
"What crime have I committed?"
"Who sent you here to kill me? The truth, now!"
"I'm a monk, a man who's renounced the world. How can you ask me that?"
"I saw you waiting to attack my sedan-chair with your staff, but you didn't dare. Bald donkey, you'd better confess!"
"This bucko didn't try to kill you. Why have you arrested me? You're wronging a peaceful man."
"Since when does a monk call himself 'this bucko'? He's a plundering bandit from the fifth region West of the Pass, for sure, who's come to avenge Shi Jin! If we don't beat him, he won't admit it. Guards, give this bald donkey a good drubbing!"
"Don't you put a finger on me! Let me tell you something!" yelled Zhishen. "I'm Lu Zhishen the Tattooed Monk from Liangshan Marsh! It doesn't matter if you kill me! When my brother Song Jiang finds out and comes down from the mountain, you might just as well cut off your own donkey head and send it to him!"
Prefect Ho was furious. He had Lu Zhishen severely beaten, then ordered his underlings to fasten a big cangue around the monk's neck and throw him into the jail for the condemned. At the same time he sent off a dispatch to the central authorities, requesting instructions. Lu's Buddhist staff and knife were locked away for safe-keeping.
This matter was soon the talk of the entire prefecture. Lesser brigands got wind of it and hastened up Mount Shaohua to report. Wu Song was shocked. "Two of us were sent to attend to something and one has already been captured," he thought. "How can I go back and face the chieftains?"
While he was pondering another bandit arrived from the foot of the mountain and announced: "A chieftain dispatched from Mount Liangshan. He's called Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller, and he's waiting below."
Wu Song hastily went down, brought him up, and introduced him to Zhu Wu. They told Dai how Lu had refused to take advice and had fallen into a trap. Dai was startled.
"I can't stay here long," he exclaimed. "I must return to Mount Liangshan and let our brothers know, so that they can send forces to save him."
"I'll be waiting anxiously," said Wu Song. "I hope our brothers will hurry to the rescue."
Dai Zong ate a vegetable meal, then worked his magic travel formula and sped towards Liangshan Marsh. He reached the stronghold in three days. He related to Chao Gai and Song Jiang how Lu Zhishen had wanted to kill Prefect Ho in order to save Shi Jin, but had been snared himself, instead. Song Jiang was alarmed.
"Two of our brothers in difficulty," he said. "Of course we'll rescue them. We mustn't delay. We'll muster men and horses immediately and set out in three contingents."
In the van of the first unit were Hua Rong, Qin Ming, Lin Chong, Yang Zhi and Huyan Zhuo. They commanded a thousand armored cavalry and two thousand infantry and took the lead, pushing through mountains and spanning rivers.
The middle unit was headed by Song Jiang, with Wu Yong, Zhu Tong, Xu Ning, Xie Zhen and Xie Bao as his lieutenants. They led a mixed force of infantry and cavalry numbering two thousand.
Bringing up the rear with fodder and grain were Li Ying, Yang Xiong, Shi Xiu, Li Jun and Zhang Shun, leading also two thousand infantry and cavalry men. This brought the expedition to a total of seven thousand. They left the mountain fortress, a turbulent stream of spears and halberds, men and horses, moving like the wind, and headed for Huazhou.
After several days on the road, they passed the halfway point, and Dai Zong was sent to announce their coining to the stronghold on Mount Shaohua. Zhu Wu and the other two leaders prepared animals for slaughter and fine wines in anticipation of their guests.
Song Jiang and his three contingents then arrived at the foot of the mountain. Wu Song went down with Zhu Wu, Chen Da and Yang Chun to greet Song Jiang, Wu Yong and the other leaders and invite them to the stronghold. When all were seated Song Jiang asked about the situation in the town.
"Prefect Ho has imprisoned your two chieftains. He's only waiting for word from the imperial court before disposing of them," said Zhu Wu.
"What should our rescue plan be?" queried Song and Wu.
"It's a big town with a deep broad moat. A very difficult place to attack," said Zhu Wu. "Only by striking from within and without at the same time can you capture it."
"Tomorrow we'll go to the outskirts and take a look," said Wu Yong. "then we'll discuss our plan."
Song Jiang drank for some time. He longed for dawn so that he could start reconnoitering.
"They've got two of our big chieftains in their prison. They're sure to be prepared," said Wu Yong. "We can't go during daylight. But there will be a bright moon tonight. Let's start down late in the afternoon. At the first watch, we can reconnoiter."
When the sun was well past its meridian, Song Jiang, Wu Yong, Hua Rong, Qin Ming and Zhu Tong rode down the slope and advanced along a winding road. At the first watch they neared the town of Huazhou. They dismounted and observed it from a bluff.
It was the middle of the second lunar month. The moonlight was bright as day. There wasn't a cloud in the sky. They could see several gates in the strong high wall enclosing the town. The moat was deep and wide. For a long time they stared, noting also Mount Huashan, west in the distance. Truly a formidable well-guarded town! What was to be done? None of them could think of a plan.
"Let's return to the stronghold," said Wu Yong, "and talk there." The five rode back through the night to Mount Shaohua. Song Jiang was frowning. His face wore a troubled expression.
"We'll send a dozen or so clever young men down to keep an ear cocked for what's going on," Wu Yong decided.
Before three days had passed, one of the scouts returned and reported: "The emperor has dispatched a Marshal of the Council of Imperial Defense, bearing a set of imperial golden hanging bells, to burn incense on Mount Huashan. He's come from the Yellow River to the Weihe."
"Brother, our worries are over," Wu Yong told Song Jiang. "Our plan is here." To Li Jun and Zhang Shun he said: "I want you to do this and this..."
"The problem is we don't know the terrain," said Li Jun. "It would be best if we had someone to lead the way."
"How about me?" Yang Chun the White-Spotted Snake proposed.
Song Jiang was very pleased, and the three went down the mountain.
The following day, at Wu Yong's suggestion, Song Jiang, Li Ying, Zhu Tong, Huyan Zhuo, Hua Rong, Qin Ming, and Xu Ning followed quietly with five hundred men to a fording point on the Weihe River. There, Li Jun and Zhang Shun were waiting with more than ten large boats. Wu Yong told Hua Rong, Qin Ming, Xu Ning and Huyan Zhuo to lie in ambush upon the bank; Song Jiang, Wu Yong, Zhu Tong and Li Ying boarded the vessels; Li Jun, Zhang Shun and Yang Chun then concealed the boats along the shore. The party waited there through the night.
At daybreak, they heard the distant sound of gongs and drums, and three government craft hove into view. On a yellow banner was inscribed the words: Marshal Su Who Burns Incense on Mount Huashan by Imperial Decree.
On Song Jiang's boat, Zhu Tong and Li Ying, each holding a long spear, stood behind him. Wu Yong was on the prow. They blocked the government vessel with their own when it reached the cove.
A captain wearing a purple robe and silver girdle emerged from the cabin with twenty men. "What boat are you?" he shouted. "How dare you interfere with the passage of a high minister?"
Song Jiang, hands clasped before him, bowed and hailed the officer respectfully. Wu Yong, from the prow, replied: "Song Jiang, a champion of the righteous, from Liangshan Marsh, awaits your gracious orders."
A chamberlain who was on board came forward and said: "A marshal of the imperial court is on his way to Mount Huashan to burn incense on orders of the emperor. Why do you robbers interfere?"
"We are champions of the righteous," replied Wu Yong. "We want only to see the marshal's honored visage so that we may offer him our plea."
"Who do you think you are, requesting to see the marshal!" cried the chamberlain. And two captains who stood on either side barked: "Keep your voices down!"
Song Jiang still did not stir from his position.
"We are inviting the marshal to come ashore. We have something to discuss with him," said Wu Yong.
"You're mad!" exclaimed the chamberlain. "The marshal is an imperial official. How can he talk with the likes of you!"
"If the marshal is unwilling to meet us I'm afraid our boys may give him a shock," Song Jiang said, standing erect.
Zhu Tong waved the pennant that was attached to his spear, and Hua Rong, Qin Ming, Xu Ning and Huyan Zhuo suddenly emerged with their men from their places of concealment. Setting arrows to their bow-strings, they took up positions on the bank by the ford. The terrified boatmen plunged into the interiors of the government vessels.
Alarmed, the chamberlain hurried in to report. Marshal Su had no choice but to emerge and take a seat on the prow. Again Song Jiang bowed and hailed him respectfully.
"Why do you halt my boat?" the marshal demanded.
"We would not presume to behave improperly."
"Then why, sir champion, do you block our passage?"
"We wouldn't dare. We want only to beseech the marshal to come ashore. There is a matter we wish to discuss."
"I am under imperial orders to burn incense on Mount Huashan, champion. How can I confer with you? A minister of the imperial court is not so lightly to be called ashore!"
"If Marshal Su refuses," said Wu Yong from the prow, "I'm afraid our followers will be equally unyielding."
Li Ying waved his pennanted spear and Li Jun, Zhang Shun and Yang Chun came rowing up in a boat. While the startled Marshal Su watched, Li and Zhang, sharp gleaming knives in their hands, leaped onto the government vessel, and knocked two of the captains into the water.
"Stop that nonsense," Song Jiang shouted. "You're startling His Excellency!"
Li and Zhang promptly dived into the river and heaved the two captains back. Both Li and Zhang were as at home in the water as they were on dry land. Now they bounded smoothly onto the deck.
The marshal's soul seemed to have left his body. Again Song Jiang yelled at his men. "You boys get out of here! Stop frightening the marshal! I'll persuade him to come ashore myself."
"If you have anything on your mind, champion, why not tell me about it here?" said Su.
"This is not the place to talk. Please come to our mountain stronghold. We have no wish to harm you. May the Spirit of Mount Huashan destroy me if I'm lying!"
Marshal Su no longer had any choice. He disembarked. He was given a horse, helped to mount, and led off by the outlaws.
Song Jiang and Wu Yong instructed Hua Rong and Qin Ming to accompany Su up the mountain. He himself swung into the saddle and followed, after ordering that the marshal's retinue plus the incense, sacrificial items and golden hanging bells all be brought along. He left only Li Jun, Zhang Shun and a hundred men to guard the boats. All the other chieftains returned to the stronghold.
There, Song Jiang dismounted and escorted Su into a large hall. He seated the marshal in the middle. The chieftains stood in lines on either side. Song Jiang kowtowed four times. He remained kneeling before Su.
"Originally I was a small functionary in Yuncheng County," he said. "A judicial proceeding compelled me to become an outlaw and take refuge in Liangshan Marsh. I am waiting for an imperial amnesty so that I may devote my services to our country.
"Two of my brothers, though blameless, have been framed by Prefect Ho and thrown into jail. We wish to borrow the imperial incense and accoutrements, plus the golden hanging bells, as a means of getting into Huazhou. When we've finished we'll return them. It will have nothing to do with you, Marshal. We pray that you consent."
"If you take the imperial incense and things and the matter becomes known, I will be implicated."
"Just blame everything on me when you get back to the capital, Marshal."

Su realized that men like these couldn't be refused. He therefore agreed. Song Jiang respectfully toasted him and laid a feast in thanks. He put the clothes of the entourage on his own men. From among the outlaws he selected a handsome, clean-shaven fellow and dressed him in the garments of the marshal, as an impersonation of Su Yuanjing. Song Jiang and Wu Yong were made up as chamberlains; Xie Zhen, Xie Bao, Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu as captains. Outlaws in purple robes and silver girdles carried pennants, banners, ceremonial equipment and symbols of office, and bore reverently the imperial incense, the sacrificial objects and the hanging golden bells. Hua Rong, Xu Ning, Zhu Tong and Li Ying dressed as guards. Zhu Wu, Chen Da and Yang Chun provided quarters for the marshal and his entourage, and wined and dined them.

Qin Ming and Huyan Zhuo were given command of one contingent of men and horses, and Lin Chong and Yang Zhi another, and were directed to advance in two columns towards the town. Wu Song was dispatched to the gate of the Mount Huashan Temple to wait for the trumpet's call, and then go into action. Dai Zong was sent on ahead to announce the coming of the "imperial mission."

To make a long story short, the procession left the mountain stronghold, descended to the fording point, got into the boats and embarked. Instead of calling on the prefect in Huazhou it went directly towards Mount Huashan Temple. Dai Zong announced its imminent arrival to the abbot of the Yuntai Monastery and the deacon of the temple. The clerics hurried to the shore to give welcome with flowers, candles and lanterns, banners and precious panoplies. The imperial incense was placed in a miniature pavilion, which the monks respectfully carried into the temple, along with the hanging golden bells.

The abbot approached the "marshal," and Wu Yong said: "He's been ill all through the journey. Get him a sedan-chair."

Attendants helped the "marshal" into the conveyance and he was carried to the temple's Hall for Officials and invited to rest. "Chamberlain" Wu Yong addressed himself to the abbot.

"The marshal is here under the emperor's decree with imperial incense and golden hanging bells to offer homage to the god. Why hasn't the local prefect appeared to welcome him?"

"We've already dispatched a messenger. I'm sure he'll be here shortly," replied the abbot.

Before the words were out of his mouth, the public prosecutor of the prefecture and sixty or so constables came as an advance party with wine and fruits to call on the "marshal." The outlaw who was disguised as this official, although resembling him somewhat, was unable to imitate his speech. Therefore he pretended to be ill and sat on a divan wrapped in a quilt. The public prosecutor, seeing the pennants, banners and serrated flags, all obviously imperial equipage from the Eastern Capital, was completely convinced of his authenticity.

The "chamberlain" went in twice, ostensibly to confer, then led the public prosecutor inside, where he knelt at the edge of the dais, a good distance from the "marshal," and kowtowed. The "marshal" pointed and mumbled something. Wu Yong led the public prosecutor forward, meanwhile berating him.

"The marshal is an important minister, very close to the emperor. He's come a long distance to this place under imperial decree to burn incense, and was ill on the road. Why didn't your prefectural officials go well forward to meet him?"

"We received notification that he was coming, but we had no idea he was so near. That's why we failed to greet him and he reached the temple ahead of us. The prefect was intending to come, but bandits on Mount Shaohua have joined forces with the outlaws in Liangshan Marsh to attack the town. We're on constant alert, and he doesn't dare leave. He sent me on ahead with wine of greeting. He'll be following soon to pay his respects."

"The marshal refuses to drink a drop until your prefect arrives and welcomes him with proper ceremony," announced Wu Yong.

The public prosecutor called for wine and drank with the "chamberlain" and the "retinue." Wu Yong again went inside and returned with a key. He led the prosecutor to see the pair of golden hanging bells. He opened the lock and, from their scented bag, removed the bells, showed them to the prosecutor, and suspended them from a bamboo frame. They were of matchless workmanship, having been made by the most skilful craftsmen in the imperial palace. Encrusted with pearls and precious jewels and with a red silk lantern suspended between them, they had hung in the center of the palace's Hall of the God. Only the special craftsmen of the imperial court could have created them.

After permitting the prosecutor to view the bells, Wu Yong returned them to their container and locked it. He then produced many documents from the Council of Administration and handed these to the prosecutor. He also requested the "marshal" to choose an auspicious day for conducting the sacrifice.

The prosecutor and his constables examined the documents, bid farewell to the "chamberlain," and returned to Huazhou to report to the prefect. Song Jiang thought with satisfaction: "Although that rogue of a prosecutor is crafty, we've got him completely buffaloed!"

By then Wu Song had taken up his position outside the temple gate. Wu Yong directed Shi Xiu to conceal a knife on his person and join him there. He also told Dai Zong to disguise himself as a captain.

The abbot of the Yuntai Monastery served a vegetarian meal, and ordered the overseer to have the temple tidied up. As Song Jiang strolled around the grounds he thought it a splendid place. The buildings were unusually fine. Huashan Temple was truly like heaven on earth.

Song Jiang then returned to the Hall for Officials. A gate-keeper reported: "Prefect Ho has arrived." Song summoned Hua Rong, Xu Ning, Zhu Tong and Li Ying—the four "guards," each bearing arms—and stationed them on either side. He positioned Xie Zhen, Xie Bao, Yang Xiong and Dai Zong—all with concealed weapons—to the left and right.

The prefect, who had come with more than three hundred men, dismounted before the temple and swarmed in with his party. "Chamberlains" Wu Yong and Song Jiang observed that all were armed with swords.

Wu Yong immediately shouted: "A marshal of the imperial court is within. Trivial persons keep back!"

The crowd halted, and only Prefect Ho advanced. "Chamberlain" Wu Yong said: "The marshal invites the prefect to enter." Prefect Ho walked into the Hall for Officials and kowtowed before the "marshal."

"Prefect," said Wu Yong, "do you acknowledge your misfeasance?"

"I didn't know the marshal had arrived. I beg forgiveness."

"The marshal has come to Mount Huashan in obedience to the emperor's decree to burn incense. Why didn't you go well forward to welcome him?"

"We didn't know his arrival was imminent, and so were remiss in our duty."

"Seize him!" Wu Yong shouted.

Xie Zhen and Xie Bao had already pulled out their daggers. With one kick they knocked Ho to the ground, then cut off his head.

"Into action, brothers!" shouted Song Jiang.

The prefect's three hundred followers were paralyzed with fright. Hua Rong and the others closed in and swept them down like abacus beads. Half of them scrambled to the temple gate. But there Wu Song and Shi Xiu, brandishing their knives, waded in while outlaws bent on slaughter attacked from all sides. Not a single man of the three hundred got away. Some came later to the temple, and these too were killed by Zhang Shun and Li Jun.

Song Jiang ordered that the imperial incense and the golden hanging bells be packed up, and all quickly boarded the vessels. Even before they reached Huazhou they saw two columns of smoke rising. They surged into the town and first freed Shi Jin and Lu Zhishen from the prison. Next, they broke open the storehouses, took everything of value, and loaded it on carts. Zhishen rushed to the rear hall and got back his knife and staff. Jade Branch had long since jumped into a well and committed suicide.

Leaving Huazhou, they got into the boats and returned to Mount Shaohua, where they restored to Marshal Su the imperial incense, the golden hanging bells, the pennants, banners and symbols of office, and respectfully expressed their thanks. Song Jiang presented him with gold and silver on a platter. All of his retinue were similarly rewarded, regardless of rank.

A farewell banquet was given for them in the stronghold and gratitude to the marshal was again expressed. The chieftains escorted them down the mountain to their boats at the river ford. Every vessel and every single possession were returned to their owners. Once more Song Jiang thanked Marshal Su.

Song returned to Mount Shaohua and conferred with the four gallant leaders. They removed all money and grain from the fortress and set it to the torch. Then the outlaws, with horses, grain and fodder, set out together for Liangshan Marsh.

As to Marshal Su, after embarking he sailed to Huazhou. There he learned that the Mount Liangshan brigands had slaughtered soldiers, plundered the storehouses of money and grain, killed over a hundred army officers, stole all of the horses, and annihilated hundreds in the Huashan Temple.

Su instructed the public prosecutor to send a written report to the Council of Administration for transmission to the emperor stating that "Song Jiang robbed the imperial incense and hanging bells en route, and was thereby able to lure the prefect to the temple and murder him."

The marshal burned the imperial incense at the Huashan Temple and entrusted the golden bells to the abbot of the Yuntai Monastery. He then hastened back to the capital, travelling day and night, and reported to the emperor what had transpired.

Song Jiang, after rescuing Shi Jin and Lu Zhishen, again divided his forces into three contingents and, accompanied by the four gallant fellows from Mount Shaohua, returned to Liangshan Marsh. They harmed no one in any of the prefectures and counties through which they travelled.

Dai Zong was sent on ahead to the fortress to report their coming. Chao Gai and the other chieftains descended the mountain to welcome them. Together they went up and entered Fraternity Hall. When greetings had been exchanged, all joined in a feast of celebration. The following day Shi Jin, Zhu Wu, Chen Da and Yang Chun, at their own expense, gave a banquet in thanks to Chao, Song, and the other leaders. Several more days passed.

To skip the minor details, one day Dry-Land Crocodile Zhu Gui suddenly arrived and reported: "On Mount Mangdang in Peixian County, Xuzhou Prefecture, there is a newly formed band of robbers, about three thousand in number. Their leader is a Taoist named Fan Rui. His nickname is Demon King Who Roils the World. He can summon the wind and rain, and he's a fantastic military tactician. He has two lieutenants: One is called Xiang Chong. His nickname is Eight-Armed Nezha. He carries a round shield pierced by twenty-four throwing knives. He can hit a man at a hundred paces and never miss. In his hand is an iron javelin. The other is called Li Gun. His nickname is the Flying Divinity and he also carries a round shield. Only his is pierced by twenty-four darts. These too are infallibly deadly at a hundred paces. He holds also a precious sword.

"These three sworn brothers occupy Mount Mangdang, and they rob and pillage. Now they have decided to come and swallow our fortress. I heard about this and had to report."

Song Jiang was furious. "How dare those crooks behave so rudely," he fumed. "I'll go down and deal with them!"

Nine Dragons Shi Jin stepped forward. "My three brothers and I have just come to the stronghold and haven't yet made the slightest contribution. We'd like to lead our own men and seize those robbers."

Song Jiang was delighted. Shi Jin mustered his contingents. Then he, Zhu Wu, Chen Da and Yang Chun donned their armor, bid farewell to Song Jiang and went down the mountain. They crossed the water in boats from the Shore of Golden Sands and hurried along the road directly towards Mount Mangdang. In three days they came within sight of it. Here it was in ancient times that the first Han emperor Gao Zu killed the snake.

The three units proceeded to the foot of the mountain. Hidden robber scouts had already gone up to report.

Shi Jin deployed his forces from Mount Shaohua in battle formation. Guarded completely in armor, astride a steed as red as a glowing coal, he rode at the head of his men, a three pointed two-edged blade in his hand.

The three leaders behind him were Zhu Wu, Chen Da and Yang Chun. Zhu Wu wielded two double-edged swords as he rode forward.

Reining in their steeds in front of their position, the four watched for some time. They saw a swarm of men come racing down the slope, preceded by two bold stalwarts. The first was Xiang Chong, of Peixian County, Xuzhou Prefecture. He carried a round shield in which twenty-four throwing knives were inserted. In his right hand he held a javelin. Attached to his back was an identifying pennant reading: Eight-Armed Nezha.

The second brave fellow, also from Peixian County, was Li Gun. He bore a round shield pierced by twenty-four darts. The shield was in his left hand. In his right he grasped a sword. Attached to his back was a pennant inscribed: Flying Divinity.

When Xiang Chong and Li Gun saw Shi Jin, Zhu Wu, Chen Da and Yang Chun, astride their horses before the opposite position, they said not a word. Instead, while lesser robbers beat gongs and cymbals, the two charged, brandishing their shields. Shi Jin's force couldn't withstand them. While the rear guard withdrew, Shi Jin's forward unit resisted, but Zhu Wu's middle unit yelled and ran for their lives for twenty or thirty li. Shi Jin was nearly hit by a flying knife. Yang Chun dodged too slowly, and was wounded by one of them. His horse was injured, and he abandoned it and fled on foot.

Shi Jin counted his forces and found he had lost half. He conferred with Zhu Wu and the others. They were intending to send someone to Mount Liangshan for aid when a fighter came and reported: "There are some two thousand men and horses on that highway to the north where the dust is rising." Shi Jin and the others mounted and looked. They saw the banners of Liangshan Marsh. Riding at the head of the contingent were Hua Rong and Xu Ning. Shi Jin hastened to greet them. He related how Xiang Chong and Li Gun had attacked with their whirling shields and how his forces had been unable to withstand them.

"Brother Song Jiang has been worried about you. He was sorry he let you go. He's sent us two to help," said Hua Rong.

Shi Jin was very pleased. The two units combined and made camp.

At dawn the following day, as they were preparing to muster their men and go forth against the foe, a fighter arrived and reported: "More cavalry are approaching on the highway to the north."

Hua Rong, Xu Ning and Shi Jin rode out to meet them and saw an army of three thousand men led by Song Jiang personally. Shi Jin told him how formidable Xiang Chong and Li Gun were with their flying knives, darts and whirling shields, and that he had lost half his men. Song Jiang was greatly alarmed. "Let's make camp first," Wu Yong suggested, "then we can talk this over."

The impatient Song Jiang wanted to muster their forces and drive directly for the foot of the mountain. But it was already growing dark, and on Mount Mangdang blue lanterns were visible. Gongsun Sheng said, "Those people must know magic. The blue lanterns in their camp show that someone there's able to cast spells. We'd better fall back. Tomorrow I'll use a counter-spell and we'll catch a couple of them." Pleased, Song Jiang ordered his army to withdraw 20 Li and make camp. Early the next morning Gongsun worked his spell. And as a result, a demon king with clasped hands presented himself at Mount Liang, a miraculous general with full willingness surrendered in the Marsh.

After Governor Ho had enticed Monk Lu Zhishen into an inner room and shouted "Seize him!" the policemen shoved him in front of the bench and the Governor bellowed: "Where have you come from, you bald reprobate?"

The Monk replied: "What crime have I committed?"

"Tell the truth," said the Governor. "Who sent you here to assassinate me?"

"I am a monk," Lu Zhishen protested. "How can you ask me something like that?"

"I saw you, you bald ass," shouted the Governor. "You wanted to attack my sedan chair with your staff, you were thinking about it but you didn't dare. You'd bloody well better confess, you scoundrel!"

"Yes, well I bloody well didn't attack you, did I, so why have you arrested me? It's a fucking false accusation!" said the Monk.

"Who ever heard of a monk who uses language like that?" said the Governor. "This bald villain must be one of those bandits from west of the pass, come here on behalf of that robber Shi Jin. He'll never confess unless he's beaten. Guards, take him away and give him a bloody good thrashing."

The Monk cried out: "Keep your hands off me. I'll tell you myself. I am Lu Zhishen, sometimes called the Flowery Monk, from the Marshes of Mount Liang. I don't care if you kill me. My brother Song Jiang will hear about it and when he comes down from the mountain he'll execute you double-quick, you whole bloody gang of donkey's heads!"

The Governor flew into a towering passion. After the Monk had been beaten for a while, a heavy cangue was ordered for him and he was thrown into the dungeons. A letter to the Emperor was composed, requesting instructions. The staff and sword were placed under seal in the courtroom.

By now the whole district was in an uproar. The two scouts raced back to Little Mount Hua with the news. Pilgrim Wu Song, horrified, said: "We came here to do a job, one of us has now been lost, how can I go back and tell the leaders?"

As he was wondering hopelessly what to do, a soldier from the mountain appeared and said: "There's a leader here sent from Mount Liang. He's called Dai Zong, the Magic Messenger. He's waiting down below."

Pilgrim Wu Song hurried down to invite him up to the strong~hold, where they held a meeting with the Strategist and the others, and they explained how the Monk had fallen into the trap after refusing to listen to their admonitions. The Magic Messenger was greatly distressed: "I mustn't stop long," he said. "I must go back to Mount Liang and tell the others, so they can send troops to rescue him."

The Pilgrim said: "I shall wait here. I beg you, go quickly and return soon."

After eating some vegetarian food, the Magic Messenger started his magic walking and raced back to Mount Liang. Within three days he was at the stronghold and recounted to the two leaders how the Monk in trying to kill Governor Ho in order to rescue the Tattooed Dragon had fallen into a trap.

Song Jiang said in great agitation: "If two of our friends are in trouble, of course we must help. I won't hesitate for a moment." He named the troops and divided them into three contingents. The first party consisting of five commanders, Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, Leopard's Head Lin Chong, the Blue-Faced Beast and Twin Rods, with a thousand armoured cavalry and two thousand foot, was to lead off and pioneer the route. The main party had six leaders, Song Jiang, the Professor, Whiskers, the Spearsman, Snake and Scorpion, and two thousand troops. The rearguard, responsible for stores and fodder, consisted of Skyhawk, Madcap, Morbid, the White-Water Dragon and White Eel with two thousand troops. Seven thousand troops in all left Mount Liang and set off for Huazhou. They marched flat out, making no stops. When they were halfway there, the Magic Messenger was sent on ahead to inform Little Mount Hua. The Strategist and his comrades laid on pigs, sheep, oxen and horses and brewed up some strong wine in readiness.

When Song Jiang's three divisions reached Little Mount Hua, Pilgrim Wu Song took the Strategist, the River-Jumper and White-Spotted Snake down to pay their respects to Song Jiang, the Professor and others, and then they all went up to the camp and held a meeting. Song Jiang asked for information about the city, and the Strategist said: "Governor Ho has got the two leaders in the prison, and is only waiting for the Emperor's instructions to execute them."

Song Jiang and the Professor said: "What's our best plan, then, for rescuing the Tattooed Dragon and the Monk?"

"The city's suburbs are extensive and the moat is broad and deep," said the Strategist. "It's very difficult to attack. We can't get them unless we have someone on the inside."

The Professor said: "Tomorrow we'll go and see what the moat is like. Then we'll talk about it again."

Song Jiang sat drinking till late, and then wanted to go and view the city at once, without waiting till dawn. The Professor advised against it. "They've got two tigers shut up in the gaol there," he said. "Of course they'll be taking precautions. We certainly can't go in full daylight. But tonight there will be a moon. If we leave the mountain in the afternoon we'll get there at dusk and we can have a good look."

So next day they waited till the afternoon and then five of them, Song Jiang, the Professor, Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, and Whiskers rode down the mountain and set off. Some time after seven o'clock they were outside the city walls of Huazhou. They halted at the top of a steep slope to observe the city. It was typical clear March weather and the moon was as beautiful as a picture, without a trace of cloud in the sky. Huazhou had several city gates. The walls were high and the earthen ramparts solid. The moat was broad and deep. They gazed long at it. Far off the peaks of Mount Hua, the great mountain of the west, could be made out. It was a fine sight:

This famed peak is often called the Immortal's Hands; here is Guanyin's platform in the clouds. At the top there's the Jade Lady's wash basin; below the waters where the Milky Way can gaze upon itself. This is a whole universe of beauty: the pointed peaks rise heavenward as if the clouds grow from them; reverenced by all is this sacred mountain, whose strange rocks and awesome peaks invade the regions of the Dipper. Here every shade of blue and green is to be found. The most brilliant poet would find it hard to put into words; the brush of the most gifted painter could scarcely encompass it. In profound caves pale light awakes a myriad delicate hues; towering peaks and cliffs reflect the sun in a thousand purple flames. The disciple points into the distance; in the ornamental pond the lily breasts the ripples like a boat. In olden times, 'tis said, flowers fed by the waters of the well grew to an incredible size. Monstrous spirits grew angry, and split the mountain top to release the gods. The famous anchorite, lofty and pure, came to the simple hut to sleep. This is renowned Mount Hua, known for a thousand years, where incense has risen to heaven since time immemorial.

Having appreciated the sight of Mount Hua, and noted that the city moat was broad, the defences solid, Song Jiang still had no idea how to proceed.

The Professor said: "Let us return to the mountain stronghold and discuss what to do."

Riding all night, they returned to Little Mount Hua. Song Jiang's brows remained knit; his concern showed clearly on his face.

The Professor said: "Let us send out a dozen sharp-witted scouts to listen all around for news."

Two days later one of these men suddenly appeared on the mountain and reported: "Recently the Emperor has sent an officer of his personal staff to take his personal gift of a pair of golden bells to the Western Peak and burn incense there. He is coming by way of the Yellow River and the Wei River."

The Professor said: "No need to worry now, brother, this has given me an idea." He called the White-Water Dragon and White Eel and said: "I want you two to do this ... and this...."

The White-Water Dragon said: "The only problem is neither of us knows the way. Wouldn't it be a good idea if we could take a guide along?"
White-Spotted Snake then spoke up: "Can I come with you?"
Song Jiang liked the idea, and the three of them set off down the mountain.
Next day the Professor asked seven of the leaders, Song Jiang, Skyhawk, Whiskers, Twin Rods, Colonel Hua, Thunderclap and the Spearsman to go down the mountain quietly with five hundred troops. When they reached the crossing of the River Wei, the White-Water Dragon, White Eel and White-Spotted Snake had already provided a dozen large boats. The Professor ordered four of his party, Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, the Spearsman and Twin Rods, to set up an ambush on the bank. The others, Song Jiang, the Professor, Whiskers and Skyhawk, got into the boats, which the three water leaders steered to a hiding-place along the bank.
They waited all night. When it grew light in the morning they heard the distant sound of gongs, drums and fifes and then three government boats drew near, all flying yellow banners proclaiming "Marshal Su Yuanjing, officer in charge of the imperial mission to burn incense on Mount Hua."
Song Jiang quietly rejoiced at what he saw: "The Mystic Lady said 'Chance lodgings will bring many joys.' Now I chance to meet this person whose name, Su, is the same as the word for lodging. There must be a meaning to it."
As the Marshal's boats approached the river mouth, Whiskers and Skyhawk grasped their long spears and stood behind Song Jiang and the Professor. When the boats reached the landing place, they were obstructed. Twenty or more guards in purple coats and silver belts appeared on the boats and shouted: "You there, on the boats, how dare you obstruct the channel and get in the way of the Marshal's convoy?"
Song Jiang, lance in hand, saluted. The Professor, standing at the prow, said: "Song Jiang, leader of the company in the Marshes of Mount Liang, respectfully requests an interview." The purser of the other boat appeared and said: "This is an officer of the imperial court, on his way to burn incense on the Western Peak, you are rebels from the Marshes of Mount Liang, how dare you stand in his way?"
The Professor said: "We are loyal subjects, we only ask to see the Marshal's face, we have a request to make of him."
The purser said: "Who do you think you are, to insist on seeing the Marshal?" The guards on either side shouted: "Lower your voice!"
Song Jiang said: "I would like to ask the Marshal to come ashore. There is something I want to discuss with him."
The purser said: "What rubbish! The Marshal is a high official of the court. How could he have anything to discuss with you?"
Song Jiang said: "I am afraid if the Marshal refuses to speak to me, my men may be a little rough with the Marshal."
Whiskers jabbed at the little banner on the boat with his spear, while on the bank Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, the Spearsman and Twin Rods advanced with their cavalry. They fitted arrows to their bows, and when they reached the river spread out along the bank. The steersmen on the boats all went and hid in their cabins in terror. The purser anxiously disappeared inside to report and the Marshal was obliged to come out and take a seat on deck.
Song Jiang saluted and said: "I do not wish to be discourteous."
The Marshal said: "Why do you interfere with our progress like this, my man?"
Song Jiang said: "I would not dream of trying to interfere with your journey, Marshal. I merely wish to invite you to disembark because I have a request to make."
The Marshal said: "I am travelling on imperial business. My mission is to burn incense on the Western Peak. What can you possibly have to discuss with me? How can you expect an important official of the court to disembark just to please you?"
Song Jiang said: "If you do not, I am afraid my companions over there may have something to say about it."
At this Skyhawk waved his signal flag and the White-Water Dragon, White Eel and White-Spotted Snake rowed their boats up. The Marshal appeared quite taken aback. White-Water Dragon and White Eel, swords flashing in their hands, leaped into the boat and with a shove sent the two guards flying into the water. Song Jiang immediately shouted: "Behave yourselves! You are frightening an important man!"
Splash! The two of them had dived into the water and were hauling the two guards out again. They moved as easily over the water as if it were level ground and effortlessly shot back onto the boat, causing the Marshal's heart almost to jump out of his mouth. Song Jiang again shouted: "Withdraw, men, stop frightening the great man. I will help him slowly to disembark."
The Marshal said: "What is your business, then, sir? Please tell me."
Song Jiang said: "This is not the place for it. I invite you to come to our mountain stronghold to hear our request. I intend no harm to you. If I harm a hair of your head, then let the Western Peak fall and crush me!"
By now it was clear that the Marshal could not avoid going ashore. He was obliged to leave the boat and step off onto the bank. A horse was brought and he was helped onto it, and then perforce must go where they led him. Song Jiang ordered Colonel Hua and Thunderclap to take him on up the mountain. Then he mounted himself and ordered the boat crews to unload the incense, religious objects, and the golden bells, and carry them up the mountain. Only the White-Water Dragon and White Eel remained behind with a hundred men to guard the boats.
All the other leaders now went up the mountain. Song Jiang rode into the camp and escorted Marshal Su to the Assembly Hall where he was given the place of honour, with the leaders ranged in their places on either side. Song Jiang prostrated himself four times, and then knelt before the Marshal and said: "I, Song Jiang, was previously an official in the Yuncheng administration, but official persecution forced me to take to the mountains and forests, and for the time being I have found refuge in the marshlands of Mount Liang, until such time as an amnesty allows me to serve my country again. At this moment two of my comrades are subject to groundless persecution by Governor Ho who has thrown them into gaol. I wish to borrow your Excellency's imperial incense, ritual objects and the golden bells to practise a deception on Huazhou. When our business is concluded you shall have them back and your person will suffer no harm whatsoever. That is my proposal."
Marshal Su said: "If you take the incense and the other ritual objects away, it will all come out in the end and I shall be in trouble."
"When you return, Marshal, you can put all the blame on my shoulders," said Song Jiang.
The Marshal saw from their looks that there was no way he could refuse, so he had to give permission. Song Jiang expressed his gratitude with toasts and a banquet. Then the uniforms of the Marshal's retinue were all borrowed from them. A likely-looking soldier was chosen. His head was shaved and he was dressed up in the Marshal's clothes to impersonate the Marshal. Song Jiang and the Professor dressed as pursers. Snake, Scorpion, Morbid and Madcap dressed as guards. The troops wore the red coats and silver belts and carried all the imperial standards, banners and insignia, and the religious objects, the boxes of imperial incense, the sacrificial offerings and the golden bells. Colonel Hua, the Spearsman, Whiskers and Skyhawk dressed as guards. The Strategist, the River-Jumper and White-Spotted Snake kept the Marshal and all his followers entertained, plying them with wine. Finally two bodies of men marched out towards the city, one commanded by Thunderclap and Twin Rods, the other by Leopard's Head Lin Chong and the Blue-Faced Beast. Pilgrim Wu Song was sent on ahead to wait at the gates to the Temple of the Western Peak for the signal to act.
To spare you more details, the main party now left the mountain stronghold and made their way to the river bank where they boarded the boats. They did not announce themselves to the governor of Huazhou but instead went straight to the Temple of the Western Peak. The Magic Messenger went first to give the news to the abbot at the Hall of Clouds and the lay brothers from the monastery came down to the boats to welcome them ashore. With incense, flowers, lamps and candles, with banners and streamers, precious relics and umbrellas, they lined up on the bank. The incense was unloaded and taken to a tabernacle spec~ially prepared for it, which the people from the temple hoisted on poles. Behind it came the golden bells. When the abbot came to pay his respects to the Marshal, the Professor said: "The Marshal caught some infection on the journey and is not in good health. Please bring a sedan chair for him."
Attendants helped the Marshal into the sedan chair and he was carried to the abbot's quarters to rest. The Professor, pretending to be a purser, said to the abbot: "This is an important imperial delegation, bringing you the Emperor's gift of imperial incense and golden bells. Why is the provincial governor so neglectful that he is not here to welcome us?"
The abbot replied: "I have sent word to him. I am sure he will be here soon."
He had hardly finished speaking when the public prosecutor from the provincial administration with fifty or more police officers arrived to greet the Marshal with wine and dried fruit. Now although the soldier who was impersonating the Marshal looked very convincing, he obviously couldn't open his mouth. That is why he had been told he must pretend to be ill and sit on the bed muffled in quilts. When the public prosecutor saw him, together with all the banners, insignia, badges and the like, which were the prerogative of palace staff, why should he suspect anything? The purser bustled in and out, and petitioned twice. Then he took the public prosecutor in and made him prostrate himself far away at the bottom of the steps. The false marshal simply motioned with his hand, and his words were inaudible. As the Professor led the official forward he delivered a reprimand: "The Marshal is an important official of the court, he has taken the trouble to come all this way, bringing the imperial incense to you, he has even had the misfortune to contract an illness on the way which is not yet cured, why are the officials of the provincial government not here to welcome him after his journey?"
The public prosecutor replied with a conciliatory smile: "Although we received advance notification of the journey, we have had no more recent news, that is why we missed meeting you. It is unfortunate that the Marshal came first to the temple, because at present the Governor is much occupied with the robbers from Little Mount Hua, who have allied themselves with the Mount Liang outlaws and are planning an attack on the city. We have to watch out for them every day and for this reason he does not dare absent himself. He sent me here first to do the honours. He will come himself to meet you later."
The Professor said: "I warn you, the Marshal will accept no wine, not a drop. All he wants is for the Governor to come as quickly as possible so they can discuss the presentation."
The public prosecutor therefore had wine served to the purser and his own people. Then the Professor went inside to report and came back with a key and took the public prosecutor to see the golden bells. He opened the case and drew the golden bells, the emperor's gift, from their sheaths of perfumed cotton and hung them on a bamboo pole, so the official could have a good look. They were indeed of incomparable workmanship:
The golden bells are cast in solid metal, and supplied with gorgeous multi-coloured trappings, including silk fringes, strings of pearls, and jewelled covers. They are swathed in yellow silk and eight-clawed green dragons twine about them. They are festooned with purple ribbons and pairs of gold phoenixes chase each other round the sides. Each bears a rich inlay of coral and cornelian, with amber and rare pearls. The fine porcelain of a lamp reflects the red gauze shade; a pink lotus is exquisitely framed in jade green leaves. Truly these bells deserve to hang in a palace, their quality would grace the most luxurious of settings.
These golden bells, in fact, were made by one of the most skilled of the palace craftsmen. They were inlaid with the seven precious stones and with pearls and between them a red lantern was set. Originally they had hung in the centre of the Hall of the Heavenly Lord. Where else could they possibly have been made but in the palace?
After allowing the official one look, the Professor locked the bells away again in their case. Then he handed over to the official various documents from the Chancellery and demanded that the Governor come to discuss matters and fix the day for the presentation ceremony. The prosecutor and his men, having seen the various objects and documents, took their leave and returned to Huazhou to report to the Governor.
Song Jiang was secretly rejoicing, saying to himself: "This bugger is a slippery customer, but I think we've pulled the wool over his eyes." By this time the Pilgrim was already in position at the gates of the temple. The Professor told Madcap to conceal a sharp sword about him and go to the temple gate to assist the Pilgrim's work there. He also told the Magic Messenger to dress as a guard.
The abbot now served a vegetarian meal in the Hall of Clouds and ordered the temple's administrator and his staff to get the place tidied up in readiness.
Song Jiang meanwhile went for a stroll around the Temple of the Western Peak. It was certainly a fine building: a series of halls quite out of the ordinary, a true heaven on earth! When he came to the main hall he lit some incense and prostrated himself. Having said a silent prayer, he returned to the official hall. At that moment the door-keeper announced: "The Governor is here!"
Song Jiang called Colonel Hua, the Spearsman, Whiskers and Skyhawk and told them to stand with their weapons on either side. Snake, Scorpion, Morbid and the Magic Messenger all with hidden weapons also stood on his left and right.
Governor Ho and over three hundred men now arrived at the temple, dismounted, and began to crowd inside. The two false pursers, the Professor and Song Jiang, saw that these three hundred men were all trying to enter without relinquishing their arms. The Professor shouted: "A marshal of the imperial court is present, no outsiders without business here are permitted to enter!" The crowd halted and the Governor entered alone to pay his respects to the Marshal. The purser announced: "The Marshal invites the Governor for an audience." The Governor entered the ceremonial hall and prostrated himself before the false marshal.
The Professor said: "Governor, do you admit your fault?"
"I should have known that the Marshal had arrived. I beg to be forgiven," said the Governor.
The Professor said: "The Marshal has come here to the Western Peak on an imperial mission to burn incense. Why were you not here to receive him?"
The Governor replied: "We have had no recent news at the government office, that is why I failed to receive him."
"Seize him!" the Professor commanded in a loud voice. Snake and Scorpion had already got their swords out. They tripped him and then cut off his head.
"Go to it, lads!" Song Jiang now shouted.
The three hundred troops who had come with the Governor had remained standing there open-mouthed, too horrified even to run for it. Colonel Hua and his men rushed on them and began knocking them off like beads on an abacus. Some made a dash for the gate, but there the Pilgrim and Madcap began laying into them, their swords whirling; the troops from Mount Liang followed suit. Of the three hundred government contingent not one got away. Those who arrived later at the temple were killed by White Eel and the White-Water Dragon.
Song Jiang hurriedly called for the imperial incense and the hanging bells to be brought and taken back to the boats. In the city two fires were to be seen so they charged in and went straight to the gaol where they freed the Tattooed Dragon and the Monk. They broke into the treasury, removed all the valuables and loaded them onto carts. The caravan then left Huazhou and returned by boat to Little Mount Hua. Here they respectfully greeted the real Marshal and restored to him the imperial incense, the golden bells, the pennants, banners and religious items and so on, politely thanking him. Song Jiang ordered a tray of silver to be brought and presented and all the Marshal's followers, regardless of their position, were rewarded. A farewell banquet was held in the stronghold to thank the Marshal. Finally all the leaders accompanied him down the mountain to see him off. At the river bank all the boats and other possessions, without exception, were returned to their rightful owners.
Having thanked the Marshal and bade him farewell, Song Jiang returned to Little Mount Hua and when he had talked to the four leaders there, they collected all their money and provisions, set fire to the defences, and in a big column of troops and provisions set off for Mount Liang.
Now when the Marshal disembarked and entered Huazhou, he learnt that the Mount Liang bandits had slaughtered the garrison and sacked the treasury and stores. More than a hundred officers had died in the city and all the horses had been taken. At the Temple of the Western Peak many more had lost their lives. He made the public prosecutor prepare a report for the Council to present to the Emperor. In it, it was said that "Song Jiang waylaid the imperial incense and bells and used them to entice the Governor to the temple where he killed him." Marshal Su went to the temple and burnt the incense and presented the bells to the abbot. He then hastened back to the capital to report all these matters. Of this no more.
Song Jiang having rescued the Tattooed Dragon and Lu Zhishen, collected the four leaders from Little Mount Hua. As before, the troops were formed into three columns and they set off for Mount Liang. They crossed the province without in any way inconveniencing the populace. The Magic Messenger was sent ahead to report to Chao Gai and the others came down the mountain to meet them. Soon they were all back in the Assembly Hall of the Heroes, where greetings were performed and a big banquet held in celebration.
Following this the Tattooed Dragon and the other three each in turn paid for a banquet to show their gratitude to Chao Gai and the others. Several days passed in this manner, but I will spare you the details.
Then one day, out of the blue, the Crocodile came up the mountain and reported: "There's a new band of robbers on Mount Mangdang over in Xuzhou. They've got together three thousand troops. The chief is a Taoist called Fan Rui. His nickname is the Demon King and his tactical skill is brilliant. He has two lieutenants. One is called Xiang Chong, alias the Eight-Armed Ogre. He carries a collection of twenty-four throwing knives, stuck in a round shield, and wields a steel-hafted spear. The other is called Li Gun, alias Winged Ghost. He has twenty-four javelins, also stuck in a round shield, and he wields a trusty sword. These three are sworn brothers and they have occupied Mount Mangdang and devote themselves to plunder and pillage. They have been talking about coming here to take over the Marshes of Mount Liang. As soon as I heard about this I thought I ought to tell you."
Song Jiang was highly indignant. "The cheek of these bastards!" he exclaimed. "I shall have to go down and see about this!"
At this point the Tattooed Dragon jumped up and said: "The four of us have just joined the stronghold and we have as yet made no contribution whatsoever. Please let us take some of our troops and go to capture this bunch of brigands."
Song Jiang was pleased with the idea. So the Tattooed Dragon detailed some of his troops and when he and the Strategist, the River-Jumper and White-Spotted Snake had armed themselves, they said farewell to Song Jiang and set off down the mountain. They crossed by boat at Golden Sands Landing and took the road to Mount Mangdang.
In three days they were in sight of this mountain, the very place where in days gone by the first emperor of Han scotched the snake and set the ball rolling. The horsemen were spotted and one of the lookouts went up the mountain to report.
The Tattooed Dragon deployed the troops he had brought from Little Mount Hua. Dressed in full armour and mounted on a flame-coloured steed he rode out in front of his forces, wielding his three-pointed double-bladed halberd. Behind him came the other three, the Strategist in the middle with his two swords. On his left was the River-Jumper, with a gleaming steel spear, and on his right, with a blade on a long pole, White-Spotted Snake.
The four horsemen reined in their horses in front of their ranks and after a few moments' wait they saw troops beginning to file down the slopes of Mount Mangdang. In front were two warriors, chief of them being the Eight-Armed Ogre with his twenty-four throwing knives. He could hit a man at a hundred paces, never once missing. In his right hand he brandished a short spear, and on his back was his personal banner with the words "Eight-Armed Ogre" painted on it.
The one behind him was Winged Ghost with his twenty-four javelins. He too could hit a man at a hundred paces. In his left hand he held the shield and in his right a sword, while on his back was his personal banner with "Winged Ghost" written on it.
Marching down the mountain these two came face to face with the Tattooed Dragon and his friends on horseback in front of their army. No word was spoken, but the soldiers started beating gongs and the two warriors from Mount Mangdang whirled their shields and charged into the attack.
The Tattooed Dragon and his forces were powerless to stop them. The troops at the rear went first. Shi Jin in the front rank put up some resistance. In the middle rank the Strategist and the others yelled in panic. It was an occasion when, as they say, there was no holding the horses. They bolted and fetched up over ten miles away. The Tattooed Dragon was almost hit by a throwing knife. The White-Spotted Snake, slow in dodging, had his charger wounded. He abandoned it and fled for his life on foot.
Of the troops which the Tattooed Dragon had brought, half were lost. He discussed what to do with the Strategist and the others who were all for going back to Mount Liang to ask for reinforcements. Whilst they were still anxiously trying to make up their minds, one of their officers rushed up and announced: "There's a big cloud of dust on the highroad to the north. Looks like two thousand troops marching this way." When the Tattooed Dragon and his companions went to meet them, they saw the Mount Liang flag and two commanders riding in front of the column. One was Colonel Hua the Archer, and the other was the Spearsman. The Tattooed Dragon proceeded to tell them about the terrifying weapons and rolling action of the Ogre and Winged Ghost and how the troops could not withstand it.
Colonel Hua said: "After you started Song Jiang was uneasy about you and regretted the decision he had taken so he sent us along as reinforcements."
The Tattooed Dragon and his companions were greatly relieved. They all made camp. Next day at dawn they wanted to muster their troops and attack, but an officer reported: "There are more troops coming along the road to the north."
Colonel Hua, the Spearsman and the Tattooed Dragon all mounted and went to meet them. It turned out to be Song Jiang himself, together with the Professor, Taoist Gongsun, Mr. Chai, Whiskers, Twin Rods, Mu the Unstoppable, Colonel Sun, the Tamer, the Little Duke and the Halberdier, with three thousand troops.
The Tattooed Dragon told them all about the Ogre and Winged Ghost, with their whizzing knives and javelins and whirling shields, and how you couldn't get near them and how he had lost men. Song Jiang was alarmed. But the Professor said: "We should take up a defensive position first and then have further discussions."
Song Jiang was impatient and wanted to go in pursuit, as far as the mountain. By now it was getting dark. Looking up at Mount Mangdang they could see a mass of bright lanterns. Taoist Gongsun said: "Those bright lanterns in their camp must mean that they have magicians amongst them. Let us withdraw for the moment. Later I will propose a strategy for capturing those two."
Song Jiang was well pleased with this. He ordered the troops to retreat eight miles or so and set up camp. Early next morning Taoist Gongsun announced his plan, which was to have important results.

The Demon King consents to join Mount Liang;
The Winged Ghost is ready to go to the Marshes.

LU DA was very angry at being arrested in the yamen, and said, "I am a monk that has renounced the world! I am a peaceful man! How dare you arrest me! I wish to die along with Shi Jin. I shall not mind that. Only Song Jiang will punish you for my death. I will tell you something. No enmity cannot be abolished. If you hand over to me Shi Jin, and the daughter of Wang Yi, and then you resign from your position then our enmity will vanish. I see from your face that you are lustful, and have no right to be a Prefect. If you do these three things, however, Buddha will look upon you with mercy, but if you miss this opportunity you will live to regret it. Now let me go to see Shi Jin, and then give me an answer."
The Prefect was very angry at this, and said, "As I suspected, you came to assassinate me like Shi Jin. That fellow! You want to see him! Take this fellow to prison, have him beaten and I will deal with him later on. He is evidently a bird of the same feather with Shi Jin. Put a strong cangue on him, and see that he is well locked up." This was done, and the Prefect wrote a dispatch to the provincial governor asking for instructions.
This affair was soon known all over the town, and one of the brigand spies hearing of it, rushed off at once to Mount Shaohua to report it. Wu Song was surprised at the news and said, "How can I now face the other leaders when Lu Da has been taken prisoner?" While he was thinking the matter over another spy arrived, and reported that a leader named Dai Zong had just come from Liangshan Marsh, and was waiting at the foot of the mountain to see Wu Song. The latter immediately went down the mountain, and conducted Dai Zong up to their stronghold where he introduced him to Zhu Wu.
Dai Zong was surprised to hear the news about Lu Da and Shi Jin, and said. "I must not stop here! I will go back at once to Liangshan Marsh, and ask Song Jiang to send his men to rescue the two brothers."
"I will wait here until you return," said Wu Song. "Please come back quickly with assistance."
Dai Zong put on his charmed puttees, and flew off. It took him three days to travel from Shaanxi province to Liangshan Marsh in Shandong. When Chao Gai and Song Jiang got the news, arrangements were made for 7,000 cavalry and infantry to depart at once with sixteen leaders under the command of Song Jiang. Dai Zong was sent off to report to Mount Shaohua in Shaanxi province that help was coming. The bandits duly reached their destination, and the leaders were taken up the mountain to discuss matters. Zhu Wu reported that Lu Da and Shi Jin were still in prison, and the Prefect was now waiting a decree authorizing him to execute the prisoners.
Song Jiang asked whether there was any proposal as to how the prisoners could be rescued.
Zhu Wu said, "Huazhou is a very big town, and the moat is very deep. It is a difficult town to take. If there is a coup d'état inside the town we might succeed."
"Tomorrow we must go and inspect the town and its defenses," said Wu Yong. "Then we can discuss matters. We must not however go in the daytime because the prefect will take care, and will be on the lookout for us. We must start tomorrow afternoon so as to reach the town after sunset. There will be a full moon tomorrow."
This was agreed, and the next afternoon the five leaders started off on horseback, and reached the town about 8 P.M. They dismounted near a hillock where they could overlook the town. It was a bright moonlight night, with a cloudless sky. In the distance they could clearly see the Western Sacred Mountain, Mount Hua.
Song Jiang saw that the town was well situated for defense, and was also well protected.
Wu Yong suggested that they should return to their headquarters, and discuss matters again. They all remounted, and rode off. Song Jiang felt very depressed at the prospect. Wu Yong suggested that they should have scouts around the town to spy, and notice what was going on, and this was done.
Two days later one of these scouts arrived at Mount Shaohua, and reported that there was an official who was coming from the capital conveying a bell for the temple on Mount Hua as offered by the Emperor. He had crossed the Yellow River, and was now traveling along the Wei River towards Huazhou.
"Elder brother, do not be disappointed," said Wu Yong. "I think we can make something out of this." He then summoned Li Jun and Zhang Shun, and told them his plans.
Li Jun, however, pointed out that they did not know the district well, and therefore must have a guide to go with them. Yang Chun offered to accompany them. This was agreed to, and the three men left the mountain.
The following day Song Jiang with seven leaders and about five hundred men also left the mountain. Upon reaching the ferry across the Wei River they had got ten boats there, Wu Yong divided the leaders placing Hua Rong and three others on the bank with the men, while Song Jiang. Zhu Tong, Li Ying, and himself were on the boats. Li Jun, Zhang Shun, and Yang Chun were in hiding near the landing place. They waited there all that night, but early the next morning they heard the sound of gongs and drums, and soon an official boat hove in sight. It was flying a yellow flag on which was written that the official named Marshal Su was proceeding by Imperial Order to Mount Hua to burn incense and offer sacrifices.
Li Ying and Zhu Tong took their spears, and stood behind Song Jiang, while Wu Yong sat on the bow of his boat. Their boats blocked the river so that the official's boat had to stop. The men on the boat shouted, "Who are you? How dare you obstruct the river, and delay a Minister?"
Song Jiang held out an official ivory tablet such as is used by men on imperial business, and bowed. Wu Yong on his boat called out, "The hero Song Jiang from Liangshan Marsh wishes to interview Marshal Su."
An officer came forward on the boat, and replied, "This is a boat conveying Imperial Envoy Marshal Su to Mount Hua to offer sacrifices and burn incense. How can you bandits stop our passage?"
Song Jiang still retained his stooping posture, while Wu Yong spoke, "Our hero wishes to state a case to His Excellency."
The officer replied, "What kind of man are you? How dare you be so reckless as to wish to speak to His Excellency Su!" The men on both sides of him, however, asked the officer not to speak so loudly.
Song Jiang still retained his attitude while Wu Yong spoke, "We request your official to disembark here, and we will discuss an important matter on the bank."
"Stupid talk! His Excellency is on imperial business. How can he talk with the likes of you?"
Song Jiang now stood up and said, "If His Excellency will not meet me I am afraid that my men will have to give a surprise!"
Zhu Tong now took his spear at the top of which was a flag. and he waved this. Hua Rong and the other leaders seeing this signal brought all their men to the river bank. The sailors on the boat seeing this took cover, and the officer went into the cabin, and reported the matter to Marshal Su who came on deck and took his seat there.
Song Jiang again saluted, "I am afraid that I have been very disrespectful."
"Why have you stopped my boat in this way?" asked Marshal Su.
"We dare not hinder you," replied Song Jiang, "but I request you to disembark here, when I will disclose an important matter."
"I am on a special mission from the Emperor," said Marshal Su, "and have nothing to say to you. How can a high dignitary do as you wish?"
"If Your Excellency will not disembark," said Wu Yong, "I am afraid that our men will come here to fetch you."
Li Ying now waved a flag at the top of his spear, and immediately Yang Chun, Li Jun, and Zhang Shun rowed their boats towards the official boat. The Marshal was surprised at this. Li Jun and Zhang Shun unsheathed their swords and as the boats got near they leapt across, seized two of the minor officers and threw them into the river.
"Don't do such silly things," called out Song Jiang. "His Excellency will be upset."
Li Jun and Zhang Shun upon hearing this dived into the water, rescued the two men, and brought them safely on to the boat again.
"You two go away as you have frightened His Excellency," said Song Jiang. "We will talk matters over, and request His Excellency to disembark."
"Hero!" said Marshal Su. "What have you to say? You can tell me here."
"This is not a place to discuss matters," said Wu Yong. "We should prefer that you come to our stronghold on the mountain. We have no bad intentions, and if we deceive you, may the spirits of the Western Sacred Mountain Mount Hua punish us."
As Marshal Su saw no way of escape, he left his boat and went up the river bank. A man came from the forest with a horse, and Marshal Su mounted it. The leaders also mounted, and they all set off for Mount Shaohua. The incense, bell, etc. were taken off the official boat, and conveyed up the mountain. Li Jun and Zhang Shun with about a hundred men were left in charge of the boats.
Upon reaching the stronghold the leaders assembled in the main hall on both sides with Marshal Su in the seat of honor in the center. Song Jiang gave four salutations to the Marshal, knelt down, and said, "Previously I was a clerk in the magistrate's yamen at Yuncheng County, but I was persecuted, and compelled to escape to Liangshan Marsh where I joined the heroes there. We are quite ready and willing to help the Emperor when needed. Just now two of our leaders have been unjustly sent to prison by the Prefect of Huazhou. We wish to borrow the incense, bell, etc. and so get entrance into the town. We will relieve you of all responsibility in this trick. We hope that you will agree to our proposal."
"If you use my things in this way," replied Marshal Su, "I shall be blamed."
"When you return to the capital you may throw all the blame on me," said Song Jiang.
Marshal Su glanced round at the armed bandit leaders, and saw that there was no means of escape so he agreed.
Song Jiang again saluted, and offered wine to the Marshal. The leaders then exchanged clothing with Marshal Su and his official party. When all had been satisfactorily arranged the bandits in their new disguise left the mountain, and embarked on the official boat. But instead of going towards Huazhou they proceeded towards Mount Hua. Dai Zong went in advance to the temple on the mountain, and informed the head priest of the arrival of an "Imperial Commissioner." The priests came down the mountain, and met the boat upon arrival. The presents were carried in front, many being carried by the priests' servants to the temple. Wu Yong said that "the Marshal" had not been well on the journey so a closed sedan chair was provided in which the false commissioner was carried up the mountain. He was assisted out of the chair upon reaching the temple.
Wu Yong again spoke to the head priest, "We have brought many presents from the Emperor which are for the spirits of this mountain. But how is it that the Prefect of Huazhou is not here to receive us respectfully?"
"I will send a man to report your arrival," said the head priest, "and he will soon be here."
Soon after this, however, a deputy from the Prefect arrived with about seventy soldiers, and much fruit and wine for the "Imperial Commissioner."
The bandit who was acting the part of the "Imperial Commissioner" had certain likeness, but he had not the intelligence and learning, and therefore could not speak like an educated mandarin. Therefore he pretended to be sick so as to avoid conversation, and sat silently on the bed. But the Prefect's deputy saw all the genuine imperial presents and the official dresses, and had no suspicion. When introduced to the Marshall, he could not hear what the false commissioner was saying. But Wu Yong asked why the Prefect had not come personally, and the deputy explained how the brigands had been attacking the town, and how the Prefect were afraid of leaving the town, and had sent him as deputy. He said however, the Prefect would come later on. The deputy then ordered wine to be served to all the men who had brought the presents.
Wu Yong went, and got the key, and opened the box containing the bell. He took the bell out, and hung it on a framework. It was made by the best workmen at the capital, and looked very fine with its precious stones inlaid. Underneath the bell was a lamp with a red silk shade. It was intended that this bell should be hung in the center of the Imperial temple. It was a fine piece of craftsmanship such as only the Emperor could obtain.
After inspection by the deputy and the priests Wu Yong locked it up again in the box. He then took out the official letters, and handing these to the deputy asked him to convey them to the Prefect who could fix an auspicious time for his visit to the temple to offer the sacrifices.
The deputy and his followers then took their leave and returned to Huazhou to report the matter to the Prefect.
"What a cute plan," thought Song Jiang. "The Prefect is sure to be deceived." As there was nothing else to do he took a stroll round the temple admiring the building which really was of exceptional rarity and beauty. As he returned to the main hall he was informed that the Prefect was coming. He told Hua Rong, Xu Ning, Zhu Tong, and Li Ying (now dressed as Imperial soldiers) to take up their positions on both sides of the hall, and four other leaders with Dai Zong to take up their positions on both sides of the supposed Imperial Commissioner.
The Prefect brought with him about three hundred soldiers as an escort. They dismounted at the temple gate and entered. Song Jiang and Wu Yong saw that all the men were armed so Wu Yong called out, "As an Imperial Commissioner is here these soldiers must not come inside." The soldiers therefore halted, and the Prefect went forward by himself. Wu Yong then said, "His Excellency requests the Prefect to go into his room for an interview." The Prefect entered the room, and saluted the brigand on the bed in the disguise of an Imperial Commissioner.
"Prefect, are you not conscious of your fault?" asked Wu Yong.
"I did not know that His Excellency had arrived, and beg him to excuse me," replied the Prefect. "After the first dispatch from the government about these presents I got no further dispatch as to when you would arrive."
"Seize him," ordered Wu Yong, and immediately the four leaders standing at the side unsheathed their swords, and seizing the Prefect cut off his head.
"Proceed with your work," called out Song Jiang, and immediately all his men attacked the Prefect's escort. They were taken by surprise, and most of them were killed on the spot. Some tried to escape but were met at the gate by other bandits and were soon finished. Not a single man of the three hundred soldiers escaped death. Even civilians who had followed the soldiers to see the ceremony were also killed.
Song Jiang had all the Imperial presents transferred to the boat, and set off for the town. He saw that fire had broken out in several parts of the town, as his men had got inside. He himself went straight to the jail, and released Lu Da and Shi Jin. Lu Da got his monk's staff, and joined in the uprising. The daughter of Wang Yi had previously committed suicide by jumping into a well. The brigands secured much loot, and conveyed this on carts to their boats. When all was ready they returned to Mount Shaohua.
The offerings were duly handed over again to Marshal Su. Song Jiang also presented him with much gold and silver, and gave much also to his guard. After a feast Marshal Su and his men went down the mountain, and again embarked on their boat.
Marshal Su proceeded to Huazhou, and there he saw the enormous amount of damage that the bandits had done. He also went to Mount Hua, and saw the large number of dead bodies lying about. He then got the recorder in the town to write a full account of the disaster, throwing the full blame on Song Jiang and his brigands. He then returned to the capital to report the affair.
The bandits and leaders at Mount Shaohua agreed to join those under Song Jiang at Liangshan Marsh. They all left for that place where they celebrated their victory and alliance by the usual feast.
After this, however, there was a dinner provided by Shi Jin and three other leaders. At that dinner Chao Gai spoke, "I have something to tell you about what happened while Song Jiang and his men were at Huazhou. One day Zhu Gui came, and reported that at Mount Mangdan in Xuzhou Prefecture there are about three thousand brigands under the leadership of a man named Fan Rui, nicknamed the 'Demon King of Disorder.' He can control the wind and rain, and uses his men with great skill and strategy. He has two assistants—Xiang Chong and Li Gun, who are famous for throwing knives which would kill men at a hundred paces. These three are sworn brothers, and they have the intention of attacking Liangshan Marsh and getting control here. When I heard of this I was very angry."
Song Jiang was also annoyed at this report and said, "How dare they be so impudent? I must go and settle the matter."
At this point Shi Jin stood up and said, "We four brothers from Mount Shaohua have so far done no meritorious deed here, although we have been admitted to your band. We are willing to take our men to attack these robbers."
Song Jiang was much pleased at this offer, and it was agreed to. The men and horses were got ready, and they left the mountain with Shi Jin, Zhu Wu, Chen Ta, and Yang Chun.
It took them three days to reach Mount Mangdan. When Shi Jin saw the place he remembered that it was near there that Liu Bang who became first Emperor Gaozu of the Han Dynasty had killed a snake. They soon reached the foot of the mountain, and an outpost went to report their arrival. Shi Jin arranged his men in ranks. He donned his armor, and rode to the front on a brown horse. He was armed with a sword with a double-edged blade. He was accompanied by the other 3 leaders.
They had not waited long when they saw a large number of men descending the mountain with two leaders in front—Xiang Chong and Li Gun. When they had arranged their men in ranks these two leaders without any parley rode forward to attack Shi Jin. They threw their flying knives, and Shi Jin found that he could not get near his two opponents so he gradually fell back. The other leaders also retreated about ten li. Yang Chun's horse was wounded and abandoned. Half of their men had deserted. Shi Jin held a conference with his comrades, and they all agreed that help must be requested from Liangshan Marsh. While they were talking, one of their scouts arrived, and reported that on the northern road there was a large body of cavalry coming towards them. Shi Jin galloped forward to see who they were, and recognized the flags of Liangshan Marsh. In front rode Hua Rong and Xu Ning, and Shi Jin rode forward to meet them. He told them how Xiang Chong, and Li Gun threw flying knives, and had driven him back without being able to even strike a blow. That day the Liangshan Marsh forces encamped in the same spot with Shi Jin's forces.
The next morning they were all ready for marching forward when another scout arrived and reported that there was a large body of cavalry coming along the north road. Shi Jin and the other leaders rode forward to reconnoiter, and were pleased to find that they were about three thousand brigands under the leadership of Song Jiang, Wu Yong, and Gongsun Sheng.
They then had a discussion, and Wu Yong was in favor of them remaining in camp that day. Song Jiang was impatient, and wished an immediate attack. Gongsun Sheng pointed out that on the mountain there were blue lanterns and he thought that this indicated that the bandits there used magical spells. He advocated that they should withdraw all their men to some distance, and he would find a plan to capture the three leaders Xiang Chong, Li Gun, and Fan Rui. This was agreed to and all the men withdrew about 6 li.

The king of devils joins the bandits;
The wounded chief surrenders to Liangshan Marsh.

Taoist Gongsun Sheng Defeats the ghosts & the Demon King on Mount Mangdang & Captures a Wizard; Chao Gai the Heavenly King is Hit & Wounded by an Arrow at Zengside in Zengtou Village

Gongsun told Song Jiang and Wu Yong his strategy.
"It's the same one used by Zhuge Liang when he positioned the boulders on the battlefield at the end of the Han Dynasty when the country split into three," said the Taoist. "We'll arrange our army into four groups and eight sections of eight companies each, totalling sixty-four, with the commander-in-chief in the middle. It will thus have four heads and eight tails, and be able to turn in any direction like the wind and clouds above the earth, as quickly as any wild beast, bird or reptile. When the enemy come down from the mountain and attack, we'll open into two and let them come in deep. As soon as our forces see our seven-starred banner wave, let them surround the enemy like a long serpent. I have a magic formula that will drive those three robber leaders to the center. Back or forward, left or right, they won't be able to get out. We'll dig a concealed pit and drive them into it. On either side we'll have men hidden with hooked poles, ready to take them."
Song Jiang was very pleased. He issued the appropriate orders, directing his officers to act accordingly. He deployed his positional forces under eight fierce commanders. These were: Huyan Zhuo, Zhu Tong, Hua Rong, Xu Ning, Mu Hong, Sun Li, Shi Jin and Huang Xin. He put Chai Jin, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng in charge of a central force. Song Jiang himself, plus Wu Yong and Gongsun, were in overall command, with Chen Da to transmit their orders by flag signals. Zhu Wu was directed to take five men to a nearby height, and from there observe the battlefield and report developments.
By mid-morning the army had neared the mountain and was spreading out in battle formation, banners waving and drums pounding provocatively. On Mount Mangdang twenty or thirty gongs thunderously crashed, shaking the earth. The three robber leaders proceeded down the slope, spreading out their force of over three thousand men. Fan Rui, their bold chieftain, rode in the van, with Xiang Chong and Li Gun to his left and right.
At the edge of the battlefield he reined in his horse. Fan Rui could work magic, but he knew little of military tactics. He watched while Song Jiang divided his army into four groups and eight sections. "Go on, deploy them," he said to himself with secret satisfaction. "That's exactly what I want you to do."
He turned to Xiang Chong and Li Gun. "When you see the wind rising, take five hundred knife twirlers and pitch in."
The two lieutenants, each grasping his shield, javelins and flying blades at the ready, waited for Fan Rui to start. His bronze comet hammer in his left hand, a two-edged sword in his right, the Demon King Who Roils the World muttered a few magic phrases, then shouted: "Speed!"
A wild gale rose on all sides, whipping up clouds of sand and stones that darkened the sky and obscured the sun. Shouting, Xiang Chong and Li Gun charged with their five hundred knife twirlers. Song Jiang's army separated into two, and the foe moved in. They were immediately beset by powerful bowmen from both sides. Only forty or fifty of the robber band were able to advance. The remainder withdrew to their original position.
Song Jiang, observing from high on a slope, saw that Xiang Chong and Li Gun were the midst of his forces. He directed Chen Da to wave the seven-starred banner. The outlaw army rolled and shifted into the form of a long snake.

Xiang Chong and Li Gun ran east and hurried west, turned left and wheeled right, but nowhere could they find an escape route. No matter in which direction they hastened, Zhu Wu pointed them out from his height with a small flag.
Gongsun also watched from a bluff. He unsheathed his ancient sword with its pine tree decorations, muttered an incantation, then shouted: "Speed!"
At once, a wind closely pursued Xiang Chong and Li Gun, whirling at their heels. The sky darkened, the sun lost its glow. They couldn't see a single man or horse. Everything was enveloped in a black fog. They completely lost sight of the men behind them. Panic-stricken, the two desperately sought a way back to their own forces, but in vain.
Suddenly there was a sound like a clap of thunder. The two cried out in consternation. Together they tripped and tumbled head over heels into a deep pit. From both sides men with long hooked poles hauled them out. They bound the captives with ropes and brought them to the mountain slope and requested rewards.
Song Jiang pointed with his whip. His three contingents plunged into a murderous assault. Fan Rui's men fled towards Mount Mangdang. Many couldn't escape. More than half were killed.
Song Jiang recalled his troops. When he and his chieftains were seated outside his tent, fighters led in Xiang Chong and Li Gun, under guard, and delivered them beneath his standard. He quickly ordered that their bonds be removed, and he went forward personally, wine goblet in hand.
"Forgive me," he said. "In the course of hostilities, we couldn't do anything else. I, the humble Song Jiang, have long known of the great fame of you three warriors. I was hoping to invite you to our mountain to join our righteous cause, but I never could find a suitable opportunity. If you won't consider it beneath you, return with us to our stronghold now. Nothing could give me greater happiness."
The two fell to their knees and kowtowed. "We know the great name of the Timely Rain, as who doesn't?" they responded. "Unfortunately, we were never able to pay our respects before. We failed to recognize your vast integrity, and went against Heaven's will. Today you have captured us. No death would be too heavy, yet you treat us so courteously. If you decide to spare our lives, we swear to serve you faithfully to the end of our days. As to Fan Rui, he can't get along without us two. If you, righteous leader, will let one of us go back, we'll try to talk him into joining you. Does that seem all right?"
"No need to keep one of you here as hostage. Both of you can return to your stronghold. I'll wait for your good news."
"Truly a man of noble generosity! If Fan Rui doesn't agree, we'll seize him and present him beneath your standard."
Song Jiang was very pleased. He invited them into his headquarters, wined and dined them, gave them fresh suits of clothing, and presented them with two fine horses. He directed a few of the outlaws to return their shields and weapons, escort them down the mountain, and see them off. The two were extremely grateful.
When they reached the foot of Mount Mangdang, members of their band were astonished to see them, and escorted them up to Fan Rui. He asked them what had happened.
"We've gone against Heaven's will and deserve to die," they said.
"Why do you say that, brothers?" he demanded.
They told him how chivalrous Song Jiang had been.
"Since Song Jiang is so generous and gallant, we shouldn't go against the will of Heaven," said Fan Rui. "Let's all join him."
"We've come to propose that very thing."
That night they set the affairs of the stronghold in order. The following morning, they presented themselves to Song Jiang and kowtowed before him. He raised them to their feet and invited them into his tent and seated them. Impressed by his manifestation of complete trust, they spoke frankly and at length about their various backgrounds.
The three invited the chieftains to their fortress on Mount Mangdang, where they slaughtered steers and horses and feasted Song Jiang and his lieutenants. They also rewarded the men of his three contingents. After the banquet Fan Rui pledged himself as a pupil to Gongsun Sheng. Song Jiang directed the Taoist to teach Fan Rui his Divine Method for Summoning the Five Thunderbolts, much to the latter's delight.
In the next few days, the livestock was led away, the stronghold's money and grain was packed, and belongings were laden on pack animals. Men and horses were assembled and the fortress was put to the torch. All then went with Song Jiang and his chieftains back to Liangshan Marsh. The journey was uneventful.

Dai Zong flew up the mountain to report their arrival. As they were about to ford the river at the edge of the marsh, a big fellow on the road near the reeds saw Song Jiang and kowtowed. Song hastily dismounted and raised the man to his feet.
"What is your name, sir, and where are you from?"
"My family name is Duan, my given name Jingzhu. Because of my red hair and yellow beard, I'm called the Golden Dog. My family are from Zhuozhou Prefecture, and I earn my living rustling horses in the north. This spring I stole a splendid animal north of the Spear Range. It's white as snow, without a single hair of a different color. From head to tail it's ten feet long, and stands eight feet high from hoofs to back. It can cover a thousand //in a day. It's famed throughout the north as the White Jade Lion That Glows in the Night. It belonged to a prince of the Tartars. When it was put out to graze at the foot of Spear Range, I nabbed it. In the gallant fraternity the Timely Rain is famous, but I never had a chance to meet you. I wanted to present you with the horse as a mark on my respect. But while passing through the village of Zengtou, southwest of the prefectural town of Lingzhou, it was seized from me by the fifth son of the Zeng family. I told him it belonged to Song Jiang of Liangshan Marsh, but the churl was very insulting, and I dared say no more. I got away as quickly as I could. I've come here specially to inform you."
Song Jiang took a liking to the thin rough-looking fellow. In spite of his odd appearance, he was clearly not an ordinary person.
"Come with us to the stronghold," he said. "We'll talk about it there." He took Duan in his boat and they crossed to the Shore of Golden Sands.
Chao Gai, the Heavenly King, and the other chieftains, escorted the returning leaders to Fraternity Hall. Song Jiang introduced Fan Rui, Xiang Chong and Li Gun to the chieftains. Duan and the three greeted them with respect. Drums beat clamorously, and a feast was held in celebration.
More and more men were joining the mountain citadel. Bold fellows from all over came like the wind. And so Song Jiang instructed Li Yun and Tao Zongwang to supervise the building of new dwellings, and to construct additional forts on every side.
Duan spoke again of the merits of the horse. Song Jiang sent Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller to the village of Zengtou to inquire about it. In four or five days Dai returned.
"Zengtou has something over three thousand families," he told the chieftains. "One is known as the Zeng Family Establishment. It is headed by Zeng the Elder, who comes originally from the land of the Tartars. He has five sons, called the Five Tigers of the Zeng Family. Their names, in order of age, are: Tu, Mi, Suo, Kui and Sheng. Their instructor is Shi Wengong, and his assistant is Su Ding. The village is defended by six or seven thousand men and stockaded camps. They've built more than fifty cage carts, boasting there is no room on this earth for both us and them. They say they will capture all of our chieftains, that we are enemies.
"The thousand-//horse known as the Jade Lion is ridden by the instructor Shi Wengong. Even more infuriating, the wretch has composed a rhyme which he's taught all the kids in the village. It goes like this:

When our horses' bridles jingle
God and demons with fear tingle.
Iron carts plus iron locks,
Prisoners nailed in iron stocks.
Liangshan Marsh we'll cleanly flush,
Chao Gai to the capital we'll rush,
And capture Timely Rain—that's Song,
And his war mentor Wu Yong.
Five Zeng tigers boldly stand,
Famed far and wide throughout the land."

Chao Gai was enraged. "How dare those animals be so unmannerly!" he fumed. "I'm going down there personally. If I don't capture those rogues I won't return!"
"You're the leader of our fortress, brother," said Song Jiang. "You mustn't lightly take action. Let me go."
"It's not that I want to steal your thunder," said Chao Gai, "but you've gone many times. You must be weary from combat. This time I'm going. Next time, brother, it will be your turn."
Song Jiang pleaded in vain. The furious Chao Gai selected five thousand men and twenty chieftains and set forth. The remainder stayed with Song Jiang to guard the stronghold. Chao divided his forces into three brigades and went down the mountain, ready to march on Zengtou Village.
Song Jiang, Wu Yong and Gongsun saw them to the Shore of Golden Sands. While they were drinking a sudden wind snapped the pole supporting Chao Gai's standard. Everyone blanched.
"An evil omen," said Wu Yong. "Choose another day for your expedition, brother."
"The wind snaps your standard, brother, just as you're about to set forth. It's not auspicious for military action," said Song Jiang. "Wait a bit longer and then deal with those knaves. There'll still be time."
"The movement of wind and clouds is nothing to be alarmed about," retorted Chao Gai. "Now is the time, in the warmth of spring. If we wait until they build up their strength and then attack, it will be too late. Don't try to stop me. I'm going, come what may!"
Song Jiang couldn't dissuade him. With his troops, Chao Gai ferried across the river. Sunk in gloom, Song returned to the fortress. He sent Dai Zong down to watch developments and report.
Chao Gai with his five thousand men and twenty chieftains neared the village of Zengtou. Confronting them was stockaded camp. The following morning Chao went with the chieftains for a closer look. Clearly, the village was strongly fortified.
Suddenly, from a grove of willows seven or eight hundred men emerged. At their head was a bold fellow—Kui, fourth son of the Zeng family.
"You bandits from Liangshan Marsh are all rebels," he shouted. "I've been meaning to turn you over to the authorities and claim the reward, and now Heaven sends you right into my arms! Get off your horses and be bound. What are you waiting for!"
Chao Gai was very angry. As he turned his head he saw one of the chieftains riding forth to do battle with Kui. It was Lin Chong, the first to form the chivalrous band on Mount Liangshan.
The two horses met, and the warriors fought more than twenty rounds, with neither vanquishing the other. Kui realized he was no match for Lin Chong. He wheeled his mount and lance in hand, rode for the willow grove. Lin Chong reined in his steed and did not pursue. Chao Gai led his forces back to camp. There, they discussed strategy for attacking the village.
"Let's go tomorrow and provoke a battle," Lin Chong proposed. "We'll see what their strength actually is, then we can talk some more."
The next morning they marched with five thousand men to the broad plain outside the entrance to Zengtou, took up positions, beat their drums and shouted. Cannon thundered from the village and a large body of men rode forth, led by seven bold fellows in a single line. In the middle was the instructor Shi Wengong. To his left was his assistant Su Ding; to his right the eldest son, Tu. Continuing to the left were Mi and Kui; further right were Sheng and Suo. All were clad in armor from head to foot. An arrow fitted to his bow, Shi sat the thousand-//Jade Lion horse. He held also a crescent-bladed halberd.
After three rolls of the drums, several cage carts were pushed out from the Zeng family position and placed to the fore. Tu pointed at his adversaries.
"Rebellious bandits," he shouted, "do you see these carts? If we simply kill you, we won't be real men. We're going to nab every one of you, lock you in the carts and deliver you to the Eastern Capital, just to show you how tough we Five Tigers really are! Surrender now, while you still have the chance, then we'll see!"
Chao Gai, enraged, levelled his lance and galloped towards Tu. To protect him, the other chieftains also charged, and the two sides were soon locked in combat. The Zeng family forces retreated step by step into the village. Lin Chong and Huyan Zhuo slew mightily to east and west, providing close cover for Chao Gai. But Lin could see that the prospects were poor. He hastily pulled back and reassembled his men. Both sides were strewn with casualties. Chao Gai returned to camp very depressed.
"Don't take it to heart, brother," the chieftains urged. "Worry will only injure your health. Brother Song Jiang also has setbacks at times in battle, but he wins in the end. The fighting was confused today. Both sides suffered casualties. But we haven't lost. No need to feel bad!"
Chao Gai said: "I'm not in a good mood, that's all." He remained in camp for three days. Though each day his troops went to challenge the foe, not a man came forth from Zengtou.
On the fourth day, two monks called on Chao Gai. They were escorted by several of the brigand soldiers. Chao received them outside his tent. The two dropped to their knees and kowtowed.
"We are custodians of the Fahua Monastery east of Zengtou," they said. "Those Five Tiger sons constantly harass our monastery, demanding gold and silver and money. There's nothing they won't do. We know their layout in detail, and we've come to show you how to get inside and take their fortifications. If you can eliminate them it will be a blessing."
Chao Gai was very pleased. He invited the monks to be seated, and had them served wine.
"Don't believe them, brother," Lin Chong advised. "How do you know it isn't a trick?"
"We are men who have renounced the material world. We wouldn't dare to deceive," protested the monks. "We've long known of the righteous behavior of the men of Liangshan Marsh. You never harm the common people wherever you go. We've come to join you. Why should we want to fool you chieftains? Besides, the Zeng family forces could hardly defeat your great army. Why be suspicious?"
"You needn't doubt them, brother," said Chao Gai. "We'll miss a big opportunity. I'll go myself, tonight, to see."
"Please don't, brother," Lin Chong urged. "Let me raid the village with half our men. You wait outside with reinforcements."
"If I don't go personally, would our forces be willing to attack? You remain with half our troops as reinforcements."
"Who will you take with you?"
"Ten chieftains and twenty-five hundred men."
That evening a meal was prepared and eaten. The bells were removed from the horses' bridles, the men wore stick gags, for a swift night march. Silently, they followed the two monks to the Fahua Monastery. It was very ancient. Chao Gai dismounted and went inside. There was no one around.
"Why are there no monks in a monastery of this size?" he queried.
"Those animals of the Zeng family caused so much trouble that most of them were compelled to return to secular life. Only the abbot and a few retainers remain. They're living in the courtyard where the tower is. Stay here temporarily. A little later, we'll lead you into the stockade of those rogues."
"Where is it?"
"There are four stockades. The Zeng brothers are in the northern one. If you take that, the others won't matter. The remaining three will quit."
"When shall we go?"
"It's now the second watch. We'll go at the third, and take them by surprise."
From Zengtou, they heard the measured beat of the watchman's drum. Later, they heard the drum sounding the half-watch. After that, they listened no more.
"The soldiers are all asleep," said the two monks. "We can go now."
They led the way. Chao Gai and the chieftains mounted and, with their men, left the monastery and followed. Before they had gone five //; the two monks had disappeared into the shadows.
The van was afraid to continue. The paths on all sides were tortuous and difficult. No homes or people could be seen. The forward troops became alarmed and informed Chao Gai.
Huyan Zhuo ordered a retreat. They had marched less than a hundred paces when on every side gongs crashed and drums pounded. Resounding yells shook the ground. Torches everywhere sprang to light.
Chao Gai and the chieftains hurriedly led their men in a withdrawal. They had just traversed two turns in the road when they ran into a troop of enemy cavalry, who showered them with arrows. One struck Chao Gai in the face, and he fell from his horse.
Huyan Zhuo and Yan Shun galloped off at top speed. Liu Tang and Bai Sheng behind them, put Chao back on his steed and fought their way out of the village. At the village entrance Lin Chong rushed up with reinforcements. Only then were they able to stem the foe. A wild melee continued until dawn, when both sides retired to their bases.
Lin Chong made a count of the troops. The three Ruan brothers, Song Wan and Du Qian had escaped by crossing the stream. Of the twenty-five hundred men who had gone in with Chao Gai only twelve or thirteen hundred were left. They had followed Du Peng back to camp.
The chieftains came to see Chao Gai. An arrow was stuck in his cheek. They pulled it out. Blood flowed, and he fainted. On the arrow was the name of the instructor Shi Wengong. Lin Chong directed that a salve made for metal weapon wounds be applied. Chao Gai had been hit by a poisoned arrow. The venom was working, and he was unable to speak.
Lin Chong ordered that he be placed on a cart, and that the three Ruan brothers, plus Du Qian and Song Wan, escort him back to the mountain fortress. The fifteen chieftains remaining in the camp conferred.
"Who would have thought when brother Chao Gai the Heavenly King came down the mountain that such a thing would happen," they said. "The wind snapped the pole of his standard, and this was the fulfillment of that bad omen. We'll simply have to return to the stronghold. Zengtou Village can't be taken in a hurry."
"We'd better wait for orders from brother Song Jiang before pulling our troops out," Huyan Zhuo said.
The chieftains were morose, the men had no heart for battle. All wanted to go back to the fortress. That night at the fifth watch, as the earliest faint light began to appear, the fifteen chieftains were still sunk in gloom. For indeed, a snake cannot travel without a head, a bird without wings cannot fly. The chieftains sighed. They had no assurance that either an advance or a retreat would succeed.
Suddenly, a picket guarding the road rushed in and reported: "Five enemy columns heading this way. Their torches are without number!"
Lin Chong immediately mounted. Torchlight had turned the hills on three sides as bright as day. Shouting foe were rapidly advancing. The chieftains did not resist. At Lin's orders, they broke camp and withdrew. The Zeng family forces pursued them fiercely. The two sides fought a running battle for sixty //before the brigands could break free. They counted their men. They had lost nearly seven hundred. It was a heavy defeat.
They hurriedly resumed the march in the direction of Liangshan Marsh. Halfway there, they were met by Dai Zong, who transmitted a command: They were to bring their troops back to the stronghold. There, new plans would be formulated.
The chieftains complied. On their arrival, they went to see Chao Gai. He was no longer able to eat or drink, and his whole body was swollen. Song Jiang wept by his bedside. He personally applied poultices and fed Chao medicines. The chieftains all kept vigil outside the tent. By the third watch of the third day a great weight seemed to be depressing Chao's body. He turned his head to Song Jiang. "Preserve your health, brother," he said. "Let whoever captures the bowman who slew me become the ruler of Liangshan Marsh." Chao Gai closed his eyes and died.
To Song Jiang it was as if he had lost one of his parents. He cried until he was faint. The chieftains helped him out of the tent. They urged him to look after the stronghold's affairs.
"Don't grieve so, brother," Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng advised. "Life and death are man's destiny. Why take it so hard? There are important matters awaiting your attention."
Song Jiang ceased his weeping. He directed that the body be leaved in fragrant water, dressed in burial garments and hat, and displayed in Fraternity Hall. The chieftains performed sacrificial ceremonies. A coffin and inner casket were built and, after an auspicious day was selected, placed in the main hall. A spirit curtain was hung and a memorial tablet put before it, in the center. The inscription read: Memorial Tablet of the Venerable Chao the Heavenly King and Leader of Liangshan Marsh.

All the chieftains, from Song Jiang on down, dressed in deep mourning. The junior officers and the rank and file wore mourning head kerchiefs of white. The fatal arrow, broken in a vow of vengeance, lay before the altar. A long white banner was raised. Monks were invited to the citadel from a nearby monastery to offer prayers for the departed. Every day Song Jiang led the outlaws in mourning. He had no heart to attend to the affairs of the fortress.

Lin Chong, with Gongsun Sheng and Wu Yong, discussed the matter with the other chieftains. They decided to make Song Jiang their leader and take their orders from him. The following morning, bearing flowers, lanterns and candles, Lin Chong and the others invited Song Jiang, the Defender of Chivalry, to be seated in the Hall of Fraternity.

"Hear us, brother," said Wu Yong and Lin Chong. "A country cannot be governed without a sovereign, a household cannot be ruled without a master. Chao Gai, leader of our mountain stronghold, has gone to Heaven. There is no one to make decisions. Your name, brother, is world renowned. We wish to choose an auspicious day and invite you to become our leader. We will obey your commands."

"Remember the dying wish of Chao the Heavenly King: 'Let whoever captures the bowman who slew me become the ruler of Liangshan Marsh,' " said Song Jiang. "You all know about it, you mustn't forget. I haven't avenged him, or wiped out this debt. How can I accept?"

"That is what Chao said." Wu Yong admitted. "But we still haven't caught the culprit, and the stronghold cannot be without a leader. If you don't take over, brother, who else would dare? Who will command our forces? His wish was as you say. Why don't you accept temporarily? We'll work something out later."

"Putting it that way is reasonable. I'll accept the post for the time being. When Chao Gai is avenged, when someone captures Shi Wengong, no matter who, he must become our ruler."

Li Kui the Black Whirlwind shouted: "Not only are you right for leadership of Liangshan Marsh, brother—you'd make a fine emperor of the Song Dynasty!"

"You're talking wildly again, you wretched oaf. Stop your raving or I'll cut your tongue out!"

"Why should you do that? I'm inviting you to become emperor, not the head of some little group worshipping a local god!"

Wu Yong intervened. "The scamp has no sense of proportion. Don't trouble yourself with the likes of him. Please deal with important affairs."

Song Jiang addressed them: "I have accepted this post temporarily. I am completely reliant on your support, brothers. We must be of one heart and mind, united in our efforts, as close as bone and marrow, acting together to carry out Heaven's will. Today our fortress has many men. It's no longer like it was before. I'm asking you brothers to command six sets of fortifications. Fraternity Hall shall be known from now on as Loyalty Hall. We shall have four sets of land fortifications, front and back, left and right. On the rear of the mountain will be two small forts. On the front of the mountain will be three fortified passes. We'll also have a fort on the water at the foot of the mountain, plus small fort on each of the banks. We shall ask you brothers to take charge.

"In Loyalty Hall I shall temporarily occupy the first position. Second shall be Military Advisor Wu Yong; third, Taoist Reverend Gongsun Sheng; fourth, Hua Rong; fifth, Qin Ming; sixth, Lu Fang; and seventh, Guo Sheng. The left set of fortifications shall be commanded by Lin Chong, Liu Tang, Shi Jin, Yang Xiong, Shi Xiu, Du Qian and Song Wan, in that order. The right by Huyan Zhuo, Zhu Tong, Dai Zong, Mu Hong, Li Kui, Ou Peng and Mu Chun. The front set of fortifications shall be under Li Ying, Xu Ning, Lu Zhishen, Wu Song, Yang Zhi, Ma Lin and Shi En. Guarding the rear will be Chai Jin, Sun Li, Huang Xin, Han Tao, Peng Qi, Deng Fei and Xue Yong. The water defenses will be under Li Jun, Ruan the Second, Ruan the Fifth, Ruan the Seventh, Zhang Heng, Zhang Shun, Tong Wei and Tong Meng. These forty-three chieftains shall be the leaders of the six inner defenses of the stronghold.

"The first pass at the front of the mountain shall be held by Lei Heng and Fan Rui, the second by Xie Zhen and Xie Bao, the third by Xiang Chong and Li Gun.

"The small fort on the Shore of Golden Sands shall be commanded by Yan Shun, Zheng Tianshou, Kong Ming and Kong Liang. Duck's Bill Shore's small fort shall be under Li Zhong, Zhou Tong, Zou Yuan and Zou Run.

"As to the two small forts on the rear of the mountain, the one on the left shall be led by Stumpy Wang, Ten Feet of Steel and Cao Zheng; the one on the right by Zhu Wu, Chen Da and Yang Chun.

"In Loyalty Hall in the row of rooms on the left Xiao Rang shall be in charge of documents; Pei Xuan, rewards and punishments; Jin Dajian, seals and letters; and Jiang Jing, money and grain accounts. In the row of rooms on the right, Ling Zhen shall be in charge of cannon; Meng Kang, shipbuilding; Hou Jian, clothing and armor manufacturing; and Tao Zongwang, walls and ramparts.

"In the rooms of the two wings behind the Hall, we'll have the following supervisors: Li Yun, housing; Tang Long, iron smithery; Zhu Fu, wines and vinegars; Song Qing, feasts and banquets; Du Xing and Bai Sheng, miscellaneous.

"The four taverns which serve as lookout places for us shall continue to be run by Zhu Gui, Yue Ho, Shi Qian, LiLi, Sun Xin, Gu Dasao, Zhang Qing and Sun the Witch. Yang Lin, Shi Yong and Duan Jingzhu shall buy horses from the north.

"These are our dispositions. Let everyone respect them and none disobey."

From the day Song Jiang assumed the leadership of the stronghold in Liangshan Marsh, every chieftain, large and small, was happy and content. All gladly acceded to his directions.

One day Song Jiang conferred with them. He wanted to avenge Chao Gai and lead troops against the village of Zengtou. But Wu Yong was opposed.

"The mourning customs of the people must be respected, brother," he advised. "You must wait a hundred days before going into battle. It won't be too late."

Song Jiang heeded his words and remained in the stronghold. Every day he had prayers offered for Chao Gai's safe passage into Heaven.

One day he invited a monk whose Buddhist name was Dayuan—"Beatified"—and who was a member of the Longhua Monastery in Daming the Northern Capital. On his way to Jining, he had been passing through Liangshan Marsh, and had been asked to the fortress to conduct services for the departed. During a vegetarian meal, Song Jiang, in the course of conversation, inquired whether the Northern Capital had any places or people of note.

"Surely you've heard of the Jade Unicorn of Hebei?" the monk retorted.

Song Jiang and Wu Yong suddenly remembered. "We're not yet old. We shouldn't be so forgetful at our age," Song exclaimed. "There's a rich man in the Northern Capital called Lu Junyi. His nickname is the Jade Unicorn. He's one of the Three Remarkable Men of Hebei Province. He lives in the capital city and is highly skilled in the martial arts. With cudgel and staff he has no equal. If we could get him to join our stronghold, we'd need have no fear of any government troops or police sent to catch us."

Wu Yong laughed. "Why so despondent, brother? You want him up here? There's nothing hard about that!"

"He's the head of one of the leading families of Daming. How can we induce him to become an outlaw?"

"I've been thinking of this for some time, though for the moment I'd forgotten. I have a plan that will bring him up the mountain."

"You're not known as the Wizard without cause. Will you tell us, please, Military Advisor, what your plan is?" Calmly with 2 fingers pressed together, Wu Yong related his plan. And as a result, Lu Junyi cast aside embroidered banners, beaded drapes, and entered instead the dragon's pool and tiger's den. Truly, to bring 1 man into the Marsh, warfare was inflicted on the entire population.

Now what Taoist Gongsun proposed to Song Jiang and the Professor was this: "My plan is that of the famous general Zhuge Liang during the early years of the Han when he used stones instead of troops. Draw up the army so that it faces in all directions, with eight sections of eight, making sixty-four in all, the commander-in-chief in the middle. This is like a beast with four heads and eight tails. It can wheel to the left or turn to the right, it's a device like the wind and clouds that float over our heads, it has the adaptability of dragon, tiger, bird or snake. Now, wait until the enemy charge down the mountain and attack, then open out on two sides, and calmly invite them in. Then when you see the signal of seven stars, reform into a long snake. I now perform my little magic, and the result is that these three and their army will find themselves unable to go forward or back, left or right. Somewhere we will have prepared a trap, a concealed pit. We drive them towards it. Troops with snagging hooks are lying in ambush on either side, ready to pin them down."

Song Jiang was impressed with the scheme and issued orders at once, with strict instructions to all officers to keep to them precisely. Eight of their strongest, boldest leaders were to command the forces on the periphery. These eight were Twin Rods, Whiskers, Colonel Hua, the Spearsman, Mu the Unstoppable, Colonel Sun, the Tattooed Dragon and the Tamer. The main force in the centre was put under the command of Mr. Chai with the Little Duke and the Halberdier. Song Jiang, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun would control the signals given by the River-Jumper. The Strategist with five officers was to take up a position on a high point to report on the enemy movements.

The morning was well advanced when the army ranks spread out at the foot of the mountain and began to wave their banners, sound the drums and shout challenges. Then from Mount Mangdang the gongs began to reverberate like thunder and the three leaders marched down the mountain. They deployed a force of more than three thousand troops. The Ogre and Winged Ghost commanded the two flanks. In the centre on horseback was the chieftain called Fan Rui, a native of Puzhou, who had once been known as Father Purity and had acquired great skill with arms among the rivers and lakes. On horseback he wielded a flying hammer with devastating effect, and he seemed to have the ability to be everywhere at once, slaughtering generals and capturing ensigns. No one could touch him. He was nicknamed the Demon King. There is a poem which tells what he was like:

About his head floats hair like black silk, his embroidered robe is all black and he is totally encased in armour which gleams like the winter sky. He uses the hammer with miraculous skill. He is truly an image of the Great Warrior of the North, and weird sprites are at his beck and call. His personal banner features wandering clouds, rivers and seas; his nickname is Demon King.

Mounted on a black charger, the Demon King rode out in front of his ranks. On his left was the Eight-Armed Ogre, on his right Winged Ghost. Now although the Demon King had quite a few magic tricks up his sleeve, he was no military strategist. When he saw the formation in which Song Jiang's army was drawn up, facing all directions, he secretly rejoiced. "If you spread your troops out like that, you're playing into my hands," he thought.

"When the wind begins to blow," he commanded the other two, "break through their ranks with five hundred men whirling swords."

They responded by grasping their outlandish shields and readying their javelins and throwing knives and waited for the Demon King to act. The latter now stood up in his stirrups and raising his left hand with the flying hammer and brandishing his trusty blade in the right hand, muttered some magic spells, culminating in a shout of: "Chrrr!" Immediately a violent wind arose on all sides, which set sand and stones flying. The sky grew dark as night, with no gleam of light from sun or moon. The other two cheered and leading five hundred dervish swordsmen charged forward. Before this onslaught Song Jiang's forces parted into two halves. As the two enemy leaders charged into the middle they were subjected to a rain of ballista missiles from either side. Only fifty or so of their troops followed them forward; the rest returned to their own ranks. Watching from his hilltop, Song Jiang saw the two enemy leaders had entered the trap and told the River-Jumper to wave the seven-stars flag. At this signal the troops, dividing and wheeling about, transformed themselves into the snake formation.

Now the two enemy leaders, however they might drive east or west, twist or turn to right or left, could find no way out. On the hilltop the Strategist was using the little flag to point with: when they turned east, he pointed east, and when they turned west he pointed west. Taoist Gongsun was there on the hilltop too, of course, observing. He now drew his famous sword inscribed with pine trees, muttered a spell and cried out: "Chrr!" The wind began to wildly swirl at the feet of the Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost. They saw the world go dark, no ray of light was visible. Not a single enemy soldier was to be seen either, nothing but darkness wherever they looked. They could not even see their own troops behind them. They became extremely anxious; all they wanted was to turn back, but it was absolutely impossible to find a way out. And now suddenly there was a shattering peal of thunder. Unending curses burst from them as simultaneously they were both tripped and fell head over heels into a huge pit. Hooks reached out on either side and in no time at all they were subdued and bound with rope.

Their captors took them up to the top of the hill to claim their reward.

Song Jiang pointed with the stock of his whip and the three leaders of his main force went into action. The Demon King tried to withdraw to the mountain, but half his force was destroyed before he got away.

Song Jiang now called in his troops and the leaders held a meeting outside the commander's tent. The two enemy leaders were paraded under the banner. When Song Jiang saw them he immediately ordered them to be untied, and presenting the cup in his own hands said: "Do not be angry. These are the fortunes of war. I myself have heard so much about you. I wanted to invite you to join our company on the mountain. It is only because there was no opportunity to do so that we have had this misunderstanding. If you do not refuse, and consent to come back with us, we shall count it a great blessing."

The two prostrated themselves humbly and said: "We too know your great reputation. It is just that for some reason we have not had the opportunity to meet you. Obviously you have great loyalty and virtue, but we failed to recognize the fact. We went against the will of heaven and earth. Now we are your prisoners. We thoroughly deserve death, yet you treat us with such courtesy. If you spare us, we pledge to serve you till death, to repay your magnanimity. As for the Demon King, how can he carry on without us? If you would permit one of us to go back and speak to the Demon King, we would tell him to come here and pay his respects, what do you say to that?"

Song Jiang said: "There is no need to keep one of you here as a hostage. Why don't you both go back to your stronghold. I will wait for you to return with good tidings."

They thanked him and said: "What a gentleman you are! If Demon King refuses to submit we will capture him ourselves and make a gift of him to you."

Song Jiang was well satisfied with this, and told one of his men to bring in wine and food. He also ordered two new suits of clothes and two good horses for them, and told some men to fetch their shields and escort them back to their stronghold. As they rode back both of them were full of praise for Song Jiang's generosity. When they reached Mount Mangdang the guards were amazed to see them and admitted them into the camp.

The Demon King asked what they had come for. "We are a pair of unfortunates," they said. "We deserve a thousand deaths."

"Why do you speak like that, brothers?" asked the Demon King.

So they told him all about Song Jiang's noble spirit.

"If Song Jiang is really so noble, so generous, then we had better stop opposing heaven's will and quickly go down to pay our respects to him," said the Demon King.

"That's exactly what we wanted to suggest," they said. They packed up the camp that same evening, and next morning at daybreak they all went down together. When they reached Song Jiang's camp they threw themselves on the ground. Song Jiang raised them up and invited them to sit in his tent. From the outset they felt not a moment's awkwardness with Song Jiang; rather there was an immediate sympathy and trust between them and they exchanged views on everything. They invited all the Mount Liang leaders back to Mount Mangdang, and had oxen and horses slaughtered to feast Song Jiang and his commanders, whilst they also rewarded the men. After the dinner the Demon King begged to become Taoist Gongsun's disciple. At Song Jiang's insistence, Taoist Gongsun explained the technique of the Five Thunders to the Demon King, to the latter's delight. In a few days' time the cattle and horses were rounded up, all the valuables and stores were packed and loaded, the troops were mustered, the compound was fired and everyone left with Song Jiang and the others to return to Mount Liang. Nothing need be said of the journey.

When they were close to Mount Liang and only needed to make the crossing, a tall fellow approached Song Jiang along the road beside the reedbeds and prostrated himself.

Song Jiang hurriedly dismounted and raised him up and asked: "What is your name and where are you from?"

The other replied: "My name is Duan Jingzhu, but people call me Yellow Dog, on account of the colour of my hair and beard. I am from Zhuozhou. I've always been a horse thief, up in the north, in Tartar territory. Last spring north of the Spearbutt range I stole a magnificent animal, with a coat whiter than snow, not a single hair of a different colour. It was three metres from nose to tail and stood fully sixteen hands. A big strong horse, that would easily do three hundred miles a day. It was quite famous up there in the north. They called it the 'moonlight charger.' It had belonged to a Tartar prince, before I stole it up there in the mountains. Now I've heard a lot about the Opportune Rain, from brethren of the rivers and lakes, only I never had the chance to meet him. So what I wanted to do was to bring this horse and make a present of it to him as my pledge for entering the company. Unfortunately as I was passing through the village of Zengside in southwest Lingzhou it was stolen from me by the five sons of the Zeng family. I tried to convince them that it really belonged to Song Jiang of Mount Liang, but they just swore at me most horribly and I didn't dare pursue the matter. When I managed to get away I came straight here to tell you."

The speaker was a gangling, coarse-looking individual of a most strange aspect. What exactly was he like? Well, there's a poem for him:

A head surrounded with wild yellow hair,
Legs that will carry him anywhere.
He's invisible as a man in a fog
When he steals a horse. He's called Yellow Dog.

When Song Jiang saw how unusual this man looked, he secretly rejoiced. "In that case," he said, "why don't you come to the mountain with us and discuss matters?"

He took Yellow Dog into the boats with them and they crossed to Golden Sands Landing. When Chao Gai and the others received them in the Assembly Hall, Song Jiang introduced the Demon King, the Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost, and Yellow Dog also paid his respects. A drum began to sound clamorously and a great feast was organized. Seeing that a lot more troops had been added to the stronghold and heroes seemed to be flocking in from all directions as if blown by the wind, Green-Eyes and the Nine-Tailed Turtle were ordered to build more houses and extend the stronghold's defences. And since Yellow Dog went on extolling the virtues of that horse, Song Jiang told the Magic Messenger to go to Zengside and find out what had happened to it.

After 4 or 5 days the Magic Messenger returned and told them: "There're three thousand or more families in Zengside. One of them is the Zeng family. Old Zeng is a Tartar. He has five sons, known as the Zeng Five. Starting with the eldest they are called Zeng Tu, Zeng Mi, Zeng Suo, Zeng Kui and Zeng Sheng. There is also an instructor there called Shi Wengong and he has an assistant called Su Ding. They've mustered an army of six or seven thousand troops in the village and built solid defences. They boast more than fifty prison carts. They are on record as saying that there's not room round here for both them and us. They are determined to capture all of us here in the stronghold; they're spoiling for a fight. The horse, Moonlight, is now being ridden by Instructor Shi Wengong. The bastards have done one particularly hateful thing. They've invented some verses that they teach the children of the village to sing:

When our jingling irons are heard,
Gods and ghosts are sore afeared.
We lock our foes in prison carts
With iron spikes to quell their hearts.
We'll sweep Mount Liang and the Marshes clean,
Seize Chao Gai and turn him in,
Take the Opportune Rain alive,
And the Professor's fall contrive.
The Zengside Brothers Five are we,
We shall forever famous be."

Chao Gai was hugely incensed. "How dare these animals speak so disrespectfully!" he said. "I'd better go myself. If I don't capture that lot, I vow never to return!"

Song Jiang said: "You are our chief. You cannot risk your own safety. I will go instead."

Chao Gai said: "It's not that I grudge you the glory. But you've been down so many times. You must be tired of fighting. This time let me go instead. Next time there's trouble it will be your turn."

When Song Jiang tried to insist, Chao Gai became quite annoyed. He selected five thousand troops and asked twenty of the leaders to go with him. The remainder were to stay with Song Jiang and guard the camp.

The twenty leaders appointed by Chao Gai were Leopard's Head, Twin Rods, the Spearsman, Mu the Unstoppable, the Red-Haired Devil, the Pilot, the three Ruan brothers, Morbid, Madcap, Colonel Sun, the Tamer, Skyscraper, the Door-God in the Clouds, the Dandy, Redeye, Golden Wings, Panther and the Daytime Rat. They led three columns down the mountain to attack Zengside. Song Jiang, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun accompanied them as far as Golden Sands Landing. As they were drinking wine there, a violent wind suddenly got up, splitting in two the new banner which Chao Gai had had made. Everyone turned pale at the sight of this. The Professor warned them: "This is not an auspicious omen. You had better postpone the attack."

Song Jiang also tried to talk him round: "You can go another time. This business of the wind tearing the banner doesn't look good for the army. It would surely be best to wait for a while before going off to deal with those villains."
Chao Gai said: "Sky and earth, clouds and wind, how can they be held to account? If we don't take advantage of this spring dawn to go and get them, we're just allowing them longer to build up their power, and when we do attack it may be too late. Don't stand in my way. Whatever happens I intend to go!"
Song Jiang could say nothing to dissuade him and Chao Gai led his army off across the water.
But Song Jiang felt most uneasy. When he got back to the stronghold he sent the Magic Messenger off after them, to listen out for news of their progress.
Chao Gai with his five thousand troops and twenty leaders reached the vicinity of Zengside and stopped before the stockade. Next day he and the other leaders rode out to take a good look at the place. What they saw was a site most dangerous to attack:
All around it a desolate expanse of water; it's surrounded on three sides by a high ridge. Next to the moat is a river harbour like a coiled snake; close to the water a thicket of willows dense as rain. As you look down on it from afar, it is all green shadows with no sign of habitation. If you watch from close to, the perimeter fence is lost in blue shade. But there are youths there in the village fierce as door gods, there are children in the fields who spring from the soil like spirits. Evidently the defences are strong; obviously this is a village of tough men and strong horses.
As they were watching, a detachment of some eight hundred troops suddenly appeared from a grove of willows. The leader wore a helmet of beaten copper and was dressed in linked armour. He wielded a spear of tempered steel and rode a fiery stallion. This was Zeng the Fourth. "You rebel scum from Mount Liang," he began to shout. "I was just coming to get you and hand you over to the authorities for the reward, apparently heaven is kind to me! You should have dismounted already so we can tie you up, what are you waiting for?"
As Chao Gai turned towards him with a look of fury, a warrior from his ranks rode forward and charged Zeng the Fourth. It was one of the founder members of Mount Liang, none other than Leopard's Head Lin Chong. The two horses clashed and they fought twenty bouts and neither had the advantage. After the twentieth bout, Zeng the Fourth, reckoning he could not get the better of Leopard's Head, rested his lance and turned his horse and raced back to the woods. Leopard's Head reined in his horse and did not follow. Chao Gai ordered his troops back to camp to discuss plans for defeating Zengside.
"Next time let's go and challenge them right outside the village," Leopard's Head suggested. "It'll give us a chance to see how things really are there, before we make our plans."
When daylight came the five thousand troops were marched to a deserted part of the level land at the entrance to the village and drawn up in battle formation. Drums rolled and the troops cheered. Loud reports came from Zengside and a large body of troops advanced, with seven leaders spread out in front in a straight line. In the centre was Instructor Shi Wengong. On his left was his assistant, Su Ding, and on his right the eldest Zeng. Also on the left Zeng the Second and Zeng the Fourth, while Zeng the Third and Zeng the Fifth were on the right. They were all in full armour. Instructor Shi Wengong had a bow with arrows and was riding Moonlight. He held a square-bladed halberd, finely carved. Three drumrolls were now heard and from the Zengside ranks a number of prison carts were wheeled out and placed in full view. Zeng the First pointed at the enemy and shouted: "Do you see my prison carts, you rebel scum? We are going to finish you off, or we're not men! We'll take you alive, one by one, and put you in the prison carts to take to the capital. There you'll die the death of a thousand cuts. But if you surrender now, there may be room for discussion."
Chao Gai responded by levelling his lance and furiously charging Zeng the First. Fearing for his safety, the other leaders went with him and the two armies met in confused combat. Gradually the Zengside forces were driven back into the village. Leopard's Head and Twin Rods gave Chao Gai close protection, hacking down the enemy on either side. Eventually Leopard's Head saw that the way forward was too difficult and hurriedly called the troops back to regroup. It was clear that they had suffered quite heavy losses and Chao Gai's heart was heavy when they returned to the camp. The other leaders rallied him, saying: "Be of good cheer, brother. It's no use grieving and it's bad for your health. When Song Jiang fights he generally has losses too. But in the end he always returns victorious. The fighting was fierce today, and both sides lost men and horses, but we weren't beaten. Why must you be so sad?" But Chao Gai's gloom was not dispelled.
Three days now passed in the camp. Each day they challenged the enemy but no one from Zengside put in an appearance.
Then on the fourth day two monks suddenly turned up in Chao Gai's camp, seeking help. Some guards brought them to the command tent, where they knelt and declared: "We are monks from the Fahua temple to the east of Zengside. Those Zeng brothers are always coming to our temple to pester us with demands for money or gifts. We are fed up with it! We haven't been able to find any way of escaping them, so we have come to beg you to go and raid their camp and get rid of them for us. It will be a blessing to the whole district."
Chao Gai was very excited by this. He asked the two monks to sit and regaled them with wine. But Leopard's Head warned him: "Don't be too trusting, brother. This may be a trap."
The monks said: "We are holy men, how could we tell a lie? We have heard so much about the reputation of Mount Liang for loyalty and honour. Wherever you go you never harm the people. That's why we decided to throw ourselves on your mercy. Why should we try to cheat you? Especially as the Zengs are not going to win against you. You've absolutely no reason to suspect us."
Chao Gai said: "Don't be so suspicious, brother. We could miss a great opportunity. I'll go myself to have a look this evening."
"Don't you go," Leopard's Head said. "I will take half the troops to raid the camp, while you stay outside to back us up."
Chao Gai said: "If I'm not going to go, why should anyone else? No, you can stay outside with half the troops and back me up."
Leopard's Head said: "Who do you want to take with you?"
Chao Gai said: "I'll take ten leaders and two thousand five hundred men." These ten leaders were: the Red-Haired Devil, Ruan the Second, Twin Rods, Ruan the Fifth, Golden Wings, Ruan the Seventh, the Dandy, Skyscraper, the Door-God in the Clouds and the Daytime Rat. That evening when they had eaten, with bells removed from the horse's bridles and the troops gagged to prevent sound, they swiftly and silently followed the two monks to the Fahua temple. They found it to be an ancient structure. Chao Gai dismounted and went in. He saw no monks inside. He asked the two monks: "Why is there not a single priest in this temple?"
"The monks were all vexatious creatures, they had to be expelled. There is only the abbot left and a few novices. They live in the court at the back. Halt your men here and wait for a while. When night thickens we will lead you to their camp."
"Where exactly is their camp?" Chao Gai asked.
"They've got four camps," the monk replied. "But I have a friend who is stationed in the northern camp. If you can capture that one, it's all that matters. You can forget about the other three."
"What time can we start?" Chao Gai asked.
The monk said: "Let's see, it's now only the second watch. If we wait till the third watch, they'll be totally unprepared."
For some time they went on hearing clearly the beat of the Zengside drum giving out the time. This continued for upwards of an hour and then there was silence.
"They must be all asleep now," the monk said. "We can start."
The monks led the way. Chao Gai ordered everyone to mount and they left the temple.
When they had gone less than two miles, it was so dark that they lost sight of the two monks and the troops in front feared to advance. There were paths leading in all directions, and not a soul to be seen. An officer came in great trepidation and reported this to Chao Gai. Twin Rods ordered a hurried retreat by the way they had come. But they had not gone much more than a hundred paces when all around them gongs and drums broke the silence together with earth-shattering cries, and there were torches wherever they looked. Desperately Chao Gai and his commanders sought to escape. But after two more turns in the path they ran into the enemy troops. The foremost of them shot a volley of arrows, and unfortunately one of these struck Chao Gai in the face, knocking him from his horse. The horses of Twin Rods and the Dandy bolted. The Red-Haired Devil and the Daytime Rat who were coming up behind them helped Chao Gai back onto his horse and galloped through the village. Leopard's Head and the others were waiting to assist them outside the village and put up a fierce resistance. A confused battle raged till dawn, when both sides returned to their respective camps.
When Leopard's Head got back and called the roll of his troops, it was found that the three Ruan brothers, the Door-God in the Clouds and Skyscraper had swum to safety, but of the two thousand five hundred troops who had gone less than one thousand three hundred remained. Together with Golden Wings they all repaired to the command tent. When they examined Chao Gai, they found that the arrow had hit him in the jaw. When it was pulled out he fainted from loss of blood. The arrow itself bore the name of Shi Wengong. Leopard's Head ordered the wound to be dressed with salve. It was however a poisoned arrow and the poison deprived Chai Gai of the power to speak. Leopard's Head had him placed on a litter and ordered the three Ruans, Skyscraper and the Door-God in the Clouds to go on back to Mount Liang with him. The remaining fifteen held a discussion.
The general view was this: "Remember the accident this time when our dear leader Chao Gai came down the mountain? The wind tore our banner. All we can do now is collect our troops and return. We'll never be able to capture this place."
Twin Rods said: "We must wait till we get orders from Song Jiang before we withdraw."
That day their gloom knew no bounds. The army had no more stomach for fighting. All they wanted was to return to the mountain.
In the evening around nine o'clock when it had just got dark they were sitting miserably in the camp. Truly it was a case of "A headless snake goes nowhere, a wingless bird cannot fly; they can but sigh and weep, since they can neither advance nor retreat." At this point a sentry suddenly rushed in and reported: "There's four or five columns of troops attacking. We can't even count the torches!"
Leopard's Head immediately ordered everyone to mount their horses. On the mountains which surrounded them on three sides the torches made it bright as day and there was shouting from every direction. Leopard's Head's forces did not stand and fight but struck camp and retreated. With the Zengside forces harrying them in the rear, they were forced to fight a rearguard action. It was not till they had gone twenty miles or so that they shook off the pursuit. When the roll was called they were found to have lost six or seven hundred men. After suffering this serious reverse, they took to the road by which they had come and headed for Mount Liang. Halfway there the Magic Messenger met them with orders to return to the stronghold and not to engage in further action. When they had marched their men back to the marshlands and up into the mountain, everyone attended the wounded leader, Chao Gai.
Neither food nor drink had passed Chao Gai's lips, he could eat nothing. His whole body was swollen. Song Jiang kept watch at his bedside, dressed his wound with his own hands and bathed it in hot water. The others stood watching outside. That evening in the third watch, towards midnight, Chao Gai's condition worsened. Turning his eyes on Song Jiang he ordered: "Dear brother, take care. Whoever catches the one who shot me, let him be lord of Mount Liang!"
Then his eyes clouded over and he was dead. For Song Jiang it was like losing a father and mother and he wept till his head swam. The others raised him up and urged him to take control of affairs. The Professor and Taoist Gongsun exhorted him: "You must spare yourself such grieving, life and death are man's portion, what use is grief? You must look to what has to be done now."
Song Jiang pulled himself together and gave orders for the body to be bathed in scented water and dressed for burial and then placed in the Assembly Hall. All the leaders came to pay their last respects. An inner casket and coffin were made, an auspicious time was chosen, the body was encoffined and placed in the hall, a screen was set up and a memorial tablet was fashioned bearing the words: "Duke Chao, lord of the Marshes of Mount Liang, inspired commander." All the leaders, from Song Jiang on down, wore full mourning. The lesser chiefs and all the men wore mourning headbands. The arrow was preserved as a pledge before the altar. Long banners were strung up around the stronghold and local monks were invited up the mountain to perform a memorial service for the benefit of Chao Gai's soul. Every day Song Jiang led the company in mourning. He had no heart for attending to the business of the mountain stronghold.
After discussion, Leopard's Head, Taoist Gongsun, the Professor and all the leaders now decided that Song Jiang should rule on Mount Liang. Everyone was in favour.
One day at dawn, when incense, lamps and candles had been lit, Leopard's Head led the company in requesting Song Jiang to come and take his seat in the Assembly Hall. The Professor and Leopard's Head opened the proceedings, saying: "Brother please hear us. 'A nation cannot survive a single day without a leader, a household cannot survive without a master.' Our leader Chao Gai has passed on. How can the stronghold remain leaderless? Your name is known everywhere within the four seas. Let us choose an auspicious day and time to inaugurate your rule as our chief, to be obeyed by everyone in all your commands."
Song Jiang replied: "Before he died, Lord Chao proclaimed: 'If anyone manages to take Shi Wengong, you'd better make him master in the Marshes of Mount Liang.' You all know this. Have you forgotten it, even though his mortal remains are not yet cold? His death has not even been avenged yet, or the bitterness wiped out. How then can I occupy this seat?"
The Professor urged him: "Though indeed Lord Chao said this, we have not in fact captured this person. How can we remain leaderless? If you refuse it, who else will dare take up the post? How will the troops of the stronghold be led? We respect all that you say, but please accept the position at least temporarily, until such time as another policy presents itself."
"What you say is reasonable. I will accept the position for the time being, but when the day of our vengeance arrives and the bitterness is wiped out, he who takes Shi Wengong, whoever it may be, must occupy this seat."
Iron Ox who was standing on one side suddenly exclaimed: "You shouldn't just be lord of the Marshes of Mount Liang, brother, you should be emperor, that's what!"
Song Jiang shouted angrily: "That big black fellow is talking rubbish again! Keep your big mouth shut or I'll have your tongue cut out!"
Iron Ox grumbled: "I wasn't asking for you to be just a local chieftain, I wanted you to be emperor. And you want to cut my tongue out!"
The Professor said: "This idiot has no sense of what's proper. Don't waste your time with him. Please give your attention to important matters."
Song Jiang lit incense and was installed as temporary incumbent of the first seat. His first deputy on the left was the Professor, his second, on the right was Taoist Gongsun. Next on the left was Leopard's Head and on the right Twin Rods. All the leaders paid their respects and took their seats on either side.
Song Jiang spoke as follows: "Today I shall temporarily occupy this position, relying entirely on the support and cooperation of all of you to advise me, in order that together we may follow heaven's path. Our numbers now in the stronghold are very great, not as in the past, and I would like you to separate into six main camps where you will reside. The Assembly Hall will in future be known as the Ceremonial Hall. Before it and behind it, on the right and on the left, there will be four land camps. On the other side of the mountain there will be two smaller posts. In front there will be garrisons for the three main gates. At the bottom there will be the waterside camp and a small post at each of the two landings. I would like you now all to accept these dispositions.
"The Ceremonial Hall will for the time being be my seat of residence. My second-in-command there will be the Professor, and after him in order Taoist Gongsun, Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, the Little Duke and the Halberdier. The left-hand camp will be commanded by Leopard's Head, with the Red-Haired Devil, the Tattooed Dragon, Morbid, Madcap, Skyscraper and the Door-God in the Clouds. The right-hand camp will be commanded by Twin Rods, with Whiskers, the Magic Messenger, Mu the Unstoppable, Iron Ox, Golden Wings, and Mu the Irrepressible. The forward camp will be commanded by Skyhawk, with the Spearsman, the Monk, the Pilgrim, the Blue-Faced Beast, the Flautist and the Young Master. The rearward camp will be commanded by Mr. Chai, with Colonel Sun, the Tamer, Victorious, the Supremo, Redeye and the Pill Monger. The waterside camp will be commanded by the White-Water Dragon, with the three Ruan brothers, the Pilot, White Eel, the Cave Dragon and the River Rider. Altogether in these six camps there will be forty-three leaders.
"The first of the gates will be guarded by Sergeant Lei and the Demon King, the second by Snake and Scorpion, the third by the Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost. The post at Golden Sands Landing will be run by the Dandy, Whitey, Red Star and Blazing Comet, the post at Duck's-Bill Landing by the Tiger-Killer and Big Chief, the Forester and Rhinoceros. Of the two land posts the other side of the mountain, the left hand one will be occupied by Short-Arse, Steelbright and the Knife, the right hand one by the Strategist, River-Jumper and White-Spotted Snake. Within the Ceremonial Hall the left hand chamber will be occupied by the Hand, as Master of the Rolls, by Chief Justice Sterling, by the Craftsman, our publisher of inscriptions, and by the Calculator, our treasurer. The right hand chamber will belong to Thunderer, chief of artillery, Flagpole, our shipwright, the Ape, our wardrobe chief, and the Nine-Tailed Turtle, superintendent of fortifications. In the chamber to the rear of the hall will reside other administrative staff: Green-Eyes, our housing officer, Spots, the supervisor of arms manufacture, Smiler, superintendent of wine-making, my brother, Iron Fan, supervisor of banquets, and Uglymug and the Daytime Rat as general overseers. The four inns or listening posts down below will be run by the Crocodile, Lungs, the Flea, the Executioner, Blackface, Auntie Gu, the Gardener and Sister Sun the Ogress, the same arrangement as before. Panther, the Guv and Yellow Dog will be responsible for buying horses in the territory to the north. Let everyone now respect these arrangements. Let there be no violations."
Every single one of the chiefs in the waterlands of Mount Liang was pleased that Song Jiang had become chief of the stronghold and all accepted his provisions without demur.
One day at a general assembly Song Jiang said: "I am anxious to avenge Chao Gai. Let us raise an army and attack Zengside."
The Professor said: "Brother, according to custom the period of mourning should be respected. Let us wait till the hundred days are past before raising an army."
Song Jiang followed the Professor's advice. He remained in the mountain stronghold, every day performing religious works to gain blessings for Chao Gai.
One day he invited a certain monk, called Dayuan, who was a member of the congregation at the Glorious Dragon Temple in the northern capital. Because he passed by the Marshes of Mount Liang on his way to Jining, they invited him to perform a service at the stronghold. As they were eating a vegetarian meal, and idly conversing, Song Jiang happened to ask about local customs and personalities in the northern capital and the monk said: "How come you haven't heard the name of the Jade Unicorn of Hebei? For Song Jiang and the Professor it was like a moment of illumination. They said: "We are not old, as you can see, so how can we be so forgetful? In the northern capital there is indeed a gentleman called Mr. Lu Junyi who is known as the Jade Unicorn, one of those famous three from Hebei, but now living in the northern capital and the possessor of wonderful fighting skills. His technique with the staff is quite unparallelled. If we had that man here with us, there'd be no reason to fear capture by the government troops, how could any troops get near us?"
The Professor said pleasantly: "Brother, what are you worried about? If you want him to come here, it's no problem at all."
Song Jiang said: "He is one of the great men in the northern capital. How could he be persuaded to become an outlaw?"
The Professor said, "I thought about it before, but for some reason it went right out of my mind. I've a plan that'll get him here."
Song Jiang said, "It's certainly not for nothing that people call you the Beacon of Learning! May I ask what method you intend to use to attract the person in question here?" The Professor's reply was unhesitating. Laying 2 fingers craftily across each other, he expounded his plan. It was to have an important result for the Jade Unicorn was to exchange the company of courtiers and the luxury of palaces for the dragon's pool and the tiger's den. Truly:

All so that one man should come to the marshlands,
The people suffered the soldiers' axes.

GONGSUN SHENG explained his strategy. He said, "At the time when the Han Dynasty was declining, General Zhuge Liang worked out his plans by means of stones. He formed a square, and divided each side into two. Each of these eight sections had eight companies so that there were altogether sixty-four companies. His headquarters was in the middle of the square. There were four "heads" or advance companies, and they could turn either to right or left, and lead the whole square. The result was that the whole square moved as one body (like a tiger) just according to the conditions faced. When an enemy was approaching the two leading companies separated, and opened the square. When the enemy was inside the wings he was in the coils of an encircling snake. I will adopt the same method, and when our three opponents are in our midst they will find no means of escape. I will have a concealed pitfall ready, and we will slowly drive them towards it until they fall into it. There they can be easily arrested by men with hooked sticks."
Song Jiang was pleased, and approved of the suggested plan. He issued orders placing Gongsun Sheng in charge of the forthcoming encounter, and dividing the bandits into eight parts.
The following day the brigands started on their march with much beating of drums and gongs, and when nearing Mount Mangdan they heard the sound of gongs. There were about three thousand bandits under the command of the three leaders. The two wings were in charge of Xiang Chong and Li Gun, with Fan Rui in the center. Fan Rui was without any skill as a general, and depended on his black arts for success. Upon seeing the opposing large army from Liangshan Marsh arrayed in the form of a square, he was quite pleased, and said to himself, "Song Jiang, you have arranged your men exactly as I have wanted you to do, but you will soon be caught by my ruse. So he sent orders to the other two leaders on the wings that when a strong wind arose they must advance with five hundred men rushing forward with their swords. Those leaders upon receiving this order put on their shields, and armed themselves with spears and throwing knives which could be hurled a long distance, and awaited the wind to be started by Fan Rui. The latter was seated on his black horse with a copper mace in his left hand, and with a sword in his right hand. He was muttering a spell, and then called out, "Quickly." Immediately a strong wind raged, hurling loose stones and sand about. The sky darkened, and the sunlight was obscured. Upon seeing this Xiang Chong and Li Gun gave orders and their five hundred men rushed forward.
Upon seeing the enemy advancing, Song Jiang gave the signal, and the front part of the square opened out on both sides. The five hundred men rushed into the square, and were fired upon from the remaining three sides with arrows. Most of them could not face this, and beat a hasty retreat. Only fifty men were left with the two leaders Xiang Chong and Li Gun. They dashed first one way and then another without a way out, Gongsun Sheng standing on a high mound had controlled the wind, and wherever the two leaders went they found the fierce wind with them hindering their movements. The two leaders could not see their followers, and were nonplused by the wind and darkness. At last their horses fell into the hidden trap, and there they were seized by men with hooked sticks, who took them to the camp at the base.
Song Jiang now dashed forward on his horse, and was followed by all his men. Fan Rui, seeing the advancing body of men, realized that his plan had failed, and at once retreated up the mountain with the remainder of his men—about half of the original force. Seeing this Song Jiang gave orders for the pursuit to stop, and returned to the camp at the base with all his men.
Upon seeing the two prisoners he unloosened their bonds, and offered them wine saying, "I hope you two heroes will excuse me. This has happened only owing to our fighting in opposite forces. I hope that you will now join us at Liangshan Marsh, and help us to seek justice. I am sorry that I have not had the opportunity before of meeting you and making this offer."

The two leaders kowtowed and replied, "We have heard of your celebrated name for a long time, but we have not had the fortune of meeting you. We now know for certain that you are a very just person. Had we known before of your goodness we would not have been your opponents. Today we are your prisoners, and expected to die, and never expected to be treated in this way. If you do not kill us we shall certainly be under a great obligation to you. As we have left Fan Rui, he will now be helpless without us, and if you would allow us to return we would explain to him who you really are, and probably get him to also join your force."
"I agree to your proposal," said Song Jiang, "and both of you may go. I will trust you, and will expect you both to come here tomorrow, and report the result of your journey."
They both kowtowed again, "We realize that you are really great. If Fan Rui will not listen to our pleadings, then we will seize him and bring him here by force."
Song Jiang was very glad, and invited them to dine with him. He then gave them new clothes, good horses, and sent two men to accompany them on their trip. On their horses the two leaders meditated on Song Jiang's generosity. Upon reaching Mount Mangdan the outposts were astonished upon seeing the return of their leaders, and sent the information up the mountain. Upon reaching the camp Fan Rui received them, and after explaining how they had been kindly treated by Song Jiang and then released, Fan Rui agreed that they could no longer oppose "The Will of Heaven," but must go and join forces with such a just man.
The following day they set out for Song Jiang's headquarters, where they were gladly welcomed. Their men and everything were duly brought to Liangshan Marsh, and the two bands of bandits were now united.
On the day that Song Jiang and the new adherents were arriving at Liangshan Marsh, and were on the point of crossing the lake a man saluted him. Upon being inquired for his name the man replied, "I am Duan Jingzhu, but because of my light-colored hair the people call me 'Golden Haired Dog.' I am a Zhuozhou Prefecture man, and get a living by stealing horses. This spring I stole a horse at Qianggan Ridge, and it was pure white without a single hair of any other color. It was very swift, and was well known as 'Jade Lion that Glows in the Night.' It previously belonged to a prince of the Jurchen Tartars. I have heard of your great reputation so I decided to present it to you. On the way, however, I was attacked at the village Zengtou where the horse was taken from me. I told them that it was your horse, but they only cursed you so badly that I dare not to go into details. I came to inform you of the matter."
Song Jiang saw from the man's appearance that he was not a ruffian, and replied, "As matters are like this I request you to come to our stronghold where we can discuss the case."
They then crossed the lake by a boat, and upon reaching the mountain all the leaders were summoned to attend the Assembly Hall where dinner was served. There Duan Jingzhu again recited how the horse had been stolen, and Song Jiang dispatched Dai Zong, the Divine Traveler, to the village Zengtou to find out where the horse was. Within five days Dai Zong returned, and reported that in the village there were about seven thousand men with many horses and about fifty carts. The headman named Zeng was a Tartar from the land of the Jurchens, and he had five sons. They had great influence there, and would not allow any opponent to exist. They declared they would crush Liangshan Marsh. The stolen horse was now in the possession of a drill instructor there named Shi Wengong. There was a very detestable poem recited on the streets of that village. It was as follows:

Startle all the spirits,
Capture all the brigands;
Arrest Chao Gai and Song Jiang,
Put them all in prison.
Strong and mighty are we,
Zeng has many tigers;
They are known throughout the empire,
There are none their equal.

"There is not a single person who does not sing that, and I found it unbearable."
Chao Gai was very angry and said, "Those animals have no sense of decency. I must go myself. If I do not capture them I shall not return. I only want five thousand men, and about twenty leaders to accompany me. The others will stop here under Song Jiang to guard our stronghold."
That day Chao Gai selected his twenty leaders, and they left the mountain with their men divided into three contingents. Song Jiang and the other leaders descended the mountain, and while they were drinking a parting cup there arose a strong wind which snapped Chao Gai's flagpole into two parts. When they saw this they were all astounded.
Wu Yong remonstrated with Chao Gai. "It is evident that the wind disapproves of our military preparations, and I therefore think that it would be better to delay our expedition for some time."
"It is nothing unusual for the wind to do such a thing," said Chao Gai. "The weather is favorable, and if we do not go now it will only enable them to prepare their defenses, and that might lead to our defeat. I ask you not to obstruct me in this matter as I intend to proceed at all costs."
Wu Yong saw that it would be useless to urge delay, and Chao Gai ordered his troops to cross the lake. Song Jiang and his men returned to the mountain, but Dai Zong was dispatched to watch the proceedings and report results.
Chao Gai and his men duly reached the vicinity of the village of Zengtou without any trouble, and encamped there. The following day he and the leaders mounted their horses and went to survey the land. They had stopped at a certain place, and while looking round they saw a large body of men emerge from a forest. In front of them rode a man who was Zeng Kui, the fourth son of the head Tartar of the village. When he got near he shouted, "You brigands are from Liangshan Marsh, and are outlaws. For a long time I have the idea to capture you, and now Heaven has given me that opportunity. You had better dismount at once, and become my prisoners."
Chao Gai was highly provoked at this insolent speech, but before he could reply one of his leaders dashed past him on horseback. It was Lin Chong, the "Leopard's Head." He engaged with Zeng Kui for about twenty bouts, and then the latter realized that he had an opponent whom he could not overcome so he withdrew to the forest. Lin Chong did not pursue him.
Chao Gai ordered that his fellow leaders should return to camp where they held a meeting to discuss matters. Lin Chong suggested that they should attack the village the following day, and then they would see how the enemy fought. This was agreed to, and the next morning their five thousand men took up their position on an open ground in front of the entrance to the village. Soon they heard the guns in the village fired, and a large number of men emerged from the village, led by seven men on horseback. These leaders wore armor. In the center was Shi Wengong, the teacher, riding the stolen white horse, and armed with a halberd, and bow and arrows. A drum was beaten three times, and at this signal the villagers opened their ranks to allow several prisoner's carts to pass through. (These were fashioned with dragon's heads in front.) Pointing to the carts one of the seven leaders, Zeng Tu, shouted, "You rebels! Do you see these carts? We do not wish to kill you, but only take you alive as prisoners so that we can send you to the Eastern Capital. That is how we, the Five Tigers, wish to display our skill. You had better submit at once."
Upon hearing this Chao Gai was very angry, and dashed forward. He was immediately followed by all his twenty leaders and the whole of their men. The two armies met, and a fierce struggle ensued. The villagers could not repulse the attack, and slowly fell back towards their village. Lin Chong and Huyan Zhuo saw that the ground near the village was uneven, and suspecting a trap they ordered a general retreat. On both sides there had been many casualties.
Upon reaching their camp Chao Gai felt very sad, but his leaders said, "Brother, set your mind at ease, and do not grieve too much about our many losses today. You must not forget that our brother Song Jiang has had many defeats. We shall be victorious before we go back."
But Chao Gai still remained depressed.
For the next three days the brigands challenged the village to fight, but the villagers did not show themselves. But on the fourth day two monks came to Chao Gai's camp, where they said, "We are from the Fahua Monastery to the east of the village of Zengtou here. We have been frequently disturbed by the Five Tigers, sons of the Zeng family, who have demanded money from us. We know all their defenses, and are willing to show them to you so that you will relieve us of their trouble."
Chao Gai was pleased to hear this, and invited them to be seated and take refreshments. But Lin Chong exhorted Chao Gai, "Do not listen to these men, as this may be only a plot."
"I think we can depend upon them as they are both monks," replied Chao Gai. "We men of Liangshan Marsh are always willing to assist people in distress, and now that we are here, we must not miss this opportunity. These monks have no grudge against us, so why should they try to deceive us? You should not be so suspicious, and hinder our affairs. There is no reason why we should not win the next time. This evening we must try again."
"As you have decided to do so," said Lin Chong, "let us divide our men in half, and I will take one half into the village, while you remain in charge of the other half outside."
"If I do not go into the village I am afraid our men will hold back," replied Chao Gai. "You had better take charge of our men outside the village."
"Whom do you want to accompany you?" asked Lin Chong.
"I want ten leaders and two thousand five hundred men." He then named the ten leaders.
This was agreed to, and after the evening meal they set out. No bells were allowed on the horses, and each man carried a gag in his mouth so that nobody should utter a word. It was growing dark, and they followed the two monks to the Fahua Monastery outside the village. Chao Gai saw that it was a very old monastery. He dismounted, and entering the building saw that there was nobody inside. So he asked the monks how it was that the place was so empty. The monks replied that most of the monks had long since left the monastery on account of the trouble caused by the Zeng family. There was only the Abbot left, with a few acolytes, and they lived in the room near the pagoda. They said that Chao Gai and his men had better stay there till the third watch (11 A.M.) when the monks would take them to the village.
"Where is the stronghold of the village?" asked Chao Gai.
"There are four camps in the village, and the Zeng brothers are in the northern one. If you can get the northern camp the others will give no trouble," replied the monk.
"At what time can we go?" asked Chao Gai.
"Just now is about the second watch (9 P.M.), and it would be better to go about 11 P.M."
Just then the drums in the village signaled the time as the second watch. But after some time the drums were not beaten again, and the monks thought that that watchmen had gone to sleep. So they decided to start off at once, and the monks led the way. Chao Gai gave the order for an advance, and his leaders and their men silently followed him. They had gone about two //when Chao Gai missed the two monks who had been acting as guides. So a halt was called. They searched all around in the dark, but could not find the road. There were no houses there. The men were getting nervous so Huyan Zhuo shouted an order for a general retreat. They had only gone about a hundred steps when they heard drums beaten on all sides around them in the dark. Soon there were sounds of men shouting, and torches were lit all around them. Chao Gai and his men had not gone much farther when they met a body of men who discharged arrows at them. One of these hit Chao Gai in the face, and he fell off his horse. Five of the leaders lifted Chao Gai on to his horse again, and retreated. Lin Chong who had half the men in reserve saw the light, and heard the drums, and at once ordered an advance of his men. The fight continued during the night. Orders were not given for a general retreat to their camp until daybreak.
In camp Chao Gai was bleeding badly from the wound in his face, and Lin Chong applied a medicine to the wound. They examined the arrow, and found on it the name of Shi Wengong. They did not notice however that it was a poisonous arrow. A cart was obtained, and in this Chao Gai was sent back to Liangshan Marsh with an escort.
The leaders left behind held a conference. The general opinion was that the mishap to Chao Gai's flag when they started on the expedition was an omen, and now that Chao Gai was wounded they had better stop operations against the village and wait until Song Jiang's order for withdrawal. They were still in a nervous condition when a scout arrived, and reported that a large body of men with numerous torches was advancing towards the camp by five different roads. Upon going outside they saw torchlights on the hills all around their camp. Lin Chong suggested that they must not fight again in the dark, and this being agreed to, orders were issued for camp to be struck, and an orderly retreat to be undertaken. As the opposing army came up a general rear-guard fight took place as the bandits retreated step by step. They retreated about twenty //before the army of the Zengs stopped pursuit. Now the leaders saw that they had only about six hundred men left, all the rest having been captured, wounded, or killed. They went on towards Liangshan Marsh where they duly arrived.
There they found that Chao Gai was much worse, his body having swollen considerably, and he was no longer capable of either eating or drinking. Song Jiang stayed by the bedside attending to his chief, and about midnight the latter spoke, "Do not be surprised at what I am going to say. I wish that the person who captures the man who shot me with that arrow, should become chief of our men in my place." As soon as he had said this he died. All the leaders heard Chao Gai's will. After Chao Gai's death the leaders decided to ask Song Jiang to become their chief. A general meeting took place in the General Assembly Hall with Lin Chong in the chair. He opened the proceeding, "In the state and family a single day cannot pass without an Emperor or master respectively. Chao Gai has gone to Heaven, so that our affairs are now without a chief. We think that you, our elder brother, Song Jiang, should now fill the vacant position, and as tomorrow is a lucky day we propose to install you as our chief."
Song Jiang replied, "Upon his death-bed our chief Chao Gai told me that he wished the post be given to the man who would capture Shi Wengong. The death-dealing arrow is still there so how can we forget his dying command? We have not yet avenged the injury so how can we make any other arrangement?"
"Nobody has yet captured the enemy and carried out Chao Gai's command," said Wu Yong, "but still we cannot remain any longer without a chief. There is nobody here equal to you so we cannot appoint anyone else. We are all intimately known to you, and nobody would object to your order. We request you to occupy the post at least temporarily, and we can talk the matter over again at some future date."
"Your arguments are well reasoned," replied Song Jiang, "and I will agree to your proposal. But should any one if you capture Shi Wengong that man must be our chief."
"Elder brother," interposed Li Kui, "you need not talk of being chief here, because you would be ideal as the Emperor of the Song Dynasty!"
Song Jiang was angry and said, "If you talk of that nonsense again I shall have your tongue cut off."
"I did not ask you to be our chief," replied Li Kui. "I said you should be the Emperor and yet you want to cut off my tongue!"
"This man does not understand how affairs should be conducted," said Wu Yong. "We need not regard his sayings, but proceed with our business."
Wu Yong and Lin Chong stepped forward, and assisted Song Jiang to the chair placed in the central position, and there he took his seat.
The leaders on both sides saluted their new chief, and then also took their seats.
Song Jiang spoke, "Today I temporarily occupy this position, and beg for your support. We must be united, and work together as one body. We have all been appointed our work by Heaven. Now our forces are very great, and I propose to divide same into six parts so that we can live in six strongholds. I propose to rename this hall as the Loyalty and Justice Hall. On the four sides of it will be four big fortresses. Behind it will be two small fortresses. In front will be three strategic barriers with a fortress on the lake and two fortresses on the shores." He then divided the leaders into six parts, and gave them their respective new positions. Everything worked smoothly under the new arrangements, and during the hundred days of mourning for Chao Gai all new buildings were completed.
One day a traveling monk was passing near Liangshan Marsh, and the leaders asked him to stay at their stronghold and assist in the memorial prayers for Chao Gai. His name was Dayuan, and he came from the Longhua Monastery in the Northern Capital, Daming. One day Song Jiang asked him for the news of the Northern Capital, and in reply the monk said, "Sir, have you not heard about the 'Jade Qilin' at the Northern Capital?"
"I am so forgetful of affairs," replied Song Jiang. "It is true that in Daming Prefecture there is an official named Lu Junyi who has a nickname, 'Jade Qilin.' He has a very good reputation. His military skill is good, and in use of spear is unexcelled in the land. If we could get him to join us I should feel satisfied."
Wu Yong laughed at this and said, "Elder brother, how is it that you have not more confidence in your present staff? If however you want him here it is easy to get him to come."
"He is the leading literary scholar of the Northern Capital," replied Song Jiang. "How can we induce him to come here?"
"I often thought of bringing him here," said Wu Yong, "but owing to other affairs I forgot about him. I will find a means of getting him to join us."
"Your reputation as a Clever Star rests upon a firm foundation," said Song Jiang. "But how can you induce him to join us here?" Wu Yong then explained his plans in detail.

The Professor Wu Yong Schemes to trap the Jewelled Qilin & Cleverly Tricks the Jade Unicorn; White Eel Zhang Shun at Night Roils, Upsets a Boat, & fights at Golden Sands Crossing Landing Bank

"With the aid of this facile three-inch tongue of mine, I shall go fearlessly to the Northern Capital and persuade Lu Junyi to come to our mountain," Wu Yong avowed. "It will be as easy as taking something out of a bag. You just put your hand in and you've got it. All I need is a rough courageous companion to go with me."
Before he had finished speaking, Li Kui the Black Whirlwind shouted: "Take me, brother Military Advisor."
"Desist, brother," Song Jiang cried. "If someone was needed for arson or murder, pillaging homes or raiding towns, you would be just right. This is a careful delicate operation. You're much too violent."
"You all scorn me because I'm ugly. That's why you won't let me go."
"It's not that. Daming is full of police. If anyone should recognize you, you'd be finished."
"That doesn't matter. No one is better suited for what the Military Advisor wants."
Wu Yong intervened. "I'll take you if you'll promise me three things. If you don't, you'll just have to stay here in the stronghold."
"I'll promise you not three, but thirty!"
"First, you're like wildfire when you're drunk. From today on, you've got to quit drinking. You can begin again when we get back. Second, you'll go as a Taoist acolyte serving me. When I tell you to do something, you do it. Third—and this is the most difficult—starting tomorrow you're not to say another word, you're to become a mute. If you promise these three things, I'll take you along."
"I can promise not to drink, and to act like an acolyte. But if I can't talk, I'll stifle!"
"If you open your mouth you'll get us into a muddle."
"Of course, it's easy. I'll keep a copper coin in my mouth. That'll do it."
The chieftains laughed. Who could persuade Li Kui to remain behind?
That day a farewell feast was given in Loyalty Hall. In the evening, all retired. Early the next morning Wu Yong gathered a bundle of luggage and directed Li Kui, disguised as an acolyte, to tote it down the mountain on a carrying-pole. Song Jiang and the other chieftains saw them as far as the Shore of Golden Sands. They urged Wu Yong to be careful, and to keep Li Kui out of scrapes. Wu Yong and Li Kui took their leave. The others returned to the stronghold.
The two travelled four or five days, stopping at inns in the evening and rising at daybreak, when they cooked breakfast and continued their journey. Li Kui was a constant irritation to Wu Yong. After several days, they arrived at an inn on the outskirts of the city. They spent the night there, and when Li Kui went down to the kitchen to cook their evening meal he hit the waiter so hard the fellow coughed blood.
The waiter went to their room and complained to Wu Yong. "That mute acolyte of yours is too rough, I was just a little slow in lighting the stove and he gave such a punch I spit blood!"
Wu Yong apologized and handed the man a dozen strings of cash for his pains. He berated Li Kui. Of that we'll say no more.
They rose the next morning at dawn, cooked breakfast and ate. Wu Yong summoned Li Kui to the room.

"You pleaded to be taken along, and all you do is aggravate me. We're going into the city today. It's no place for fooling around. I don't want you to cost me my life!"
"I wouldn't dare!"
"Now remember this signal. If I shake my head, you're not to move."
Li Kui promised. The two left the inn and set out for the city in disguise. Wu Yong wore a black crinkled silk head kerchief that came down to his eyebrows, a black Taoist cassock trimmed in white, and a multicolored girdle. His feet were shod in square-toed cloth shoes, and he carried a pole with a bronze bell which shone like gold. Li Kui's bristly brown hair was wound up into two coils on either side of his head. His black tiger body was clad in a short brown gown. A multicolored short-fringed sash bound his bear-like waist. He wore a pair of open-work boots for climbing mountains. On a pole with a curved end a strip of paper dangled, reading: "Fortunes told. One ounce of silver." At that time robbers marauded throughout the land, and every prefecture and county had to be defended by troops. Since the Northern Capital was the leading city in Hebei, it was garrisoned by an army under the personal command of Governor Liang. It was a neatly laid out metropolis.
Wu Yong and Li Kui swaggered up to the gate. The forty or fifty soldiers on guard were gathered around an officer seated in a chair. Wu Yong approached and bowed.
"Where are you from, scholar?" one of the soldiers asked.
"My name is Zhang Yong. This is Li, my acolyte. I'm a wandering caster of horoscopes. I've come to this great city to tell fortunes." Wu Yong produced his false license and showed it to the soldier. "That acolyte has wicked eyes," some of the other soldiers said. "Shifty, like a thief."
Li Kui, who overheard, was ready to burst into action. Wu Yong hastily shook his head, and Li Kui lowered his gaze.
"It's a long story," Wu Yong said apologetically. "He's a deaf mute, but he's terribly strong. He's the son of one our family's bondmaids. I had to take him along. He has no manners at all. Please forgive him."
Wu Yong strolled on through the gate, with Li Kui plodding at his heels. They walked towards the center of the city. Wu Yong rang his bell and chanted:

Gan Luo won fame early, Zi Ya late,
Peng Zu and Yan Hui, each a different life span,
Fan Dan was poor, Shi Chong rich,

"Fortune, destiny, fate. I predict life, I foretell death, I know who shall rise high and who shall fall low," cried Wu Yong. "I'll tell your future for one ounce of silver." Once more he vigorously rang his bell.
Fifty or sixty laughing children trailed behind. Singing and giggling, they passed the gate of Magnate Lu's storehouse. Soon Wu Yong returned and marched by again, followed by the hooting youngsters.
Lu was seated in the office, watching his stewards check merchandise in and out. Hearing the noise, he asked the man in charge for the day: "What's all that racket outside?"
"It's really very funny," the man replied. "Some Taoist fortune teller from out of town is walking the streets offering his services. But he wants an ounce of silver. Who would give that much! With him is an acolyte, a sloppy looking fellow who walks like nothing human. Kids are following them and laughing."
"He wouldn't venture to make such large claims if he wasn't a man of learning. Invite him in."
The steward went out. "Sir priest," he called. "The magnate asks you in."
"Who is he?"
"The magnate Lu Junyi."
Wu Yong told Li Kui to come along, raised the door curtain, and entered the office. He instructed Li Kui to sit down on a goose-necked chair and wait. Then he approached Lu and bowed.
Lu bowed in return. "Where are you from, sir priest? What is your name?"
"My name is Zhang Yong. I call myself the Mouth That Talks of Heaven. I'm from Shandong, originally. I can cast horoscopes for emperors. I can predict births and deaths, high position or poverty. For an ounce of silver I can tell your fortune."
Lu invited Wu Yong to a small alcove in the rear of the hall. They seated themselves as host and guest. After tea was served, Lu ordered the steward to bring an ounce of silver.
"Please, sir priest, tell me my humble fate."
"When were you born?"
"A gentleman asks only about misfortune, not fortune. So you needn't talk of prosperity. Just tell me what else is in store," said Lu. "I'm thirty-two." He stated the year, month, day and hour of his birth.
Wu Yong took out an iron abacus, calculated a moment, then slammed it down. "Fantastic!" he exclaimed.
Startled, Lu demanded: "What lies ahead for me?"
"I'll tell you frankly, if you won't take it amiss."
"Point out the road to the lost traveller, sir priest. Speak freely."
"Within the next hundred days, bloody tragedy will strike. Your family wealth will be lost, and you will die at the sword."
Lu Junyi laughed. "You're wrong, sir priest. I was born in the Northern Capital and grew up in a wealthy family. No male ancestor ever broke the law, no female widow ever remarried. I conduct my affairs with decorum, I do nothing unreasonable, I take no tainted money. How can I have incurred a bloody fate?"
Wu Yong's face hardened. He returned the silver piece, rose, and walked towards the door. "People always prefer to hear what pleases them," he sighed. "Forget it. I'm willing to point out a smooth road, but you take my good words as evil. I'll leave you now."
"Don't be angry, sir priest. I was only joking. I'd like to hear your instructions."
"If I speak directly, don't hold it against me."
"I'm listening carefully. Hold nothing back."
"Your fortune has always been good, magnate. But your horoscope conflicts with this year's fate god, and the result is evil. Within a hundred days, your head shall be separated from your body. This has been destined. There is no escape."
"Isn't there any way to avoid it?"
Wu Yong again calculated on the abacus. He said: "Only if you go to a place one thousand li southeast of here. Although you may suffer some shocks and alarms, you will not be injured."
"If you can arrange that, I'll gladly reward you!"
"I'll tell you a four line prediction verse. You must write it on the wall. When it comes true, you'll appreciate my mystic powers."
Lu called for a brush pen and ink slab. Wu Yong sang these four lines and Lu wrote them on the white calcimined wall:

A boat sails through the reeds,
At dusk a hero wanders by,
Righteous to the very end,
Out of trouble you must fly.

Wu Yong collected his abacus, bowed and turned to go. Lu Junyi urged him to stay, at least until the afternoon.
"Thank you for kindness," said Wu Yong, "but I must get on with my fortune telling. I'll come and pay my respects another day."
Lu saw him to the gate. Li Kui took up the pole with the curved end and went out. Wu Yong bid Lu farewell. Followed by Li Kui, he departed from the city and returned to the inn. There he paid their bill and collected his luggage. Li Kui carried the fortune telling sign.
"The main job has been done," Wu Yong exulted, after they had left the inn. "Now we must hurry back to the stronghold and prepare our welcome for Lu Junyi. Sooner or later, he'll come."

To return to Lu Junyi, every evening at dusk he stood in front of his hall and gazed unhappily at the sky, sometimes muttering unintelligibly to himself. One day he impatiently summoned his stewards. Before long, they all arrived.
The chief steward was named Li Gu. Originally from the Eastern Capital, he had come to join a friend living in Daming. But the man was nowhere to be found and, after a time, Li Gu fell, frozen, outside the magnate's gate. Lu Junyi saved his life and took him into the household. Because Li Gu was diligent, could write and calculate, Lu put him in charge of household affairs. Within five years he rose to the post of chief steward. He managed all matters of both household and outside business, and had forty or fifty clerks working under him.
These now followed Li Gu into the hall and respectfully greeted the magnate. Lu looked them over and asked: "Where is that man of mine?"
The words were scarcely out of his mouth, when a person came before him. Over six feet tall, he was twenty-four or -five years of age, was adorned with a thin mustache and goatee, and had a slim waist and broad shoulders. The kerchief on his head was twisted into the shape of a papaya, with his hair coming up through a hole in the middle. His white gown had a round silk collar of filagreed silver thread. Around his waist was a girdle woven of fine spotted red thread. His feet were shod in brown oiled leather boots. A pair of gold rings shaped like animals dangled from the back of his head. His neckerchief was of fragrant silk. A fan inscribed by a famous calligrapher was tucked slantwise at his waist. Over one ear hung an all-season flower.
The young man was a native of the Northern Capital. After losing his parents as a child, he had been adopted by the Lu family. Because he had pure white skin, Lu engaged a skilled tattooist to decorate his body. The result was kingfisher blue added to white jade. No one could match the young man in beauty of physique. Not only was he gorgeously tattooed, but he could blow and strum musical instruments, sing and dance, and play word games. There was nothing he didn't know, nothing he couldn't do.
He could speak various dialects, knew the special jargon of many different trades. As for the fighting arts, no one could touch him. Hunting in the outskirts of the city, he could bring down any game with his bow. He used only three short arrows, and never missed. Wherever his arrow struck, there his quarry fell. Returning to the city in the evening, he seldom brought back less than a hundred birds. In archery contests, he cleaned up all the prizes.
His mind, too, was quick and agile. You had only to mention a problem and he gave you the answer. His name was Yan Qing. People of the Northern Capital were fond of quips, and they called him the Prodigy. He was Lu Junyi's most trusted adviser.
The men Lu summoned greeted him respectfully and stood in two lines. Li Gu headed the line on the left, Yan Qing headed the line on the right. Lu the Magnate addressed them.
"Last night a fortune teller predicted that unless I took refuge a thousand li southeast of here, I would suffer a bloody disaster within a hundred days. I remember now that southeast of here in Tai'an Prefecture, there's a temple on Mount Taishan called the Golden Temple of the Match-Heaven God. This god governs births and deaths and man's disasters. I shall go there and burn incense to expiate my sins and avoid the calamity. At the same time I can do a bit of business and admire the scenery. Li Gu, I want you to get me ten large carts and load them with our Shandong local products. Pack your luggage, because you're going with me. Yan Qing, you stay and look after the household and our storehouses. Li Gu will turn over his duties to you. I'm leaving in three days."
"Master, you're making a mistake," said Li Gu. "Everybody knows fortune tellers are slick talkers. You shouldn't listen to that fellow's claptrap. Remain at home. What's there to be afraid of?"
"My fate has been determined. Don't try to stop me. Once disaster strikes, it's too late to be sorry."
"Please listen to my humble opinion, master," said Yan Qing. "The road to Tai'an runs pass Liangshan Marsh, which is infested with bandits under Song Jiang. Though they rob and pillage, government soldiers and police can't get near them. Wait until times are more settled, if you want to burn incense. Don't believe that fortune teller's wild story. He's probably a plant from Mount Liangshan, sent to stir you up so that they can trick you into joining them. It's too bad I wasn't home last night. With two or three phrases I could have exposed the fellow and made him a laughing stock."
"You're both talking rot. Who would dare to deceive me! Those oafs in Liangshan Marsh—what do they matter? I can scatter them like grass, in fact I'll go and nab them. My prowess with weapons will show them what a real man is like!"
Before he had finished speaking, a woman emerged from behind a screen. It was his wife Jia.
"Husband," she said, "I've been listening to what you've been saying. 'Better to stay at home than even one li roam,' as the old saw goes. Ignore that fortune teller. Why put your vast family affairs aside and expose yourself to shocks and alarms in a den of tigers and lair of dragons just to do some business? Stay at home, be calm and content, relax quietly, and naturally nothing will go wrong."
"You don't know anything about it, woman! My mind is made up. I don't want to hear any more from any of you!"
Yan Qing said: "Basking in the reflection of your good fortune, master, I have been able to learn a little skill with weapons. I don't mean to boast, but if you take me with you and any bandits happen along, I should be able to knock off forty or fifty. Leave Chief Steward Li to look after things at home and let me accompany you."
"Li Gu knows trade practices I don't understand. He'll save me a lot of trouble. That's why I'm taking him and leaving you here. I have others to keep the accounts. All you have to do is take charge of the manor."
"My feet have been bothering me quite a lot lately," said Li Gu. "It's hard for me to walk any distance."
Lu was very angry. "Soldiers are trained for months for the sake of a few days of battle. I want you to go with me on this trip, and you've got all kinds of excuses. The next man who defies me is going to get a taste of my fists!"
Li Gu, frightened, looked towards the mistress. But she only walked sadly into an inner room. Yan Qing was even less inclined to speak.
Silently swallowing his humiliation, Li Gu went to pack the luggage. He got ten drivers, ten large carts, and forty or fifty animals to haul them. He loaded on the luggage, and had the merchandise securely tied in place.
Lu Junyi put his own affairs in order. The third day, he burned paper prayers, dispersed money to the male and female members of his family, and gave instructions to each. That evening he directed Li Gu to finish up quickly and prepare to leave the city first with two servants. Li Gu went off. The magnate's wife, seeing the carts, wept.
At the fifth watch the following morning, Lu rose, washed, and put on a complete set of new clothes. He gathered his weapons and went to the rear hall, where he burned incense in farewell to his ancestors. He instructed his wife: "Take good care of things at home. At the latest I'll be back in three months; at the earliest, only forty or fifty days."
"Be careful on the road, husband. Write to us when you can, so that we'll know how you're getting on."
Yan Qing came forward and bowed, in tears. Lu had orders for him as well.
"Be diligent in all things. Don't go running off to roister in houses of pleasure."
"Since you'll be away, master, I certainly won't slacken."
Staff in hand, Lu left the city. He was met by Li Gu.
"You and the two servants go on ahead," Lu directed. "When you find a clean inn have them prepare food, so that it's ready for the drivers and porters when they get there, and we won't be delayed."
Li Gu also carried a staff. He set off with the two servants. Lu and other servants followed with the carts. They passed splendid mountains and elegant waterways, travelling broad roads and level plains.
"I couldn't have enjoyed such scenery if I remained at home," Lu thought pleasurably.
After travelling forty li or more he was met by Li Gu, and they had a pastry lunch. Li Gu went on again. Another forty or fifty li and they reached an inn, where Li Gu had arranged quarters for the night for all.
Lu went to his room, leaned his staff, hung up his felt hat, removed his knife, and changed his shoes and stockings. It goes without saying that he rested and dined. The company rose early the next morning and cooked breakfast. When everyone had eaten, the animals were hitched to the carts and the march resumed.
They proceeded in this manner for several days, stopping at dark and continuing at dawn. Again, they put up at an inn for the night. The following morning they were preparing to go on when one of the waiters addressed Lu Junyi.
"I must tell you, sir, that less than twenty li from here the road passes an entry to Liangshan Marsh. The lord of the mountain is Song Jiang. Although he doesn't harm travellers, rather than suffer frights and alarms it's best to go by quietly."
"So that's how it is," Lu exclaimed. He told a servant to fetch his trunk. Lu unlocked it and took out a bundle from which he extracted four white silk banners. He ordered the waiter to bring four bamboo poles and attach the banners, one to each. On them, Lu wrote this series of lines:

From the Northern Capital Lu the Bold
Transports merchandise a long, long way,
Determined is he to catch the robbers,
Fully his manliness to display.

Li Gu and the others groaned. "Are you a relative of Song the mountain lord, sir?" asked the waiter.
"I'm a magnate from the Northern Capital. What relation would I be to those crooks! I've come specially to nab that lout Song Jiang."
"Speak softly, sir," begged the waiter. "Don't get me involved. This is no joke. Even with ten thousand men, you'll never get near Song Jiang!"
"Bullshit. You oafs are probably all in cahoots with him!"
The waiter was beside himself with despair. The drivers and porters were dumbfounded. Li Gu and the other servants knelt at the magnate's feet.
"Master, have pity on us. Save our lives, go back. Rather that than prayers for our departed souls!"
"What do you know!" Lu barked. "Would those little finches dare contend with an eagle? I've always wanted to show my prowess with arms, but I've never met a foe worthy. Today, I have my chance, here and now. Why wait! In those bags on my cart I've got some good hemp rope. The bandits I don't kill I'll knock down with my halberd. You tie them up and put them on the carts. If necessary abandon the merchandise. We'll use the carts for transporting prisoners. I'll deliver their chief to the capital and claim the reward. That will satisfy my wish of a lifetime. If a single one of you refuses to go along with me now, I'll slaughter you right here!"

The four banners were affixed to the four leading carts. The remaining six carts followed. Li Gu and the rest, weeping and sniveling, had no choice but to obey the magnate. Lu took out a halberd head and tied it to his staff tightly with three strong knots. He hastened the carts forward in the direction of Liangshan Marsh. Li Gu trembled with every step he took on the winding mountain road, but Lu pushed on relentlessly.

They marched from early morning till almost noon. In the distance they saw a big forest, with trees larger than a two-man embrace. When they reached the edge of the forest a shrill whistle pierced the air, terrifying Li Gu and the two servants. They didn't know where to hide.

Lu Junyi ordered that the carts be pulled to one side, under guard. The drivers and porters, bemoaning their fate, crawled beneath the carts. "When I knock the robbers down, you tie them up," Lu shouted. Before the words were out of his mouth, four or five hundred outlaws emerged from the edge of the forest. Behind them the crashing of gongs could be heard. Another four or five hundred brigands cut off Lu's retreat. Cannon boomed in the woods, and out leaped a bold warrior.

"Do you recognize the mute acolyte, Magnate Lu?" he called, brandishing a pair of axes.

Lu suddenly understood. "I've often thought of capturing you robbers," he cried, "and I'm here today to do it. Bring that knave Song Jiang down the mountain to surrender. Any tricks and I'll kill you all. I won't spare a one!"

Li Kui laughed. "Magnate, you've fallen for a clever ruse by our Military Advisor. Come and take your place in a chieftain's chair."

Enraged, Lu twisted his halberd and charged. Li Kui met him with axes swinging. Before they had fought three rounds Li Kui jumped from the combat circle, turned, and headed for the forest. Lu pursued, halberd level. Li Kui ran into the wood, zigzagging left and right. In a towering fury, Lu plunged in after him. Li Kui flew into a grove of pines. By the time Lu got there, his adversary was gone.

He was turning away when a group of men appeared from the side of the grove and a voice called: "Don't go, Magnate. Do you know me?"

Lu looked and saw a big fat monk, dressed in a black cassock and carrying an iron Buddhist staff by its lower end.

"Who are you, monk?" the magnate shouted.

The man laughed. "I'm Lu Zhishen the Tattooed Monk. I'm here on orders from brother Song Jiang to welcome you and lead you up the mountain."

"Bald donkey," Lu exploded, "how dare you be so rude!" Twisting his halberd, he rushed the monk.

Zhishen met him with whirling staff. Before they had fought three rounds, the monk parried Lu's halberd, turned and ran. Lu gave chase. At that moment Wu Song the Pilgrim stepped forth from among the brigands. He charged, brandishing two swords. Lu abandoned his pursuit of Zhishen and battled with Wu Song. They had fought less than three rounds when the Pilgrim hastened away.

Lu Junyi laughed. "I won't chase you. You louts aren't worth it!"

But then someone on the mountain slope called out: "You don't understand, Magnate. Haven't you heard that man fears falling into the water, just as iron fears falling into the fire? Our Military Advisor has made his plan. How can you escape?"

"Who are you, rogue?" Lu yelled.

The man laughed. "Liu Tang the Red-Haired Demon."

"Petty crook, don't try to get away," the magnate fumed. He dashed at Liu, halberd in hand.

They had just battled three rounds when a voice off at an angle shouted: "Gallant Mu Hong the Unrestrained is here!" And Liu Tang and Mu Hong, each with a halberd, attacked Lu Junyi.

Before they had gone three rounds, Lu heard footsteps behind him. "At you!" he exclaimed. Liu Tang and Mu Hong fell back a few paces, and Lu whirled to face the adversary in his rear. It was Li Ying the Heaven-Soaring Eagle. From three sides Lu's foes assailed him. But he was completely unruffled, in fact the more he fought the stronger he became.

As they were belaboring each other, gongs crashed on the mountain top. The three chieftains feinted with their weapons and swiftly withdrew. Reeking of sweat from his exertions, Lu did not pursue. He returned to the edge of the forest to seek his carts and drivers. But the ten carts, their drivers and all the animals had vanished. Lu groaned.

He clambered to a high point and looked around. Far in the distance at the foot of a slope he saw a group of brigands driving the carts and animals before them. Li Gu and the others, tied in a line, followed. To the beat of drums and gongs, they were being led to a grove of pines.

Lu's heart burst into flames, rage engulfed him like smoke. Halberd in hand, he chased after the procession. When he was not far from the slope two bold fellows shouted at him: "Where do you think you're going?" One was Zhu Tong the Beautiful Beard, the other Lei Heng the Winged Tiger.

"Small-time robbers," Lu yelled back. "Return my carts and drivers and animals!"

Zhu Tong twiddled his beard and laughed. "How can you be so dense, Magnate? Our Military Advisor often says: 'A star can only fly down, it can never fly back.' The way things stand, you might just as well come with us to the fortress and take your place in a chieftain's chair."

Infuriated, Lu charged the two with levelled halberd. Zhu Tong and Lei Heng met him with their own weapons. Before they had fought three rounds the former constables turned and fled.

"I'll never get my carts back unless I knock one of those bandits over," thought Lu. He pursued them recklessly around the bend of the slope. But the two had vanished. Instead, he heard the sound of clappers and flutes wafting down from the mountain top. He looked up. Fluttering in the breeze was an apricot yellow pennant on which was embroidered the words: Righteous Deeds on Heaven's Behalf. And there beyond, beneath a gold-spangled red silk umbrella, was Song Jiang, with Wu Yong to his left and Gongsun Sheng to his right. They were accompanied by a column of sixty or seventy men. All politely hailed Lu Junyi.

"Magnate, we trust you've been well!"

Lu grew very angry, and he cursed them by name. Wu Yong tried to soothe him.

"Calm yourself, brother. Song Jiang has long known of your virtue, and holds you in the greatest respect. He sent me to call at your gates and lure you up the mountain so that we might perform righteous deeds for Heaven together. Please don't take it amiss."

"Presumptuous bandits," yelled Lu. "How dare you trick me!"

From behind Song Jiang emerged Hua Rong with bow and arrow. "Magnate," he called, "don't force a showdown between us. Let me demonstrate my archery."

Before he had finished speaking, the arrow whizzed straight into the big red tassel atop Lu's broad-brimmed felt hat. Astonished, the magnate turned and fled. On the heights, drums shook the ground. From the east side of the mountain, led by Qin Ming the Thunderbolt and Panther Head Lin Chong, came a body of yelling mounted men, banners waving. A similar troop, also shouting and waving banners, charged out from the west side of the mountain, led by Two Rods Huyan Zhuo and Metal Lancer Xu Ning. Lu was so frightened he didn't know which way to go.

It was growing dark. Lu's feet hurt, and he was hungry. Frantically seeking an escape route, he hurried along a small mountain path. At dusk, mist veiled the distant waters, fog locked the deep mountains. The moon and stars were dim, the vegetation a pale blur. Lu was reaching the ends of the earth, if not the limits of the sky.

He looked around. There was nothing but reeds here, and misty water. Lu raised his face to the sky and sighed. "I wouldn't listen to good advice, and now I'm in a terrible mess!"

A small boat slid out from among the reeds, sculled by a fisherman. "You're very brave, sir traveller," the fisherman called. "This is the entry to Liangshan Marsh. What are you doing here in the middle of the night?"

"I've lost my way and can't find a place to spend the night. Save me!"

"This region is very broad, but there is a market town. It's over thirty li if you go by land, and the road is tortuous and difficult to follow. By water, though, it's only four or five li. Give me ten strings of cash and I'll take you there in my boat."

"Get me to an inn in the market town and I'll give you plenty of silver."

The fisherman rowed up to the shore and helped Lu on board, then shoved off with his iron-tipped bamboo pole. When they had gone four or five li, they heard the sound of an oar in the reeds ahead. A small craft flew out. On it were two men. The one in the prow, buff naked, gripped a long punting pole. The one in the stern was wielding a sweep oar. Pole held athwart, the man forward sang this song:

Though poems and books I cannot read,
And in Liangshan Marsh I dwell,
I shoot fierce tigers with snarebows and arrows,
Fresh baited hooks bring me fish as well.

Lu Junyi, startled, didn't dare utter a sound. From reeds on the right, two more men rowed out on another small boat. The man in the stern plied a creaking sweep oar. The man in the bow held horizontally a long punting pole. He sang this song:

My favorite pastime is killing men,
A rogue I've been since the day I was born,
Thousands in gold means nothing to me,
I'm determined to nab the Jade Unicorn.

Lu the Magnate groaned. Now, from the middle reeds a third boat came skimming towards him. The man in the prow was holding an iron-tipped wooden pole upside down, and he was singing this song:

A boat sails through the reeds,
At dusk a hero wanders by,
Righteous to the end.
Out of trouble you must fly.

The men on all three craft hailed Lu respectfully. The one in the center was Ruan the Second. Ruan the Fifth was on the boat to the left, Ruan the Seventh was on the boat to the right. The three craft approached. Lu was very alarmed. He knew he couldn't swim.

"Land me on the nearest shore," he urged the fisherman.

The man laughed. "By the blue sky above and the green waters below, I was born on the Xunyang River, came to Liangshan Marsh, and have never concealed my name. Meet Li Jun the Turbulent River Dragon! If you don't surrender, Magnate, you'll be throwing your life away!"

Lu was astonished. "It's either you or me!" he shouted.

He lunged at Li's heart with his halberd. Li saw the blade coming. Hands on the sweep oar, he flipped over in a back somersault and landed ka-plonk in the water. The boat spun around in a circle and the halberd fell overboard. Suddenly, at the stern, a man shot up from under the water with a shout. It was White Streak in the Waves Zhang Shun. Treading water, he grasped the rudder and gave a quick twist. The boat turned turtle, and the hero landed in the drink. Could he live through this? Truly, a plan had been laid to catch a phoenix and cage a dragon, a pit had been dug for a heaven-startling, earth-shaking man.

Now when that monk from the Glorious Dragon Temple happened to mention the Jade Unicorn, the Professor boasted: "I can easily go to the Northern Capital and get him to come here, just by using the persuasive powers of this little tongue of mine. It would be easy as falling off a log. All I'd need is a bold companion to go with me."

Before he had finished speaking, Iron Ox shouted out: "Professor, my dear friend, take me along with you!"

Song Jiang said sternly: "Absolutely not, brother, you'll stay here! For killing and arson, for plunder and pillage, for looting and destruction, you're the one we'll employ. But this is delicate business, you've not got the temperament for it. You're not to go."

"You all despise me, because you think I'm ugly," Iron Ox complained. "That's why you won't let me."

"We don't despise you," Song Jiang said. "But just now the capital will be packed with police. If you were to get caught you'd simply have thrown your life away for nothing."

"I don't care!" said Iron Ox. "I still want to go along with him."

The Professor said: "I'll take you with me if you'll obey three conditions. If you're not prepared to do as I say, you'd better stay here in the stronghold."

"Not only three, I'd obey thirty conditions!" cried Iron Ox.

"First condition: when you drink you blaze up like fire, so from today you've got to cut out drinking, no wine till we get back again. Second condition: you'll dress for this trip as a Taoist acolyte, my disciple, and if I call you, you must come immediately. Third condition — this is the hardest: from tomorrow you're not to speak a word, you're to pretend to be dumb. If you accept these three conditions, I'll take you."

"The bit about not drinking and dressing as a Taoist acolyte is all right. But to make me keep my mouth shut and not say anything, that'll kill me!"

"If you open your mouth, you're bound to stir things up," said the Professor.

"All right then," said Iron Ox. "I'll put a copper coin in my mouth, that'll do it!"

"Dear friend," said Song Jiang. "If you're really determined to go, you mustn't blame me if anything goes wrong."

"Of course, of course," said Iron Ox. "I'll be taking these two axes along. If the motherfuckers give me any trouble I'll cut a thousand fucking heads off!"

Everyone laughed. It was quite impossible to dissuade him. A farewell banquet was held that same day in the Ceremonial Hall and everyone went to bed late. Early next morning the Professor packed his bag and told Iron Ox to get dressed up as a Taoist acolyte and carry the luggage down the mountain on a carrying-pole. Song Jiang and the others accompanied them as far as Golden Sands Landing. They warned the Professor many times to be careful, and to keep a tight rein on Iron Ox. Then the two travellers said goodbye and the rest returned to the stronghold.

So the Professor and Iron Ox headed towards the Northern Capital. They travelled four or five days, each day stopping late at an inn to sleep and early in the morning making their breakfast and taking to the road again. Iron Ox gave the Professor many a headache along the way.

Before long they reached the Northern Capital and found an inn just outside. In the evening when Iron Ox went to prepare food in the kitchen he gave the waiter such a beating he was spitting blood. The waiter went to complain to the Professor: "That attendant of yours, the fellow who can't speak, is really horrible. Just because I was a bit slow with lighting the fire, he beat me up. Coughing up blood, I was."

The Professor hastened to apologize and gave him ten strings of silver to get himself fixed up. And, it goes without saying, he told Iron Ox off. When Iron Ox got up and cooked food for them again in the morning, the Professor called him in and said sternly: "You insisted on coming, damn you, and you're a continual nuisance on this journey. But we're going into the city now, and that's no laughing matter. Please don't put my life in jeopardy!"

"Of course not, I wouldn't dream of it," Iron Ox replied.

The Professor said: "We must have a secret signal. If I nod it means I want you to stop whatever you're doing at once."

Iron Ox took note.

They put on their disguises at the inn and made their way into the city. The Professor wore a sweat-band of black crepe over his forehead, a black Taoist robe with white borders, and a multi-coloured girdle of the kind you see on the Immortal Lu Dongbin. He had blunt-toed shoes of black cloth and was also holding a staff with a gilded copper bell on the end. Iron Ox's brown hair, usually unkempt, was coiled on either side of his head and fixed with a bone pin, his swarthy frame was enveloped in a short brown cassock of rough cloth, his thick waist was girt with a coloured sash with a short fringe, and he wore a pair of light climbing boots on his feet. He carried a pole taller than his own height bearing a placard with the words: "One tael of silver to hear your fate and fortune."

When they were dressed, they locked the door of their room and headed for the south gate of the city. It was only a quarter of a mile or so before they saw the gates of the Northern Capital. What a sight!

The walls are high, the ramparts rugged, the moat broad and deep. Deers' antlers are planted all around, sharp tines are set on every side. The drumtowers are imposing, all bedecked with many-hued banners of silk. The battlements are flat and level, piled high with swords, lances, pikes and halberds. The coffers are overflowing, the citizenry flourishing. From courts to east and west music fills the heavens, shops to north and south are bursting with the goods that enrich earthly life. A thousand officials hold sway over the many-tiered city. A million of our people are dwelling in this land.

Now in those days many thieves and robbers roamed the world and every region, every province and district was strongly guarded. Especially here in the Northern Capital, the most important city of Hebei, defended by the garrison troops of Governor-General Liang: here one would naturally expect things to be well organized.

As the Professor and Iron Ox strolled up to the city gate, therefore, they found forty or fifty men guarding it, presided over by a seated officer. The Professor approached and bowed. One of the guards said: "Where have you come from, master?"

"My name is Zhang Yong," the Professor said. "This disciple of mine is called Li. I make my living among the rivers and lakes casting horoscopes. I am coming to the capital to tell fortunes." He took out his false certificate which he showed to the corporal.

Someone said: "That disciple's got a way of looking at you just like a bloody criminal!" Iron Ox was about to take offence at this, but the Professor gave a quick nod and Iron Ox hung his head. The Professor went up to the gatekeeper and said apologetically: "It's a long story. This disciple of mine is deaf and dumb, but he's got prodigious strength. He was brought up by my family and I have no choice but to take him with me. I am afraid he doesn't know the ways of the world. I beg you to forgive him!"

They bade farewell to the guards and went on their way, heading for the centre of town, Iron Ox striding behind with his head held high. The Professor was shaking his bell and intoning: "To some it comes early, to others late; to each is given a different date. You may end poor, you may get rich, come to me if you want to know which." From time to time he would say: "Come along then, hear your fate and fortune, all you want to know about births and deaths, noble and base. Just a tael of silver to know what lies ahead," and then he would give his bell a shake. Fifty or sixty urchins followed behind, making fun of him. They came thus to the gate of Mr. Lu's pawnshop, amid much song and laughter and toing and froing, the children in a great uproar.

Mr. Lu, the Jade Unicorn, happened to be sitting in front of his warehouse, watching his assistants checking in goods, when he heard this commotion in the street and asked the man in charge: "What's all the excitement for out there?"

The man replied: "It's a laugh, sir! There's this travelling fortune-teller in the street. He's asking a whole tael of silver to tell your fortune, but who's going to pay that much? And there's this really uncouth novice with him who walks like nothing on earth. The children are all running after them laughing."

The Unicorn said: "He must be a man of great learning or he wouldn't ask so much. Go and ask him to come in."

The employee dashed out and shouted: "Master, the boss wants to see you."

"Who wants to see me?" said the Professor.

"Mr. Lu asks you to come in," said the man.

The Professor turned back, with the acolyte at his heels. Drawing aside the curtain he went in and stopped before the hall. He ordered Iron Ox to sit on a little goose-necked chair and wait for him. Here is what met his eyes as he went on in:

Large, round eyes surmounted by clear eyebrows like a circumflex accent, a tall and upright stature, majestic bearing, god-like demeanour. The staff is his preferred weapon and in defensive technique he is indisputably a master. Of distinguished lineage, he inherits one of the most famous names in the capital. On the battlefield he will take on ten thousand horsemen, drive back a thousand infantry. Noble and generous he is, ever a defender of right. His talents are truly universal. This is Mr. Lu, known as the Unicorn.

The Professor made his obeisance, and the Unicorn bowed in return and asked: "May I ask where you are from, Master, and what is your name?"

The Professor said: "My name is Zhang Yong and my religious name is Heaven's Spokesman. My people are from Shandong and I know how to cast a horoscope according to the official rules. I can predict births and deaths, riches or poverty. If you will give me a tael of gold or silver, I will tell your fortune."

The Unicorn asked him to come inside and took him to a little pavilion at the back of the house where he gave him the seat of honour. When they had drunk tea he told the servant to bring a tael of silver, and after handing over the fee, asked if he might trouble the holy father to cast an eye on his life.

The Professor said: "Please let me have the day and month of your birth for the calculation."

The Unicorn said: "I would like to know the bad, not the good, Master. There's no need to go into anything about wealth and honours. I'd just like to know about present actions, that's all. My age is thirty-two ..." He went on to give the year, month, day and hour of his birth.

The Professor took out an iron abacus and placed it on the table. He did a few calculations, and then pushed the abacus away, crying in a loud voice: "Oh, my God!"

Somewhat taken aback, the Unicorn asked: "Is it something very good or bad?"

The Professor said: "Please excuse me if I speak bluntly."

The Unicorn said: "I ask for nothing else but to receive your directions. Please speak freely."

The Professor said: "According to your fortune, there is going to be some bloody event within the next hundred days; your wealth and property cannot protect you from violent death."

The Unicorn laughed at this. "You must have got it wrong, Master. I happened to be born in the Northern Capital. I grew up in a rich man's house. My ancestors were faultless citizens. Among my female relatives none was ever unprincipled enough to remarry. Besides all this, I always act circumspectly and never do anything unreasonable or risky. How can some event involving bloodshed be hanging over me?"

The Professor's face had changed; he had turned pale. He quickly picked up the money he had been given and handed it back. Then he stood up to leave. He said with a deep sigh: "Verily heaven flatters men with false hopes. Well, well! My warning is clear and straightforward. But if honest advice is to be construed as an evil intent, I beg to be excused!"

The Unicorn said: "Do not be angry Master. I was only joking. I do wish to hear what you have to tell me."

The Professor said: "Then please do not be offended if I speak plainly."

"I shall listen carefully. Please conceal nothing."

"With all respect then, you have until now been blessed with good fortune, but this year your stars are contrary and you must expect ill effects. Within the next hundred days there will be dead bodies and strange signs. This is predestined. It cannot be prevented."

The Unicorn said: "Is there not some way I can escape?"

The Professor made some more calculations on the abacus, before replying: "Only if you go to reside in the south-east. If you are beyond a radius of three hundred miles this catastrophe can be avoided. Although there are still some reasons for fear, there will be no serious physical danger."

The Unicorn said: "If I manage to avoid the trouble I shall be truly grateful."

The Professor said: "Four verses are relevant to your fate. I will tell them to you and you must write them on the wall. Later they will be confirmed and you can verify my clairvoyance."

The Unicorn called for a brush and ink in order to write on the whitewashed wall. The Professor recited these four verses: "Through the reeds a small boat steers. All of a sudden a hero appears. The loyal man must seek a way out. There's nothing to do but to turn about."

When the Unicorn had written all this down, the Professor picked up his abacus, bowed and prepared to leave. The Unicorn tried to persuade him to stay. "Won't you sit down for a little, Master," he said. "Leave in the afternoon."

"I am most obliged to you," the Professor said. "But I have other fortunes to tell. I will come and pay my respects another day." He rose to leave. The Unicorn saw him to the door. Iron Ox took up his staff and went out. The Professor bade farewell to the Unicorn and with Iron Ox in tow left the city. They returned to the inn, paid for their room and food, and packed their bags. Iron Ox carried the sign and as they left the inn the Professor said to him: "Good work! Now we must hurry back to the stronghold and complete our strategy, prepare a trap for the Unicorn. Because he will be coming, that's for sure!"

We shall say nothing of the Professor's and Iron Ox's return to the stronghold. Rather we shall turn to the Unicorn, who after having his fortune told felt extremely ill at ease. He simply could not sit still. He was of course another one of the stars, destined to join the company. Anyway, having heard those predictions, he couldn't stand it another day and told his servant to summon all his employees for a meeting to discuss the business. Soon they were all present, including the chief administrator, a fellow called Li Gu. This Li Gu was originally from the Eastern Capital. He had come to the north to stay with a friend whom he had not been able to find. The Unicorn had found him freezing to death outside his gate and had rescued him and looked after him. Seeing that he was conscientious and could write and do sums, he gave him a post in his business. Within five years he had promoted him to chief administrator. He was now responsible for the whole business both in the house and outside. Under him he had forty or fifty storekeepers. Everyone in the household called him Manager Li. On this occasion all the employees, great or small, followed Manager Li into the hall and saluted.

The Unicorn looked them over and said: "How is it a certain person is missing?"

The words were hardly out of his mouth when a man entered. He was a tall young man of about twenty-four or twenty-five, with a neat beard and moustache, very narrow-waisted and broad-shouldered. He wore a handkerchief on his head, formed into the shape of a papaya, and a white silk robe embroidered with silver thread. A red sash spotted like a spider circled his waist. He had brown boots of oiled leather. His hair was gathered at the back of his head by two gold rings shaped like animals and a scented scarf protected the back of his neck. A fan painted by a famous artist was stuck in his belt. At his temple he wore some seasonal flower.

This man was a native of the Northern Capital, whose parents had died when he was small. He had been brought up in the Unicorn's house. Because his skin was exceedingly white, the Unicorn had a tattoo artist tattoo him all over, from head to foot. The effect was like kingfisher blue inlay on a white marble pillar. For beauty of physique no one, no matter who, could compete with him. But he didn't only have physical beauty. He could play all kinds of musical instruments, sing and dance, he was brilliant at word games, there was nothing he couldn't do, nothing he didn't have knowledge of. He knew every dialect and understood the jargon of every profession. For physical dexterity no one surpassed him; he used a Sichuan bow and just three short arrows. When he went hunting in the surrounding countryside he never missed: the arrow always hit its mark and he would return to the city in the evening with hundreds of different kinds of birds. When an archery club held a competition you can be sure the prize would go to him. Moreover he was extremely smart, the kind of person who really knows his way around. His name was actually Yan Qing — just the one character for his given name — but people in the Northern Capital called him the Prodigy. A poem describes his qualities:

The lips are as if painted with vermilion, the eyes shining like lacquer, the features might be carved in jade. His courage is exceptional, his spirit vaulting, his intellectual endowment tremendous. His manners are natural and easy, he would be an ornament even to Mount Liang. When he sings the old airs his voice control is superb, he is naturally a great connoisseur of art, and in the groves of carnal pleasure he is always a leading player. On the drums he can produce a thunderous sound, the tone is clear and ringing when he plays the pipes, his conversation is philosophical and profound. His moves with the staff are impossible to read and with his fists and his flying kicks he can put four hundred troops to flight. All are envious of his powers: they call him the Prodigy.

Naturally this Prodigy was a trusted member of the Unicorn's household. He now entered the hall, gave a loud greeting and took the second place, so that Manager Li was standing on the left, the Prodigy on the right.

The Unicorn opened proceedings as follows: "I have just had my fortune told. I was informed that within the next hundred days some bloody event would occur, unless I leave home and take refuge more than three hundred miles away in the southeast. It has occurred to me that there is somewhere I can go in the southeast. That is where Mount Tai is, the Eastern Peak, the Temple of Divine Benevolence, where they help people who are caught up in catastrophes. In the first place I can go there and burn candles and incense to limit the danger and alleviate the effects. Secondly I can shelter there from this particular disaster. Thirdly I can do some trade and enjoy a change of scene. Manager Li, please find me ten wagons and load them up with Shandong goods. Then get your luggage packed because you're going travelling with me. Prodigy, you will look after the household. From today on you will hold the keys to the stores jointly with Manager Li. I want to start in three days' time."

Manager Li said: "You're making a mistake, Master. Have you forgotten the proverb, 'Fortunes are told to suit the hearer'? Don't listen to all that fortune-teller's nonsense. What danger can there be if you stay home?"

The Unicorn said: "My fate is preordained. Don't argue with me. If disaster should strike, it would be too late to do anything about it afterwards."

The Prodigy said: "My dear master, please hear me. If you take the road to Tai'an in Shandong, you have to pass by the Marshes of Mount Liang. Nowadays Song Jiang is there in the marshes, with a bunch of cutthroats who pillage and plunder; the government forces can't even get near them. If you want to go and burn incense, wait for a time of peace. Don't trust all that rot the fortune-teller told you yesterday. Who knows if he isn't a criminal from Mount Liang dressed up as a Taoist, come here to deceive you? I'm only sorry I wasn't at home yesterday. If I had been, I'd have put a question or two to that priest, and I bet we'd have had a few laughs."

The Unicorn said: "Stop talking nonsense. Who'd dare come here and play a trick like that on me? And as for that bunch of fools in the Marshes of Mount Liang, who gives a fig for them? I consider them a mere bagatelle. I've thought of going to arrest them myself. After all, everyone praises the skill I have acquired in martial arts. I'm known to be a magnificent fighter!"

Before he'd finished speaking, a woman made her appearance from behind a screen. This was the Unicorn's wife. She was twenty-five years of age and her name was Jia. They had been married five years. She now said: "Husband, I've been listening. There's an old saying: 'Even a mile away from home, is not as good as at home.' Don't listen to all that fortune-telling rubbish. Why abandon your vast business interests and go in fear and trepidation to trade in the tiger's den and the dragon's pool? You'd much better stay home and practise meditation to purify the mind and suppress desire, and live in peace and tranquillity, at one with nature."

The Unicorn said: "What would a woman know about it? It's better to believe something is true than ignore it. Disaster has always been man's best teacher. One must bear both good fortune and ill. Anyway, I've made up my mind, so all of you had better shut up!"

The Prodigy again said: "I live always in the shadow of your good fortune, Master. I too have learnt a few things about staff play. I don't want to boast, but I could help you if I went with you. If you happen to meet some bandits on the road, I could deal with forty or fifty of them. Why not leave Manager Li at home and let me serve you on the journey?"

The Unicorn said: "There are things about trading I don't understand, that's why I am taking Manager Li along. I need his knowledge; he is a great help to me. So I'm leaving you to look after the business. Someone else will keep the books, and you will only be in temporary command here."

Manager Li now said: "I'm afraid I've been having a bit of a problem with my feet lately. I definitely won't be able to walk very far."

The Unicorn blew up. "'Feed troops for a thousand days, you'll only get a morning's work out of them!'," he said. "I ask you to go travelling with me and all you can do is offer excuses. If anyone else tries to make difficulties he shall have a taste of my fists!"

Manager Li's face was ashen with fear and no one dared to say anything else. They parted thus.

Concealing his anger and holding his tongue, Manager Li went to prepare the luggage. He procured ten wagons and ten porters, around fifty draft animals, had the luggage loaded on and a number of bales of goods securely tied.

The Unicorn went to get dressed. On the third day he burnt offerings and distributed money in his household, giving to everyone, young and old, male and female. That evening he told Manager Li to get two servants, have everything packed up and leave the city. When Li was leaving, the Unicorn's wife saw the wagons and went away weeping. Next day at dawn the Unicorn rose, bathed himself, put on new clothes and breakfasted. He got offerings and went to the hall at the back to take leave of his ancestors and burn incense. Just before departing he exhorted his wife to take good care of the house and said he would be back in somewhere between forty days and three months.

"Go carefully," she said. "And write home often."

The Prodigy then prostrated himself.

"I leave you in charge here," the Unicorn said. "See that everything goes smoothly. Don't go out whoring and creating trouble."

"If you are going to be away, how could I possibly neglect my duty?" the latter said.

The Unicorn picked up his staff and left the city. When he met up with Manager Li, he said to him: "Take two companions and go on ahead. When you find a nice clean inn, prepare some food there and wait. When the wagons and porters catch up, we'll eat. That way we'll avoid wasting any time."

Manager Li went off staff in hand, with his two companions. The Unicorn and a number of servants followed behind, escorting the wagons. There was beautiful scenery, fine mountains, wide waters, a broad and level highway, and the Unicorn rejoiced at what he saw. "If I had stayed at home, I would have missed such sights!" he thought. After something over ten miles, Manager Li approached with some dim sum for lunch. After they had eaten, he again went on ahead. They did another fifteen miles or more, and then they came to an inn where Manager Li arranged accommodation for the whole caravan. The Unicorn entered the room, leant his staff against the wall, hung up his hat, took off his sword, and changed his shoes. Nothing need be said of that night's food and lodging. They were up very early next morning to make breakfast. When they had finished eating, the teams were harnessed to the wagons and they took to the road again.

So they went on, for several days, travelling till late in the evening, starting early. Then at one inn where they stayed, the waiter came to the Unicorn as they were about to set off in the morning and said: "I think as how I ought to let you know, sir, not ten miles from our inn here you'll pass by a road that leads to the Marshes of Mount Liang. Although Song Jiang, who's the chief of them up there on the mountain, doesn't usually harm travellers, you want to watch your step round there, don't make too much of a stir like."

"So that's the way it is," was all the Unicorn said. He told his servants to get out the trunk with his clothes. He opened it and took out a package, from which he took four silk banners. He asked the waiter to let him have four bamboo poles. To each of them he then attached one of the banners. On each banner was written in characters the size of a bucket:

Here comes the Unicorn,
To martial arts and exploits born.
Though bent on trade in distant lands,
He'll first destroy the robber bands.

When Manager Li and the others saw this, they cursed their fate. The waiter asked: "Is that lot on the mountain friends of yours, then, sir?"

"I am a rich merchant from the capital," the Unicorn replied. "How could a lot of robbers be my friends? I'm going to catch that villain, Song Jiang."

"Please sir, not so loud. Don't involve me in it. It's no joke! Even with a hundred thousand troops, you wouldn't get nowhere near him."

The Unicorn said: "Bollocks! You villains are all in league with them!"

The waiter could only lament, while the drivers were struck dumb. Manager Li knelt down and said: "Master, please take pity on us all and let us go home alive instead of provoking heaven's wrath."

The Unicorn shouted: "What do you know about it? How could that bunch of paltry sparrows expect to compete with a swan? I've been in training all my life, but so far I haven't met anyone prepared to take me on. Now I've got a wonderful opportunity. If I don't seize it, when will I ever have another like it? In a bag on that wagon over there I've got a quantity of good hemp rope. If those bandits really want to die, just let them attack me. I shall knock them over one by one, a halberd blow for each. You lot just tie them up for me and chuck them on the wagons. If necessary we'll throw out all the merchandise to make room for the prisoners and deliver the whole gang to the capital and demand the reward. It will fulfil a lifelong ambition of mine. If any of you don't want to go on, I can kill you here first."

The banners were now strung up on the four leading wagons. The other six followed on behind. Manager Li and the others, despite their bitter complaints, had to do as they were told. The Unicorn took out a blade and mounted it on his staff, securing it with three tight knots. He set off after the wagons on the Mount Liang road. When he saw the mountains ahead, Manager Li dragged his feet, whereas the Unicorn simply couldn't get along fast enough. They had been travelling from first thing in the morning till nearly midday, when they saw far ahead a large wood, consisting of more than a thousand trees of immense girth. When they reached this wood, they heard a loud whistle. There was nowhere for the terrified Li and the two servants to hide. The Unicorn ordered the wagons to draw to one side. The drivers all cowered underneath, cursing their luck.

"If I knock them down, you tie them up for me!" the Unicorn shouted.

He had hardly finished speaking when four or five hundred men marched out of the wood. Then gongs sounded behind and another four or five hundred troops now stood blocking the way back. A gun went off in the wood and a hero leapt out.

Iron Ox, for that's who it was, gripped his two axes and bellowed: "Hello Mr. Lu! Do you recognize the mute Taoist novice?"

This made the Unicorn wild. "I've often thought about coming to get you, you band of desperadoes," he shouted. "And now I'm here, so you can go and tell Song Jiang to come down from the mountain and surrender. If he refuses, I shall see that you all die, every man jack of you!"

Iron Ox roared with laughter. "Mr. Lu," he said, "you've fallen into the Professor's trap. Don't waste any more of our time, there's a seat waiting for you on the mountain."

The Unicorn enraged grasped his halberd firmly and charged Iron Ox, who came to meet him whirling his two axes. Before they had fought thirty bouts Iron Ox slipped from the circle of combat, turned and ran off towards the trees. The Unicorn levelled his halberd and raced after him. On reaching the wood Iron Ox dodged this way and that among the trees. The Unicorn stumbled after him, mad with rage, till Iron Ox plunged into a dense thicket and disappeared. The Unicorn followed, but he could see no one. When he tried to turn back, a group of men came out from the pines, one of whom shouted: "Don't go away, Mr. Lu. Do you recognize me?" It was a strapping great monk, wearing a black cassock and carrying a staff of steel.

"Where the hell are you from?" the Unicorn exclaimed.

The Monk laughed and answered: "I am Lu Zhishen, the Flowery Monk. I am under orders from our military commander to meet you and escort you up the mountain."

The Unicorn really blew up at this. "How dare you speak to me like that, you bald ass!" Gripping his sword he charged the monk, who came to meet him whirling his steel staff. But before they had fought three bouts, the monk struck his opponent's halberd aside and then turned and left. The Unicorn rushed after him. At this point Pilgrim Wu Song appeared from the ranks, brandishing two swords, and attacked. Despairing of catching the monk, the Unicorn now turned his attentions to the Pilgrim. But again, before three bouts were completed, this new opponent took to his heels.

The Unicorn laughed sarcastically. "I shan't chase you. You're not worth bothering with, you pitiful wretches!"

Before he'd finished speaking, someone shouted down the mountain: "Mr. Lu, what's the matter with you? Have you never heard that 'Men fear water, steel fears fire?' My brother made the plan, how can you think you'll escape?"

"And who the hell are you?" the Unicorn shouted.

The other answered with a laugh: "I'm Liu Tang, the Red-Haired Devil."

"Stay where you are, you scum!" the Unicorn shouted. And levelling his halberd he ran at Liu Tang. But when they had fought three bouts another man shouted from the sidelines: "Mu the Unstoppable is here!" Then the two of them, the Unstoppable and the Red-Haired Devil, fought the Unicorn. Another three bouts and the Unicorn heard footsteps behind him. He gave a fearsome shout which stopped the other two in their tracks, and turned to engage the new assailant, who was Skyhawk. The three leaders now fought him in a T-shaped formation. Quite undaunted, the Unicorn fought all the harder. In the midst of this, a gong sounded on top of the mountain and all three of his assailants slipped away.

The Unicorn was drenched in sweat from his efforts and did not pursue them. When he returned to the edge of the wood and started looking for the carts and their drivers, he could see none of them, not even the draft animals. He climbed a small hill to get a better view. All he saw was far off on the mountainside a group of soldiers driving his carts and oxen before them and Manager Li and his followers strung out behind. They were rapidly disappearing into the pine forest, while the gongs and drums continued to sound.

When he saw this the Unicorn began to breathe out smoke and fire. He took a firm grip on his halberd and set off in pursuit. When he had nearly reached the mountain, two warriors shouted: "Where are you going?" One of these was Whiskers and the other was Sergeant Lei. When the Unicorn saw them, he shouted: "You insurgent scum, give me back my wagons and my porters."

Whiskers, fingering his handsome beard and grinning broadly, said: "Mr. Lu, how come you are so slow on the uptake? You've fallen into our military commander's trap, so even if you were to grow wings you wouldn't be able to get away. Why don't you come straight away to the Ceremonial Hall, where a seat awaits you."
This enraged the Unicorn still further. Grasping his halberd firmly he charged them. Whiskers and Sergeant Lei met him with their weapons at the ready. But before they had fought three bouts they turned and left the field. The Unicorn thought to himself: "I've got to knock one of them over, or I'll never get back the wagons." Throwing caution to the winds, he raced up the hill after them. But neither was anywhere to be seen. From the summit however came the sound of drums and fifes and raising his eyes he saw a banner of apricot yellow embroidered with four characters: "To follow heaven's path," and looking again he saw an umbrella of red silk embroidered with gold thread, and sitting under it Song Jiang, with the Professor on his left and Taoist Gongsun on his right. A company of two hundred or more now sang out in unison: "Mr. Lu, we trust you're in good health!"
This only added fuel to the flames of his anger and caused him to hurl insults up the mountain. The Professor spoke soothingly: "Calm yourself, please. Song Jiang has long admired you. That is why he sent a certain friend to your home, to arrange for you to visit the mountain, in order that together we may do heaven's will. Please do not be angry with us!"
"You unprincipled brigands, how dare you set a trap for me!" the Unicorn bawled.
Colonel Hua, the Archer, now stepped out from behind Song Jiang, holding a bow. He took an arrow and looking the Unicorn straight in the eye shouted: "Mr. Lu, I am not trying to show off. I just want you to see my skill with an arrow." He had hardly finished speaking before an arrow whistled through the air and struck the red tassel on top of the Unicorn's hat.
This had its effect on the Unicorn, who turned and fled. Drums now began to thunder on top of the hill and Thunderclap and Leopard's Head charged down the eastern slope at the head of a cavalry troop, with streaming banners and shouting loudly. At the same time Twin Rods and the Spearsman led another troop of cavalry down the slope to the west, also waving banners and shouting. To his horror the Unicorn saw that he was cut off. It was getting late, and he was footsore and hungry. He was beginning to fear there was no way out, when he spotted a narrow path leading towards the loneliest part of the mountain, and took it eagerly. It was around dusk, and mist was rising over distant waters, fog enveloping the mountains. Stars and moon shed only the faintest of light and it was impossible to see anything clearly. All he could do was keep on walking, even if it led to the edge of heaven or the utmost limits of the earth.
He came in fact to Duck's-Bill Landing. Here all that met the eye was lonely reedbeds and a vast expanse of misty water.
When the Unicorn saw this he raised his eyes to heaven and heaved a great sigh: "It's all because I didn't pay due attention to the holy man's words that I am now assailed by such troubles."
In this unhappy state, he saw the reeds part and a fisherman appear, rowing a small boat. Leaning on his oars, the fisherman shouted out: "Well, you're a bold one, and no mistake! This is forbidden territory in the Marshes of Mount Liang. What brings you here, halfway through the night?"
"I lost my way, that's what," said the Unicorn. "I can't find anywhere to stay. Can you help me?"
"In these parts there is one little place, but you'd have to go ten miles round to get there, and besides the way is complicated, it's very hard to find. By water it's only a couple of miles. If you don't mind parting with ten strings of silver, I'll take you there in my boat."
"If you'll ferry me across to an inn in the village I'll even give you something extra," said the Unicorn.
So the fisherman rowed to the bank to pick the Unicorn up, and then punted off with his iron boatpole. They had just gone a mile or so when they heard the creak of oars in the reeds ahead of them: a skiff shot out. There were two people in it. The one in front was stripped naked and equipped with a fishing rod. The one behind was sculling. The front man rested his pole and began to sing:

For reading the classics, I've no inclination,
To live on Mount Liang's my only vocation.
I'll trap you a beast or make you a bait will Fetch to your line a bloody great turtle.

The Unicorn got a shock. He didn't dare make a sound. From the reeds on the right hand side came another sound and another boat appeared with two men in it. The one in the back was sculling and laughing as he did so, the other was resting his pole and singing:

Since the day I was born, I've been counted a tough 'un;
Thieving, fighting, and murdering ruffian.
I don't want your gold, and your riches I scorn;
My ambition's to capture the Jade Unicorn.

The Unicorn could only curse his luck. Then another small boat came flying towards them with a man standing in the prow, carrying an iron-tipped wooden pole and singing:

Through the reeds, a small boat steers.
All of a sudden a hero appears.
The loyal man seeks a way out.
Nothing to do but to turn about.

When the songs finished, a greeting was shouted out from all 3 boats together. In the middle boat was Ruan the Second, in the left hand boat Ruan the Fifth, and in the right hand boat Ruan the Seventh. The three boats now joined forces and headed straight for them.
What he heard struck fear into the Unicorn's heart. It occurred to him that he had no idea how to swim. He began to urge the fisherman to take him to the bank quickly. The fisherman only laughed and said: "The blue sky is above, green water below. Me, I was born on the River Yangtze, but now I reside in the Marshes of Mount Liang. I'm not the kind who changes his name every other minute; Li Jun, the White-Water Dragon, that's who I am! Now if you don't surrender right off, you'll just be throwing your life away for nothing!"
The Unicorn was really scared now. Shouting "it's either you or me!" he took his halberd and aimed a blow at the boatman's heart. The latter saw the blow coming and taking a firm hold on his scull, turned a backward somersault into the water. Splash! The boat was left drifting in circles on the water and the halberd disappeared under the waves. At this point, a man surfaced at the stern of the boat and shouted "White Eel is here!" Treading water, he pressed down on the rudder and then with a sudden twist turned the boat bottom to the sky, toppling its occupant into the water. This really was a case of:

Employ a scheme to beat the phoenix and trap the dragon,
Forge a snare for the man of whom heaven and earth go in fear.

"I rely on my small tongue," said Wu Yong, "to go to the Northern Capital and get the 'Jade Qilin' to join us here just as easily as I take an article out of my pocket. But it would be necessary that a man of strange appearance should accompany me there."
Li Kui heard this, and said, "Elder brother, I am willing to go with you."
"You keep quiet," said Song Jiang. "I shall need you if there is any arson, murder, or looting to be done. But this requires artfulness, and your nature is not suitable for such work."
"But am I not an ugly strange person?" said Li Kui. "Why not make use of my strange appearance?"
"I do not dislike you," said Song Jiang, "but if you go to the Northern Capital and they found out your name, your life would be in danger."
"Never mind that," said Li Kui, "I think that Wu Yong will see that I am suitable."
"You must listen to my three conditions," said Wu Yong. "If you do not agree to them then you must stay here."
"Three conditions will not stop me," replied Li Kui. "If there were thirty conditions I would agree to them."
"The first condition," said Wu Yong, "is that you should abstain from wine because when you take it you have a violent temper. Second condition, you must dress as a Taoist acolyte, and obey my orders implicitly. The third is difficult. From tomorrow you must not speak a single word, but act like a mute. If you will observe these three conditions you may go with me."
"The first two I can observe, but the third is very hard," said Li Kui.
"If you open your mouth mischief is bound to happen," said Wu Yong.
"I shall have to do it," said Li Kui. "I can keep my mouth closed by having a copper cash on my tongue."
There was general laughter at this. It was agreed to let Li Kui go, and that evening a farewell banquet was held in the Loyalty and Justice Hall.
Early the next morning Li Kui donned the priest's garb, and left the mountain with Wu Yong. For five days these two traveled along the road to the Northern Capital, Daming, and rested each night at inns on the way. Li Kui kept his word, but found it very difficult at times to keep quiet when he had lost his temper. Upon reaching the capital they stayed at an inn, and one evening when Li Kui was in the kitchen cooking food he lost his temper and struck one of the servants. The servant went and complained to Wu Yong of this. Wu Yong offered apologies, and gave the servant ten strings of cash in compensation.
The next morning after breakfast Wu Yong called Li Kui and said, "You have begun to annoy me with your temper. Let us have no more of this. Today you must accompany me and keep out of mischief. If there is any trouble today you may endanger my life. I will now give you a secret signal. When I wag my head you must not move."
They both then left the inn and went into the city. Wu Yong was dressed as a priest, and carried a small bell; Li Kui was dressed as an acolyte, and carried a stick over his shoulder to which was attached a piece of paper with a text written on it, "Tell fortunes, and give advice on any matter for one tael of silver."
At that time there were many soldiers in Daming Prefecture because in the country around were many bandits and thieves. It was also the headquarters of Grand Secretary Liang, the commander in chief of the armies north of the Yellow River. Wu Yang and Li Kui came to the city gate where there was an officer of the guard. Wu Yang saluted him, and the officer asked, "Sir, where are you from?"
"My name is Zhang Yong," replied Wu Yong, "and this is my assistant named Li. I am a fortune teller."
An inspector of passports was looking at Wu Yong's paper, when a soldier remarked, "This acolyte has the appearance of a thief." Li Kui was angry and would have hit the fellow, but Wu Yong wagged his head, and so Li Kui curbed his temper and hung down his head.
Wu Yong offered apologies for his assistant's quick temper, and then all being in order they went their way. As he went along the street Wu Yong rattled his bell and sang a ballad:

Gan Luo a mandarin, when young
Zi Ya when old;
Unlucky Yan Hui died in youth,
Peng Zu when old;
Fan Dan was always poor from birth,
Shi Chong was rich.
Some men just prosper, smiling,
Seem destined for the best of fate;
For others, graves are yawning,
Unlucky and unfortunate.
From me nothing is hidden,
Of life and death or poverty;
Beware of fatal omen,
Consult me now, avoid delay.

Having finished this he rang his bell again. He was soon followed by a crowd of boys who laughed at him. When he reached Lu Junyi's house he walked backwards and forwards there, singing the funny song, and ringing his bell, and being ridiculed by the crowd of boys.
Lu Junyi heard the noise, and asked a servant what it was about.
"It is very funny!" said the servant. "There is a fortune teller who asks for a tael of silver to tell one's horoscope. He is accompanied by a strange-looking acolyte who is very uncouth, and his antics amuse the people."
"As he asks for so much he must be a well-educated man," said Lu Junyi. "You go and ask him to come here."
The servant went and asked Wu Yong to come to his master. "What is your master's name?" asked Wu Yong. The servant told him, and then Wu Yong agreed to go. Upon reaching the room the servant gave Li Kui a chair on the veranda and asked him to wait there. He then lifted the door curtain, and showed in Wu Yong who saluted Lu Junyi.
"What is your honorable village and name?" asked Lu Junyi.
"I am Zhang Yong, and my nickname is 'Heaven's Mouth,' and I am a Shandong man. I am familiar with the book on 'Nativity and Fate,' and can foretell the future. My fee is one tael of silver."
Lu Junyi asked him to enter a smaller room at the back, and there sat down.
The host ordered tea, and also a tael of silver to be given to Wu Yong. He then asked Wu Yong to tell his fortune.
Wu Yong asked for the date, hour, etc. of his birth, but Lu Junyi said he did not want to know much of his good fortune but whether any mishap would happen to him. "This year I am thirty-two years old, and was born in the last month of the year."
Wu Yong shook his box, and throwing out the cash exclaimed, "How strange!"
Lu Junyi was startled and asked, "Is it auspicious or inauspicious?"
"I cannot be straight with you," replied Wu Yong, "because you would not like it."
"If I have gone astray I hope that you will tell me," said Lu Junyi, "and never mind what I say."
"In the near future," said Wu Yong, "you will meet some bloody disaster, and you will be killed. Your family possessions will all be lost."
Lu Junyi laughed at this and said, "I am afraid that you have made a mistake. I was born in this town, and have always had plenty of money. In our family we have never had a lawbreaker, nor have we had a criminal. Our widows have never re-married. Moreover my affairs have always been well done; nothing irregular, and no ill-gotten gain. How could I now get into some bloody disaster?"
Wu Yong changed his countenance, handed back the money he had received, and said, "Everywhere people like to be flattered. Enough! I speak the truth and yet my words are taken in an ill purpose. I must go now."
"Do not be annoyed at what I said," replied Lu Junyi, "I was only jesting. Please tell me exactly what yon think will happen."
"It is always hard to believe unpleasant truths," said Wu Yong.
"I ask you to conceal nothing from me, and I will hear the worst," said Lu Junyi.
"Your fate has been propitious up to now," said Wu Yong, "but this year there will be a change for the worst. Within a hundred days your body will lose its head. Your fate has been fixed by Heaven, and there is no way of escape."
"Is it not possible to avoid this trouble?" asked Lu Junyi.
Wu Yong again shook the cash in his box, and throwing them out examined them with apparently great care. He said, "It appears that if you went from here about three hundred //to the southeast you might get out of the reach of this coming disaster. You might still have some trouble there, but it would not be so serious."
"If you help me to escape this coming disaster I will recompense you liberally," said Lu Junyi.
"I'll express your fate in four lines of poetry that you may write down on the wall," said Wu Yong, "and when things happen to you, you will realize the accuracy of my prognostication." Lu Junyi summoned a servant to get a writing brush, and wrote on the white wall of the room the following stanzas as Wu Yong dictated:

On bank a gallant hero strolls,
His boat is hidden in the reeds;
The end is destined by fate
No sorrow if he takes rest.

After Lu Junyi had written this Wu Yong picked up his box and was about to depart but Lu Junyi requested him to wait a little. Wu Yong, however, said he had some business to attend to, but he would come again some other day. Lu Junyi accompanied him to the door, and both Wu Yong and Li Kui departed. Upon reaching the inn they packed up their baggage, paid their bills, and left at once. When they were on the road again, Wu Yong said, "That business is finished. We can now quickly go back to Liangshan Marsh, and await there for the arrival of Lu Junyi."
When Wu Yong had left, Lu Junyi kept going over what he had said. He kept looking at the sky and was restless. One day he sent for all his employees to discuss matters. His chief steward was named Li Gu, and was an Eastern Capital man. Previously he had come to the Northern Capital to see a friend, but as that man had left he found himself stranded. One winter day he was starving, and Lu Junyi saw him, and took pity on him, and gave him employment. He had proved his abilities in his work, and very soon he was promoted. Step by step he had become chief steward, and managed all the affairs of the estate. Under him were about fifty servants.
When all the employees had assembled Lu Junyi did not notice another confident steward so he asked where he was. Just as he spoke a big man presented himself. He was about twenty-five years of age, but had a moustache. He had broad shoulders, but a slim waist. He wore a white silk gown, and had a hat shaped like a melon. He had a red decorated belt, and wore yellow leather boots. A metal ring was hanging at the back of his head, and a flower was stuck in the side of his hat. He was a native of the town, and had been succored by Lu Junyi as he had neither father nor mother. His skin was quite white, and had been tattooed all over with numerous designs. He played well on the flute and the lute, and was also good at singing and acting. In fact there was hardly anything he could not do, and do well. He knew all dialects, and spoke them fluently. He also knew the expressions used in every trade and profession. A skilled archer and good at all games, he was always a successful champion in whatever he took up. His name was Yan Qing, and he was known by his nickname 'The Prodigy.' He was the confident of his master Lu Junyi. It was he who now entered the room along with Li Gu, the steward.

When he saw them enter Lu Junyi spoke, "The other day I had my fortune told, and within a hundred days I shall meet a bloody disaster. In order to avoid that fate I must go about three hundred //to the southeast. The likely place I know is Mount Tai in Taian Prefecture, Shandong, where there is a temple dedicated to the Supreme Heavenly Emperor, who controls the births, deaths, and calamities of the people. I will go there and offer incense to redeem my sins. I can take refuge there until this threatening danger has passed by. While there I can buy and sell things, and also see the views. Li Gu, I want you to get ten carts for me, and load them with suitable goods for sale there. You can accompany me on this trip. You can hand over today all my household affairs to Yan Qing who will take your place. I want to start in three days from now."

"Sir, I am afraid that you are making a mistake," replied Li Gu. "There is a saying, 'Divinations can be forged in any form.' You better not believe what fortune tellers say. If you remain here there will be no fear of any danger."

"My life is decided by fate," said Lu Junyi. "Do not hinder my movements, because if the calamity happened it would be too late for regret."

"Sir, will you please listen to me," interposed Yan Qing. "If you go to Mount Tai you must pass close to Liangshan Marsh, and there the brigands are very powerful under a leader named Song Jiang. Soldiers have failed to suppress the brigands. If you must go to offer incense at Mount Tai, it would be better if you waited here until the affairs in that quarter are more settled. You need not believe what that fortune teller told you. It may be that he was sent by the brigands to delude you, and so get you into their net. I am sorry that the other day I was not here and did not see the man. I could have found out his game after asking him a few questions."

"Do not talk nonsense," said Lu Junyi. "Who can cheat me? I do not care a rap for those fellows at Liangshan Marsh because they are hardly worth a straw, and I myself could easily arrest them. Since my youth I have practiced all kinds of military drill, and am well known everywhere as a skilled fighter."

When he had finished speaking his wife came from behind the screen and said to him: "Husband, I have been listening to all you have said. There is an ancient saying, 'One //away from home, and things are not like home.' Do not listen to what the fortune teller said. Stay at home and look after our own affairs instead of going to places where you will meet with danger. It would be better to prepare another room where you can purify your heart and diminish the passion. Live there in solitude and nothing will of course happen to you."

"You woman do not understand affairs," replied Lu Junyi. "I have decided what I must do, and it is useless for you to interfere."

"I will go with you. I will not boast of my skill," said Yan Qing, "but if on the way we are attacked by brigands I will stand by you. I can defeat fifty such men myself."

"I do not understand trading matters," said Lu Junyi, "and that is why I want Li Gu to accompany me. You can stay behind and take care of the house."

"In the last few days I have been suffering from some foot trouble," said Li Gu, "and I cannot very well go with you."

Lu Junyi was angry at this, and said, "'Maintain troops for a thousand days, and use them only one day.' I want you to accompany me, and yet you offer excuses. If anyone places obstacles in my way I shall have to land out with my fist."

Li Gu was afraid, and looked helplessly at the wife who seeing the position withdrew behind the screen. Yan Qing even did not care to say another word. All the servants took their leave. Li Gu smothered his annoyance, and left the room to make arrangements for the journey. He got ten carts and fifty men to pull them.

Three days later all was ready, and after sacrificing to the family ancestors they took leave of all the household who assembled to see them off. After the first day Lu Junyi arranged for Li Gu and two men to go in advance, and make arrangements for the party to stay in the inns.

On the journey Lu Junyi enjoyed the scenery and the pleasure of traveling. He said that if he had stayed at home he would have missed all this.

They had traveled for several days without any untoward incident happening. One morning, however, as they were about to leave, a waiter of the inn spoke to Lu Junyi, "Sir, I have something to tell you. You are only seven //from Liangshan Marsh, and your road will take you close to that place. The chief of the brigands there is Song Jiang, and though he does not wish to injure travelers yet you must go quietly on your way without any anxiety."

Upon hearing this Lu Junyi had a box unlocked, and taking out four white flags wrote seven characters on each, "The Generous Lu Junyi of the Northern Capital." He then displayed these on sticks, and stuck them on the carts. His men upon seeing these flags were downcast as they were afraid. The inn waiter also was surprised and asked, "Are you a relative of Song Jiang at Liangshan Marsh?"

"No!" replied Lu Junyi, "I am a wealthy man from the Northern Capital; I come here to capture that fellow."

"Don't speak so loudly here," said the waiter, "because I do not want to be implicated in your affairs. I am not joking. If you had a thousand men with you, you could not capture any brigands here."

"Shut up!" said Lu Junyi, "I expect that you are in league with them."

The waiter covered his ears and ran away. Lu Junyi's men were now almost frightened out of their wits. Li Gu knelt down, and said, "Master, have pity on us. If you would let us go home alive, it will be very kind of you."

"What are you talking about!" said Lu Junyi. "Should an eagle be afraid of a sparrow? I have been well trained in physical drill since my youth, and I have never yet met a man who could defeat me. Today I shall perhaps have an opportunity of showing off my skill. I have placed on the top of that cart a sack of ropes. While I kill the men with swords you can pick them up and bind them on the barrows. Then we can cart them off to the capital, and the Emperor will reward us for our enterprise. If any of you are unwilling to go with me I will kill you on the spot."

Without any further objection all the carts moved forward, but the men were very mortified at being forced to go. Lu Junyi tied his halberd to one of the flag sticks on a cart. As they approached Liangshan Marsh the road became steeper, and the men took each step with fear. Lu Junyi urged them forward.

About 10 A.M. they saw in the distance a forest in which were monstrous trees. As they got near the forest they heard a whistle. Li Gu and two men were in front as usual, and upon hearing this they looked round for a hiding place. Lu Junyi gave orders for the carts to be placed at one side of the road. This was done, and the men took cover under the carts. Lu Junyi shouted out, "As I capture these brigands I want you to bind them with the ropes." As he was saying this he saw about five hundred men coming round the corner of the forest. Many gongs were also sounding behind him, and turning round he saw another body of five hundred men also approaching. A shell in the forest was fired off, and at the same time a man leapt out of the forest close to him. The man carried an axe in each hand, and shouted, "Do you recognize the fortune teller's acolyte?"

Lu Junyi was startled. He replied, "I have always had a desire to capture you brigands, so I intentionally come here to meet you. Tell Song Jiang to come here at once, and pay respects to me. If he delays his arrival I shall kill the whole lot of you."

Li Kui laughed at this and said, "Sir, our fortune teller predicted that you would be in danger, so I request that you come and join us as a leader."

Lu Junyi was angry at this, and seizing his halberd advanced. Li Kui did the same, holding his two axes aloft. After three bouts of fighting, however, Li Kui jumped apart, and retreated to the forest. Lu Junyi followed him, but Li Kui hid himself from place to place as Lu Junyi came near. At last Li Kui saw a chance, and escaped entirely into the forest. Lu Junyi looked round, but could not see a single man near that spot. As he was returning, however, he heard men behind him, and someone called out, "You need not go away. You surely will recognize me."

Lu Junyi looked round, and saw a big monk with a large iron staff in his hand. "Where are you from?" he asked.

The monk, Lu Da laughed and replied, "I am the monk Lu Da. I have been instructed to come and request you to take refuge at our stronghold."

Lu Junyi was more angry still and cursed, "You bald-headed donkey! How dare you talk in this impudent way!" He then advanced with his halberd in hand, and Lu Da stood on defense ready to receive the attack. After three bouts, however, Lu Da ran away with Lu Junyi in pursuit. They had not gone far when Wu Song armed with two swords stepped out of the trees, and faced Lu Junyi. He said, "Sir, if you will follow me there will be no bloody disaster."

But Lu Junyi would not listen to this, and attacked Wu Song. After three bouts, however, Wu Song also ran away.

Lu Junyi laughed at this, and called out, "I am not going to run after you, because evidently you fellows are of no importance."

He had hardly finished saying this when he saw a man at the foot of the hill who called out to him, "Lu Junyi, you need not boast! Have you not heard of the saying, 'Man fears falling into a trap; iron fears being cast into the fire.' Our commander-in-chief has a plot, and however you try to get away where there is no means of escape."

"Who are you, fellow?" shouted out Lu Junyi.

The man laughed and replied, "I am Liu Tang, the 'Red Haired Demon.'"

Lu Junyi reviled him, "You petty thief! Don't you also run away." He advanced and fought three bouts with Liu Tang who was then joined by another brigand, Mu Hong, the "Unrestrained," and they both attacked Lu Junyi. But after three bouts another voice was heard, and these two withdrew a few steps. Turning round Lu Junyi found his third opponent, Li Ying, the "Striking Hawk." He was now almost surrounded, but as he advanced each man retreated in turn. He did not pursue them as he was feeling quite warm, but returned to the spot where he had left his men, and the ten handcarts, but there was not a single one left. He therefore climbed a small eminence, and looked all round. In the distance he saw both his carts and men in charge of a party of brigands. His steward Li Gu was bound with ropes. Lu Junyi was extremely annoyed at this, and seizing his halberd he started off to try to catch up with them. On his way, however, he met two leaders of the brigands who shouted, "Where are you going?" One was Zhu Tong, the "Beautiful Whiskers," and the other was Lei Heng, the "Winged Tiger."

"You brigands!" replied Lu Junyi, "go at once, and return to me those carts and men."

Zhu Tong stroked his beard, and with a smile replied, "Do you not understand yet? Our wise leader has often said, 'In our galaxy of stars, some come, but none go!' As you cannot get away from here you better join us as a leader."

Lu Junyi was again angry, and advanced to attack them. They fought for about three bouts, and then the two leaders retired. When he saw this Lu Junyi thought that he must pursue them before he could get back his carts and men. But as he ran round the hill, his two opponents had disappeared. Up the hill, a number of drums were beating, and looking there he saw a yellow flag bearing four characters, "Executor of Heaven's Wish." Under a large red silk umbrella stood Song Jiang with Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng on either side. Behind them stood about seventy leaders who all saluted him, and called, "Sir, how are you?"

Lu Junyi paid no attention to this and simply cursed them.

"Sir, do not be angry," interposed Wu Yong. "Our commander Song Jiang has wished to meet you for a long time, and he sent me to your house to get you to come to our mountain. He wants you to join us here and not remain an outsider."

Lu Junyi replied, "You are only brigands, and how dare you try to deceive me!"

Hua Rong fixed an arrow in his bow, and called out, "Lu Junyi, don't be too confident in your skill, just watch my arrow." He then shot the arrow which took the red tassel off Lu Junyi's cap. Lu Junyi was startled, and beat a retreat down the mountain. He saw thousands of men to the east and west, so he went towards the north. It was now evening, and he felt both tired and hungry. Mists were covering the ground, and there was no moonlight. He could not find even a small path in the increasing darkness. He tried several times, but was always forced to stop by some obstacle. He soon found himself in tall reeds, with water on all sides. He stopped, and gazing towards Heaven he said, "Because I would not listen to advice, so now I am in trouble." While in this flight he saw a fisherman rowing a boat among the reeds. The man called out to him, "How brave you are! This is close to Liangshan Marsh, and it is now nearly midnight. Why have come to such a place?"

"I have lost my way," said Lu Junyi, "and cannot find a resting place. Please help me."

"There is a market village about ten //from here," replied the fisherman, "but the road is hard to follow unless you have been that way before. You could, however, get there easily by boat, and that way would only be about two //. If you will pay me ten strings of cash I will take you there on my boat."

"If you will convey me there," said Lu Junyi, "and find me an inn, I will pay you liberally."

The fisherman brought his boat to the side, Lu Junyi stepped on board, and the man pushed off. They had gone about two //when they heard another boat approaching. On that boat, they soon saw two men, one of whom was stripped naked, and was punting the boat along with a pole. The other man at the stern was sculling. The first named man was singing:

For books a hero has no need,
As brigand bold his life's secured;
With crossbow tiger fierce is shot,
By baited hook the fish is lured.

Lu Junyi was afraid, and dared not utter a sound. He just then saw another boat emerging from among the reeds on his left, on which were also two men just as in the first boat. One also began to sing:

I'm not of violent nature,
But Qilin in my boat,
I'm sure of being victor,
Take brigands by the throat.

Lu Junyi now realized his danger especially as he saw a third boat sculled by one man who also began to sing:

On bank a gallant hero strolls,
His boat is hidden in the reeds;
The end is destined by fate,
No sorrow if he takes rest.

When the song was ended, the men on the three boats all saluted Lu Junyi, and called out "ruo." They were the three brothers Ruan, Lu Junyi being unaccustomed to swimming asked the fisherman to take him to the bank at once. But the fisherman only laughed, and replied, "Above is the blue sky; below is the green water. I was born at Xunyang River, but afterwards went to Liangshan Marsh, I am Li Jun, the 'Muddy Water Dragon.' If you, Lu Junyi, do not submit now, your end is very near."

Lu Junyi was surprised at this, but said, "Then one of us two must die." He took his halberd, and thrust it at Li Jun who seeing this evaded the blow by turning a back somersault into the water. Soon the boat began to move round in a circle, and Lu Junyi's halberd had been thrown into the water. Just then he saw a head emerge from the water, and it said, "I am Zhang Shun, the 'White Fish.'" He seized hold of the rudder, and kicking the water, he overturned the boat, and threw Lu Junyi overboard.

A plot to capture the phoenix and dragon,
A trap to hold an extraordinary man.

Sniping with Arrows & by Shooting I from Ambush, the Pordigy Yan Qing Saves the Life of his Master with well-directed arrows; By Leaping from a Building's Upper Room balcony, Madcap Shi Xiu Snatches a Victim from the Execution Grounds & Saves a Life

Zhang Shun wrapped and arm around Lu's waist and swam with him towards shore. They soon reached the bank. Fifty or sixty men were waiting with lighted torches. These gathered round, removed Lu's dagger and stripped him of his wet clothes. They were about to bind his arms when Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller transmitted an order.

"Lu the Magnate is not to be harmed," he shouted.

An attendant gave Lu a silken embroidered tunic and gown to wear. Eight brigands brought a sedan-chair, assisted Lu into it, and set forth. Seen in the distance were twenty or thirty red silk lanterns, illuminating a mounted troop which was approaching to the accompaniment of drams and music. At the head was Song Jiang, Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng. They were followed by many chieftains.

All dismounted. Lu Junyi hastily got down from his sedan-chair. Song Jiang knelt. The other chieftains, in rows, did the same. Lu also dropped to his knees.

"Since I have been captured, I request an early death."

Song Jiang laughed. "Please sit in your sedan-chair, Magnate."

The chieftains resumed their saddles. To the sound of music, the procession climbed through the three fortified passes and went directly to Loyalty Hall. There, the hosts dismounted and led Lu into the hall. It was brightly lit by lanterns and candles.

"Your fame, Magnate, has long thundered in my ears," said Song Jiang. "Being able to meet you today is one of the greatest good fortunes of my life. My brothers behaved rudely a little while ago. We beg your forgiveness."

Wu Yong stepped forward and said: "The other day, on orders from brother Song Jiang, I called at your gates disguised as a fortune teller. My aim was to lure you up the mountain so that you might join us in our mutual endeavors to act on Heaven's behalf."

Song Jiang invited Lu Junyi to be seated in the highest chieftain's chair. Lu's reply was courteous.

"I've no talent, knowledge or ability, and I've offended your prestige. Ten thousand deaths would be a light retribution. Why do you make sport of me?"

Song Jiang smiled. "Who would dare? Because of our genuine respect for your great virtue, Magnate, we have hungered and thirsted for your arrival. We pray you do not scorn our humble mountain fortress. Be our leader. We will unquestioningly obey your every command."

"Then let me die immediately, for I cannot accede to your wish."

"Let's talk about it again another day," Wu Yong suggested.

Wine was brought for the magnate. Lu had no way out, and he drank several cups. Lesser brigands conducted him to the rear hall to rest.

The next day sheep and horses were slaughtered and Song Jiang invited the magnate to a large feast. After much polite refusal, Lu consented to sit in the middle. When several rounds had been drunk, Song Jiang rose, goblet in hand.

"Last night we offended you, and for this we beg your pardon. Although our stronghold is small, and not a worthy place to water your horse, we hope you will consider our sincere fidelity. I gladly relinquish my position to you, Magnate. Please do not refuse."

"You're making a mistake, sir chieftain. There are no crimes against my name, and my family has a bit of property. A man of the great Song Dynasty I was born, a ghost of the great Song Dynasty I will die. I prefer death to accepting your proposal!"

Wu Yong and the other chieftains also joined in Song Jiang's pleas. But Lu was determined not to become an outlaw.

"If you're not willing, Magnate," Wu Yong finally said, "we can't force you. You would be with us in body but not in spirit. Since we have the rare privilege of having you here, even if you won't join us, at least stay a while. Then we'll escort you home."

"Why not let me go right now? My family has had no news of me. I'm afraid they'll worry."

"No problem about that. We'll have Li Gu return first with the carts. You can go a few days later."

Lu turned to his chief steward. "Are your carts and merchandise all there?"

"Not a thing is missing."

Song Jiang ordered that two large silver ingots be presented to Li Gu, and two small bits of silver be given to the servants, and ten ounces of silver be distributed among the carters. The recipients expressed their thanks.

"You know my difficulties," Lu said to the chief steward. "When you get home, tell my wife not to worry. Say I'll be returning in four or five days."
Li Gu, who wanted only to get away, readily assented. "I certainly will," he promised. He bid farewell and left Loyalty Hall. Wu Yong rose.
"Set your mind at ease, Magnate," he said. "Keep your seat while I see Li Gu off. I'll be back soon."
Wu Yong mounted and went on ahead to the Shore of Golden Sands and there waited for the chief steward. Soon Li Gu, the two servants, the draught animals and their drivers, came down the mountain. Wu Yong, who had five hundred brigands with him, hemmed the procession in on two sides. Seated in the shade of a willow tree, he summoned Li Gu before him.
"Your master has already talked it over with us and agreed. Today he's taken the second chieftain's chair. Even before he came up the mountain, he wrote a four line rebellious verse on the wall of a room in his house. Note the first word of each line. In the first it's 'Lu,' in the second it's 'Jun,' in the third it's 'Yi,' in the fourth it's 'rebels'—'Lu Junyi rebels.' Now you know what he's doing in our fortress! At first we were going to kill you all, but then we thought it would give our stronghold a bad name. So we're letting you go. Travel day and night and hurry home. But don't nourish any hopes that your master will return."
Li Gu fervently kowtowed. Wu Yong ordered that boats take the men and animals across the river. They shortly were speeding along the road to the Northern Capital.
We'll leave Li Gu for the moment and talk of Wu Yong after he went back to the banquet in Loyalty Hall. He besieged Lu Junyi with clever and persuasive arguments. The feast didn't end till the second watch. Another feast was laid the following day.
"I appreciate the good intentions of you chieftains in keeping me here," said Lu, "but for me every day is like a year. I must leave today."
Song Jiang replied: "I'm a man of no talent, and have been very fortunate to meet you, Magnate. I'd like to use my own money to give you a small dinner where we can have a heart to heart chat. Please don't refuse."
Another day passed. The following day Song Jiang laid a feast, the next day it was Wu Yong, and the day after it was Gongsun Sheng. To tell it briefly, there were over thirty chieftains, and each day each of them in turn gave Lu a banquet. Time slipped away, the sun and moon shuttling across the sky. More than a month went by. Again Lu proposed to leave.
"We'd like to keep you," said Song Jiang, "but if you really must go, we'll have a few modest drinks in farewell in Loyalty Hall."
The next day, Song Jiang again paid for the feast out of his own pocket. The other chieftains protested to Lu Junyi.
"Though our brother respects you one hundred per cent, we respect you one hundred and twenty," they said. "But you go only to his banquet! Just because you have regard for the substantial brick, that doesn't mean you should scorn the thin tiles!"
And Li Kui shouted: "I risked my life in the Northern Capital to invite you here, and you won't allow me to feast you. I'm going to hang on to your tail until you agree!"
Wu Yong laughed. "Who ever heard of that kind of an invitation? How crude! Magnate, forgive him. But, in view of their sincerity, you really ought to stay a little longer."
Almost unnoticed, another four or five days expired. Lu was determined to go. Then Zhu Wu the Miraculous Strategist approached him with a group of chieftains in Loyalty Hall. "Although we are of lesser rank," said Zhu, "we have expended some efforts for our brother Song Jiang. There isn't any poison in our wine! If you take offense and refuse to dine with us, I won't make any trouble. But I'm afraid my brothers will react badly. Then, being sorry will be too late!"
Wu Yong rose to his feet. "You men behave! I'll speak to the magnate for you. I'm sure he can stay on a bit longer. Why not? 'Advice offered, wine goblet in hand, is never ill-intentioned,' as the old saying goes."
Lu could not withstand the importunities of so many. He agreed to remain another short while. This stretched into an additional nearly forty days. It had been the fifth lunar month when Lu left the Northern Capital, and by now he had spent more than two months in the mountain fortress. Golden wheat rustled in the breeze and the dew was cool. Autumn Festival time was rapidly approaching.
Lu longed to go home, and he spoke to Song Jiang about it. Obviously, his wish was intense.
"That's easy enough," said Song. "Tomorrow, I'll see you to the Shore of Golden Sands."
Lu Junyi was delighted. The next day, his clothing and weapons were restored, and a column of chieftains escorted him down the mountain. Song Jiang presented him with gold and silver on a platter.
"I don't mean to boast," said Lu, "but my family has money and goods in plenty. I'll take only enough to get me to the Northern Capital. I don't want the rest."
Song Jiang and the other chieftains escorted Lu to the Shore of Golden Sands. There, they bade him farewell and returned to the stronghold. Of that we'll say no more.

We'll speak rather of Lu Junyi, who strode along at a rapid clip. In ten days he reached the suburbs of the Northern Capital. Since it was already dusk he didn't enter the city but put up for the night at an inn. Early the next morning he left the village hostel and hastened towards the city.
Before he had gone a li he met a fellow in tattered head kerchief and ragged clothes. The man, on seeing Lu, dropped to his knees and kowtowed. It was Yan Qing the Prodigy.
"What are you doing in this condition?" cried the magnate.
"This isn't the place to talk."
The two rounded the corner of an earthen wall and Lu started to question Yan Qing.
"Not long after you left, master," the young man related, "Li Gu returned and said to the mistress, 'The master has thrown in with Song Jiang in Liangshan Marsh. He's accepted the chair of the second chieftain.' Li Gu went to the authorities and accused you. They began living together and, claiming that I was disobedient, threw me out. They confiscated all my clothes and drove me from the city. And they warned all my friends and relations that they would go to court and prosecute anyone who gave me shelter, even if they had to spend half the family fortune doing it! As a result, no one dared have anything to do with me. Having no place to stay in the city, I've been wandering around in the outskirts, begging. I've had to live in a rear lane. Take my advice, master, and return to Mount Liangshan. Don't even consider anything else. If you go into the city, you'll surely be trapped."
"My wife isn't that kind of a woman," Lu shouted. "You're just farting, you oaf!"
"You don't have eyes in the back of your head, master, how could you have seen? You spent most of your time developing your physique, you never had much interest in sex. The mistress has been having an affair with Li Gu for a long time. Now they can shut the door and be together as husband and wife. If you go home, master, they're bound to do you dirty."
Lu was furious. "My family has lived in the Northern Capital for five generations. Everyone knows us! How many heads has Li Gu got to spare that he would dare pull such a thing? You've probably been up to some wickedness yourself, and you're telling me this to put me off! I'm going home and get to the bottom of this, and then I'll settle with you!"
Yan Qing wept bitterly and kowtowed, clinging to his master's garments. Lu kicked him aside and strode on towards Daming.
He entered the city and went directly home. His stewards gaped in amazement. Li Gu hurried forward to welcome him. He escorted Lu into the hall, dropped before him and kowtowed.
"Is Yan Qing here?" Lu inquired.
"Don't ask, master. It's a long story and you've had a tiring journey. Why don't you rest first, then I'll tell you."
Lu's wife emerged, weeping, from behind a screen. "Don't cry," urged Lu. "Just tell me what's happened to young Yan."
"Don't ask now, husband. It's a long story and you've had a tiring journey. Why don't you rest first. then I'll tell you."
The magnate was growing suspicious, and he demanded an answer.
"Why not change your clothes, worship in the family chapel, and have some breakfast," Li Gu suggested. "Then it will be time enough for us to speak." He had food laid out for the magnate.
As Lu was raising his chopsticks, he heard shouts at the front and rear gates.
Two or three hundred policemen came charging in. They promptly bound the astonished Lu and drove him with blows of their batons to the residency of the governor of the Northern Capital.
Governor Liang was at that moment holding court. In lines to his left and right were seventy or eighty policemen like wolves and tigers, and these brought Lu before him. Lu's wife and Li Gu both knelt to one side.
"You were one of the Northern Capital's good citizens, you knave," shouted the governor. "Why did you join the bandits in Liangshan Marsh and accept the second chieftain's chair? You came to link forces within and without so that they can attack the city! Now that you've been captured, what do you have to say?"
"In a moment of stupidity I let Wu Yong from Mount Liangshan, posing as a fortune teller, into my house. With lying words, he beguiled me to Mount Liangshan, where I was detained for more than two months. Fortunately, I was able to get away and come home. I have no evil intent. I pray Your Excellency will see into my heart."
"Do you expect anyone to believe that! If you're not in league with them, why did you stay there so long? The wife you abandoned and Li Gu have both exposed you. Would they make false accusations?"
"Since it's come to this, master, you'd better confess," Li Gu advised. "That poem you wrote on the wall at home has a hidden rebellious meaning. It's overwhelming proof. There's no need to say any more."
"We don't want to injure you," said Lu's wife, "but we're afraid you'll involve me. You know the old saying: 'When a man rebels, his family and all his relations must pay with their lives.' "
Kneeling before the governor, Lu cried that he was being wronged. "Don't say that, master," Li Gu urged. "If the charge is true, you can't escape it. If it's false, you'll easily clear yourself in the end. But first confess, and you won't have to suffer a beating."
Lu's wife agreed. "It's hard to get a false charge into court, husband, and it's equally hard to deny the facts. If you've committed a crime, you'll be the death of me! Will your sensitive skin be able to withstand the feelingless rods? Confess, and your sentence will be lighter!"
Li Gu had spread bribes high and low, and now Zhang the court clerk spoke up. "That stubborn villain! If he's not beaten he'll never confess!"
"Right," said Governor Liang. "Beat him," he shouted.
Policemen flung Lu Junyi face downward and pounded him till his skin split, his flesh protruded and blood flowed in rivulets. Three or four times he fainted. Finally, he could bear it no longer.
"I was destined for a violent death," he sighed. "I'll make a false confession."
As soon as the clerk obtained the confession, he had a hundred-catty cangue for the condemned placed around Lu's neck and directed that he be taken to prison, to the distress of all spectators inside and outside the court. That same day Lu was pushed through the prison gates, led to a pavilion and forced to kneel.
Seated on a bed was the superintendent of the city's two prisons, who was also the official executioner. He was Cai Fu, a native of the Northern Capital, known as Iron Arm for his strength with the executioner's blade.
Standing beside him was his brother Cai Qing, one of the guards. The people of Hebei Province like to make quips, and they gave Cai Qing the nickname Single Blossom because of his fondness for hanging a flower over one ear. Holding a courier's staff, he stood at his brother's side.
"Lock this condemned prisoner up," Cai Fu said. "I'm going home for a while. I'll be back later."
Cai Qing led Lu away.
Cai Fu rose and left the prison. He was passing through the gates when a man rounded a wall ahead. He was carrying a container of cooked rice and looked worried. It was Yan Qing the Prodigy.
"What are you up to, young brother?" Cai Fu asked.
Yan Qing dropped to his knees and wiped the tears rolling down his cheeks. "Brother Superintendent, have pity on my master Lu the Magnate," he pleaded. "He's been wrongfully convicted and has no money to pay for food. I begged this half container of rice outside the city so that he'll have something to stem his hunger, permit me to give it to him, brother Superintendent, and you'll be doing a good deed!" Yan Qing, his voice choking, prostrated himself.
"I know about this case," said Cai Fu. "You can bring him the rice."
Yan Qing thanked him and entered the prison. As Cai Fu was crossing the prefectural bridge, a waiter hailed him respectfully.
"There's a customer upstairs in our tea-house, Superintendent. He's waiting to speak to you."
Cai Fu went upstairs with the waiter and found Li Gu the chief steward. The two exchanged courtesies.
"What can I do for you, Chief Steward?"
"I've never concealed from you my good side or my evil. You know all about me, Superintendent. Tonight, I want you to finish him off. I've no other way to show my respect, but here are fifty ounces of gold in scallion shape. I'll take care of the other court officials and functionaries myself."
Cai Fu laughed. "Haven't you read what's carved on the tablet in front of the court? It's easy to oppress the people but hard to deceive Heaven. You're so crooked you cheat yourself. Do you think I don't know? You've taken over his property and stolen his wife, and you offer me a paltry fifty ounces of gold to kill him! If the Inspector General came down here and checked on me, I hate to think of the charge I'd have to face!"
"If it's not enough, Superintendent, I can add another fifty."
"Li Gu, you're the kind who would feed his cat its own tail! Are you trying to tell me that Lu Junyi, well-known magnate of the Northern Capital, is worth only one hundred gold ounces? Get this straight—I'll need five hundred ounces of gold, if you expect me to do him in!"
"I have them here. You can have the whole amount, as long as you do the job tonight."
Cai Fu took the gold and concealed it on his person. He stood up. "You can call for the body tomorrow morning." Li Gu thanked him, and happily departed.
Cai Fu returned home. No sooner had he arrived than a man raised the door curtain and entered.
"How do you do, Superintendent," the visitor said. A handsome man, he wore a round-collared gown the deep green of a raven's wing, a girdle with a buckle of mutton-fat jade. His turban was like the crown of a crested goose, his shoes were encrusted with pearls. He kowtowed before Cai Fu.
The superintendent hastily returned the salutation. "What is your name sir," he asked, "and what do you want to see me about?"
"It would be better if we talked inside."
Cai Fu invited his visitor into a conference alcove, where they seated themselves as host and guest. The caller opened the conversation.
"Don't be alarmed, Superintendent. I'm from the Henghai Shire of Cangzhou Prefecture. My name is Chai Jin. I'm a direct descendent of the Zhou emperors, and I'm known as the Small Whirlwind. Because I'm chivalrous and generous, I've become acquainted with members of the gallant fraternity everywhere. Unfortunately, I committed a crime and had to take refuge in Liangshan Marsh. I'm here today on orders of brother Song Jiang to inquire about Lu the Magnate. Who would have thought that due to the connivance of corrupt officials, an adulterous wife and her wicked lover, he would be cast into a cell for the condemned! His life is hanging by a thread, and his fate is in your hands. I'm calling at your home to tell you this, with no fear of the consequences to myself. If, with Buddha-like compassion, you keep Lu in this world, we shall not forget your great virtue. But if you permit an error even half the size of a grain of rice to occur, our soldiers will surround your city, our generals will arrive at your moats, and we'll smash our way in and slaughter the entire population, good and bad, old and young! We have long known that you are a bold fellow who is chivalrous and faithful. For want of a proper gift, we can present you only with a thousand ounces of gold. Now, if you want to arrest me, go ahead. Bind me with ropes. I swear I won't so much as frown."
In a cold sweat, Cai Fu was afraid to speak. Chai Jin rose. "When a gallant man does something, he doesn't dilly-dally. Let's have your answer."
"Please go back, sir. I can handle this."
"We have your promise. Your kindness will be rewarded." Chai Jin stepped out the door and summoned his companion. He took from him the gold and placed it in Cai Fu's hands. Then he bid the superintendent a courteous farewell and departed. The companion was none other than Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller—another man not easily put off.
But Cai Fu wasn't sure how to go about it. He thought for some time, then returned to the prison and conferred with his brother.
"Ordinarily, you're good at making decisions," said Cai Qing. "A small matter like this—what's so hard about it! As the old saying goes: 'Prove a killing with a show of blood, a rescue must be thorough or it's not any good.' Since we've got a thousand ounces of gold, we'll spread some of it around, high and low. Governor Liang and Clerk Zhang both have itchy palms. Once they've taken the bribes, they'll naturally spare Lu's life, and simply exile him to some distant place or other. Whether he's rescued or not is up to the bold fellows of Liangshan Marsh. We can only do our part."
"That suits me fine. Transfer Magnate Lu to a better place of confinement, and see to it that he gets good food and drink every day. Let him know what we're doing."
The two brothers came to an agreement. They secretly dispensed gold high and low, judiciously placing their bribes.
The next day, learning that nothing had happened, Li Gu went to Cai Fu's home and urged him to take action. Cai Qing said: "We were about to do it, but Governor Liang wouldn't permit us. He has ordered that Lu's life be spared. You work on the higher-ups. If they give us the word, there won't be any problem."
Li Gu sent an intermediary with money to see Governor Liang. But the governor only said: "This is a matter for the superintendent in charge of the prisons. Am I supposed to kill him myself? In a day or two I'll tell him to see to it."
Thus the governor and the superintendent each pushed the decision off onto the other. Clerk Zhang, who had received money from Li Gu, kept postponing a final disposition of the case. But Cai Fu came to him with another bribe and urged him to get it settled. Zhang drafted a judgment and brought it to Governor Liang.
"How shall we dispose of this?" asked the governor.
"It seems to me that although there's a complaint against Lu, there isn't any real evidence. He did stay in Liangshan Marsh for a long time, true, but he was inveigled into it, and we can't get at the real culprit. Give him forty blows and exile him three thousand li. How does that sound to Your Excellency?"
"Very intelligent. It suits me perfectly."
The governor directed Cai Fu to bring Lu Junyi before him. In open court he had the cangue removed, read aloud the confession, and imposed a beating of forty blows. A leafed iron cangue of twenty catties was then locked around Lu's neck and the governor sentenced the prisoner to Shamen Island. He instructed Dong Chao and Xue Ba to escort him there under guard.
These two originally had been policemen in Kaifeng Prefecture, and been ordered privately to kill Lin Chong while taking him to Cangzhou. Because they failed to do so, Marshal Gao Qiu had found an excuse for banishing them to the Northern Capital. Governor Liang, discovering that they were a competent pair, had added them to his staff. Now he directed them to escort Lu into exile.
Dong and Xue received the official sentence document and took Lu the Magnate from court to the dispatch office, and there had him detained. The guards then went home to pack their luggage and prepare for the journey.
When Li Gu heard about this, he groaned. He sent a man to invite the two guards for a chat. Li Gu received Dong Chao and Xue Ba at a tavern, conducted them to seats in a private room, and there served them with food and wine. After each had drunk three cups, Li Gu spoke.
"I won't try to deceive you—Lu the Magnate is my enemy. He is being banished to Shamen Island, which is a long way from here, but he hasn't a penny, and you two will have to foot all your own travel expenses. Even if you move very quickly, the round trip will take you at least three or four months. I haven't any proper gift, only these two silver ingots to burden your hands. When you reach a convenient place, a number of li away, or at most two stages from here, kill him. Bring back the tattoo on his face as proof and I'll give you each fifty ounces of gold in addition. All you have to do is write up some false report. I'll attend to the people in the governor's office."

Dong and Xue looked at each other. There was a long silence. The large silver ingots were a strong temptation.
"I'm only afraid we couldn't bring it off," Dong said.
"Brother," Xue remonstrated, "Master Li is a fine gentleman. We ought to do this for him. If ever we have any problems, he'll surely look after us."
"I never forget a favor," said Li Gu. "I'll gradually repay you."
The two guards accepted the silver, said goodbye, returned to their quarters, and gathered their luggage. The same night, they set out.
"I'm still in pain from the beating I had today," said Lu. "Couldn't we start tomorrow?"
"Shut your friggin mouth," said Xue. "It's rotten luck for gents like us to be stuck with a pauper like you! To Shamen Island and back is over six thousand li. Travel expenses are going to be enormous, but you haven't a penny. How are we going to manage!"
"Have pity. I've been wrongfully convicted."
"You rich usually won't even give a fellow a hair off their hide," said Dong. "Well, Heaven isn't blind, and now you're getting what you deserve! Don't complain. We'll help you walk."
Lu could only swallow his anger and move along. They left through the East Gate, and the guards hung their luggage and umbrellas on Lu Junyi's cangue. As a prisoner, there was nothing he could do about it.
By dusk, they had covered fourteen or fifteen li. There was a town ahead, and they looked for a place to spend the night. The waiter led them to a room in the rear and they set down their bundles.
"We are, after all, gentlemen of the police," Xue Ba said to Lu. "Are we to dance attendance on a prisoner? If you want to eat, cook up some rice!"
Lu had no choice but to go to the kitchen, with the cangue around his neck, and ask the waiter for fuel stalks. He twisted these into a bundle and made a fire in the stove. The waiter put rice on to boil and washed bowls and chopsticks for him. Lu had been born rich, and he didn't know how to do these things. The fuel was wet. It didn't burn well, and kept going out. Lu blew hard to keep it alight, and got his eyes full of ashes.
Dong grumbled and scolded. When the rice was cooked, the two guards helped themselves. Lu dared not take anything. The two finished eating, and allowed Lu to have the remainder of their soup and their cold rice. Xue cursed him continuously.
The meal over, Xue ordered Lu to heat water so that they could wash their feet. Only when the water was boiling hot did Lu venture to sit down in the room. The guards finished bathing their feet, then brought a basin of sizzling water for Lu. The moment he removed his straw sandals, Xue plunged his feet into the water. The pain was agonizing.
"A gentleman waits on you, and you have the nerve to grimace," snarled Xue.
The guards chained Lu behind the door, where he groaned all night. They themselves slept on the brick kang bed. At the fourth watch they got up and ordered the waiter to make breakfast. They ate, gathered their bundles and prepared to set forth. Lu's feet were blistered from the scalding. He could scarcely stand. What's more, it was a rainy autumn day, and the road was slippery. Lu skidded and stumbled with every step. Xue drove him on with blows of his staff, while Dong pretended to urge leniency. Xue complained and grumbled all along the way. They travelled more than ten li and came to a large forest.
"I really can't move," said Lu. "Have pity and let me rest."
The guards led him into the forest as the east was turning light. No one else was abroad.
"My partner and I got up very early this morning." Xue Ba said to Lu. "We're quite tired and would like to take a nap. But we're afraid you'll run away."
"Even if I sprouted wings I couldn't escape."
"We're not going to let you trick us. I'll tie you up." With the rope he had hanging at his waist Xue bound Lu around the middle to a pine tree, then pulled his feet back and fastened them as well.
"Go to the edge of the forest and keep watch, brother," Xue said to Dong. "Cough as a signal if anyone comes."
"Brother, do the job quickly!"
"Don't worry. Just keep watch."
Xue raised his official staff. "You mustn't blame us two," he said to Lu. "Your steward Li Gu told us to kill you during the journey. You'd die anyway after you got to Shamen Island. It's better to dispatch you here. Don't complain about us in the Nether Regions. A year from now will be the first anniversary of your death!"
His tears falling like rain, Lu lowered his head and waited to die. Xue raised his staff with both hands and started a blow at Lu's temple. Dong, on the edge of the forest, heard a thud, and he hurried back to look. The magnate was still tied to the tree, but Xue was lying face up at Lu's feet, the staff dropped to one side.
"Strange," Dong muttered. "Did he swing so hard that he tripped and fell?"
Dong tried to help him up, but couldn't budge him. Then he saw that blood was flowing from Xue's mouth, and three or four inches of a slender arrow protruded from his chest. Before Dong could yell, a man sitting in a tree to the northeast cried: "Here it is!" A bowstring twanged and an arrow lodged itself in Dong's throat. His feet flew up and he landed heavily.
The man leaped down from his perch, whipped out a dagger, cut the ropes binding Lu, and smashed open the cangue around his neck. Then he threw his arms around the magnate and wept aloud. Lu opened his eyes and recognize Yan Qing.
"Is this my ghost meeting you now?" Lu cried.
"I waited outside the chancellery and followed you and the guards," said Yan Qing. "The rogues wanted to kill you in this forest! But with two arrows from my crossbow I finished them both. Did you see it?"
"You've saved my life," said Lu. "But killing those two guards makes my crime more severe. Where can I go?"
"It was Song Jiang who started all this trouble. Where else except Mount Liangshan?"
"My wounds still hurt from the beating and my feet are torn. I can't walk."
"You mustn't delay. I'll carry you on my back."
Yan Qing kicked the two bodies aside, picked up his crossbow, tucked his dagger in its sheath, collected the official staves, lifted Lu onto his back, and headed east. By the time he had walked ten li or so, he was exhausted. They saw a small village inn, entered, and asked for a room. They bought some meat and wine to appease their hunger. For the time being, they remained at the inn.

Passers-by found the bodies of the two guards in the forest. The chief of the nearby hamlet informed the local village head, who in turn notified Daming Prefecture. An officer sent to investigate identified the victims as Dong Chao and Xue Ba, police guards in the governor's chancellery.
Governor Liang, on receiving the report, instructed the Inspector of Police of Daming to apprehend the criminals within a fixed time. Police, examining the scene of the crime, said: "These crossbow arrows are clearly Yan Qing's. We'd better move fast." Nearly two hundred policemen went separately to every home and inn in every town and village far and near and put up "Wanted" posters describing the two culprits in detail.
Lu Junyi, unable to walk, stayed at the inn recovering from his wounds. When the waiter heard about the murder, he could talk of nothing else. He noted the resemblance of his guests to the sketches in the "Wanted" posters, and hurried to the hamlet chief.
"There are two strange men staying at our inn," he said. "I wonder whether they could be the ones?"
The hamlet chief relayed this information to the authorities.

In search of something tasty, Yan Qing went with his crossbow to the nearby fields and shot some game. On his return, he found the whole village in an uproar. He hid in a grove of trees and watched. Two hundred policemen, armed with spears and swords, surrounded Lu Junyi, who was bound on a cart which was being pushed away. Yan Qing wanted to rush out and save him, but he had no military equipment, and could only groan.
"If I don't go to Mount Liangshan and get Song Jiang to come to the rescue," thought Yan Qing. "I'll be throwing my master's life away!"
He left immediately. He was still travelling by the middle of the night. He was hungry, but he hadn't any money. Yan Qing came to a small hill. It was covered with underbrush and had a few trees. He went into a grove and slept till daylight. He awoke very depressed. A magpie was chattering in a tree.
"If I can shoot that down," he thought, "I can beg some boiling water from a villager and cook it. That will ease my hunger pangs."
Emerging from the grove, he looked up. The bird cawed at him raucously. Yan Qing softly removed his crossbow from its sheath and offered a silent prayer: "I've only this one arrow. If my master is going to be saved, let it bring the magpie down. If my master is fated to die, let the magpie fly away unscathed."
He fitted the arrow to the string and shouted: "Bow, don't fail me!" The trigger mechanism twanged and the arrow hit the bird in the tail. It flew down the hill, the arrow trailing from its rump. Yan Qing gave chase, but he lost sight of his quarry.
While he was searching, he saw two men coming his way. The one in the lead wore a turban shaped like a pig's snout. Gold-traced silver rings dangled at the back of his head. A gown of fragrant black silk was bound at the waist by a gold-figured sash. He was shod in hempen sandals over soft stockings that reached his knees, and he carried a staff as high his eyebrows. The man behind had a broad-brimmed white felt hat on his head, a tea-colored gown with embroidered sleeves, a pink purse at his middle, and heavy leather shoes. On his back was a bundle of clothing. He carried a short cudgel. A knife hung at his waist.
They passed so close by, they almost brushed shoulders with Yan Qing. He turned and looked after them and thought: "I have no travelling money. If I knock those two down and take the purse it will be easier for me to get to Liangshan Marsh."
He hung his bow behind him and followed. The two, heads down, were concentrating on walking. Yan Qing caught up with the rear man in the felt hat. He punched him square in the back and knocked him down. But before he could hit the man in front, the fellow raised his staff and cracked Yan Qing on the left shin, tumbling him to the ground. The rear man meanwhile got up, planted a foot on Yan Qing, pulled out a dagger and poised to stab.
"Bold fellow," Yan Qing cried, "it doesn't matter if I die, but who will deliver my message?"
The man hesitated and lowered his arm, then pulled Yan Qing up. "What message have you, knave?"
"Why do you ask?"
The other man grasped Yan Qing's hand and pulled it forward, exposing the tattooing on his wrist. "Aren't you Yan Qing, the one they call the Prodigy, in the household of Lu the Magnate?" he asked.
Yan Qing thought: "One way or another, I'm going to die. I might as well tell the truth and let him arrest me, so that I can go to the next world with my master!" Aloud, he said: "Yes, I am!"
The two men laughed. "It's a good thing we didn't kill you. So you're young brother Yan! Do you know who we are? I am Yang Xiong the Pallid. And this is Shi Xui the Rash."
"We've been ordered by brother Song Jiang to proceed to the Northern Capital and inquire about Lu the Magnate," said Yang Xiong. "Our Military Advisor and Dai Zong have also come down from the mountain and are waiting for news."
Yan Qing told them everything that had transpired, and Yang said: "In that case I'll take you to brother Song Jiang in the fortress and we can decide what to do. Shi Xiu, go on to the Northern Capital, see what you can find out, and report back."
"Right," said Shi Xiu. He gave Yan Qing a muffin and dried meat to eat, and left him his bundle to carry.
The Prodigy went with Yang Xiong. They travelled through the night to the mountain fortress, where Yan Qing met Song Jiang and told the story in full. Shocked, Song Jiang summoned his chieftains for a conference.

We'll talk now of Shi Xiu. With only the clothes he wore on his back, he arrived at the outskirts of the Northern Capital. It was already turning dark and he was unable to enter the city, so he rested that night outside. He went in the next morning after breakfast.
He observed that people were sighing, and seemed quite downcast. Puzzled, he proceeded to the center of town. The door of every home was closed. He asked an old man what was wrong.
"Traveller, you wouldn't know," the old man replied. "Here in the Northern Capital we have a Lu the Magnate. He's one of our richest men. He was snatched away by the robbers of Liangshan Marsh and managed to escape. But when he came home he was convicted on a wrongful charge and sentenced to Shamen Island. Somehow, on the way, the two guards escorting him were killed. Last night, Lu was captured again, and today, at the third quarter afternoon, he's going to be executed here in the middle of the city! You'll be able to see it."
To Shi Xiu the news was like a douse of icy water. He walked on. At the main intersection was a two-storied tavern. He entered, went up the stairs, and sat down in a small room overlooking the street.
"Are you having other guests, or are you drinking alone, sir?" the waiter asked.
Shi Xiu glared. "A big bowl of wine and a large platter of meat. Just bring them and let's not have any friggin questions!"
Startled, the waiter poured two measures of wine and sliced a large platter of beef. Shi Xiu ate and drank steadily. Before long, he heard a growing hubbub in the street below. He looked out the window. The door of every home and shop was shut tight.
The waiter came up the stairs and said: "You must be drunk, sir! There's going to be a public execution down there. Pay your bill and go someplace else, quickly!"
"That stuff doesn't scare me. Get out of here before I give you a taste of my fists!"
Not daring to reply, the waiter went back downstairs.
On the street gongs crashed and drums thundered. Shi Xiu watched from his window. Crowds jammed all sides of the execution place. A dozen pairs of guards, bearing swords or staves, pulled and pushed Lu forward and compelled him to kneel outside the tavern building. Iron Arm Cai Fu carried the official sword of execution. Single Blossom Cai Qing held Lu's cangue.
"Magnate Lu," said Cai Fu, "you can see for yourself. It isn't that we two didn't want to save you. Circumstances are forcing us to do this! We've already arranged a seat for you in that Temple of the Five Saints ahead. Your soul can go there and claim it."
From the crowd a voice shouted: "It's three quarters afternoon!"
Cai Qing removed Lu's cangue and grasped his head. Cai Fu raised the executioner's sword. The clerk read in a loud voice the crimes listed on the condemned man's placard. The crowd of spectators gasped in anticipation. And with that sound, Shi Xiu, dagger in hand at the upstairs window of the tavern, let out a yell: "The bold fellows of Mount Liang Marsh are all here!" Cai Fu and Cai Qing pushed Lu aside, grabbed the ropes that had bound him, and ran. Shi Xiu leaped down from the window and wielded his steel knife, killing men like hacking melons and slicing vegetables. He downed a dozen or more before they could get away. He grabbed Lu with one hand and pushed south. Shi Xiu didn't know the Northern Capital streets, and Lu was too stunned to do more than stumble along. Governor Liang was astounded when he heard the news. He immediately summoned his highest commanders and directed them to have their soldiers seal off all 4 city gates. He sent his entire police force after the fugitives. Pursued by fast horses and powerful troops, could Shi Xiu and Lu the Magnate scale the high city walls and towering ramparts? Where could they go? They had no claws for burrowing into the ground, and no wings to fly them up to the blue sky.

Now the Unicorn, although a bold fighter, was quite helpless in the water, and White Eel had capsized the boat and knocked him in. What happened next was that White Eel grasped him by the waist under the water and swam to the other shore. Having relieved him of his weapon, he hauled the man out onto the bank. Torches had been lit and the forty or fifty men waiting there to receive the Unicorn surrounded him, took off his sword, stripped him of all his wet clothing, and were about to tie him up.
At this point the Magic Messenger shouted out an order: "Do not harm Mr. Lu in any way!" Someone was immediately sent with a padded cotton coat and silk robe for the Unicorn to put on. Eight soldiers came with a sedan chair, helped him into it and set off. Before long a score or more of red silk lanterns became visible in the distance, illuminating a small group of horsemen who were advancing to meet them to the beating of drums. At the head of them were Song Jiang, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun. Behind were all the other leaders. They all dismounted and the Unicorn hurriedly descended from the sedan chair. Song Jiang knelt first, and then all the other leaders in turn knelt down.
The Unicorn also knelt to return the courtesy. He said: "Since you have captured me, I would ask you to grant me a quick death."
Song Jiang smiled and said: "Please get into the sedan chair again." They all mounted, the music started up again and they rode up through the three gates till they reached the Ceremonial Hall. There they dismounted and the Unicorn was led into the hall, which was brilliantly illumined with lamps and candles.
Song Jiang came forward and spoke, in a very friendly tone. "Your great reputation has long sounded like thunder in my ears," he said. "Today I have the great good fortune to meet you. It is a pleasure I shall never forget. But I fear we have given you cause for annoyance and I beg you humbly to forgive us."
Next the Professor came forward and said: "The other day I told your fortune. I had been entrusted with visiting you to tell your fortune in order to get you here, to join the great enterprise, so together we can follow heaven's path."
Song Jiang now asked the Unicorn to take the first place among the leaders. The Unicorn replied modestly: "I have no talent, no knowledge or ability, I would count a thousand deaths light punishment, why do you jest with me?"
"How could we jest with you?" Song Jiang reassured him. "We value your nobility as those who hunger and thirst value food and water. Our greatest desire is that you will not leave our humble place but stay as our leader, ever to be obeyed by us."
The Unicorn replied: "Better for me to die, when living is so painful."
The Professor said: "Let's talk about it later."
Wine was poured and food prepared for his entertainment. The Unicorn had no alternative but to accept a few cups, and then a soldier took him to an inside room to sleep.
Next day Song Jiang had sheep and horses slaughtered and gave a big feast to which the Unicorn was invited. He had to be asked many times before he would sit down with them. After several rounds of wine Song Jiang stood up, cup in hand, and said ingratiatingly: "Last night I fear we offended you. I sincerely apologize. Although this stronghold of ours is so small and unworthy, hardly fit for your horse, for the sake of 'honour and loyalty,' two concepts we consider pre-eminent, I beg you to accept this position. Please do not refuse."
"You are mistaken in this," the Unicorn replied. "It was through no fault of my own that I became involved. Besides, I have some family dependents. I was born loyal to the dynasty, I must die loyal to the dynasty. I would rather die than agree to your proposal."
Although the Professor and each of the other leaders pleaded with him, the Unicorn refused to become an outlaw. Finally, the Professor said: "If you are not willing, how can we force you? We have implored you to stay, but it is not to your liking. All we can say is that since you are already here, although you do not want to join us, please allow us to entertain you here for a few days before we send you home."
"I have no objection," the Unicorn said. "Only I am afraid that the members of my family will be worried not having news of me."
"That's no problem," said the Professor. "We will send Manager Li back first with the wagons. You can go a few days later, what's wrong with that?"
The Professor asked Manager Li if he had all his wagons and merchandise.
Manager Li replied: "There's nothing at all missing."
Song Jiang ordered two large silver ingots to be brought and gave them to Manager Li. Two smaller ones were shared by the servants. He gave ten pieces of white silver to the wagon drivers. They all thanked him. The Unicorn said to Manager Li: "You know all about my situation. When you get back tell my wife not to worry. I shall be back in three or four days' time."
Manager Li was eager to get away and wasted no time in replying: "That's fine." Then he said goodbye and left the Ceremonial Hall. The Professor immediately after stood up and said: "Now Mr. Lu, just you relax and sit here for a little while. I will see Manager Li off down the mountain."

This was in fact just a pretext. What the Professor did was go first to Golden Sands Landing and wait. In a little while Manager Li with the two servants, the wagons, the oxen and their other companions came down the mountain. The Professor, surrounded by five hundred troops, was sitting under a willow tree. He called Manager Li over and said: "Your master has come to an agreement with us. He has taken the second place in our command. But this was already set out in a four-verse poem before he even came here. It's written on the wall in his house. Let me explain it to you. There are twenty-eight characters written on the wall, and each line contains an important word. 'Through the reeds a small boat steers' contains the word reeds, which is the same as your master's name, Lu. 'All of a sudden a hero appears' contains the word hero, the first part of your master's given name. 'The loyal man seeks a way out' contains the word loyal, the second part of his given name. 'Nothing to do but to turn about' contains the word turn. So in the four lines taken together you can find reeds — hero — loyal — turn, or in other words, Lu Junyi turns. What do you expect from us here on the mountain? Originally we were going to kill you all, but then we decided that it would reflect badly on our company. So now we are letting you go, to travel back as fast as possible. Do not expect your master to return home."

Manager Li and his companions thanked him profusely. The Professor ordered the boat to take them across the water and the whole caravan set off, hastening back to the Northern Capital. It was really a case of "Once off the hook the turtle stretches out his tail and shakes his head and doesn't look back."

Now our story divides in two. Let us leave Manager Li and the rest to journey home, while we return with the Professor to the Ceremonial Hall. He rejoined the banquet and flattered the Unicorn with a skilful tongue. The feasting continued until the second watch.

Next day when another feast was held in his honour, the Unicorn said: "I am most grateful to you all for inviting me, but I have to tell you that each day is like a year to me until I can leave."

Song Jiang said: "Unworthy as I am I have had the good fortune to make your acquaintance. I would like to offer you a little drinking party so that we can sit down and chat together. I hope you will not refuse me this." So another day passed.

Song Jiang was host on the next day, the Professor the day after, and Taoist Gongsun the day after that. To cut a long story short, more than thirty of the leaders in the hall took it in turn to host a feast and the days ticked by, the sun and moon going to and fro like a weaver's shuttle. Soon well over a month was gone. As he contemplated this, the Unicorn became ever more anxious to leave. Song Jiang said: "We won't try to keep you, when we know how eager you are to return home. But we must have one last little farewell celebration before you start."

Song Jiang's farewell for the Unicorn was held next day. And then all the other leaders came to the Unicorn and said: "We know our leader honours you greatly, but we honour you even more highly! If you'll only accept his hospitality and not ours, it's like valuing a brick more highly than a tile!" And Iron Ox who was among them cried out: "I risked my life to go to the Northern Capital and invite you here. If you won't accept hospitality from my brothers and myself, I shall take it as an insult that nothing will ever wipe out."

This made the Professor laugh. "What a way of inviting someone!" he said. "That's totally uncouth! Please forgive him, Mr. Lu, and accept their good intentions. Stay just a little longer!" And so another four or five days slipped by. When the Unicorn was absolutely determined to go, the Strategist marched into the Ceremonial Hall with a group of others and began to speak: "Although we are all brothers here, we've a bone to pick all the same. Is there poison in the wine or something? If Mr. Lu doesn't see fit to accept what we offer, that's fair enough. Only it's a bit late to say so now that we've gone to all the trouble."

The Professor rose and said: "Don't get upset. I will plead for you with Mr. Lu to stay a little longer, and I don't see why he shouldn't agree. As the proverb says: 'No need to fight when a cup of wine will set things right'." The Unicorn could not refuse them all, so he stayed a few days more. Altogether that made nearly a month and a half. So since the time he left the Northern Capital in August more than two months had slipped by here on Mount Liang. It was now well into autumn, with its soft breezes and refreshing dew, and the Mid-Autumn Festival was fast approaching. The Unicorn was really missing home and he said so. When Song Jiang saw that he was seriously homesick, he said: "That's no problem. Tomorrow we'll take you down to Golden Sands Landing and send you on your way." The Unicorn expressed his gratitude. As the poem says:

Away from your native mountains, the days pass slowly;
Not a day but the heart longs for home.
At these times a man wishes for wings
To waft him on the winds of heaven over the water.

Next day the Unicorn's original clothes, his sword and his staff were restored to him and all the leaders escorted him down the mountain. Song Jiang offered him a tray of gold and silver as a leaving present, but he refused it, saying: "I do not mean to boast, but I have plenty of this sort of thing at home. All I need is just some travelling expenses to get me to the Northern Capital. A gift like this I definitely cannot accept."

Song Jiang and the others then took him to Golden Sands Landing and said goodbye. Of this no more.

We shall not speak of Song Jiang's return to the camp, but of the Unicorn as he sets off and hastens homeward. In ten days he reached the capital. It was already getting dark so he didn't enter the city but stopped outside at an inn. He departed next morning at dawn and raced towards the city. He had not gone half a mile when he met someone with a ragged headcloth and clothes full of holes who after regarding him attentively pressed his knuckles to his forehead and prostrated himself. Looking carefully, the Unicorn recognized the Prodigy. "How do you come to be in such a state, lad?" he asked.

"This is not a good place to talk," the Prodigy said.

The Unicorn led him round the corner of an earthen rampart and then began to question him closely. The Prodigy said: "Not more than two weeks after you left, Manager Li came back and said to the mistress: 'The Master has given his allegiance to Song Jiang of the Marshes of Mount Liang and accepted the position of second-in-command.' He also went to the authorities and denounced you. He and the mistress had already come to an agreement, and they took umbrage when I disapproved, so they threw me out. They only let me take a single suit of clothes and then hounded me out of the city. They even told all the family and friends that anyone who gave me shelter would forfeit half his possessions and be reported to the authorities, so no one dared have anything to do with me. Since I could find nowhere to stay in the city I had to come out here and beg for a living. At the moment I am sleeping in the street. At first I thought of going to Mount Liang to find you, but I didn't want to do anything in a hurry. If you are thinking of returning from the Marshes, please listen to me and go back there at once. Don't even stop to think about it. If you go into the city you'll be caught in a trap."

The Unicorn shouted: "My wife is not like that! Shut your mouth!"

The Prodigy said: "Master, you can't see what's in front of your nose! What do you know about it? All you ever think about is martial arts, you don't know anything about women. Your wife had a relationship with Manager Li long ago. Now they're quite open about it, like husband and wife. If you go back there you'll meet your end!"

The Unicorn was outraged. He yelled at the Prodigy. "My family has been in the Northern Capital for five generations, everyone knows them. What kind of position does Li Gu have, how could he try something like that on? Most probably you've done something terrible yourself, and now you're trying to tell it the other way round. I'm going to go home and find out the truth of all this. You haven't heard the end of it!"

Weeping copiously, the Prodigy flung himself on the ground and tried to grasp the hem of his master's robe. The Unicorn spurned him with his foot and stalked off into the city.

When he entered his house all the employees looked very frightened. Manager Li hurried to meet him and then took him into the hall and prostrated himself. The Unicorn asked: "Where is the Prodigy?"

Manager Li replied: "You'd better not ask, Master. It's a long story and I'm afraid it will make you angry. I'll tell you later when you've rested."

The Unicorn's wife now appeared from behind the screen, weeping. "Don't cry," the Unicorn said to her. "Just tell me what has happened to the Prodigy."

"Don't ask now," she said. "I'll tell you all in good time."

The Unicorn was beginning to have doubts. He persisted in asking about the Prodigy, so Manager Li said: "Change your clothes and have some breakfast first, Master. Then we can talk about it."

He set about ordering food for his master. Just as the Unicorn raised the chopsticks, a tremendous knocking was heard at the front door and the back door and several hundred policemen burst in. The Unicorn was too shocked to do anything so they tied him up and drove him with a blow at every step to the detention cells. Governor Liang was presiding in the court at the time with his officers drawn up in two ranks on either side and some eighty or so ferocious guards. The Unicorn was flung down before the bench, while his wife and Manager Li knelt to one side. The Governor shouted out: "You're supposed to be a respectable citizen of the Northern Capital, you villain. What do you mean by going to hobnob with the brigands on Mount Liang and accepting the second position among their leaders? I hear you're even conspiring with them to attack this city! But we've got you now. What have you got to say for yourself?"

The Unicorn said: "Fool that I am, I was deceived by 'Professor' Wu Yong from Mount Liang, who came to my house disguised as a fortune-teller. He lured me to the mountain and they held me there under house arrest for over two months. Now I've managed to escape and return home. I swear I am innocent. I rely on your justice."

Governor Liang said: "Why keep pretending? If you weren't in league with that Mount Liang lot, why did you stay there so long? Your wife and Manager Li have already lodged an accusation, so someone's not telling the truth."

Manager Li said: "Master, since you're here you had better confess. I have seen the coded poem about rebellion on the wall in your house. It's the strongest possible evidence. You haven't got a leg to stand on!"

His wife said: "We didn't mean to harm you. We were just afraid you would get us involved. As the proverb says: 'For every traitor nine relatives pay the price'."

Kneeling before the bench, the Unicorn began to cry out that he was unjustly accused. Manager Li said: "It's not true that you've been unjustly accused. It's just that the truth can't be hidden, lies get found out. Hurry up and confess, so you won't have to be tortured."

The wife said: "Husband, falsehood won't easily pass into a court of law, the truth is hard to oppose. You go and get yourself into trouble and you ruin me as well. It's a fact of life that flesh is delicate but the cane has no feelings. Why not confess? You'll only get a limited sentence if you do."

Since Manager Li had given out money to everyone, Registrar Zhang declared to the court: "This feckless vagabond will never confess until he's beaten!"

"Hear, hear!" said the Governor. "Beat him!" he thundered. His officers bound the Unicorn and threw him down on the ground. No need to tell what happened. They beat him till the skin split and the blood streamed down. Three times he fainted. No chance here for the Unicorn to show off his martial skills! He could only look to heaven and sigh: "If it is my fate to suffer calamity, I'd better make a false confession and be done with it."

Registrar Zhang took down the confession and the one hundred catty cangue of a man condemned to die was imposed. The Unicorn was taken to the main prison and locked up. Onlookers inside and outside the court-house were deeply shocked. On entering the gaol the Unicorn received thirty more vicious blows of the cane. He was taken under escort to the inmost office and made to kneel before the warden's bench.

The warden pointed a finger at him and said: "Do you know who I am?"

The Unicorn dared not make a sound. It was in fact the warden of the two prisons, who also doubled as public executioner. His name was Cai Fu and he was a native of the Northern Capital. Because of his great strength, people called him Strongarm. Beside him stood his brother whose name was Cai Qing. He was the under-warden. He always liked to carry a flower and the people of Hebei had dubbed him Blossom. He now stood beside Strongarm, leaning on his staff of office.

"Chuck this felon into the dungeon," Strongarm said. "I'm going to take a walk. I won't be long." Blossom led the Unicorn away.

When Strongarm left the prison, he went to see a certain person down by the city wall. The man was carrying a rice pot and his expression was gloomy. Strongarm knew that this was the Prodigy. "Young Yan," he said, "what are you doing?"

The Prodigy knelt down and looking up with tears in his eyes, said: "Warden, my friend, please be merciful to my master, Mr. Lu, who has been unjustly accused and sentenced and cannot even afford to have food sent him. I have managed to beg this half pot of rice outside the city to provide some relief for my master's hunger. But I beg you to tell me what I can do to help." So saying he continued to weep and prostrated himself.

Strongarm said: "I know all about it. You take the rice to him so he can eat."

The Prodigy thanked him and went into the prison with the rice.

Strongarm now proceeded as far as the city bridge. Here he met a teahouse keeper who shouted out a greeting and said: "Warden, I have a customer upstairs who wants a word with you."

When Strongarm went upstairs, who should he see but Manager Li. When they had greeted each other, Strongarm said: "What is it you want to say to me, Manager?"

Manager Li said: "I'll tell you no evil, I'll tell you no lies. My future is entirely in your hands. This evening I've some business that I want to get completely wrapped up. There's nothing special about it, but here is fifty taels of gold in garlic-shaped ingots. This is for you alone. I will take care of the other officers of the court myself."

Strongarm grinned and said: "Haven't you seen the warning in the courtoom which says: 'It's not difficult to oppress the people but Providence is never cheated'? Do you think I don't know all about this dirty business of yours? You've already taken his goods and seduced his wife and now you give me fifty taels of gold to finish him off. If they review the case later on, I'm the one who will be in trouble."

Manager Li said: "I can understand your anxiety. I'll give you another fifty taels."

Strongarm said: "Manager Li, you are trying to make the cat eat the tail you've just cut off! A man so famous in the Northern Capital as Mr. Lu — is he only worth a hundred taels of gold? If you really want me to destroy him, let me be honest with you, you'll need to give me at least five hundred."

"I've got the gold here, you can have it. I only want to be sure you'll finish the business a little later tonight."

Strongarm took the gold and tucked it away. Then he stood up and said: "You can come for the body tomorrow morning."

Manager Li thanked him and went away with a light heart.

Strongarm went home. As soon as he got in, a stranger pulled aside the front door curtain and entered.

"Good evening, Warden!" said the stranger boldly. He was a remarkably distinguished looking man, and extremely well dressed. He wore a round-collared robe, the hue of a raven's wing and the belt around his waist was fitted out with jade decorations. His feet were shod in slippers embroidered with pearls and on his head was a coronet decorated with pheasant's feathers. He bowed to Strongarm as he entered the courtyard.

Strongarm hurriedly returned the courtesy and said: "May I ask your name, sir? And what can I do for you?"

"Shall we talk inside?" said the other.

Strongarm took him to a little conference room and invited him sit in the place of honour.

"Do not be afraid, Warden," the stranger began. "My name is Chai Jin. My family are descended from the Zhou Emperor and people call me the Little Whirlwind. For reasons of chivalry and philanthropy I have come to know many of the world's brave men. I had the misfortune to infringe the law and took refuge in the Marshes of Mount Liang. I am here with a commission from our leader Song Jiang, to report news of Mr. Lu. Who would have thought that a conspiracy of greedy officials, corrupt officers, a faithless wife and a scheming lover would land him in prison, on death row, where his life hangs by a thread. And he is in your hands. Death is the lot of mortal men, but I am sent to tell you this: if you can preserve Mr. Lu's life the Buddha's eyes will smile on you and your magnanimity will not be forgotten. But if even a hair of his head is harmed an army will be at the city walls and when the defences are breached every head will roll, without distinction of person, wise or foolish, young or old! I have long heard that you are a loyal and honourable man. I have nothing worthy to give you, but I have here a thousand taels of pure gold, as a very small gift. If you think you should arrest me, then go ahead and tie me up, I will not take it amiss."

What he heard made Strongarm so nervous that he broke out in a cold sweat. For a long while he was quite unable to answer. Finally Chai Jin stood up and said: "It is for you now to act. Please do not waste my time. I must have a decision."

Finally Strongarm said: "You can leave, sir. I will make arrangements."

Chai Jin bowed and said: "If I have your word, then I thank you." As he went out of the door he gave orders to a follower who brought in the gold, handed it to Strongarm, saluted and left. This follower waiting outside was the Magic Messenger — another hero who was not to be taken lightly.

Strongarm could not decide what to do. He thought about it for a long long time. Finally he returned to the prison and told everything to his younger brother. The latter said: "Usually you are so decisive. This is an easy matter, what's the problem? As the proverb says: 'If you kill someone there's bound to be blood, if you want to save someone, do it properly!' Since you've got a thousand taels of gold here, let's both go and buy everyone off for him. Governor Liang and Registrar Zhang both love money. If they've got a bribe in their hands they won't let Mr. Lu suffer the death penalty. They'll probably just banish him or something, then whether he's rescued or not depends on his friends from the Marshes of Mount Liang. Anyway, we'll be shot of it."

Strongarm said: "That's exactly what I was thinking. Now you get Mr. Lu to a safe place, make sure he's got plenty of good wine and food, and tell him the news."

Having made up their minds, the two brothers quietly distributed gold to all and sundry to ensure their support.

Next day Manager Li, seeing no sign of activity, went to Strongarm's home to urge him to get a move on.

Strongarm answered: "We were just about to do him in when His Excellency forbade it. Orders were received that he was to be kept alive. But if you go to the top and persuade them to give the authorization, then I've no objection."

Manager Li accordingly sent someone with money for bribes. But when this man tried to hand the money over, Governor Liang said: "This is the Warden's business. Surely you don't expect me to do it myself? Just leave it a few days and then I'll tell him to do it."

Everyone was passing the buck. Registrar Zhang had received the gold already and all he wanted to do was postpone the case. Strongarm was busy handing out bribes and trying to arrange for an early hearing. Registrar Zhang collected up the papers and presented them to Governor Liang who said: "How are we going to resolve this case?"

Zhang said: "In my humble opinion, although there is a serious accusation against Mr. Lu, there is no concrete evidence. Although he spent a certain time on Mount Liang, it was at most involvement with crime, not a serious crime in itself. Give him forty strokes and banishment to a distance of a thousand miles. Would that do, do you think?"

"A very clear appraisal," said Liang. "Exactly what I had in mind." So then he ordered Strongarm to fetch Lu from the gaol. The cangue was removed in the courtroom, the confession and case summary were read, and he was sentenced to forty strokes. A new twenty catty cangue was imposed and the beating was administered in front of the courtroom. Then two guards, Dong Chao and Xue Ba were appointed to escort him to the island of Shamen, his place of exile. These two had served in the Eastern Capital force and had escorted Leopard's Head on the road to Cangzhou. Because they had failed to kill Leopard's Head they got into trouble with Marshal Gao when they returned and were banished to the Northern Capital. Governor Liang had seen how capable they were and had retained them on garrison duties. He now put Mr. Lu in their charge.

So the two guards left the court and placed the Unicorn in the cells while they went home to pack their things, ready for departure.

Meanwhile, when Manager Li got to hear about all this, he was flabbergasted. He sent someone to ask the two guards to come and meet him. When they arrived at the inn, he asked them to take a seat and offered them wine and food. After three cups, he announced: "I will be frank with you. Mr. Lu is my enemy. Now he has been banished to the island of Shamen. It's a long way and he hasn't a penny, so you will have to waste your own money on the journey. It will be at least three or four months before you get back. I can't give you very much, but please accept these two big silver ingots as an initial payment. After a couple of stages at most, or as little as a few miles if you come to a really quiet spot, finish him off, remove the golden seals from his cheeks and bring them back as proof. When you let me know it is done, each of you will receive fifty taels of gold in garlic-shaped ingots. All you need do is lodge a report at the garrison command, and I will take care of everything."

The two looked at each other. They spent a long time considering it. The sight of the two big ingots naturally aroused their greed.

Dong Chao said: "I'm just afraid it may not work out for us."

Xue Ba said: "Listen, Mr. Li is obviously a reliable person. If we do this business he'll be well disposed towards us. If there's any problems we can ask him to sort them out."

Manager Li said: "I'm not one to forget a favour. I shall repay you very thoroughly."

Having taken the money, the guards went home to get their luggage, in order to leave that evening. The Unicorn said: "I received the beating today and it's still exceedingly painful. Can't we start tomorrow?"

"You shut your fucking mouth!" Xue Ba shouted. "Just my luck to be saddled with a useless bugger like you! It's over two thousand miles to Shamen, there and back, we've practically no funds for the journey, you haven't got a cent yourself, how do they expect us to manage?"

The Unicorn said: "You really ought to show me some consideration, as a victim of unjust persecution."

Dong scolded: "You rich men, you're never ever willing to part with a cent! Now heaven has opened your eyes for you, it'll teach you a lesson! Stop feeling sorry for yourself; we'll give you a hand."

The Unicorn just had to grin and bear it. He was obliged to go with them, passing out of the city through the eastern gate. The guards hung their bundles of clothes and their umbrellas on his cangue. So there was the Unicorn, once a rich man, now a convict. There was nothing he could do about it. Another thing he had to bear was the late autumn weather, everywhere yellow leaves falling and the wild swans overhead, and nothing to be heard in this scene of desolation but the sound of a flute:

Somewhere a flute, expressing autumn's sense,
Stirring up feelings of sadness without reason,
So heartbreakingly sweet one cannot bear to listen:
How can such heartbreak be lodged in a mere sound!

As they escorted him on the road the two guards treated the Unicorn well or badly by turns. When it was nearly evening and they had done about eight miles, they came to a small market town and found themselves an inn to stay. The waiter took them to a room at the back where they deposited their bags. Xue Ba said: "It's a tough enough job being a policeman, I don't see why we should also have to slave for a convict. If you want anything to eat, go and light the stove, double-quick!"

So the Unicorn, still with his cangue on, had to go to the kitchen and ask the waiter to let him have some straw, which he tied into bundles and took to the stove to get the fire going. The waiter washed the rice for him and cleaned some bowls.

Now the Unicorn was a rich man by birth and was quite incapable of this kind of work. The straw and tinder were damp and it wouldn't light. When by dint of much blowing he managed to get it to take, the smoke got in his eyes and he couldn't see. Dong meanwhile was grumbling and cursing away. When the rice was finally cooked the two guards took it and the Unicorn did not dare ask for any. By the time they had finished, all that was left for the Unicorn to eat was the dregs of some soup and some cold rice.

Dong never ceased cursing the Unicorn. After supper he sent him off to heat water for washing. Whilst he was waiting for the water to boil, the Unicorn ventured to go and sit down. When they had washed their feet, the other two got a bowl of boiling water and encouraged the Unicorn to wash his feet in it. The moment he took off his sandals, Xue thrust his feet straight into the boiling water. The pain was excruciating. Xue said: "Here I am, serving you, and you go and make faces!" The two guards went to sleep by the stove. Using some wire they confined the Unicorn behind the door of their room. They had themselves woken some time before dawn and told the waiter to make breakfast. After eating their fill they packed their bags and were ready to start. But the Unicorn found that his feet had come out in blisters and he could hardly bear to put them down.

It rained heavily that day, too, and the path was slippery. The Unicorn staggered at every step. Xue seized him by the waist and belaboured him with his staff of office, Dong gave him false encouragement. All the way he was complaining of injustice and cursing his luck. When they had gone three or four miles they came to a forest and the Unicorn said: "I really cannot go any further. For pity's sake, please let us rest a while."

So they took him into the forest. The sky was just brightening in the east. There was no one about. Xue said: "We got up very early and we're tired. We could take a little nap here in the forest if I wasn't afraid you might run away."

The Unicorn said: "Even if I grew wings I couldn't go anywhere at the moment."

Xue said: "Let's hear no more from you. Just wait while I tie you up."

He removed a piece of rope he had round his waist and attached it to the Unicorn's waist. Then he put a turn round a pine tree. He took another turn round the Unicorn's legs, securing them to the tree. Then he said to Dong: "You go to the edge of the wood and keep a lookout. If you see anyone coming warn me by coughing."

"All right, but try and do it quickly," Dong said.

"Don't worry. You just go and keep watch," Xue said.

Xue picked up his staff. Looking the Unicorn in the eye he said: "Don't blame us. That manager of yours, Li Gu, he's the one what told us to finish you off on the road. But anyway, if you got to Shamen you'd be as good as dead there, so what's wrong with disposing of you a bit sooner? Only don't make no accusations against us when you get down below. This time next year it'll be your anniversary."

The Unicorn began to weep. He lowered his head, awaiting death. Xue lifted the staff in both hands. He fixed his eyes on the spot on the Unicorn's skull where he was going to bring the staff down. Dong, keeping watch outside, heard the thump of the blow and hurried back to look. The Unicorn was still tied to the tree. Xue was lying flat on his back under the tree; his staff had fallen to one side. "This is extraordinary!" Dong thought. "Is it possible he used so much force that he fell over?" He examined the lying man's face: there was no sign of life. Blood was coming from the mouth. From the breast protruded several inches of the slender shaft of an arrow. Before Dong had time to cry out, he saw a man sitting up in one corner of the tree. At the same moment he heard the twang of a bowstring and an arrow struck him in the head. His legs went from under him and he fell with a crash. The man in the tree leapt down and taking a knife that was tied to his wrist cut the Unicorn's bonds, smashed the cangue, supported the Unicorn and abandoned himself to tears.

When the Unicorn dared to open his eyes he recognized the Prodigy. "Is it really you, lad," he cried, "or is it a spirit impersonating you?"

The Prodigy said: "Ever since you left the garrison I have been following hard on the heels of those two scoundrels. I saw them lock you up in the guardhouse and I saw Manager Li go to talk with them. I suspected that they meant you no good, so I left the city that same night. When you were staying at the inn I waited outside. I got up before dawn and came here first to wait. I guessed it had to be here in this wood that they would set to work. I've finished them both off with arrows, do you see?"

When this Prodigy had the bow in his hand, he could loose three arrows in quick succession and every one would hit its mark.

The Unicorn said: "Although you've saved my life, you've killed these two guards, which makes my fault even graver. Where can we possibly go now?"

The Prodigy said: "It was Song Jiang who got you into trouble in the first place. There is nowhere else we can go now but to the Marshes of Mount Liang."

The Unicorn said: "The trouble is all my wounds from the beating have opened and my feet are all blistered, I simply can't move."

The Prodigy said: "We mustn't waste any time. I will carry you on my back."

The Unicorn went to the dead guards and took some silver from them. He picked up his bow, stuck his sword in its scabbard, took a police staff, hoisted the Unicorn onto his back and set off northwards. After little more than three miles he was exhausted. When they came to a little inn, he went in to ask for a room and buy some wine and food to allay the pangs of hunger. The two of them rested here for a while.

Meanwhile a traveller had come upon the two dead policemen in the forest. He reported it to a local headman who passed it on to the district chief and a report was sent to the capital. In due course an inspector was sent to investigate and he established that the dead men were Dong Chao and Xue Ba from the garrison command. This was reported to the Governor, who issued a warrant and fixed a time-limit for the arrest of the murderer. Various police officers came to look. "The arrows evidently belong to the Prodigy," they announced. "There is no time to lose." Several hundred police were sent out in all directions, to put up notices with descriptions of the two wanted men and to spread the word in villages, districts and inns far and near, and inform the people in towns and markets so as to enlist them in the hunt.

The Unicorn was at this time still at the village inn, recuperating from his beating, and as he still could not walk, there he had to stay. The waiter heard about the murder case and learnt that there was a description of two wanted men at the district office. Having seen it, he hurried to report to the local headman: "There are two pretty suspicious-looking people at our inn. I wonder if it could be them." The headman went to report to the police.

Now the Prodigy, because there was nothing to eat, had taken his bow and gone to look for some game round about. He was on his way back when he heard a lot of shouting in the village. He hid in the trees to observe, and saw several hundred fully armed police standing around, while the Unicorn was dragged away bound in a prison cart. He wanted to rush out and save him, but he had no proper weapon so all he could do was lament. "Unless I go to Mount Liang and tell Song Jiang and persuade him to come and help, I am going to be responsible for my master's death!" he thought.

He set off at once. Halfway through the night he felt terribly hungry. But he hadn't a cent on him. He reached the top of a ridge where there was a thicket of tangled trees and lay down to sleep till daybreak. His heart was heavy and he kept hearing the chattering of the magpies in the branches above him. He thought: "If I shot one I could get some water from the local people and cook it. That would relieve this hunger."

When he walked out of the wood and raised his eyes, a magpie was looking at him. He quietly took out his bow and silently questioned fate and prayed to heaven, as follows: "This is the only arrow I have left. If I am to save my master, may the arrow hit and the magpie fall from the sky; if my master is fated to die, let the magpie fly away before the arrow reaches it."

He fitted the arrow to the bow and cried out: "May good fortune not desert me!" The bow twanged and the arrow hit the magpie in the tail. With the arrow stuck in it, the magpie flew off down the hill. The Prodigy bounded in pursuit. But he couldn't find it. As he was searching, two men appeared in front of him. Here is what they looked like:

The foremost wears a scarf folded in the shape of a pig's snout, secured with two gold and silver rings at the back of the head, and a robe of very black silk. About his waist is a girdle of wrought gold, half length soft boots on his feet and he carries a staff of eyebrow height. The second wears a white felt hat to keep off the dust and a brown embroidered robe. His waist is girt with a purple belt and he wears leather walking shoes. He has a pack on his back, carries a short staff and a sword is stuck in his belt.

The two newcomers were walking side by side with the Prodigy. The Prodigy eyed them and thought to himself: "I've got no money. Suppose I knock them down with my two fists and take their bags? Then I can travel on to Mount Liang."

He turned away to hide his bow. The two men were walking along with lowered heads, their eyes on the road. The Prodigy stole up and hit the second man, the one who was wearing a felt hat, on the back of the head. He crashed to the ground. As he was about to hit the one in front, he was instead caught himself by a blow from the latter's staff which took him in the left leg and knocked him to the ground. The other now struggled to his feet and planting one foot on the Prodigy drew his sword and was about to strike without more ado. But the Prodigy cried: "Wait, sir! I am not afraid to die, but who will notify my master?"

Instead of striking the other stayed his hand while he asked: "What the devil has a villain like you got to notify?"

The Prodigy said: "Why do you ask?"

The man in front now pulled the Prodigy's sleeve and the tattoo was exposed. He asked excitedly: "Aren't you someone from Mr. Lu's household, the Prodigy or something like that?"

The Prodigy thought to himself. "I'll die anyway, I might as well speak and let them turn me in, so my spirit and my master's can be together after death." Accordingly he said: "Yes, I am the Prodigy, from Mr. Lu's household. I was heading for Mount Liang to report and ask Song Jiang to rescue my master, that's what."

At this the two men both laughed and said: "Lucky we didn't kill you! So it's the Prodigy, is it? Don't you know who we are?"

The one in black was none other than Mount Liang's Morbid. The one behind was Madcap. Morbid said: "We have orders from the chief to go to the Northern Capital and find out how Mr. Lu is. The Professor and the Magic Messenger are following us down to wait for our report."

When the Prodigy knew who it was he gave them a full account of the previous events. Morbid said to Madcap: "In that case the Prodigy and I had better go back to the mountain stronghold to report all this to the chief. He will come up with a new plan. You go on to the capital and find out what is happening, then come back and report."

"Right", said Madcap, while the Prodigy picked up his pack and went with Morbid. They reached Mount Liang after travelling all night. When they saw Song Jiang the Prodigy recounted all that had happened in detail. Song Jiang was extremely worried and summoned all the leaders to discuss the situation and work out a suitable plan.

Meanwhile Madcap, with nothing but the clothes he was wearing, reached the capital as it was beginning to get dark. He couldn't enter the city so he had to spend the night outside. Next morning after breakfast when he went into the city he found everyone muttering anxiously about something. He began to fear the worst. When he reached the centre he found everyone had locked and barred their doors. He questioned some householders there, but the only answer he got was from an old man: "Haven't you heard then, sir, that a certain Mr. Lu of this city, a very rich man, was lured to Mount Liang by the bandits there and when he managed to escape and return he was persecuted by the authorities and banished to Shamen. Then somehow on the way there he killed his two guards. Yesterday they caught him, and today he's going to be brought here to be executed at half-past twelve. You'll be able to watch."

Madcap went to the market-place at once to see for himself. He found a tavern at the crossroads and went in. He found himself a cubicle overlooking the street and sat down. The waiter came bustling up and asked: "Are you waiting for someone sir, or are you on your own?"

Madcap glared at him and said: "Just bring a big bowl of wine and a big piece of meat, and cut out the bloody questions."

Much chastened, the waiter poured a double measure of wine and sliced a big piece of beef and brought it. Madcap ate and drank for a while. Before long there was a tremendous commotion in the street below. He stepped outside onto the veranda to look. Everyone had locked their doors and every shop was shut. The waiter rushed upstairs and said: "Are you drunk sir or what? They've got the criminal down there. You'd better hurry up and pay your bill and take yourself off!"

"What the hell should I be afraid of?" said Madcap. "Get out of here, unless you want me to hit you!"

That shut the waiter up and he went downstairs again. In a little while the clamour of gongs and drums became deafening. Madcap watched from the veranda of the inn, as the execution ground at the crossroads was marked off by a dozen executioner's men bearing swords and staves and the Unicorn with his hands tied was dragged and buffeted to a spot in front of the tavern where he was made to kneel. Strongarm took up the executioner's sword. His assistant, Blossom, supported the cangue and said: "Mr. Lu, you know everything. It isn't that we didn't want to help you, my brother and I, but it all went wrong. I have already arranged your place below in the Halls of the Blessed. When your spirit arrives there, it'll be received."

A voice rang out: "Twelve thirty! The hour has come!"

The cangue was removed, the assistant executioner steadied the head, the executioner raised the sword, and the registrar read out the crime sheet in a loud voice, the crowd was completely hushed. Then suddenly, from the upper floor of the tavern Madcap, sword in hand, shattered that silence with a great shout: "The forces of Mount Liang are here!" Strongarm and Blossom let go of the Unicorn, cut the rope and ran for it. Madcap leapt down from the veranda and raising his sword began slashing at people like someone splitting watermelons or picking vegetables. He killed a dozen without drawing breath. Then he grabbed hold of the Unicorn and made off, heading south. However, Madcap did not of course know the streets of the capital. He was further hindered by the fact that the Unicorn was terrified out of his wits and could hardly move a limb. When Governor Liang heard what was happening, he was horrified. He told his guards to form separate detachments, go to each of the four city gates, and close them. All the police were ordered to report for duty. Well, however much of a hero you may be, how can you scale the high walls and ramparts of a city? Our heroes were indeed in the situation of someone having to burrow through the ground without the benefit of teeth or claws, or trying to fly up to heaven without feathered wings.

WHEN Lu Junyi was thrown overboard he was rescued by Zhang Shun, who brought him to the bank, where there were many men with torches who seized Lu Junyi, disarmed him, removed his wet clothes, and were going to bind his hand with ropes. Just then Dai Zong appeared, and called out, "Do not injure Lu Junyi in any way!" He took some new embroidered clothes from a man, and handed them to Lu Junyi. A sedan chair was there, and Lu Junyi was asked to take his seat in same. In the distance were about forty men with red silk lanterns illuminated and beating drums who were to conduct Lu Junyi to the mountain. With them were Song Jiang, Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng, and all the other leaders. When near, the chair was set down, and Lu Junyi got out. The leaders all dismounted, and knelt down. Lu Junyi also knelt down, and said, "I am your prisoner, and request a quick dispatch."

Song Jiang laughed and replied, "Sir, I request you to be seated in the chair."

Lu Junyi did this, and all the leaders again mounted their horses. They then all moved off up the mountain, and upon halting before the Loyalty and Justice Hall Song Jiang pressed Lu Junyi to enter the hall. There was a blaze of lanterns on all sides. In the hall Song Jiang addressed Lu Junyi, "I have heard of your fame for a long time, and today I am gratified to be fortunate enough to meet you. I am afraid that we have annoyed you just now, and I ask you to forgive us."

"I was instructed by our commander," said Wu Yong, "to go to your house as a fortune teller, and by some means get you to come and join us here."

Song Jiang requested Lu Junyi to occupy the second seat of honor, but the latter only laughed, and said, "At home I had no conduct deserving capital punishment, and now here I do not think of living. You want to kill me, then kill me at once. Do not joke with me."

Song Jiang laughed, "How dare I joke with you? Your virtue is abundant, and we have been longing for a long time to meet you. So we thought out a plan to get you to come here, and now we will obey your orders."

"Stay!" said Lu Junyi. "For me to die is easy, but to follow your wishes is very difficult."

"We had better discuss matters further tomorrow," said Wu Yong.

Food and wine were now brought in, and they all sat down. Lu Junyi saw no way of avoiding this so he ate and drank with the rest, and then was conducted to a bedroom.

The next day a feast was prepared, and Song Jiang pressed Lu Junyi to join them. When they entered the hall Lu Junyi was pressed to take the premier seat. During the feast Song Jiang stood up, filled Lu Junyi's cup with wine, and then said, "Last night we spoke rather abruptly, and now ask you to forgive us. Though our stronghold is small, and is not a suitable place for a great man, yet I ask you look at that inscription, 'Loyalty and Justice,' and become our commander-in-chief, and I will make room for you."

"Tut, tut!" exclaimed Lu Junyi. "You are wrong, I have committed no fault! Whether I live or die, I shall still be loyal to the Great Song Dynasty. I would prefere to die than to join you."

"If you are unwilling to join us," said Wu Yong, "we cannot force you to do so. We might detain your body, but we could not keep your spirit. Only it has been very difficult for us to get you come here. If you will not join us, we hope that you will stay with us for at least a few days."

"As you cannot keep me here, why should you not let me leave at once?" asked Lu Junyi. "I am afraid that my people at home will be very much upset at not hearing of me."

"That can be easily arranged," said Wu Yong. "We can send your steward Li Gu back with your carts and goods so that you can rest here for a few days." He then summoned Li Gu, and upon his arrival asked him, "Have you got all your goods and carts?"

"There are none missing," replied Li Gu.

Song Jiang sent for some silver, and distributed it among Li Gu and his subordinates.

Lu Junyi then spoke to Li Gu, "You know all my trouble. I want you to tell my wife everything, and urge her not to be downcast. If I am not killed here I will certainly come back."

"The men here like you," said Li Gu, "so that it won't matter if you stay here for one or two months." He and his men then withdrew.

"Sir, I hope that you will make yourself at home here," said Wu Yong. "I will go and see that Li Gu departs without any difficulty." He then left the hall, mounted his horse, and went down the mountain to wait for Li Gu. When he met him he said, "Li Gu, we have settled every thing with your master, and he has agreed to occupy the second seat in our assembly. While he was at home he wrote on the wall of a room a poem of twenty-eight characters, seven in each line, and along the top of the four lines are four characters, 'Lu' 'Jun' 'Yi' 'Rebels'. The poem is as follows:

'On bank a gallant hero strolls,
His boat is hidden in the reeds;
A long sword he holds,
To kill the traitorous ministers.'

"Today your master has arrived here, but you do not understand the reason. He asked us to kill all you men so that nobody would know where he was, but that would represent us heroes at Liangshan Marsh as being unjust. So you can now return and tell his people that he will never come back."

Li Gu and his men saluted. Wu Yong got a boat, and the party was rowed across the lake. Wu Yong took leave of them, and they departed on their way to the Northern Capital.

The next day another feast was held in the Loyalty and Justice Hall, and there Lu Junyi spoke, "As you have not killed me yet my stay here seems very long. Today I must take my leave of you."

"I have no ability," said Song Jiang, "but today I am aware of your greatness. Tomorrow I will arrange a private feast for us two then we can discuss matters fully. I must ask you not to decline the invitation."

The next day Song Jiang gave the feast, and the day afterwards Wu Yong also had a special private feast for Lu Junyi. Then Gongsun Sheng did the same, and he was followed by all the other thirty leaders so that Lu Junyi had a special feast every day for a whole month. At last Lu Junyi decided to depart at all costs, and Song Jiang agreed to this. He arranged for a parting feast, and drank wine with Lu Junyi. But the other leaders complained because Lu Junyi would not also drink wine with them. They used the proverb, "Why is the brick thick and the tile thin," i.e., why do you treat him intimately and treat us coldly?

Li Kui also called out, "I went through a lot of trouble in my journey to and from the Northern Capital to induce him to come here, but now he would not drink a parting cup with me. Let me fight with him to settle the affair."

Wu Yong laughed at this, but pointed out to Lu Junyi how much he was liked. At last Lu Junyi agreed to stay five days more. But after that he was again induced to stay until nearly another month had passed. It was then near the end of autumn, and the days were getting cold. At last Lu Junyi spoke personally to Song Jiang about his departure, but the latter only laughed, and said, "This can be easily arranged. I will accompany you across the lake tomorrow." The next day Lu Junyi put on his sword and clothes for journey, and all the bandit leaders came down the mountain to see him off. He accepted from them only enough money to cover his expenses on the way.

Lu Junyi had no adventure on his journey, and duly reached the Northern Capital. As it was evening when he arrived he decided to pass the night in an inn just outside the gate. The next morning he entered the city, and happened to meet a man who had a tattered turban and shabby clothes. Upon seeing Lu Junyi he began to cry. Upon looking at the man closely he recognized him as his employee Yan Qing, and therefore asked him what was the matter.

"This is no place to talk," replied Yan Qing. So they both went off the road to a quiet corner where Yan Qing said, "Sometime after you had gone Li Gu returned and told your wife that you had joined the brigands at Liangshan Marsh, and had become the second-in-command. So they both went to the yamen, and made an accusation against you. They then went away and lived together. As I objected to that arrangement they dismissed me, and then prevented me from getting other employment so that I have been reduced to begging for a bare living. I knew that you would not join the brigands, and therefore waited here for your return. Now if you will take my advice you will at once return to Liangshan Marsh, because if you stay here there will be danger for you."

"My wife is not the kind of woman who would do such a thing," replied Lu Junyi.

"As you have no eyes at the back of your head," said Yan Qing, "how could you know what has happened here? Previously you were so engaged in your military drills that you had no time for your wife's desires, and it was at that time that your wife had Li Gu as her lover. They now live together as man and wife, and if you interfere there it will lead you to trouble."

Lu Junyi was angry and said, "Our family has been in this town for five generations, and I am well known here. I know Li Gu dares not do this kind of thing. I think you may be deceiving me for some reason. I will go myself to make inquiries at my home, and then I will deal with you."

Yan Qing cried again, and seized hold of Lu Junyi's clothes, but the latter kicked him, and getting free he hurried off towards his home.

Upon arriving there all the servants were surprised to see him. Li Gu hurried forward, saluted, and requested him to enter the main hall. Lu Junyi asked for Yan Qing, and Li Gu replied, "That is a long story, and you had better not ask about him just now. You just take a rest and then I will tell you all about him."

Just then Lu Junyi's wife stepped from behind the screen, and he spoke to her: "How do you do, wife? Now can you tell me about Yan Qing?"

His wife replied, "You need not ask, as that is a long story. You may take a rest and then I will tell you all about him."

Lu Junyi was now very suspicious, and wanted to pursue his inquiries about Yan Qing. But Li Gu said, "Please change your clothes; then worship at your ancestral tablets; get your breakfast, and then we can discuss matters fully." He then went and ordered the food.

As Lu Junyi sat down to eat there arose a great noise at the gates, and about two hundred yamen aides entered. They seized Lu Junyi, bound him, and took him off to the yamen beating him on the way with their staves. The commander-in-chief of the garrison, Grand Secretary Liang took his seat on the bench. Lu Junyi was taken in front of the bench, and the yamen aides stood in ranks on both sides. Li Gu and Lu Junyi's wife had also arrived, and they knelt down at one side.

Grand Secretary Liang, addressed the prisoner in a loud voice: "How is it that you, a highly respected citizen of Daming Prefecture, the Northern Capital, went and joined the brigands at Liangshan Marsh, and became second-in-command there? Do you now return to the Northern Capital to devise schemes to attack us with the brigands? What explanation have you to offer?"

"I was rather stupid," replied Lu Junyi. "One of the brigand leaders, Wu Yong, came to my house in the disguise of a fortune teller. He instigated me to go to Liangshan Marsh, where I was kept as a prisoner for two months. By lucky chance I escaped and returned home here, really I have had no bad intentions. I request that you go into this matter fully."

"It is useless for you to say you have no bad intention," said the Grand Secretary Liang. "If you were not on very intimate terms with the brigands how could you stay there for two months? The accusation against you was made by your own wife and your steward Li Gu. It cannot be false."

"Master," said Li Gu, "if I were you I would make a full confession. On the wall of a room at your house we found a rebellious poem so that it is useless trying to hide anything."

"We do not wish to injure you," said Lu Junyi's wife, "but we are afraid of being implicated. There is a saying, 'If one man rebels, his family is exterminated.'"

Lu Junyi felt deeply wronged, knelt down, and denied the accusation.

"Master, do not deny the charge," said Li Gu. "If you now speak the truth you may get off more easily than if you speak falsely. If you do not confess very soon they will force a confession by torture."

The wife also said, "Husband! If there was nothing definite you would not be here, and if you speak the truth it will be easier to get your release. If you have done this, my own life will be endangered. Your flesh is sensitive, but the bamboo has no feelings. If you confess you will only be punished according to the law."

As Li Gu had bribed all the officials high and low, so the clerk of the court Zhang addressed the bench, "This is an obstinate man, and he will not confess without torture."

"That is so," said the Grand Secretary. He then gave an order for the accused to be beaten.

The court aides seized the prisoner, forced him on the ground, and beat him on the buttocks with the bamboo until blood flowed freely. Lu Junyi fainted several times. He could not endure this torture, and at last said, "My fate is evidently to meet with an untimely death so I will now confess."

The clerk of the court wrote down his confession, and afterwards the accused had a cangue fastened round his neck, and was sent to the prison.

Most of the public present considered that the prisoner had merely confessed in order to escape further torture.

In the prison Lu Junyi was in charge of a jailer Cai Fu, nicknamed, the "Iron Arm," who had his younger brother, Cai Qing, nicknamed the "Flower," as his assistant. Cai Fu was the chief executioner, and never took two strokes, his younger brother always wore a flower in his cap—hence the nicknames. Cai Fu told his younger brother to take the prisoner to a cell, as he wished to go home. This was done. As Cai Fu left the prison he was accosted by a man at the door who was crying and also carrying a can of food. Cai Fu recognized him as Yan Qing and asked what he was doing. Yan Qing knelt down with his tears falling to the ground like pearls and beans. He said, "Elder brother, I ask you to have pity on my master Lu Junyi as he was innocent, although now a prisoner. I have been begging for food, and have now brought a little for him. Do not refuse me." He could not control his sorrow or say another word, but burst into tears.

Cai Fu replied, "I know about the case. You can go inside and give the prisoner the food."

Yan Qing saluted, and entered the jail.

Cai Fu went on his way, but soon met a tea boy who called out, "There is a guest in our tea-house who wishes to speak to you." Cai Fu went upstairs with the man, and found Li Gu waiting for him. After saluting each other Li Gu spoke, "You know all about my affairs so I will not attempt to deceive you. Tonight I want you to extinguish his life. I wish to present you fifty taels of silver for this. If the officials make inquiries I will 'square' them."

Cai Fu laughed and said, "Have you not noticed the stone tablet on the wall of the court with the inscription, 'It is easy to deceive persons, but difficult to deceive heaven.' You may deceive yourself, but you may be sure that I shall know all about it. You have got hold of his wealth, and also his wife, and now you offer me a bribe to kill him. If I commit a crime I shall suffer for it when it is discovered."

"You think fifty taels are too small, so I will double that amount," replied Li Gu.

"Li Gu," said Cai Fu, ""you cut off the cat's tail, and then mix it with the cat's food.' Lu Junyi is a very wealthy man, and your offer is not enough. I might do it, however, for five hundred taels."

"I have the money here," said Li Gu, "and I will hand it to you, if you will kill him this very night."

Cai Fu took the money, hid it in his clothes, and then said, "You come early tomorrow morning for the corpse."

Li Gu thanked him, saluted, and took his departure. Cai Fu went on his way, and upon reaching his home was met at the entrance by a man, who was good looking, well dressed, with a jeweled belt, and embroidered silk shoes.

They saluted each other, and then Cai Fu asked for the man's name and business.

"Let us go inside and then we can talk," replied the man.

They did so, and took their seats in a small private room.

"Do not be alarmed at what I say," commenced the man. "I am a Henghai County man, and my name is Chai Jin. I am a descendant of the Emperor of Later Zhou Dynasty, and I am known as the 'Small Whirlwind.' I am just and upright and distribute wealth in good cause. By a misfortune I committed a crime, and therefore had to fly for safety to Liangshan Marsh. Our commander there is Song Jiang who instructed me to come here, and watch carefully the affairs of Lu Junyi. Who could know that the venal officials, avaricious subordinates, an adulterous wife, and a fornicating villain would join together to injure an innocent man. You hold the life of the innocent man in your hand. I have come to see about this matter, and have scorned the danger I run in doing so. If the prisoner survives we shall never forget your virtue. If the slightest error occurs in this matter then when the heroes of Liangshan Marsh enter this city they will kill everyone, whether good or bad, young or old. We have heard that you are a very upright man, so I will present you a thousand taels of silver. If you wish to arrest me please do so, and I will not resist you."

Cai Fu while listening to this was covered with goose flesh, and was so paralyzed that he could not utter a word.

So Squire Chai Jin continued, "Sir, do not hesitate, but give me an immediate answer."

"I request you, sir, to go back," replied Cai Fu. "I will arrange matters as you wish."

"As you agree to do this I will see that you are duly recompensed," said Squire Chai Jin.

He then took the money from his companion who was standing outside the gate, and handing it to Cai Fu took his leave.

Cai Fu was undecided what to do in view of what Squire Chai Jin had said. He however returned to the jail, and told his younger brother what had passed. His brother said, "You generally have no difficulty in deciding what to do, and as this is only a small matter where is the difficulty? There is a saying, 'In killing a man we must see his blood, in saving a man, we must save him out of trouble.' As we have a thousand taels of silver we can make presents to our superior and inferior men in his name. Both Grand Secretary Liang, and clerk Zhang are fond of bribes, and they can be bought to spare the life of Lu Junyi. We can easily arrange for him to be banished to another place, and so avoid trouble from Liangshan Marsh."

"What you say is just what I think," said Cai Fu. "Take Lu Junyi and put him in a decent cell, and see that he has good food and wine. You can also tell him what has happened."

The money was duly distributed among the various officials, and the matter was explained to them. The following day as Li Gu got no further news he went to Cai Fu's house to find out the reason. Cai Qing, the younger brother, was at home, and he told Li Gu, "We wanted to get rid of the prisoner as you proposed, but unfortunately we got orders from Grand Secretary Liang that the prisoner's life must be saved. So you had better go to the Grand Secretary and bribe him. As soon as he issues orders to us our work will soon be done."

Li Gu sent another man to bribe the officials, and an intermediary reported that the Grand Secretary declined to have anything to do with killing the prisoner. But perhaps after a few days the prisoner might commit suicide.

Clerk Zhang had been bribed by Cai Fu, so he put up the case purposely. Cai Fu also urged him that something should be done at once, and Clerk Zhang consulted Grand Secretary Liang as to how the case should be dealt with. "They had a clear accusation, but there was little proof of the crime. Though he stayed at Liangshan Marsh for some time, there was no evidence that he was really a bandit. We can beat him, and then banish him to some place about three hundred li away. What do you think of that?"

The Grand Secretary agreed to this proposal, so sentence was made that Lu Junyi was to receive forty blows with the bamboo, to have a smaller cangue, and be banished to Shamen Island.

This was done, and Lu Junyi was placed in charge of an escort of two men, Dong Chao and Xue Ba. Now these men were the same who had tried to kill Lin Chong when on his journey of banishment but were prevented by Lu Da. Upon receipt of the signed order they took charge of Lu Junyi, and placed him temporarily in a small room while they went home to get their traveling kit ready. Li Gu heard of the new arrangement, and sent a messenger to request Dong Chao and Xue Ba to come and see him before starting off. They duly met Li Gu in an inn where they all sat down in a private room to eat some food and drink wine. After drinking three cups of wine Li Gu spoke to them, "I will be straight with you. Lu Junyi is my enemy. He has no money now, and on this long journey to Shamen Island you will have to pay all the expenses yourself. It will be at least three months before you can get back. Just now I have only these two ingots of silver to give you. If however, when on the way you kill the prisoner, and upon your return you show me the skin bearing his brand mark, then I will give each of you fifty taels of silver. Then you can bring a report back that the prisoner died on the way and I will fix matters up all right for you at the yamen."

Dong Chao and Xue Ba looked at each other, and then Dong Chao replied, "I am afraid this is hard for us to do."

But Xue Ba said, "Our friend Li Gu is a well-known man, has a good name, and perhaps we can do this thing for him. If there is any difficulty he can arrange matters for us."

"I am not ungrateful, and I can certainly compensate you well," said Li Gu.

So Dong Chao and Xue Ba took the money, went home for their baggage, and departed that night with the prisoner.

They placed their baggage on Lu Junyi's cangue. They treated the prisoner very harshly on the way. Towards evening of the second day they had gone about five li, and they stopped at an inn, just on the outskirts of a forest. They were shown by the waiter into a room at the back, and Xue Ba spoke to Lu, "We are minor officials so how can we wait upon you. If you want a meal you must go and cook it yourself."

So Lu Junyi went into the kitchen, and getting some fuel from the waiter he lit the fire. The waiter also gave him clean rice to boil. But as Lu Junyi had been brought up in a wealthy family he did not know how to cook food. The fire he had lit soon went out, and upon his blowing the embers to revive the flame he got the ashes in his eyes. Dong Chao was annoyed at the delay, and cursed him. When the rice was cooked Dong Chao took it all away, and Lu Junyi dared not even ask for some. When they had finished there was a little left which they gave to Lu Junyi, but it was cold. Xue Ba now told Lu Junyi to boil some water to wash their feet. When he had done this Lu Junyi went into a room and sat down. When they had finished they filled a tub full of very hot water, and summoned Lu Junyi to come and wash his feet. When he had taken off his shoes they seized his legs, and thrust both feet into the boiling water. He shrieked with the pain.

Xue Ba said, "We wait upon you but you are so fastidious." They took a chain and fastened Lu Junyi to the door. They then went to sleep.

About 3 A.M. they got up, and called for the waiter to get their breakfast ready. When they had dined they picked up their bundles to leave the inn. Lu Junyi saw that his feet were all scalded, and he could not walk. Outside it was raining heavily, and the path slippery. Lu Junyi attempted to walk, but fell down. Xue Ba took a stick and thrashed him. Lu Junyi struggled on, while they cursed him. They had gone about three li like this when they came to a forest, and Lu Junyi said, "I cannot really go any further, and I hope you will take pity on me and allow me to rest here." They agreed to this, and they all entered the forest. It was now daybreak, and there were no people about. Xue Ba said, "We got up very early this morning, and as we are a bit tired we will rest here. We would like to sleep, but are afraid that you will try to escape."

"Even if I had wings I could not get away just now," said Lu Junyi.

"We will not trust you," said Xue Ba, "and will tie you up."

He took a hempen cord from around his waist, and tied Lu Junyi to a pine tree. He then asked Dong Chao to act as sentry some distance away, and to cough if he saw anyone coming.

"Brother, please get it done as quickly as possible," said Dong Chao.

Xue Ba took his stick, and said to Lu Junyi, "you must not think ill of us but your steward, Li Gu, asked us to kill you on the way. In any case you would soon have died at Shamen Island, so it would be better if you died here. When you get to the afterlife do not blame us."

Lu Junyi wept, but did not speak a word. Xue Ba lifted the stick to strike Lu Junyi on the head when Dong Chao at his post heard a noise, and assumed that the deed had been done. He hurried back to see the result, and there Lu Junyi was still tied to the tree, but evidently none the worse. Xue Ba, however, was lying at the foot of the tree, and his stick was some distance away. "How strange!" said Dong Chao. "You must have over-exerted yourself, and so have fainted." He stooped down to raise his companion, but could not move him. He now saw blood issuing from Xue Ba's mouth, and looking more closely he saw an arrow sticking in Xue Ba's breast. He was startled at this, and quickly looking round espied a man sitting in a tree. At the same moment the man shot an arrow which struck Dong Chao in the neck, and he fell down dead.

The man jumped down from the tree, and taking his sword cut the cord binding Lu Junyi to the tree. When Lu Junyi opened his eyes he saw that the man was Yan Qing, his servant, and exclaimed, "You! Surely we are both dead, and are now both spirits."

"I have followed you all the way from the town," said Yan Qing, "because I thought that they would try to murder you. But I have succeeded in killing them. See, here they are."

"You saved my life," said Lu Junyi, "but you have killed those yamen guards so that I am now implicated in a serious crime. Where can we go?"

"Song Jiang certainly did you an injury when he tricked you into leaving your home, but now there is no other place than Liangshan Marsh for us to go to."

"But I am still suffering from the beatings I got in the prison, and my feet were scalded so how can I walk, or go anywhere?" said Lu Junyi.

"We cannot delay matters, so I will carry you on my back." Yan Qing was feeling very perturbed, he kicked the corpses aside and then took Lu Junyi on his back, and started off in an easterly direction. But after going about three li like this Yan Qing felt tired, and therefore he stopped at an inn for the night.

Now it happened that some travelers passing near the forest saw the two corpses, and told the chief at the next village, who reported the matter to the officials at Daming, the Northern Capital. When the coroner arrived he recognized Xue Ba and Dong Chao. The officials duly issued an order for the arrest of the murderer within a fixed time. Upon examining the arrows it was found out that they belonged to Yan Qing, so another proclamation was issued giving description of that man, and also Lu Junyi, and ordering their immediate arrest.

Lu Junyi and Yan Qing were now staying at an inn. The waiter at the inn heard of the murder, and as everybody was talking about it, he had suspicions about them. So he went to the village, and told the chief there who sent a report at once to the local yamen.

As Yan Qing had no dish for the meal, he took his bow and arrows and went out to shoot some birds. As he was returning to the inn he heard a hubbub in the village so he hid in some trees to see what was happening. Soon he saw a large number of police with a cart on which Lu Junyi was bound a prisoner again. Yan Qing's first desire was to rush out, and rescue Lu Junyi, but he realized that this would be useless as he was not well armed. So he thought, "The only way now is for me to go to Liangshan Marsh, and beg Song Jiang to come and rescue Lu Junyi."

So he started off at once, and traveled all that night. He was very hungry, as he had not a cash to buy food. He crossed a ridge, but as the trees were very dense he could not find his way very well, so he lay down among the bushes and slept there. At daybreak he was aroused by a magpie chattering in a tree just over his head. He thought, "If I shoot that bird I can take it into a village, and get it cooked." When he got up, the magpie, seeing him, began to chatter again. He took his bow and an arrow, and prayed to Heaven, "I have only one arrow, but this shot must hit the bird if my master is to live. If my master's fate is death then this shot will fail." He fixed the arrow and addressed it. "Dart, do not fail!" He pulled the string, and the arrow flew and hit the magpie's tail. The bird flew away towards the foot of the ridge with the arrow sticking in its tail. Yan Qing ran in the direction the bird had gone, but instead of seeing the magpie he ran into two men. The first man wore a cap, in the shape of a pig's snout and had two rings hanging from the cap at the back of his head. He wore a brown silk gown and an engraved metal girdle. His cloth boots came up to his knees. He carried a long staff. The second man wore a big broad brimmed cloth cap and a tea-colored gown. His belt was red, and contained pockets for money, etc. He had leather boots. He carried a bundle on his back, a small stick in his hand, and a sword in his belt. Yan Qing passed the two men close by before he could stop. He looked round and thought, "Why should I not attack these man, and take their money, and so have enough to take me to Liangshan Marsh?" He stuck his bow in his clothes, and turned on the men. The two men, however, seeing his action went on as before. Yan Qing pursued them, and upon catching up, struck one in his back with his fist and knocked him down. The other man, however, took his stave, and swinging it struck Yan Qing on the leg so that he fell down. Before he could get up the other man put his foot on Yan Qing's back, drew his sword to kill him. At this, Yan Qing called out, "Good sir! I do not mind death, but I ask you to have pity on me, as there would be no man to carry the news." The man stayed his hand, and asked what the news was.

"Why do you ask for the news?" asked Yan Qing.

The man seized hold of Yan Qing's arm, and seeing the tattoo marks asked, "Are you not Yan Qing, the employee of Lu Junyi?"

Yan Qing was face to face with death so he thought, "As these men know me I had better tell them the whole truth." He replied, "Yes, I am Yan Qing."

The man said, "It was very lucky that we did not kill you. Do you not recognize us? We are from Liangshan Marsh. I am Yang Xiong and this man is Shi Xiu. We were deputed to come here, and find out what has happened to Lu Junyi. Wu Yong and Dai Zong will come very soon."

Yan Qing then told them all that had happened.

Yang Xiong said, "As that is the position I must go at once to Liangshan Marsh with Yan Qing, and ask for instructions. Meanwhile Shi Xiu had better go to Daming and watch what happens there."

Shi Xiu agreed to this, and gave Yan Qing some of their spare food, and also his bundle. They went their separate ways.
When Shi Xiu reached Daming it was just dark, and as the gates were closed he could not enter that night so he slept at an inn outside the gate. Early the next morning after breakfast he entered the city, and found the people very depressed about something. When he reached the market place he asked an old man whether there had been any trouble. The man replied, "Stranger! Do you not know about the case of Lu Junyi? Today he is to be beheaded about noon so that you can see the affair."
When Shi Xiu heard this his blood ran cold. He went to the place of execution, and entered an inn overlooking the ground. There he sat down and ordered wine and food.
The waiter asked, "Are you alone, or have you invited others to join you here?"
Shi Xiu was now very angry and shouted, "Bring me large bowls of wine and plenty of food. Don't ask stupid questions!"
The waiter was startled at this gust of temper, but hurried off, and soon brought the refreshments. Shi Xiu quickly ate a hearty meal, but just as he had finished he heard a row down below. Looking out of the window he saw that all the shops were closing doors. Just then the waiter entered, and asked if he had had enough and said, "An execution is taking place so would you please pay now and leave."
"What should I be afraid of?" asked Shi Xiu. "You get off at once before I hit you."
The waiter beat a hasty retreat. Soon afterwards drums and gongs were sounded in the street below, and looking out again Shi Xiu saw Lu Junyi being taken to the execution ground which was just in front of the inn where he was. The head jailer Cai Fu was there with his executioner's sword, and his brother Cai Qing who spoke to Lu Junyi, "You must understand that it is not us who do not try to help you, but you have done wrong. Over there is a temple, and we have prepared there a proper seat for your soul to rest there in peace."
The crowd standing round now called out, "It is well afternoon now."
So Cai Qing took off the cangue, and held the prisoner's head in position. Cai Fu raised the sword to strike the deadly blow. The clerk held aloft the sentence and read it aloud. The waiting crowd gasped in anticipation. Shi Xiu now drawing out his sword shouted out, "All the brigands from Liangshan Marsh are here," and jumped down to the ground. Upon hearing and seeing this Cai Fu and Cai Qing deserted. Shi Xiu killed every man within reach, and in no time ten men lay on the ground. He seized Lu Junyi, and took him off down the south street. Shi Xiu did not know the roads, and Lu Junyi was too dazed to notice anything. As soon as the news reached Grand Secretary Liang, he ordered all the city gates to be closed, and dispatched large numbers of soldiers to search the whole city for the escaped prisoners. How could any hero escape from a city under such conditions?

Song Jiang Attacks the Daming Prefecture in the Northern Capital with Troops; Scimitar Guan Sheng Discusses & plans How to Capture Mount Liang

There was no way for Shi Xiu and Lu the Magnate to get out of the city. Police surrounded them and snared them with long hooked poles and looped ropes. In spite of their courage, the two couldn't resist overwhelming numbers. They were caught and brought before the governor, their captors crying that here was the rogue who had raided the execution grounds.
Shi Xiu was hustled into court. He stood, glaring. "You're a crook who ruins the country and injures the people, a slave of a slave," he shouted at Liang. "Soon my brother Song Jiang and his army will attack your city and trample it flat and hack you into three pieces! I've been sent on ahead to notify you louts!"
The onlookers were stupefied at Shi Xiu's revilement of the governor in open court. But Liang listened. For several minutes he was sunk in thought. Finally he ordered that a big cangue be fastened on each of the prisoners and that they be cast into the jail for the condemned. He put Cai Fu in charge, warning him against any slip-ups.
Cai Fu wanted to be on good terms with the gallants of Mount Liangshan. And so he detained his charges in a cell together, and every day served them good food and wine. As a result, they did not suffer, in fact they lived quite well.
Liang then summoned Wang, the newly appointed prefect, and asked him for a list of the casualties in the fracas. Seventy or eighty had been killed, and innumerable others had sustained head injuries, lacerations and fractured limbs. Liang dispensed government funds for medical treatment for the wounded and cremation for the dead.
The next day news began coming in of dozens of proclamations which had been posted inside and outside the city by the Mount Liangshan forces. Citizens, not daring to conceal them, reported the proclamations to the authorities. Governor Liang read one, and his soul flew up to Ninth Heaven in fright. It ran as follows:

*

Song Jiang, a Liangshan Marsh fighter for righteousness, hereby notifies the authorities of Daming and all its inhabitants: Lu Junyi of the Northern Capital is a man of honor. We recently invited him to our mountain stronghold to carry out together with us the Will of Heaven and dispatched Shi Xiu to inform you of this. To our surprise you seized them both. If they are not harmed, and you turn over to us the adulterous wife and her lover, we will not intervene. If however you injure these men who are our wings, our limbs, we shall descend from our fortress in full force and take vengeance, incinerating and destroying everything, good or bad. Heaven and Earth will support us, and the spirits will assist. We shall wipe out the treacherous and exterminate the stubborn. Easily we shall enter the city, but not lightly will our wrath be appeased. Virtuous husbands and wives, filial sons and grandsons, righteous citizens and clean officials need have no fear. They may go peacefully about their affairs. Let all be thus advised.

Liang again summoned Prefect Wang. "How shall we deal with this?" he queried.
Wang was a weak and timid person. "The imperial court sent soldiers to arrest that gang on Mount Liangshan several times, but they failed," he said. "What can a small city like ours do? If those wild villains attack before imperial forces come to the rescue, we'll be finished. I have a suggestion. Spare the lives of the two prisoners, but write a plea to the imperial court and notify his excellency Premier Cai. At the same time send our local troops out to prepare to repel any raiders. This will preserve the city and protect its inhabitants. If we execute those two, the brigands may attack immediately before reinforcements can arrive. The imperial court will blame us and the citizens will be thrown into a panic. It will be a nasty situation."
"Your proposal is quite sound," said Governor Liang. He summoned superintendent Cai Fu and gave him his instructions.
"Those two are no ordinary culprits," he said. "If you're too hard on them, they may die. If you're too soft, they may escape. I want you and your brother to watch them day and night. Be flexible, but keep them under constant guard. Don't relax for a moment."
Cai Fu was delighted with this order, since it fitted in precisely with what he had in mind. On leaving the governor he went to reassure the two prisoners. Of that we'll say no more.
Governor Liang then called his generals, Wen Da the Mighty Sword and Li Cheng the King of the Skies, to his residency for a conference. He told them of the proclamations from Liangshan Marsh and what Prefect Wang had proposed. Li Cheng was contemptuous.
"So those petty bandits may dare to emerge from their lair," he said. "It's nothing for you to be concerned about, Excellency. I'm not talented, and I've eaten much of the public larder without performing any meritorious deeds. Now I would like to do my utmost. Let me lead my soldiers forth and encamp outside the city. If the bandits don't come, we can discuss what to do next. Though strong, their days are numbered. I'm not boasting, but if they do venture out and attack, I guarantee not one of them will return alive!"
Liang was very pleased. He rewarded the commanders with gold and silks. The two thanked him, took their leave, and returned to their respective posts.
The following morning Li Cheng summoned his officers to his tent to confer. From among them Suo Chao, a handsome, impressive man came forward. He was known as the Urgent Vanguard, and his weapons were a pair of golden battle-axes.
"The bandit Song Jiang is coming soon to attack our Northern Capital," Li Cheng said. "Muster your soldiers, march them thirty-five //from the city and make camp. I will follow with more troops."
The next morning Suo Chao did as ordered. He halted at a place called Flying-Tiger Valley, and built a fortified encampment at the foot of the hills. Li Cheng, the day after, left the city with leaders of his middle and flanking units, marched twenty-five //to Locust Tree Slope, and there set up a stockaded camp. Both camps bristled with spears and knives. Branched stakes, like sharp deer antlers, were firmly embedded on the perimeters. On three sides deep pits were dug. The soldiers rubbed their hands in anticipation, eager to distinguish themselves and win glory for the emperor.

We'll divide our story into two parts. Those proclamation notices were written by Wu Yong after hearing the news from Yan Qing and Yang Xiong. On learning from Dai Zong that Lu the Magnate and Shi Xiu had been captured, he had them put up when no one was around on bridges and roadways. Dai returned to the mountain fortress and told the chieftains in detail what had transpired.
Song Jiang was shocked. He at once had the drums sounded to summon the chieftains to Loyalty Hall. They took their seats in order of rank. Song addressed himself to Wu Yong.
"You meant well at the time, inviting Lu the Magnate up the mountain to join our band. But because of this, today he's in trouble, and brother Shi Xiu as well. What can we do to rescue them?"
"Don't worry, brother. I'm not talented, but I have a plan. We can use this opportunity to relieve the Northern Capital of its money and grain for our own use! Tomorrow is an auspicious day. Divide our chieftains into two. Leave half here to guard the fort. Give me the other half to attack the city."
Song Jiang directed Ironclad Virtue Pei Xuan to muster the necessary forces to march the following day.
"These two big axes of mine haven't had any action for a long time," said Li Kui the Black Whirlwind. "I'm glad to hear we're going to fight and pillage again. Let me have five hundred men and I'll take the Northern Capital, hack Governor Liang into mincemeat, dismember the corpses of Li Gu and that adulterous female, and rescue Lu the Magnate and Shi Xiu! The 'mute acolyte' will get his revenge. I'll do a thorough job of it."
"Although you're brave, brother," Song Jiang replied, "the Northern Capital isn't like other prefectures. What's more, Governor Liang is the son-in-law of Premier Cai, and his generals Li Cheng and Wen Da are of matchless courage. They're not to be underestimated."
"You knew I'm quick to speak, yet you let me go disguised as a mute," Li Kui yelled. "But now, though you know I like to kill, you won't let me be the vanguard. Do you want to aggravate me into my grave!"
"Since you insist," said Wu Yong, "you can go as a vanguard. Take five hundred bold fellows and set up an advance position. You can start tomorrow."
That evening Song Jiang and Wu Yong decided on the number of men to be used in the campaign. Pei Xuan wrote a notice which he dispatched to various installations on the mountain, outlining the order of march according to contingents and directing prompt execution.
It was then the end of autumn and the beginning of winter, a comfortable time for wearing armor, and the horses were sleek and fat. For a long time the men had not seen battle, and they longed for action. The hatred they felt was intense, and they were determined to wreak vengeance. Happy with their mission, they gathered their weapons, and saddled and bridled their steeds. They rubbed their hands, ready to start down the mountain at the appointed hour.
The first contingent, the vanguard, consisted of five hundred men under Li Kui the Black Whirlwind. The second, under Two-Headed Snake Xie Zhen, Twin-Tailed Scorpion Xie Bao, Kong Ming the Comet and Kong Liang the Flaming Star, consisted of a thousand men. The third also contained a thousand men and was led by the girl Ten Feet of Steel, and her lieutenants Sun the Witch and Gu Dasao the Tigress. The fourth was headed by Li Ying the Heaven-Soaring Eagle, assisted by Nine Dragons Shi Jin and Sun Xin the Junior General, and also contained a thousand men.
Song Jiang was the commander-in-chief of the central army, with Wu Yong as his military advisor. His four aides were Lu Fang the Little Duke, Guo Sheng the Second Ren Gui, Sun Li the Sickly General and Huang Xin the Suppressor of the Three Mountains. Qin Ming the Thunderbolt led the forward army, seconded by Han Tao the Ever-Victorious General and Peng Qi the Eyes of Heaven General. Panther Head Lin Chong commanded the rear army, and his lieutenants were Ma Lin the Elfin Flutist and Deng Fei the Fiery-Eyed Lion. The left army was commanded by Two Rods Huyan Zhuo, assisted by Golden-Winged Hawk Ou Peng and Yan Shun the Elegant Tiger. Hua Rong led the right army, aided by Chen Da the Gorge-Leaping Tiger and Yang Chun the White-Spotted Snake.
Also on the expedition were the cannon expert Heaven-Shaking Thunder Ling Zhen, who was in charge of grain for the men and fodder for the horses, and Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller who was responsible for collecting military intelligence.
Each contingent, under its respective leader set out at daybreak in the prescribed order. Only the Deputy Military Advisor Gongsun Sheng was left behind with a body of men to guard the fortress and its three passes, assisted by Liu Tang, Zhu Tong and Mu Hong. The waterside fort was held by Li Jun and others. Of that we'll say no more.

We'll speak now of Suo Chao, seated in his camp in Flying-Tiger Valley. A horseman sped up like a meteor and announced that Song Jiang was approaching with an army of countless thousands. They were only twenty or thirty //away. Suo Chao immediately sent word to Li Cheng on Locust Tree Slope. The general hurriedly relayed the information to the city. At the same time he mounted his charger and rode directly to the forward camp. Suo Chao greeted him and told him the news in detail.
At dawn the next day the defenders breakfasted. When it was light they broke camp, moved forward to the Yu Family Hamlet, and deployed fifteen thousand infantry and cavalry in battle positions. Li Cheng and Suo Chao, in full armor, reined their horses beneath a pennant-decorated arch. Far to the east more than five hundred men could be seen flying towards them in a cloud of dust. Riding in the fore was Black Whirlwind Li Kui, a battle-ax in each hand. Glaring, he ground his teeth and shouted: "Your lord Black Whirlwind from Mount Liangshan is here!"
Li Cheng turned to Suo Chao with a laugh. "Every day we hear about the bold fellows from Liangshan Marsh. Why, they're just a pack of dirty bandits, not worth mentioning! Vanguard Commander, why don't you nab the louts?"
Suo Chao smiled. "There's no need for me to act. We have plenty of field officers eager for glory."
Before the words were out of his mouth, a senior officer named Wang Ding, twirling a lance, galloped forward with a hundred horsemen. Li Kui and his men couldn't withstand the united cavalry charge, and they fled in all directions. Suo Chao and his forces chased them past Yu Family Hamlet.
Behind the hill, gongs and drums suddenly resounded, and two cavalry troops rode forth. On the left was Xie Zhen and Kong Liang, on the right was Kong Ming and Xie Bao, and each troop contained five hundred fierce riders.
Startled by the appearance of these reinforcements, Suo Chao stopped his pursuit and hastily returned.
"Why didn't you capture the bandits?" Li Cheng demanded.
"We chased them beyond the hill and were about to take them when the rogues were reinforced. Their support had been waiting in ambush. We couldn't follow through."
"They're only bushwhackers. What's there be afraid of!"
Li Cheng led his entire forward army in a charge past Yu Family Hamlet. Ahead he saw banners wave, and heard yells and the thunder of drums and the crash of gongs. Another cavalry troop appeared. At the head of this one was a girl warrior, very smartly accoutred. On the red banner in front of the unit she was leading, the words Female General Ten Feet of Steel were inscribed in letters of gold. Gu Dasao was on her left, Sun the Witch on her right, and together they led a force of over a thousand. Their men were of every size and description and hailed from many different parts of the country.
When Li Cheng saw them he said to Suo Chao: "Soldiers like that are absolutely useless. Go at them directly, while I surround them with my troops."
Grasping his golden axes, Suo Chao struck his horse and galloped forward. Ten Feet of Steel turned her mount and raced for a hollow in the hills. Li Cheng, who had spread out his force, tore after her.
Suddenly, he heard earth-shaking yells. Charging towards him was Li Ying the Heaven-Soaring Eagle, flanked by Shi Jin and Sun Xin. Hastily, he and his soldiers retreated into Yu Family Hamlet. But then they were assaulted from the left by a contingent led by Xie Zhen and Kong Liang, and from the right by the unit under Xie Bao and Kong Ming. Meanwhile, the three women commanders had wheeled their troop around and were catching up from the rear.
So hot was the pursuit that Li Cheng and his men were scattered.
They pressed desperately on to return to camp. Ahead, they found Li Kui the Black Whirlwind blocking their path. Li Cheng and Suo Chao managed to dash through. By the time they reached the camp, they had suffered huge losses.
Song Jiang and his army did not chase them any further. They reassembled for a short rest, then made camp.
Li Cheng and Suo Chao hurried to the city and reported to Governor Liang. That same night Wen Da was rushed to the battle area with local reinforcements. Li Cheng received him in the camp on Locust Tree Slope and raised the question of a withdrawal strategy. Wen Da laughed.
"Those bandits are only a slight itch. They're nothing to worry about!"
That night they agreed on a plan and instructed the troops. At the fourth watch everyone had breakfast, at the fifth they donned their armor, at daylight they marched. Thrice the battle drums rolled as they broke camp and advanced towards Yu Family Hamlet.
Soon they saw Song Jiang's army, sweeping towards them like the wind. Wen Da the Mighty Sword spread his troops out in battle formation, and ordered his archers to shoot and stop the front ranks of the advancing foe. Song Jiang selected one of his senior officers to go forth. He bore a red banner with the words writ large in silver: Qin Ming the Thunderbolt.
Qin Ming reined his horse and shouted: "You corrupt officials of the Northern Capital, listen! We've been intending to attack your city for a long time. Only a fear of hurting its good people has prevented us. Turn over Lu Junyi and Shi Xiu, surrender the adulterous pair, and we'll withdraw and swear we won't encroach. If you are stubborn, you'll bring fire down on your own heads that will melt jade and stones! Those are your only prospects. If you've anything to say, speak now, without delay!"
"Who will seize that varlet for me?" Wen Da furiously cried.
Before he had finished speaking, Suo Chao advanced to the front and shouted: "You were an officer appointed by the imperial court. How has the government ever wronged you? Instead of behaving like a proper person you've become a wretched bandit! I'm going to pulverise you when I catch you today!"
To Qin Ming the words were like coal in a stove, oil on a fire. He clapped his horse and charged, whirling his wolf-toothed cudgel.
Suo Chao spurred his mount to meet him. Two spirited horses collided, two sets of weapons clashed, the armies on both sides yelled. The contestants fought more than twenty rounds, with neither the victor.
Han Tao moved up on horseback from the ranks of Song Jiang's vanguard unit. He fitted an arrow to his bow, aimed, and let fly. The arrow struck Suo Chao in the left arm. He dropped his axes, turned and cantered back to his position.
Song Jiang pointed with his whip and all three armies surged forward. Corpses soon covered the plain, blood flowed in rivers. It was a crushing defeat. The Song Jiang forces chased the running foe past Yu Family Hamlet, then captured Locust Tree Slope. Wen Da fled all the way to Flying-Tiger Valley. When he counted his soldiers, he found he had lost a third.
On Locust Tree Slope Song Jiang made camp. Wu Yong said: "Beaten troops are always frightened. We ought to go after them before they recover their nerve. It's too good a chance to miss."
"You're quite right, Military Advisor," replied Song Jiang. He circulated the order that his crack victorious forces should that evening divide into four columns and march through the night to attack the city.
As to Wen Da, he had just caught his breath after returning to Flying-Tiger Valley, when a junior officer entered and announced a row of fires on a nearby hilltop. Wen Da mounted his horse and went out with a troop of soldiers to look. There, on a hill to the east, countless torches were turning the hills and the surrounding fields red.
To the west, too, fires gleamed. Wen Da led his men hastily in that direction. Suddenly, from behind he heard thunderous shouts. Racing in pursuit from the east was Hua Rong, followed by Yang Chun and Chen Da. Panic-stricken, Wen Da led his soldiers quickly back to Flying-Tiger Valley.
But then, from the glowing torches in the west Two Rods Huyan Zhuo, with Ou Peng and Yan Shun as his second in command, came charging downward. Pincers from east and west were closing in. And from the rear, there were more yells, and Qin Ming the Thunderbolt, aided by Han Tao and Peng Qi, raced up to join the fray. Shouting men and neighing horses milled in the firelight without number.
Wen Da's army was thrown into confusion. They broke camp and left. Again they heard yells, this time before them. There were bursts of flame Heaven-Shaking Thunder Ling Zhen and his assistants had slipped around to the side of Flying-Tiger Valley via small paths and were bombarding with their cannon.
Wen Da and troops plunged through and raced for the city. Ahead of them drums pounded. A troop of cavalry was blocking their way. In the firelight Panther Head Lin Chong moved forward, aided by Ma Lin and Deng Fei. On all sides drums thundered in unison and fierce flames erupted. The government soldiers, in turmoil, fled for their lives.

Swinging his sword, Wen Da was hacking his way through when he ran into Li Cheng. The two joined forces and fought a withdrawal action. By dawn they had battled to the outskirts of the city.
When Governor Liang heard the news, his soul was shaken from his body. He hastily mustered troops and sent them out to bring in the defeated soldiers. Then he locked the city gates and tightened his defenses.
The following morning Song Jiang's forces arrived. They pushed straight up to the East Gate and there made camp. They prepared to attack.
In the city's military headquarters Governor Liang called a conference. It was difficult to see any solution.
"The brigands are at our gates," said Li Cheng. "The situation is desperate. If we delay any longer, we'll be lost. You must immediately write a personal family letter, Excellency, to the premier, and send it by trusted emissary tonight. The premier will then be able to petition the emperor in the morning court to dispatch crack troops to our rescue. That would be best. Second, you should also officially notify all neighboring prefectures and counties to send relief troops quickly. Third, instruct the Daming Prefecture to conscript civilians to go up on the walls of the Northern Capital and help defend the city. Let them keep in readiness throwing logs, ballista stones, blinding lime and molten metal. Have them cock the crossbows, and be vigilant day and night. In this manner we can guarantee against mishaps."
"I can write the letter easily enough, but who will carry it?" Said the governor. That same day he designated one of his leading commanders, Wang Ding. Wang donned full armor, selected a couple of cavalrymen, and took the letter. The city gate was opened, the drawbridge lowered, the messengers went off to the Eastern Capital at flying speed. Neighboring prefectures and counties were officially notified to rush relief troops. Prefect Wang was directed to muster civilians for the defense of the city walls. Of that we'll say no more.
Song Jiang divided his forces and established camps on the north, east and west of the city, leaving only the approaches to the south gate open. Every day he attacked, at the same time urging the mountain stronghold to send grain and fodder for a long siege. He was determined to break into Daming and rescue Magnate Lu and Shi Xiu. Every day Li Cheng and Wen Da came out with soldiers and gave battle, but they were unable to win. Suo Chao was recuperating from his arrow wound, which had not yet healed.
Wang Ding and the other two riders arrived at the residency of the premier with the private letter and dismounted. The keeper of the gate went in and reported. The premier directed that Wang Ding be allowed to enter. Wang went directly to the rear hall, kowtowed and presented the message. Premier Cai Jing opened the letter and read it. Shocked, he closely questioned Wang Ding. The emissary related the story of Lu Junyi in detail, adding, "Song Jiang has surrounded the city with a huge force of bandits. We can't cope with them." He told also of the murderous battles at Yu Family Hamlet, Locust Tree Slope and Flying-Tiger Valley.
"You've had a tiring ride," said Cai. "Go to the government hostel and rest. I must hold a conference of officials."
"The Northern Capital is in a terrible dilemma, Your Excellency. It faces disaster. If it should fall, what will happen to the rest of Hebei Province? We hope Your Excellency will send troops quickly and destroy the rebels!"
"No need to say any more. You may go."
Wang Ding withdrew. The premier at once directed his officer of the day to summon the Chancellor of Military Affairs to an urgent conference on a military matter of the utmost importance. Shortly thereafter, Tong Guan, the Chancellor, accompanied by three marshals, arrived at the hall of state and presented themselves to the premier. Cai Jing told them in detail of the emergency in the Northern Capital.
"We need a plan, and a first-rate general, to drive off the marauding bandits and preserve the city," he said.
The assembled officers looked at one another with frightened expressions. From behind the infantry marshal a man stepped forward. A commander of the palace guards, his name was Xuan Zan. His face was as black as the bottom of pot, his nostrils were aimed at the sky, he had curly hair and a reddish beard. A massive fellow, he wielded a steel blade. His skill with weapons was out of the ordinary. Formerly married to the daughter of a prince, he had been known as the Ugly Son-in-Law. The prince, impressed by his winning several archery matches in a row, had given him his daughter in marriage. But Xuan Zan's ugliness had so revolted the girl that she died.
As a result he was held in low esteem and never rose above his rank of guards' commander. Tong Guan, a wily sycophant and courtier, considered himself infinitely superior, and treated him with contempt.
But at this moment Xuan Zan felt he had to speak, and he addressed the premier.
"I became friends with a man when I was in the rural areas. He is a direct descendant of Guan Yu, famed general at the end of the Han Dynasty, when the country split into three. His name is Guan Sheng, and he bears a striking resemblance to his noble ancestor. His weapon is a crescent-shaped halberd, and so people call him Guan Sheng the Big Halberd. He's now a lowly patrol officer in Pudong, but he's studied books of military lore since childhood, is thoroughly versed in weaponry, and is a man of matchless valor. If he is presented with money and raised to senior officer rank, he can expunge the water-girt fortress and destroy the wild rebels. This man is essential to the preservation of our country and peace in our land. He awaits only your command."
Cai Jing was delighted. He appointed Xuan Zan his emissary to ride like a comet through the night to Pudong with an invitation to Guan Sheng to come to the capital and confer. The assembled officials withdrew.
Xuan Zan immediately set out, accompanied by four or five other horsemen. In less than a day they arrived at the headquarters of the Pudong patrol and dismounted. Guan Sheng was there, discussing the rise and fall of prominent figures in ancient and current times with his friend Hao Siwen. When he was informed that an emissary had come from the Eastern Capital, he went out with Hao to welcome him. Guan exchanged courtesies with his caller and invited him into the hall and asked him to be seated.
"We haven't seen each other in a long time," said Guan. "What brings you all this distance today?"
"The Mount Liangshan bandits are attacking the Northern Capital. I've told the premier that you had a strategy for keeping the country tranquil, and a skill capable of destroying all enemy officers and troops. By imperial decree, and on orders of the premier, I bring you these gifts of money and satins and a fine saddle, and request you to set forth. You mustn't refuse, brother. Get your things together and we'll start for the capital."
Guan Sheng was extremely pleased. "This is Hao Siwen," he said. "He and I are sworn brothers. His mother dreamed she was entered by the spirit of a wild dog shortly before she became pregnant with Hao. And so, today, he is known as Wild Dog Hao. He's skilled in all eighteen of the military arts. Since I've been summoned by the premier, why shouldn't I take him with me, so that we can serve the country together?" Xuan Zan gladly consented. He urged them to commence the journey quickly.
Guan Sheng gave parting instructions to his family, collected his weapons, horse, helmet, armor and luggage, and set out that same night with Hao and a dozen big fellows from West of the Pass, all accompanying Xuan Zan. On reaching the Eastern Capital, they rode directly to the premier's residency and dismounted. The keeper of the gate announced them and they were invited in. Xuan Zan led Guan Sheng and Hao Siwen to the hall of state. They kowtowed to the premier, then stood respectfully at the foot of the dais.
Premier Cai Jing looked Guan Sheng over. He saw a tall, powerfully built man with a fine beard divided into three strands, eyebrows that extended to his sideburns, eyes turned up at the corners, a face as ruddy as jujubes, and crimson lips. Cai was very pleased.
"How old are you, officer?" he asked.
"Thirty-two, sir."
"Bandits from Liangshan Marsh have surrounded the Northern Capital. Tell me, please, do you have any good plan for breaking the siege?"
"I heard a long time ago that those bandits have taken over the Marsh and prey on the people and raid the towns. Now they've dared to leave their lair and seek their own destruction. It would be a waste of energy merely to relieve the Northern Capital. If you will give me an army of crack troops, I'll first take Mount Liangshan, then capture the bandits. Thus, neither of their forces will be able to help the other."
Cai Jing was delighted. "Besieging the kingdom of Wei to relieve the kingdom of Zhao—the strategy used in ancient days! Exactly what I was thinking." He directed the Council of Military Affairs to muster 15000 crack soldiers from the provinces of Shandong and Hebei, and let Hao Siwen lead the vanguard and Xuan Zan the rear contingent, with Guan Sheng in over-all command. Duan Chang the infantry marshal was given charge of grain and fodder supplies. The premier highly rewarded the three new commanders and set a date at which they were to proceed directly and in force against Liangshan Marsh. But the dragon's home is the sea; it cannot ride the mist and clouds. The tiger on the unfamiliar plain cannot fully use its teeth and claws. Truly, while gazing longingly at the autumn moon one can easily lose the glowing jewel in its casket.

Madcap, remember, has just rescued the Unicorn from execution; but not knowing the roads in the Northern Capital he can find no way to escape. Well, the next thing that happens is this: Government troops converge on them from all sides and the police pin them down — quite literally, with hooks — and tie them up. The unfortunate pair of heroes are overwhelmed by numbers.
Thus immobilized, they were led before Governor Liang, who had already been informed that the villains who robbed the execution ground were taken. When Madcap appeared in the court, he glared about him and reviled the Governor: "You filthy desecrator of our land and oppressor of the people, I am here on the orders of my chief. He will be coming here with an army to seize this town of yours. He will raze it to the ground and cut you to pieces! He sent me to tell you this!"
He ranted on, calling the Governor every name in the book, while the whole courtroom stared at him speechless. Governor Liang gave the matter long and troubled thought, then ordered heavy cangues for the two of them. They were taken to the cells for condemned prisoners and Strongarm, the gaoler, was ordered to guard them closely, and be sure nothing went wrong.
Now Strongarm was eager to keep in with Mount Liang and after locking them up together he brought them good wine and food every day. So, far from suffering, they actually ate very well.
Governor Liang summoned the newly appointed district magistrate to receive his orders. The casualties in the town were counted and there were found to be over seventy dead, as well as countless head injuries, cuts, bruises and damaged limbs. When he had read the official report, the Governor allotted public money to pay for medical treatment or cremation.
Next day reports began to arrive from people within and without the city who said: "We cannot remain silent about the fact that dozens of unsigned notices from Mount Liang have appeared; it is clearly our duty to report it."
When Governor Liang saw one of these notices he was frightened out of his wits. Here is what it said:
Song Jiang of the Marshes of Mount Liang respectfully greets the government and people of the Northern Capital and wishes to inform them that: owing to the excesses of those who exercise authority under the Song dynasty, the abuse of power by corrupt officials, the cruel oppression of the innocent and the terrible plight of ordinary people, Mr. Lu, a valiant and upstanding gentleman of the Northern Capital, has asked to be admitted to our company and join with us in doing heaven's will. How vilely in your folly and greed do you torment the innocent! Mr. Shi also, whom we sent on ahead to report on the situation, has been wrongfully detained! But provided the lives of these two people are preserved, and the harlot and her evil lover handed over, I shall not attack you. If on the other hand a hair of their heads is harmed, or any injury whatsoever sustained by them, we shall mobilize all our forces and unite to exact revenge. When our army falls upon you, even jade will burn. We shall root out the evil deceivers, we shall eliminate the troublemakers. Heaven and earth are on our side, gods and spirits bestow on us their blessing. We shall enter the city with the greatest of ease, but not lightly will we be appeased. Honourable men and women, filial and obedient offspring, upright citizens and honest officials have nothing to fear — they should continue to perform their duties as normal. Let all take heed!
Governor Liang read this unsigned proclamation and then summoned District Magistrate Wang for a consultation. "How should we resolve this business?" he said.
Wang was of a timid disposition and when he heard the proclamation he said: "If the court has repeatedly failed in its attempts to eradicate that rabble in the Marshes of Mount Liang, how will we, with our meagre resources, succeed? If those criminals attack us and the central government does not come to the rescue, it will be too late then to wish we had acted differently. If you ask me, we should spare these two lives. We can write a report and submit it to the Emperor and also inform the Grand Preceptor. In addition let us order our own troops to set up camp outside the city, to be prepared for any eventuality. By these means we can guarantee the peace of the Northern Capital, preserve our troops and protect our people. If any harm did come to those two and the outlaws attacked, well, in the first place there are no reinforcements, secondly the Emperor would hold us responsible, and thirdly it would agitate the populace and cause unrest in the city, all of which is highly undesirable."
Governor Liang said: "You have hit the nail on the head." He sent for Strongarm and said: "These two criminals are something of a problem. If you restrain then too harshly there is a chance they may die, but if on the other hand you are too lax I am afraid they may escape. You and your brother must temper rigour with mildness, but be constantly on your guard. Do not allow your vigilance to lapse for one instant."
This exactly suited Strongarm's book. "It's just what I wanted," he said to himself. He got his keys and went to the gaol to tell his two friends the good news. Of this no more.
Governor, meanwhile, summoned two of his generals, Swords-man Wen Da and Li Cheng, known as Vulcan, for consultations. He explained about the proclamation from Mount Liang and Magistrate Wang's proposed course of action.
Vulcan said: "A bunch of common bandits like these won't dare venture far from their den. Why is Your Excellency so worried about them? I am well aware that my talent is small and my salary more than my achievements warrant, but I am prepared to devote all my energy to this campaign. We will establish our camp outside the city and if the rebels fail to turn up we will think of something else. The bandits' fortunes are in decline, their days are numbered! If they have the nerve to poke their noses out and attack us, I don't want to boast, but not even a scrap of their armour will make the return journey!"
His Excellency was delighted with this speech, and he presented gold and rich brocades to both generals, who thanked him and took their leave, each returning to his own headquarters to rest.
Next day Vulcan went to his tent and summoned all his officers to a briefing. One of those present was a most impressive individual, a man of truly noble mien. This was Suo Chao the Hasty. He was the first to receive his orders. "The bandit Song Jiang is going to advance on the city some day soon," Vulcan told him. "He plans to attack the Northern Capital. You are to march your troops out of the city and make camp about ten miles away. I shall follow with my forces."
Hasty passed this order on to his troops the following day, and they marched to a place called Flying Tiger Valley, ten miles from the capital, where they pitched camp at the foot of the mountains. Next day Vulcan marched eight miles out and encamped at a place called Acacia Hill. Weapons were plentiful in the camp and they planted a thick hedge of deer's antlers all around it. On three sides they dug concealed pits.
The troops were now champing at the bit and the commanders were united in their resolve. They couldn't wait for the forces from Mount Liang to come at them, so they could have their chance of glory.
Now our story divides in two. The unsigned proclamation had of course been written by the Professor after the Prodigy and Morbid reported back and after the Magic Messenger, whom he sent to find out about the fate of Madcap and the Unicorn, reported that they had been recaptured. Copies of the proclamation were scattered in quiet places and posted up on highways and bridges, with the aim of protecting the lives of the captured pair, the Unicorn and Madcap.
When the Magic Messenger returned to Mount Liang and recounted the preceding events in detail, Song Jiang was extremely upset. The drum was beaten and a general meeting was held in the Ceremonial Hall, at which all the leaders, great and small, sat down in due order of precedence. Song Jiang opened the proceedings, addressing the Professor as follows: "This all began when you had the good idea of inviting the Unicorn to join our company. Now it has unexpectedly brought him great hardship. In addition we have lost Madcap. What can we do to rescue them?"
The Professor replied: "Do not worry, brother. Although I know my limitations, I am going to propose a scheme which will allow us to profit from this situation by sacking the Northern Capital and reprovisioning our stronghold. Tomorrow is an auspicious date. I would like you to divide us into two parties, one to guard the camp and the other to go with me to capture the city."
Song Jiang said: "I like the sound of this." He told Sterling to draw up a list of the leaders who were to set out on the following day.
At this moment Iron Ox intervened: "These two axes of mine have been idle far too long. This talk of fighting and plunder is meat and drink to them. Just give me five hundred troops to attack the Northern Capital and I'll make mincemeat of the Governor, catch Manager Li and his whore and cut them into little pieces, and rescue the Unicorn and Madcap. I'd like nothing better."
"I know how brave you are," Song Jiang said. "But the Northern Capital is not like any little provincial town and the Governor is the Grand Preceptor's son-in-law. Not only that but he's got two generals, Vulcan and Swordsman, who are a match for anyone. We must not underestimate them."
Iron Ox roared: "Brother, if you exaggerate other people's valour like this, you simply undermine your own confidence. You just watch me go and do it. If they get the better of me I swear I'll never come back."
The Professor said: "If you really want to go, we'll put you in charge of the vanguard, with five hundred picked men to constitute the spearhead. You can start tomorrow."
Song Jiang and the Professor held further talks that evening, and decided on their forces. Sterling prepared a roster, which was sent to all the camps. Everyone was to follow the dispositions and take care there was no slip-up.
The season was autumn, nearly winter, the time when it becomes more comfortable to wear armour and the horses are fat. The troops had not seen battle for some time, and were full of warlike spirit. Their ardour was exceptional and their thoughts dwelt only on revenge. Eager for glory, they prepared their weapons, saddled their horses and set off down the mountain full of anticipation.
Iron Ox was told to lead off with five hundred men to pioneer the route. Second were Snake, Scorpion and the Kong Brothers, Comet and Red Star, with a thousand men. Third was Steelbright, the woman warrior, assisted by Sister Sun the Ogress and Auntie Gu, with a thousand troops. Fourth was Skyhawk, assisted by the Tattooed Dragon and Blackface, also with a thousand troops. The main force was commanded by Song Jiang and the Professor, with four commanders on their staff: the Little Duke, the Halberdier, Colonel Sun and the Tamer. The vanguard was commanded by Thunderclap, accompanied by Victorious and the Supremo. The rearguard was commanded by Leopard's Head, with the Flautist and Redeye. On the left flank was Twin Rods, seconded by Golden Wings and the Dandy, on the right flank Colonel Hua with the River-Jumper and White-Spotted Snake. Thunderer was in charge of supplies, the Magic Messenger was head of military intelligence.
When these dispositions had been announced, they led off in turn, starting at dawn. Only four leaders remained in the stronghold: the deputy chief, Taoist Gongsun, the Red-Haired Devil, Whiskers and Mu the Unstoppable, together with a sufficient number of troops to guard it. The three gates and the waterside camp were guarded by the White-Water Dragon and others. Of this no more.
Now while Hasty was waiting in the camp at Flying Tiger Valley, a messenger galloped up and reported: "Song Jiang is approaching with a huge army. They're less than ten miles away!"
Hasty passed on this intelligence immediately to Vulcan at Acacia Hill. Vulcan sent a messenger into the city and at the same time had his horse saddled and rode over to the forward camp, where Hasty received him and gave a full report.
Next day they breakfasted before dawn, rode out of the camp at first light and drew up their forces in battle formation outside the hamlet of Yubank. Fifteen thousand troops were deployed there. Vulcan and Hasty rode out in full armour and halted their horses under the pennants. Away to the east a cloud of dust was rising, evidence of a force of at least five hundred racing towards them. Vulcan pointed with the stock of his whip and his troops readied their bows and crossbows.
The opposing forces from Mount Liang deployed in a straight line opposite the hamlet:
Each man wears a headband of alizarin red; all are clad in scarlet padded tunics. Their stork-like legs are encased in tightly wound puttees; their lean and supple waists are firmly supported by taut stomachers. The three-pronged forks glitter coldly, the four-bladed halberds give off a deadly sheen. Spears cluster thick as hemp, their tips of varying shape; bronze swords and scimitars pack the sky like snowflakes. The earth is alive with pennants that dance like flames, the heavens are on fire with banners bright as the sunset rack.
Now an officer rides out from the east flank. This is Iron Ox, brandishing his two axes, glaring about him and baring his teeth, as he calls out in ringing tones: "Do you recognize Li Kui, the Black Whirlwind of Mount Liang?"
When Vulcan saw the opposition he burst out laughing and said to Hasty: "We're always hearing about these heroes from Mount Liang, but now we see what they really are: just a scruffy bunch of robbers! Can't you see? You are leader of the vanguard, why don't you go and capture that villain?"
Hasty smiled disdainfully: "No need of the butcher's knife to kill a chicken! We've plenty of worthy officers. There's no call for the commander himself to waste his time on them."
Before Hasty had finished a commander called Wang Ding rode out from behind, twirling his spear. He charged, a hundred cavalry following his lead.
Now Iron Ox was as valiant as they come, and in addition was fully protected by armour, yet before this onslaught his forces broke and ran. Hasty ordered his men in pursuit, and they chased the enemy past the hamlet, where suddenly round the shoulder of the hill drums thundered out and two bodies of cavalry appeared. Leading this cavalry charge were Snake and Red Star on the left and Comet and Scorpion on the right, each with five hundred men. Seeing these reinforcements, Hasty decided to abandon the pursuit. He reined in his horse and returned.
"Why didn't you bring the villain back?" Vulcan asked.
"I chased him to the foot of the hill and I was about to take him but the bastards have got reinforcements lying in wait there, so it wasn't practicable."
"Nothing to fear from a pack of robbers like that!" Vulcan said, and ordered his vanguard to advance from their position outside the hamlet.
They were met with waving flags, with cheers, thunder of drums and screech of gongs, as another troop of cavalry rode at them: it was led by a woman warrior of most gallant appearance, as the poem tells:

Skin like jade, in form like a hibiscus flower, a beauty made in heaven. The scales of her golden armour flash as they ripple; the headband of red silk gauze allows a glimpse of silver. She grasps a noble blade in each delicate hand; such valour is awesome. The eyes are calm like autumn pools, she can unmask a thousand wiles. She steadily urges her steed forward; her sword cuts like the wind, she thirsts for the blood of government troops. Powder flies from her face, her battle tunic is soaked in sweat, a deadly air rises from breast and armpits. Officers' spirits faint, the enemy's courage melts away: this one is outstanding among women warriors. When she returns victorious a dark smile lights up her countenance.

Steelbright's troops rode under a red banner with gold characters proclaiming: "The Woman Warrior Steelbright." On her left rode Auntie Gu, and on her right Sister Sun the Ogress. Their troops, a thousand or more, were of all shapes and sizes and from many different regions.

When Vulcan saw them, he exclaimed: "What use are that lot? First division, charge them head on! My own troops will divide and encircle them."

In obedience to the order Hasty gripped his bronze axe, slapped his horse and charged. Steelbright turned her horse and galloped off towards a fold in the hill. Vulcan's army followed up from all sides. But in the midst of this pursuit earth-shattering shouts rang out and a black mist veiled the sky as another cavalry troop came racing towards them. Vulcan hurriedly withdrew five miles or so and then, since visibility was nil, retreated to the hamlet. Snake and Comet with their cavalry fell on them from the left, Red Star and Scorpion charged from the right. The women warriors had turned their horses and were attacking from behind. Vulcan's men panicked. As they fought desperately to get back to their camp, Iron Ox popped up in their path. Vulcan and Hasty managed to break through, but by the time they returned to base they had lost many of their men.

Instead of pursuing them, Song Jiang's troops regrouped and rested for a while, before pitching camp. Vulcan and Hasty sent an urgent message back to the city, informing the Governor and requesting Swordsman to order out his army to relieve them without delay.

When they met in the camp at Acacia Hill, Vulcan proposed a withdrawal. Swordsman greeted this proposal with contempt. "This is just a minor setback, it's not to be taken seriously!" he said. "I'm not going to boast, but I shall engage them soon myself and I am confident of victory." Plans were made and all the officers received their orders; breakfast in the fourth watch, call to arms in the fifth, and at first light forward march!

Three beats of the drum and they struck camp and marched to the hamlet of Yubank.

Soon Song Jiang's army was seen like an advancing storm. Swordsman ordered his forces to spread out and deliver a steady fire of arrows and crossbow bolts at the enemy ranks. The drums beat a brave tattoo and flags of many colours were flourished.

From Song Jiang's ranks a warrior now rode forth under a red banner with silver characters, which proclaimed: "Thunderclap Qin Ming". Reining in his horse, he shouted out in stentorian tones: "All you greedy bureaucrats and corrupt officials of the Northern Capital, hear this: we would have attacked your city long ago if we had not feared it would harm the common people and the innocent. If you will release our two comrades and hand over to us the faithless wife and her blackguard lover, we will withdraw our forces. You have our word for it that we will not attack you. But if you persist in the folly of your ways it will result here and now in a conflagration hot enough to set the Kunlun mountain ablaze and cause jade to melt. If you have anything to say, say it. Your time is running out!"

Almost before he had finished, Swordsman shouted out in a fury: "Who will seize that robber for me?"

Immediately with a jingling of harness bells an impressive warrior appeared behind him and rode out in front. It was Suo Chao the Hasty, who had been given his nickname, you will remember, because of his impetuous nature.

"You were an officer in the service of the Emperor, you bastard," he yelled at Thunderclap. "What has the country done against you that you should abandon honour and consort with outlaws and robbers? When I capture you today I will carve you into a thousand pieces, your punishment will be worse than death!"

Now Thunderclap was also an impatient man. This challenge had the same effect as adding fuel to a fire or pouring oil on flames. Slapping his horse and twirling his wolf-toothed mace he charged. Hasty gave his horse its head and galloped to meet him. Two spirited steeds converged, two kinds of weapon clashed, as both armies cheered them on. They fought more than twenty bouts and neither had the advantage. Then from Song Jiang's vanguard Victorious rode out. He fitted an arrow to his bow, took careful aim and let fly. The arrow hit Hasty in the left shoulder, obliging him to drop his axe and gallop back to his own side. Song Jiang pointed with the stock of his whip and all three divisions charged forward together. They fought till the field was heaped with corpses and the blood flowed in rivers. It was a crushing defeat for the government forces. They were beaten back past the hamlet and the camp at Acacia Hill was taken. Swordsman had to retreat to Flying Tiger Valley. When his troops were counted it was found that a third had been lost.

Song Jiang now established his own camp at Acacia Hill.

The Professor said: "When an army is defeated like that they are bound to be demoralized. But if we don't seize this opportunity I fear they will recover their resolve. We should strike while the iron is hot."

"What you say makes very good sense," said Song Jiang. The same evening he ordered his victorious troops to form four divisions and launch a surprise attack on the city.

Now Swordsman had returned to Flying Tiger Valley as restless and impatient as a dog kicked out of the house or a fish that escapes the net. As he was discussing what to do next, a scout came and reported: "There's a line of lights on the hillside out there!"

When Swordsman rode out with some of his troops to take a look, he saw countless torches on the mountain to the east spreading a red glow over the mountainside and the neighbouring countryside. As Swordsmen led his men towards the enemy, a troop of cavalry appeared over the shoulder of the hill. Led by Colonel Hua, seconded by White-Spotted Snake and the River-Jumper, they were charging towards him from the flank. This was more than Swordsman had bargained for, so he withdrew to Flying Tiger Valley.

A vast number of torches now appeared on the hill to the west, as Twin Rods, supported by Golden Wings and the Dandy launched an attack. There were also shouts from behind them. This was Thunderclap, together with Victorious and the Supremo, making a determined assault. Swordsman's troops were thrown into confusion. They started to abandon the camp but there were more shouts in front of them, accompanied by the flash of gunfire. Thunderer and his assistants had got close to Flying Tiger Valley by small mountain paths and were setting up a bombardment.

Swordsman and his troops headed back towards the city. But now amid a roll of drums a troop of horsemen appeared, blocking their path. From a forest of torches Leopard's Head and his lieutenants the Flautist and Redeye rolled forward to cut off their retreat. With drums and gongs on all sides and fires blazing everywhere, the government troops panicked: it was every man for himself. Swordsman, his great weapon dancing in his hand, hacked a way through. He met up with Vulcan and they combined forces, fighting a rearguard action as they retreated. By dawn they had struggled back to the walls of the city.

When the Governor heard the latest news, he was frightened out of his wits. He at once ordered troops out of the city to cover the return of the defeated army, and then had the gates barred and bolted, intending to make a firm stand.

Next day Song Jiang's forces were at the East Gate, where they encamped and prepared for their assault.

Governor Liang held a conference in the military headquarters. It was difficult to see any way out. Vulcan said: "The bandits are at our gates. The situation is critical. If we hesitate we are lost. You must compose a personal letter to your father-in-law the Grand Preceptor and send a trusted messenger with it immediately to inform him of the situation, so that he can petition the Emperor at the dawn audience and troops be sent to relieve us. That's the main point. Secondly you must inform the authorities in neighbouring districts and get them to send us reinforcements without delay. Thirdly all our citizens must be ordered onto the walls to join in the defence of the city; wooden blocks and ballista stones must be stockpiled, bows and crossbows prepared, together with supplies of lime and molten metal, and a strict watch kept from morning till night. If we do this we should be all right."

The Governor said: "Writing the letter is no problem, but who will deliver it?"

It was in fact the guard commander Wang Ding who was despatched that same day. Dressed in full armour he rode off with a mounted escort bearing the confidential letter. The gate was opened, the drawbridge lowered, and off they sped towards the Eastern Capital, to communicate the intelligence and to spread word to the neighbouring provinces to send reinforcements. Magistrate Wang was ordered to assemble the citizens and get them up on the walls to prepare the defence. Of this no more.

Song Jiang now distributed his commanders around the walls of the city and camps were set up at the north, east and west, leaving a gap only in the south. Each day an attack was launched on one side or another. As quickly as possible they brought in supplies from the mountain stronghold in readiness for a long siege, because they were determined to break down the city's defences and rescue the Unicorn and Madcap.

Day after day Vulcan and Swordsman sallied forth to do battle, but to no avail. Hasty was still recuperating from his arrow wound, which had not yet healed.

We will now leave Song Jiang to his siege and describe how guard chief Wang Ding and his two companions, entrusted with the confidential letter, rode up to the residence of the Grand Preceptor in the Eastern Capital and dismounted. The doorman went in to announce their arrival and the Grand Preceptor ordered Wang Ding to be admitted. On reaching the inner room, he kowtowed and presented the letter. The Grand Preceptor tore it open and read it with growing concern. He asked for a full account and Wang Ding told him all about the affair of the Unicorn. "Song Jiang's army is now investing the city," Wang Ding said. "Their power is overwhelming. We can't hold out." He described the fighting at the hamlet of Yubank and at Acacia Hill and Flying Tiger Valley.

The Grand Preceptor said: "You've ridden hard and you must be tired. You'd better go to the rest house and sleep. I shall need to discuss this matter in council."

Wang Ding said: "Your Excellency, the situation in the Northern Capital is extremely grave, it could fall at any moment. If the city is lost, how can Hebei hold out? I hope you will send an army as early as possible to destroy the rebels."

The Grand Preceptor said: "You have said enough. You may leave."

When Wang Ding had gone, the Grand Preceptor told the duty officer to summon the President of the Military Council for an urgent discussion of the military emergency. Shortly after, this gentleman, by name Tong Guan, entered with three marshals. They greeted the Grand Preceptor, who told them in detail about the crisis in the Northern Capital. "So now what's our plan, and who's the best man to carry it out? How do we eliminate these bandits and rescue the city?"

The officials looked at each other. They were all pale. Then from behind the marshal of infantry a man stepped out. This was someone from the Palace Guard called Xuan Zan, a cavalry commander. Nature had endowed him with a face black as the bottom of a pot, a hooked nose rising skywards, curly red hair and whiskers and the physique of a tiger. He fought with a sword and was exceptionally skilled. Formerly he had been married to the daughter of a royal prince, so everyone referred to him as "The Ugly Son-in-Law". The prince had become enamoured of his military skills when he won a series of archery contests and so married his daughter off to him. Unfortunately the princess couldn't bear his looks and died of grief. After that there was no particular use for him so he was made a humble captain of guards. Marshal Tong Guan, who was an obsequious old toady, had no time for him at all and utterly despised him. But this fellow now felt irresistibly impelled to come forward and say to the Grand Preceptor: "I have a friend from the days when I was serving in the provinces. He is a descendant of Guan Yu of the late Han. His name is Guan Sheng. In looks he resembles his famous ancestor and since he also fights with a sword which is curved like the new moon, people call him Scimitar. He is at present in command of the outpost at Pudong and his talents have not received recognition. From childhood he has been a student of military strategy and has a deep understanding of the art of warfare; he has courage enough for a thousand men. If he is offered suitable gifts and promotion, he is the man who can sweep the marshes and wipe out the lawless bandits, to the great benefit of country and people. It needs only an order from you."

The Grand Preceptor was well pleased with this suggestion and he appointed the Ugly Son-in-Law as his emissary, to ride like the wind with a letter for Scimitar and invite him to the capital for talks. This done, the members of the Council withdrew.

To cut a long story short, the Ugly Son-in-Law galloped off with the letter and a retinue of four or five. Without losing a day he arrived at the Pudong outpost and dismounted. Scimitar was with his friend Hao Siwen at the time, talking of history and the rise and fall of states. When he heard there was an emissary from the capital, he quickly came out with Hao Siwen to receive him.

When greetings had been exchanged, Scimitar invited the Ugly Son-in-Law inside to sit down and asked: "We have not seen each other for a long time. What business prompted you to make this arduous journey?"

The Ugly Son-in-Law replied: "The outlaws from the Marshes of Mount Liang are attacking the Northern Capital and I ventured to recommend you strongly at a meeting with the Grand Preceptor as someone who would know how to bring peace and stability to the country and have the ability to force a surrender and execute the leaders. I am authorized by imperial decree and the personal instructions of the Grand Preceptor to present you with silk, currency and this saddle, to persuade you to go back with me. Please do not refuse. Just pack your things and come with me to the capital."

Scimitar was delighted with the prospect and said: "This friend of mine, whose name is Hao Siwen, is my adopted brother. At the time of his birth, his mother dreamt she had been entered by the spirit of the wild dog of the Gemini constellation before she became pregnant, so people call him the Hound. He is skilled in the use of every single one of the eighteen weapons. If I answer the Grand Preceptor's summons, why shouldn't I take him along so we can work together to save the country?"

The Ugly Son-in-Law agreed gladly. He urged them to start the journey at once.

So Scimitar gave instructions to his family and collected his horse, weapons, helmet and armour and packed his bags. Then he and the Hound and a dozen or so stalwarts from the frontier region set off with the Ugly Son-in-Law in great haste. On reaching the capital they rode straight to the Grand Preceptor's palace and dismounted. The doorman announced them and His Excellency bade them be brought in. The Ugly Son-in-Law led the other two before the dais and after prostrating themselves they stood to one side. The Grand Preceptor looked Scimitar over and found him to be a fine figure of a man, very tall, with a flowing beard and whiskers, broad eyebrows and bright upward-slanting eyes. His lips were deep red, as if painted.

"May I ask how old you are, commander?" said the Grand Preceptor, well satisfied with what he saw.

"I am thirty-two," Scimitar replied.

"The bandits of Mount Liang are besieging the Northern Capital. I would like to know if you can produce any plan for breaking this siege."

"I heard long ago about these brigands who have occupied the marshlands and are terrorizing and robbing the people. Now by venturing away from their hideout they are inviting disaster. Just to relieve the Northern Capital is a waste of effort. If you can let me have ten thousand or more spirited troops, I will start by capturing Mount Liang. After that, we will take the rest of the bandits. This will prevent either group from rendering assistance to the other."

The Grand Preceptor expressed his satisfaction with this plan. "That's really a way to turn defence into offence," he told Scimitar. "It's a plan after my own heart." He told the other members of the Military Council to find 15000 crack troops from Shandong and Hebei. The Hound was to command the vanguard, the Ugly Son-in-law the supporting force, and Scimitar was to have overall command. An infantry general was put in charge of supplies. The three leaders of the expedition were remunerated and a date was fixed for their departure, when they were to advance on Mount Liang in full force. When the dragon leaves the ocean, so it seems, he is bereft of his power over mists and clouds; when the tiger comes out on the plain, he cannot make full use of his teeth and claws. Perhaps then, this was to be a case of

They miss the shining pearl on the plate.

IT was not long before the police found Lu Junyi and Shi Xiu, and took them bound to the yamen. Having been brought before Grand Secretary Liang, Shi Xiu glared at him and abused him, "You are a crook that does the work of the slave's slave. But very soon my elder brother will arrive here with troops, attack and destroy the whole town. You will then be cut into three parts. He asked me to come here and inform you of your fate."

Many of the yamen officials were afraid, as Shi Xiu said this several times. When Grand Secretary Liang heard of this he could not speak for some time. He then ordered that large cangues be placed on the prisoners, and that they be sent into the prison for those about to be executed. He also instructed Cai Fu to guard them well as they must not escape again. Now Cai Fu wished to be on good terms with Liangshan Marsh so he placed the prisoners in quite decent cells, and gave them excellent food, so that they had nothing to complain of.

Grand Secretary Liang also instructed his assistant to suitably compensate the relatives of the persons who had been killed by Shi Xiu. There were at least seventy men who had been killed. A great many had been injured. They were given medical attendance and medicine free.

The next day the people found that anonymous placards had been secretly posted all over the town so they at once took some to the Grand Secretary who found them read as follows: "I, Song Jiang, commander-in-chief, at Liangshan Marsh hereby proclaim to all the officials at Daming Prefecture that Lu Junyi is the most honorable man in the land. I invited him to come to see me, and act with me in accordance with the Will of Heaven. How dare you, corrupt officials, accept secret bribes and oppress the people. I sent Shi Xiu to report this to you, but you have also arrested him. You must not execute those two prisoners, but at once arrest the adulterer and the adulteress who have caused this trouble. Should you execute my brothers, I shall come with large armies and take full revenge on you. I shall make no discrimination, but kill everybody. I will root out the lawbreakers, and Heaven and Earth will approve of my administration of justice. I chat and smile at this small affair, but I will come dancing to the beating of drums. Just men and decent women, filial sons and obedient grandsons, orderly citizens, and honest officials need have no fear of us. I issue this for your information."

As the Grand Secretary read this, his color changed, and he was quite nonplused to know what to do. He, however, sent for his assistant Wang to discuss the matter with him. Wang was a weak person, and when he had heard the details he said, "The imperial troops have tried several times to exterminate those brigands at Liangshan Marsh, but have failed every time, so what can we do as we are so weak? If the brigands attack us there will be no time to get more troops, and we shall soon be defeated. So I think it would be wiser for us not to execute the prisoners. Then we must report the matter at once to Prime Minister Cai and secondly we must assemble our troops outside the town so as to be prepared against the attack. If we do this I do not think there will be much danger, and the people will not suffer from an attack outside the town."

Grand Secretary Liang agreed to this and sent for the head jailer, Cai Fu. When he arrived the Grand Secretary said to him, "Those two prisoners are evidently very important persons, and I am afraid that if roughly treated by you they might die. You must therefore treat them well."

When Cai Fu heard this he was much pleased as it agreed with what he had already done. He returned to the jail and told his brother about the new order.

Grand Secretary Liang next sent for his two Generals to discuss matters with them. When they heard the news General Li Cheng said, "I think this place is too far from Liangshan Marsh, and the brigands will never get here. So why should you worry about this impudent notice? I have not much ability, but still I hold this important post. I have received imperial favors, but so far have not been able to show my gratitude in a practical way. I am willing to do my utmost for my master, and will take the troops and encamp outside the town. If the brigands come I will never let them go back alive."

The Grand Secretary was much pleased at this, and presented the General with much silk and gold.

The following day General Li Cheng held a conference of all his officers, and there one of his officers, Suo Chao, the "Urgent Vanguard," stepped forward. Li Cheng addressed him, "Song Jiang and his brigands will soon be here to attack Daming Prefecture. I want you to take command of some troops, and establish a camp about twelve //from the town. I will come and join you there with more men."

Suo Chao having received his orders took his troops the following day to a place called Feihu Gully, and there established a camp. General Li Cheng established another camp about three //nearer the town at a village called Huaishu Mound. Around these camps hidden pits and traps were made, so that the positions seemed impregnable. The officers and men felt quite secure, and calmly awaited the arrival of the brigands.

The proclamation issued from Liangshan Marsh was composed by Wu Yong, and was posted on every bridge and on every road. Dai Zong kept the leaders at Liangshan Marsh well informed as to the developments at Daming Prefecture. At a conference of leaders Song Jiang spoke to Wu Yong, "You had a good plan to inveigle Lu Junyi to our hold, but now he is in trouble. Our strong brother Shi Xiu has also been arrested. Have you any suggestion as to how we can save their lives?"

"Brother, do not worry," said Wu Yong. "If we embrace the present opportunities, we can not only save those two lives, but also seize much loot at Daming. Tomorrow is a very auspicious day, and I want you to give me half of our forces to proceed to Daming."

This was agreed to, and men were appointed for the coming expedition. But Li Kui interposed, "It is a long time since my two axes joined in a fray, and as they have just heard of this expedition they are naturally very glad. So please let me lead five hundred men in this expedition. I'll take Daming, chop Grand Secretary Liang to minceмeat, hack apart Li Gu and his old bag, rescue Li Junyi and Shi Xiu! Previously I was told to remain dumb on an expedition, but now I want to vent my anger."

"Younger brother," said Song Jiang, "this is a very serious and important affair, and we must not forget that Grand Secretary Liang, is the son-in-law of Prime Minister Cai. The government troops will be in charge of two great Generals, Li Cheng and Wen Da, who are brave and the equal of ten thousand men. We cannot treat them lightly, although I do not doubt your bravery and fierceness."

"Elder brother, you know that I am outspoken so you expected me to be silent," said Li Kui. "Now I should be only too pleased to kill our enemies, so why not let me go?"

"In that case," said Wu Yong, "you had better go in advance. You can lead a vanguard of five hundred men and conduct your own fighting. You can start tomorrow."

That evening Song Jiang talked over the details of the expedition with Wu Yong, and Pei Xuan wrote out the various orders, and dispatched them to the various leaders.

It was just the end of autumn, and the country was very suitable for campaigning. The horses were well fed and were in good condition. The men had rested for some time, and were quite ready for some more fighting. They got their arms, saddled the horses, and left the mountain in four divisions the next day.

Suo Chao at his camp near the Feihu Gully received a report from his scout that the brigands were now only ten //away, and were quickly advancing. He sent the news to General Li Cheng who sent all his cavalry to support Suo Chao. They were duly placed in position by Suo Chao.

The following day breakfast was taken at daybreak, and then they all went to meet the brigands. The brigands were approaching, and as they got near it was seen that Li Kui was in front of them. When near, he shouted, "Do you recognize your lord, 'Black Whirlwind' the hero of Liangshan Marsh?"

General Li Cheng on his horse laughed at this, and spoke to Suo Chao, "I have heard of the men of Liangshan Marsh, but this is a very dirty lot, and we need not take any notice of them. Now General, let us take that fellow."

Suo Chao also laughed, and replied, "It is beneath me. There is somebody else!"

Near them was a Lieutenant named Wang Ding who heard this, and without waiting for an order he galloped forward to fight with Li Kui, and was followed by his hundred cavalrymen. When Li Kui's foot soldiers saw the cavalry they turned and fled in all directions. As the cavalry pursued the men Suo Chao saw a large body of brigands advancing on both flanks so he signaled an order for the cavalry to retire.

General Li Cheng however asked, "Why not let them capture those brigands?"

"I am afraid there may be an ambush, and our cavalry might fall into a trap," replied Suo Chao.
But General Li Cheng did not agree with this, and ordered the soldiers to advance. As General Li Cheng advanced he saw that the main body of the brigands was led by a girl on horseback. On the flag he read the name of the commander, "Woman General, the 'Ten Feet of Green.'" The men were of all sizes—some big and some small, so that they looked disorderly.
Li Cheng turned to Suo Chao, "What is the use of this ill-assorted rabble? You take some men to fight that lot, while I will capture some of the other brigands."
Suo Chao whipped his horse and dashed forward. When the girl Hu San Niang, the "Ten Feet of Green" saw him coming she turned her horse round, and galloped off, followed by her men and her lady lieutenants, Gu Dasao and Sun Er Niang. General Li Cheng ordered his men to spread out and attack the retreating brigands. He had not gone far when he saw large bodies of brigands approaching, shouting and waving their arms. He therefore ordered a retreat, but when this movement was being done, he found brigands on both his flanks. Hu San Niang and her followers returned, and were now attacking his army in the rear. His men could not stand the attack on three sides, and they soon broke into disorder, and galloped off in all directions. As he neared his camp he found his way blocked by Li Kui and his men. General Li Cheng signaled for a charge, and his men bore down on Li Kui's body of men, and dividing it cut their way through. Upon reaching their camp he realized that he had lost a good number of his men. The brigands however did not advance any further, and so the battle came to a halt.
When Grand Secretary Liang heard of the defeat he immediately ordered General Wen Da to take the reserve of soldiers to support General Li Cheng. Upon reaching the camp Li Cheng met Wen Da, and after discussing the position asked for the latter's opinion.
General Wen Da laughed and replied, "It is only like a painful sore, and is of no importance." They however discussed their plans for the following day, and came to an agreement.
Early the next morning rations were served to the troops, and after breakfast orders were issued for a general advance, and they had just got moving when the brigands appeared in the distance also marching towards them. General Wen Da gave orders for the troops to halt, and open out, and for bows and arrows and spears to be ready. The brigands also halted, but a horseman rode forth with a red flag bearing the characters "Qin Ming the Thunderer." He pulled up his horse just in front of the Imperial troops, and shouted out, "Let covetous and corrupt officers from Daming Prefecture listen to me! For a long time I have planned to attack your town, but deferred doing so because I did not wish to injure the common people there. But if you will now release Lu Junyi and Shi Xiu, and hand over the adulterer and adulteress we will at once retire, without any further fighting. If, however, you are stubborn and will not listen to this proposal then tell me so at once."
General Wen Da was angry at this, and turning round to his men asked, "Who will volunteer to go out and attack that fellow?"
Before he had finished saying this Suo Chao galloped forward to fight. Halting he called out to Qin Ming, "You were previously in the Imperial army, and you were not ill-treated. So why are you now a brigand instead of being a loyal man? Today I will capture you, and cut you up into small pieces."
At this Qin Ming was wild with rage, and raising his spiked mace, dashed forward. Suo Chao did likewise. Their horses took their riders, temper, and were also keen for the fray. The assembled troops cheered at the sight. The two fought for about twenty bouts without either gaining any advantage. Among the brigands was the leader Han Tao who shot an arrow which struck Suo Chao in the shoulder, and as the latter could no longer wield his battle-axe he turned his horse and retreated.
Song Jiang seeing this signaled the order for a general advance, and then began a great battle. Blood was flowing over the ground like water. The Imperial troops gave way, and being again defeated retreated to their camp. They further retreated to the second camp at the Feihu Gully. There Wen Da found that he had lost about one third of his men.
Song Jiang halted his men at the first camp, and discussed matters with Wu Yong who said, "The troops have been defeated a second time so that their morale will be weak just now. We must seize this opportunity for a further attack, before they have had time to recover." Song Jiang agreed to this, and issued orders at once for a general attack that very night.
General Wen Da was resting, and meditating in his tent that night when a soldier reported to him that there was a big fire on the east. General Wen Da immediately mounted his horse, and riding forward he saw all the hills and plains to the east were lit up. Looking round he now saw that to the west of his camp it was also ablaze with lights. He returned to camp, and saw that the brigands were advancing on both sides. He was very much upset, and had no definite plan of defense. The brigands approached with great noise. The Imperial troops were restless, and were evidently on the point of decamping, but they were now quite surrounded. General Wen Da had decided to cut a way through with his men, but just then the brigands opened fire upon them. He could not control his men any longer as they were in great disorder. He therefore spoke to General Li Cheng to get a few men together, and then with a sudden rush they broke through the cordon of brigands, and so escaped. This remnant of the Imperial troops reached Daming just after daybreak.
When Grand Secretary Liang heard of the disaster he felt as though he had lost two of his three souls. He hurriedly ordered all the remainder of his troops to rescue. When the defeated troops had all entered the town he ordered that all the gates be closed, and the wall strongly defended.
The following day the brigands approached and encamped outside the East Gate.
The Grand Secretary summoned a conference of all officials to discuss means of defending the town. At the meeting General Li Cheng spoke, "The brigands are just outside the town, and we are in great danger. If we are not careful the town will soon be taken. Sir, you should write a personal note to Prime Minister Cai, explaining our position, and asking for immediate relief. Send this by a very trusty and confidential courier this very night. Secondly, you should dispatch urgent letters to all the surrounding towns asking for support. Thirdly, you should issue a proclamation in this town appealing to every man to join in the defense of the town. They must prepare logs of wood and stone to hurl at the enemy; arm themselves with crossbows and stiff bows; get bottles of powder and lime dust, vile smelling manure; and take guard both night and day. If we do this at once we may be able to hold out for some time."
"I can write all the dispatches you refer to," said the Grand Secretary, "but who can face the danger outside and get through?"
Lieutenant Wang Ding volunteered to do this, and that night he left with the confidential dispatches. He was successful, and reaching the nearest town he delivered the messages, and had them sent to all the surrounding towns. He himself went on to the Eastern Capital with the important dispatch.
On the other hand, Song Jiang divided his men and besieged the town on three sides, but he left the South Gate open intentionally. He also ordered for supplies to be sent from Liangshan Marsh as he was uncertain how long the attack would last. He was however determined to continue his attack until both Lu Junyi and Shi Xiu were rescued.
Every day General Li Cheng and Wen Da led some of his soldiers outside the town to skirmish with the brigands but could not succeed.
Wang Ding quickly reached the Eastern Capital and delivered the confidential dispatches to Prime Minister Cai. The latter was astonished at the news, and questioned Wang Ding closely. Wang Ding told the whole story of Lu Junyi, and explained in detail how the Imperial troops had been defeated by the brigands.
The Prime Minister then told him to go and take rest after his tiresome journey, while he would discuss the matter with the other ministers. Prime Minister Cai Jing then summoned all the ministers to assemble in the Grand Council to discuss urgent matters. It was not long before all were assembled, and then Prime Minister Cai Jing, explained what had happened at the Northern Capital. He asked "What can be done to relieve the town and defeat the brigands?"
The ministers looked at each other in a helpless air, but nobody spoke. A man however stepped forward from behind the seat occupied by the commander of the infantry. He was Xuan Zan, a Captain of the Imperial Guard. His face was dark, and had a snub nose. His hair was curly, and his moustache was red. He was very tall, and was armed with a steel sword. During a war against a Mongol tribe he had distinguished himself as a skillful bowman, and the prince was so pleased with his skill that he had been given the prince's daughter in marriage. But the girl had not loved him, and as she had died after a short term of married life he had fallen into disfavor with the prince who had given him a minor military position as Captain in a cavalry regiment. For this reason he gained the nickname of "Disgraceful Son-in-law." He now addressed Prime Minister Cai Jing, "When I lived at home I knew a man named Guan Sheng, who is a descendant of the famous General of the Three Kingdoms, Guan Gong. His manner and form carries a close resemblance to his ancestor and he always carries a great halberd like Guan Gong. Because of this he is called, Guan Sheng, the 'Great Halberd.' He is in charge of a police force at Pudong in Shaanxi province, and is well known for his military skill. Nobody can beat him, and he is quite fearless. If presents were made to him and he was promoted to some responsible position in the army, I think he could exterminate the brigands and make the country safe."
Cai Jing was much pleased at this suggestion, and at once commissioned Xuan Zan, the "Disgraceful Son-in-law," to send a dispatch to Guan Sheng and bring him to the Eastern Capital, Kaifeng without delay.
We need not go into many details, but will just say that Xuan Zan duly carried out his orders, and quickly reached Pudong. He was gladly welcomed by Guan Sheng who had not seen him for a long time. When Xuan Zan had delivered his message Guan Sheng was highly delighted at the news. He then introduced him to his best friend, Hao Siwen, and told him the story of Hao's birth. "Hao Siwen's mother dreamt that a star, Jing Mu An descended and entered her womb. Soon afterwards a son was born and he was called Hao Siwen, with the nickname 'Jing Mu An.' He is well skilled in military drill, but so far has no opportunity of proving his ability, and lives an insignificant life here." Guan Sheng proposed to take Hao Siwen with him to fight against the brigands. This was agreed to, and they set out that night for the Eastern Capital. Their arrival was reported to Prime Minister Cai Jing, who invited them to enter. They all three entered the hall and saluted. Cai Jing was pleased with Guan Sheng's appearance, and asked for his age. Guan Sheng replied that he was thirty-two years old. Cai Jing then explained the position at the Northern Capital, Daming Prefecture and asked if he had any suggestions to make.
"I have long heard," said Guan Sheng, "that those brigands occupy Liangshan Marsh and make disturbances in the surrounding country. For the first time, however, they now leave their base far behind so I think we can easily defeat them. However, it would be useless to rescue Daming Prefecture with a large force. I beg you to give me ten thousand soldiers to capture Liangshan Marsh first, and by cutting off their base we can early arrest the brigands.
Cai Jing was very much pleased at this, and said, "That is the same method that was used in rescuing the Kingdom of Zhao by besieging the capital of the Kingdom of Wei. I agree with your plans." He then summoned the Grand Councilors, and explaining the plan got three armies placed under the command of Guan Sheng. An immediate start took place, and the armies went straight to Liangshan Marsh

Guan Sheng took his leave of the premier and assumed command of the fifteen thousand men. He divided them into three contingents and, with them, left the Eastern Capital, heading for Liangshan Marsh.
Meanwhile, Song Jiang and his commanders attacked the Northern Capital every day. Li Cheng and Wen Da dared not come out and confront them. Suo Chao's arrow wound had not yet healed. There was no one to fight.
Song Jiang was unable to crack the city. He grew morose. They had been away from the mountain stronghold for some time, but victory remained elusive. Sitting gloomily in his tent one night, he lit a candle and started to read over the Heavenly Books given him by the Mystic Queen. It struck him as odd that no army had been sent to relieve the long besieged city. And why hadn't Dai Zong, whom he had dispatched to the mountain fortress, returned? Song Jiang's mind was troubled. He could neither eat nor rest.
A junior officer came in and said: "The Military Advisor is here." Wu Yong entered the central tent.
"We've been surrounding the Northern Capital for quite a while. Why hasn't any army been sent to its rescue?" he queried. "And no one comes out to do battle. We know that three horsemen had left the city. Governor Liang must have dispatched emissaries to the Eastern Capital to report the emergency. Surely Premier Cai, his father-in-law, would send an army under an able general to his rescue. Could they be using the 'besieging Wei to relieve Zhao strategy'? Instead of relieving this place, they could be attacking our Mount Liangshan stronghold. That must be it. You've good cause for worry. We should call in our forces, but not withdraw all."
Just then Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller arrived. He reported to Song Jiang. "The premier has engaged the services of Guan Sheng the Big Halberd, direct descendant of the immortalized Guan Yu. He's leading an army in a raid on Mount Liangshan. The chieftains in our fortress don't know what to do. They hope you, brother, and the military advisor will return with our forces quickly and come to their aid."
"Even so," cautioned Wu Yong, "we mustn't be too hasty. Tonight, we'll have the infantry withdraw first. But we'll leave two cavalry units in ambush on both sides of Flying-Tiger Valley. When they learn in the city that we're pulling out, they'll certainly chase us. This is the plan we must follow. Otherwise, our army will fall into disorder."
"You've spoken well, Military Advisor," said Song Jiang.
He ordered Hua Rong to place five hundred troops in hiding on the left side of the valley, and Lin Chong to conceal another five hundred on the right. Huyan Zhuo be directed to take twenty-five horsemen and Ling Zhen to set up some artillery about a dozen //from the city. When the pursuing soldiers came out they were to fire their cannon. This would be the signal for the troops lying in ambush to close in for the kill.
At the same time, Song Jiang's forward contingent would pull back, with dragging banners and muffled drums, like drifting clouds after rain, like retreating troops who refused to fight.
The infantry rose in the middle of the night and began marching away, in order of their units. Not until early the next morning did the bugles sound for a general withdrawal.
All this was observed from atop the city walls—the dragging banners, the shouldered halberds and axes, the obvious intent to return to the mountains, the noisy bustle, the dismantling of the camps. The news was reported to Governor Liang.
"The Liangshan Marsh army has called in its troops. They're all leaving."
Governor Liang summoned Li Cheng and Wen Da.
"Evidently the premier has sent an army to capture their Mount Liangshan," said Wen Da, "and the knaves are afraid of losing their lair, so they're rushing to get back. This is our chance to slaughter them and nab Song Jiang."
Before the words were out of his mouth, a mounted messenger arrived with a directive from the Eastern Capital to join in exterminating the bandits. Pursue them, it said, if they retreat. Governor Liang promptly ordered Li Cheng and Wen Da to lead two contingents and harry Song Jiang's forces from the east and the west.
At the head of the withdrawing units, Song Jiang observed the soldiers pouring out of the city to give chase. He and his men moved quickly, as if their lives depended on it. Li Cheng and Wen Da pursued, straight to the side of Flying-Tiger Valley. Then cannon boomed behind them.
Li Cheng and Wen Da, startled by the blast, reined in their horses and looked. To their rear they saw a bristling array of banners and heard the wild thunder of battle drums. It was completely unexpected. Then five hundred men under Hua Rong, and an equal number under Lin Chong, surged towards them from left and right in a murderous charge.
It was too late to take defensive action. The government commanders knew they had been tricked, and led a full speed retreat. They ran right into a troop of cavalry, under Huyan Zhuo, which slaughtered them savagely. Li Cheng and Wen Da, their helmets gone, their armor in shreds, fled back to the city and bolted the gates.
Song Jiang's troops resumed their orderly withdrawal. As they neared Liangshan Marsh, they found Xuan Zan the Ugly Son-in-Law blocking their road. Song Jiang directed his army to halt and make camp. At the same time he sent a messenger secretly across the river and up the mountain with an order for relief units both by land and by water.

Inside the stronghold, Zhang Heng the Boat Flame, chieftain of the water forces, said to his brother Zhang Shun, White Streak in the Waves: "We haven't performed any meritorious deeds since coming here. Now Guan Sheng the Big Halberd of Pudong is attacking our fortress in three columns. Why don't we two raid his camp, capture him, and cover ourselves with glory? Then we'll be able to hold our heads up before our brothers."
"Our only job is to command these water forces," said Zhang Shun. "If we don't relieve a brother unit in danger, people will laugh at us."
"Don't be so finicky, otherwise we'll never distinguish ourselves. If you don't want to, that's up to you. Tonight, I'm going."
All Zhang Shun's pleas were to no avail. That night Zhang Heng put four or five men each on more than fifty boats. They were garbed for a stealthy raid, and carried bamboo spears and short daggers. Moonlight shone faintly on the cold dew. It was very still, around the second watch, when the small craft reached the shore.
Guan Sheng was in the central tent, reading by the light of a lamp. A junior officer on sentry duty came in quietly and reported: "Forty or fifty small boats have entered the reeds. The men on them are armed with spears. They're hiding there on both sides. We don't know what they're up to."
Guan Sheng smiled coldly. He turned to the commanding officer and whispered a few words.
Zhang Heng, leading between two and three hundred men, advanced on tiptoe from the reeds to the edge of camp. They pushed aside the pronged barriers, and continued directly to the center of headquarters. They saw in a tent Guan Sheng stroking his beard as he read beside a lamp.
Happily, Zhang Heng charged into the tent, spear in hand. At once gongs crashed and soldiers yelled, raising a terrible din. It sounded as if heaven and earth were falling, mountains and rivers collapsing. From four sides the soldiers in ambush spewed forth. Not one of the three hundred or so raiders got away. They were bound and pushed before the general's tent.
Guan Sheng looked them over and laughed. "Lawless rebels, petty scoundrels! Dare you come here and insult me?" He had Zhang Heng confined in a prisoner's cart. As to the others, he put them in jail, intending to deliver the lot to the capital after he had captured Song Jiang.
At this time the three Ruan brothers, in the fort by the waterside, were considering sending to Song Jiang for instructions. Zhang Shun came in.
"Although I begged him not to," he said, "my brother raided Guan Sheng's camp. He was caught and put in a prisoner's cart."
Ruan the Seventh uttered an exclamation. "We're all in this to the death, together through thick and thin. He's your flesh and blood brother. How could you let him be captured? If you don't rescue him, we Ruan brothers will!"
"I don't dare make a move without orders," said Zhang Shun.
"While you're waiting they'll chop him into mincemeat," cried Seventh.
"That's right," Second and Fifth agreed.
Zhang Shun couldn't convince them otherwise. He was forced to agree.
That night, at the fourth watch, all the chieftains of the water forces, large and small, were put in command of a hundred or more craft. Rapidly, they set sail for Guan Sheng's camp. To the sentry on the shore they looked like a swarm of ants. As they neared the bank, he hurriedly reported to the Big Halberd.
"Stupid thieving slaves," laughed Guan Sheng. He again whispered instructions to his commanders.
With the three Ruan brothers in the lead and Zhang Shun bringing up the rear, the yelling raiders charged into the camp. But not an enemy was in sight. Startled, the Ruan brothers turned to leave. Gongs crashed before the tents. From left and right government infantry and cavalry, in eight columns, closed in like giant scoops and dustpans.
Quickly alert to the danger, Zhang Shun dived into the water. The three Ruan brothers rushed along the path for the shore. Their pursuers caught up, and hooked poles snaked out and nooses flew, catching the Devil Incarnate Ruan the Seventh and dragging him away. Second, Fifth and Zhang Shun were rescued by Turbulent River Dragon Li Jun, Tong Wei and Tong Meng at the risk of their own lives.
The naval forces informed Mount Liangshan what had happened. Liu Tang told Zhang Shun to go by water directly to Song Jiang's camp and report. Song Jiang conferred with Wu Yong. How were they to drive back Guan Sheng?

"The coming battle will be decisive. On it victory or defeat will depend," said Wu Yong.
Before the words were out of his mouth, they heard battle drums thundering. Xuan Zan the Ugly Son-in-Law was leading his three contingents in a frontal assault. Song Jiang and his forces advanced to meet them. Xuan Zan appeared beneath an arch of pennants and reined in his horse.
"Who will go forth and seize that rogue?" cried Song Jiang.
Hua Rong promptly clapped his steed and attacked, holding his lance. Xuan Zan met him with whirling blade. Back and forth they fought, up and down the field, for ten full rounds. Hua Rong executed a feint, turned his mount and rode away. Xuan Zan pursued and began to catch up. Hua Rong set his steel lance in the rings of his saddle and took out his bow and arrow. Twisting around, he extended his powerful arms and released the feathered shaft. Xuan Zan heard the twang of the bow and, as the arrow sped towards him, raised his weapon. It pinged off the blade.
Hua Rong notched a second arrow to his string. His foe was closer now. He aimed at his chest and let fly. Xuan Zan ducked low over his stirrups, and the missile whizzed past. But the Ugly Son-in-Law was thoroughly impressed with his marksmanship. Abandoning the chase, he pulled his steed around and galloped back towards his position. Hua Rong wheeled his horse and pursued. As he narrowed the gap between them, Hua Rong winged a third arrow at Xuan Zan's back. It clanged against protective armor and bounced off.
Xuan Zan raced to his position and sent a messenger to Guan Sheng to report what had happened. The Big Halberd immediately called for his battle charger. He grasped his sword, mounted, and rode to the front, emerging beneath the arch of pennants.
Song Jiang commented quietly to Wu Yong on Guan Sheng's noble appearance. Turning to his chieftains, he said: "A heroic general, worthy of his fame!"
Lin Chong was angered by this remark. He said: "We brothers have fought sixty or seventy engagements since coming to Liangshan Marsh, and always with honor. Such a comparison reflects on our prestige!" He rode out at Guan Sheng, lance extended.
The Big Halberd shouted: "Swamp bandits, how dare you rebel against the imperial court! I challenge Song Jiang alone to a battle to the death!"
Song Jiang, from beneath his side's arch of pennants called Lin Chong to stop, and himself rode forth. He bowed to Guan Sheng.
"I am Song Jiang, a petty functionary from the town of Yuncheng," he said. "I respectfully present myself so that the general may criticise my shortcomings."
"A small official like you—how dare you rebel against the throne?"
"His Majesty has been deluded. He's given power to corrupt ministers and officials who harm the people. My brothers and I seek only to perform righteous deeds for Heaven and emperor. We have no evil intent."
"The emperor's soldiers are here before you, and you still resist! Your smooth talk can fool no one. Dismount and surrender, or I'll pound you to mincemeat!"
Qin Ming the Thunderbolt was infuriated. Brandishing his wolf-toothed cudgel, he sprang into the saddle and rushed forward. The Big Halberd galloped out to meet him. Lin Chong, afraid he would lose a chance to distinguish himself in combat, also flew to attack Guan Sheng. The three battled savagely in a cloud of dust like revolving figures on a carrousel lantern.
Song Jiang was concerned lest they injure Guan Sheng. He ordered the buglers to blow recall. Lin Chong and Qin Ming returned to the position.
"We were about to grab the lout," they said. "Why did you call us back and halt the battle?"
"Brothers," said Song Jiang, "we fight in righteous self-defense. We never use our strength against the weak. If it took two of you to capture him, he wouldn't acknowledge it as a fair defeat, and people would laugh at us. I consider him a courageous general, an able, loyal statesman, a descendant of an immortalized ancestor. If he would consent to go up the mountain, I'd gladly relinquish my place to him."
The two chieftains were very dissatisfied. That day, both sides withdrew their forces.
Guan Sheng, returning to his camp, dismounted and removed his armor. "I couldn't hold out against those two commanders. It was plain I was about to lose," he mused. "But Song Jiang called them back. I wonder why?" He directed that Zhang Heng and Ruan the Seventh be brought to him in their prisoner carts, and he questioned them:
"Song Jiang was only a petty functionary in Yuncheng. Why do you fellows support him?"
"Our brother is famed throughout Shandong and Hebei," Ruan the Seventh retorted. "He's called the Timely Rain and the Defender of Chivalry. A crude oaf like you wouldn't know that!"
Guan Sheng, with lowered head, did not reply. He ordered that the carts be taken away.
He brooded in his tent that night, unable to sleep or rest. He walked out and gazed at the moonlit sky. Frost covered the ground. Guan Sheng sighed. A scout approached him and reported.
"A bearded commander, riding alone and carrying only a whip, wishes to see you."
"Did you ask him who he is?"
"He bears no armor or weapons. He won't give his name. He says only that he wants to speak to the commander-in-chief."
"Very well. Bring him to me."
The man was escorted to Guan Sheng's tent. He looked vaguely familiar in the lamplight. Guan Sheng asked him who he was.
"Please dismiss your attendants."
Guan Sheng laughed. "If a general of a great army isn't of one heart and mind with his troops, how can he command them? In headquarters or out, high rank or low, we all know how to keep secrets. You can speak freely."
"My name is Huyan Zhuo. I was formerly the commander of the imperial linked-up cavalry which attacked Liangshan Marsh. But I was deceived by a bandit trick and lost the initiative. I was unable to return and report to the emperor. When I heard that you had come, General, I was overjoyed. On the battlefield this morning Song Jiang saw that Lin Chong and Qin Ming were about to capture you, and he called them back before they could do you an injury. He's long had the desire to surrender, but his bandits don't agree. He and I have conferred secretly on a way to compel them. If you are willing, General, tomorrow night take a light bow and short arrows, ride a swift horse along a small path into the bandits' camp, and seize Lin Chong and other brigand chieftains. Then you can turn them over to the authorities in the capital. Not only will you be performing a great deed, but Song Jiang and I will have our crimes forgiven."
Very pleased, Guan Sheng invited Huyan Zhuo to drink. Huyan told him that Song Jiang's main concern was loyalty to the emperor, and that it was unfortunate he had become involved with brigands. Guan Sheng stroked his beard and poured wine. The two spoke freely and without suspicion.
The next day, Song Jiang again mustered his forces to do battle.
Guan Sheng said to Huyan Zhuo: "Tonight, we'll put our plan into operation. But first we must defeat some of their top commanders."
Huyan donned some borrowed armor, mounted, and rode with the Big Halberd to the field of battle. The moment he set eyes on him, Song Jiang cried: "I never gave you an iota less than your due. Why did you steal away in the night?"
"Knavish bandits," Huyan replied. "You'll never amount to anything!"
Song Jiang ordered Huang Xin the Suppressor of the Three Mountains to fight him. Grasping his death-dealing sword, Huang vaulted into the saddle and rode against Huyan. The chargers met and the contestants battled. They had fought less than ten rounds when Huyan raised one of his rods and knocked Huang to the ground. Song Jiang's men rushed onto the field and carried Huang back. Delighted, Guan Sheng commanded all three contingents to attack and annihilate the foe.
"Don't do that," Huyan urged. "That knave Wu Yong is sure to have some scheme. If we pursue, we'll fall into their trap."
Guan Sheng immediately recalled his troops, and they returned to camp. In the central tent, he treated Huyan to wine and asked about Huang Xin the Suppressor of the Three Mountains.
"He originally was an important official in the imperial court and a district commander in Qingzhou Prefecture. He and Qin Ming and Hua Rong became brigands at the same time. Killing that bandit today has taken the edge off their prestige. When we slip into their camp tonight we're sure to succeed."
Guan Sheng was very pleased. He ordered that Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen head two columns as reinforcements. He himself would command a unit of five hundred cavalry armed with light bows and short arrows. Huyan Zhuo would lead the way. They would set out at the second watch, and by the third reach the middle of Song Jiang's camp.
At the boom of a signal cannon they would attack simultaneously from within and without.
The moonlight was as bright as day. At dusk they had put on their armor and removed the bells from their horses' bridles. The soldiers were equipped for stealthy action. When they mounted, each man gripped a short stick in his teeth to ensure silence. Huyan led the way and the others followed.
For half a watch they travelled a mountain path. Forty or fifty soldiers who had been lying in concealment rose up by the side of the road. "Is that you, General Huyan?" a low voice asked.
"No talking," Huyan snapped. "Follow behind my horse."
He rode on ahead, with Guan Sheng in his rear. They proceeded through a mountain gap. Huyan pointed with his lance. A red lamp glowed in the distance.
Guan Sheng reined in his steed. "What place is that?"
"Song Jiang's central army." Huyan urged on his horse.
As they neared the red lamp a cannon boomed. Guan Sheng and his cavalry charged. But when they reached the lamp, there wasn't a soul in sight, and Huyan had disappeared. Guan Sheng, startled, realized he had been tricked. Hastily, he pulled his mount around. On the surrounding hills, drums pounded and gongs crashed. Scrambling for any escape path, the soldiers fled for their lives. Guan Sheng galloped away, followed only by a few other riders.
They hurried through the mountain gap. On the edge of the grove behind them again a cannon boomed. Hooked poles shot out from every side and dragged Guan Sheng from his saddle. His weapon and horse were taken, he was stripped of his armor, and pushed and jostled into the main camp. Lin Chong and Hua Rong and a troop of horsemen cut off Hao Siwen. Attacked by the two chieftains, Hao fought them twenty or thirty rounds. He felt his strength ebbing and turned to flee. From obliquely behind him the girl warrior Ten Feet of Steel hotly pursued. She snared him with a crimson noose and dragged him from his steed. Brigand infantry rushed forward, grabbed him, and hauled him to the main camp.
In the meanwhile, Qin Ming and Sun Li, out after Xuan Zan with a troop of cavalry, ran into him on the road.
Xuan Zan rode forward. "Wretched bandits," he fumed. "Who resists me dies, who avoids me lives!"
Qin Ming was furious. He spurred his mount forward, brandishing his wolf-toothed cudgel, riding full tilt towards Xuan Zan. The chargers met and the contestants battled several rounds. Then Sun Li began closing in from the side. Xuan Zan grew flurried, he lost his old skill. He was knocked from his saddle by Qin Ming's cudgel. The three brigand contingents cheered. They rushed over and seized him.
While all this was going on, Li Ying the Heaven Soaring Eagle was raiding Guan Sheng's camp with a large force and rescuing Zhang Heng, Ruan the Seventh and the other captured naval brigands. They also seized a quantity of grain, fodder and horses, and induced many of the defeated foe to surrender.
At dawn Song Jiang and his forces returned to the mountain. The east was gradually turning light when he and his chieftains seated themselves according to rank in Loyalty Hall. Guan Sheng, Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen were brought in. Song Jiang hastily came down, ordered the guards back and personally untied them. He seated Guan Sheng in the central chair of the highest leader and kowtowed.
"This lowly criminal has accidentally offended against Your Excellency's authority," he said humbly. "I beg forgiveness."
Huyan Zhuo also came forward. "I was acting under orders and could not refuse. I pray you, General, excuse my presumptuous behavior."
Guan Sheng was nonplussed by the chivalrous attitude of the chieftains. He turned to Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen. "We're here as captives. What shall we do?"
The two replied: "Whatever you decide, General."
"We've no face to return to the capital," said Guan Sheng. "We ask only an early death."
"Why talk like that?" said Song Jiang. "If you don't scorn us as too insignificant, why not join us in performing righteous deeds on Heaven's behalf? Of course, if you'd rather not, we won't keep you. We'll send you back to the capital today."
"People call you Song Jiang the Loyal and Righteous, and you're certainly worthy of your name,, A man must requite the friend who understands him. Since we can no longer return home or to our posts, we'll gladly serve as ordinary soldiers under your command."
Song Jiang was delighted. He had a big feast of celebration laid that day, and sent men out to assure the scattered government troops of good treatment if they surrendered. Six or seven thousand responded. The remainder were allowed to go. Of the soldiers who capitulated, those who had families were given some silver and permitted to return home. Xue Yong, dispatched with a letter to Pudong, was instructed to fetch Guan Sheng's family to the stronghold. Of that we'll say no more.
During the feast, Song Jiang suddenly remembered Lu Junyi the Magnate and Shi Xiu, still incarcerated in the Northern Capital, and tears came to his eyes.
"Don't feel badly," said Wu Yong. "I have a plan. Muster our troops and attack Daming tonight. We're sure to succeed."
Guan Sheng rose and said: "As thanks for your not having killed me, I would like to march in the forward echelon."
Song Jiang was very pleased. The next morning he instructed that Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen's original troops be restored to them and that they serve as the forward unit's vanguard. Not one of the captured commanders was unwilling to join in the attack on the Northern Capital. Li Jun and Zhang Shun were directed to follow up with armored naval forces. All set forth in the order prescribed.

In the city Governor Liang was drinking with Suo Chao to celebrate his recovery from his wound. The sky was dull, and the wind howled. A cavalry scout entered and reported.
"Guan Sheng, Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen and their men have been captured by Song Jiang, and have joined his band. The Liangshan Marsh army will reach here today."
Governor Liang goggled, his mouth agape. Goblets toppled, chopsticks fell.
"Those bandits gave me an arrow wound," said Suo Chao. "Now I can get my revenge!"
Liang rewarded him with warm wine and directed him to lead city soldiers against the foe. He ordered Li Cheng and Wen Da to follow with reinforcements.
It was mid-winter and the weather was cold. For days the sky had been overcast with red clouds. A strong wind howled and moaned. Suo Chao marched to Flying-Tiger Valley and made camp.
The next day, Song Jiang with Lu Fang and Guo Sheng mounted a bluff to watch Guan Sheng fight. 3 times the big drums sounded and Guan Sheng rode onto the field. At the opposite end, Suo Chao appeared on horseback. He didn't recognize Guan Sheng. An aide said, "That's Guan Sheng the Big Halberd who's just gone over to the rebels."
Suo Chao silently gripped his lance and rode at his opponent. Guan Sheng clapped his horse and galloped to meet him, brandishing his sword. The 2 had fought less than 10 rounds when Li Cheng intervened. He had been watching from the government's central contingent and saw that Suo Chao's play with axes could never defeat Guan Sheng. Flourishing his blade, he joined in the assault. Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen moved in with their weapons to help the Big Halberd. Now five horsemen were involved. Song Jiang on the bluff pointed with his whip. His entire army rolled into action. Li Cheng's soldiers suffered a crushing defeat. Severely mauled, they retreated into the city that night and barred the gates. Song Jiang's troops chased them to the foot of the walls, then made camp nearby. The next day Suo Chao again surged out with a contingent of government soldiers. Wu Yong instructed his field officers to go through the motions of putting up a fight, but to retreat if the enemy advanced. Suo Chao, fooled by this display, returned to the city triumphant. In the evening, the clouds massed and the wind was fierce. When Wu Yong came out of his tent, it was snowing heavily. He dispatched infantry to a narrow stretch between a stream and a hillside, had them dig a pit, cover it over, and conceal it with earth. That night the snow continued to fall. The next morning everything was covered with a white mantle two feet thick. To the watchers on the city wall Song Jiang's forces looked frightened. They seemed to keep shifting from one position to another. Suo Chao, seeing this, mustered three hundred cavalry and sallied forth. The outlaws scattered and withdrew. Song Jiang directed naval chieftains Li Jun and Zhang Shun to go lightly armed towards the foe. Restraining their mounts, lances athwart, when they neared Suo Chao they cast their weapons aside and fled in the direction of the pit with Suo Chao in hot pursuit. An impatient man, he threw caution to the winds. Here the path ran close to the stream. Li Jun abandoned his steed and leaped into the water. He swam forward. "Brother Song Jiang, run!" he yelled. Suo Chao galloped recklessly across the narrow stretch. On the hillside behind, cannon boomed and startled horse and rider tumbled into the trap. Brigands who had been hiding immediately swarmed around. Even if Suo Chao had 3 heads and 6 arms, he couldn't have warded off the 7 injuries and 8 wounds inflicted upon him. Truly, deep silvery snow concealed a snare, beneath ivory jade flakes a pit trap lay.

Now the commander from Pudong known as Scimitar because his weapon was a large halberd with a curved blade was a real hero, as brave and loyal as they come. Taking leave of the Grand Preceptor, he marched out of the capital with an army of fifteen thousand in three units. He headed directly for the Marshes of Mount Liang.
Our story divides here. Song Jiang and his leaders had been attacking the Northern Capital every day but had met with no success. Government commanders Vulcan and the Swordsman had no intention of coming out to fight, and Hasty had quite a serious arrow wound from which he was not yet recovered, so there was no one in the garrison willing or able to do battle with them. Song Jiang was downcast by his failure to break down the city's defences. It was long since they came down from Mount Liang and victory was still not in sight.
One evening, then, sitting gloomily in his tent, he lit a candle and took out the Mystic Lady's books. As he was consulting them a thought suddenly struck him: they had been besieging the city for quite a while, yet no relief column had appeared. Moreover, the Magic Messenger, who had gone back to Mount Liang, had not yet returned. These thoughts rendered him anxious and restless.
At this moment the sentry suddenly reported: "The Military Adviser is here!"
The Professor marched into the command tent and said: "We have been besieging the city for a long time, so why is it no relief force has come to them and no one from the city has tried to attack us? Those three riders who left the city must have been sent by Governor Liang to inform the capital of the emergency. You would expect his father-in-law the Grand Preceptor to send troops immediately and you would expect them to have top commanders. Now, what if they are trying to turn defence into offense and instead of sending troops to relieve the danger here have gone directly to attack our stronghold on Mount Liang? It is a possibility you must not overlook. We must regroup. But we should not all withdraw at once."
At that very moment the Magic Messenger arrived and reported: "The Grand Preceptor in the Eastern Capital has requested the Pudong commander Guan Sheng, known as Scimitar, a descendant of the great Guan Yu, to head an army against the Marshes of Mount Liang. Our leaders in the stronghold don't know what to do. They beg you both to return with the army as fast as possible and advise them."
The Professor said: "Nevertheless we must not act precipitately. Tonight let us first withdraw the infantry, leaving behind two cavalry units to set up an ambush on either side of Flying Tiger Valley. When the city hear that we are retreating they will certainly come out in pursuit. We must do things this way, otherwise our retreat could turn into a rout."
"You are absolutely correct," Song Jiang said. He ordered Colonel Hua with five hundred troops to take up a position on the left of Flying Tiger Valley, and Leopard's Head with another five hundred to take up a position on the right. Twin Rods with twenty-five horsemen was to protect Thunderer while he set up cannon three or four miles from the city, with orders to hold his fire until the pursuing forces were close. This would be the signal for the troops in ambush to attack simultaneously from either side. Orders were also given for the first of the retreating troops to lower their banners and move off without gongs or drums, dispersing like clouds after the rain; they were to offer no resistance, giving the appearance of an army in full retreat.

The infantry divisions rose in the night and one by one set off. By about the middle of the next morning all were gone. Those in the city saw frenzied activity in Song Jiang's lines, as his men lowered their standards, shouldered arms, struck camp and departed, apparently heading back to the mountain. After observing closely, they reported to the Governor: "The forces of Mount Liang are packing up. They are all leaving."
The Governor immediately summoned Vulcan and the Swordsman to a meeting.
Swordsman said: "It must be because the Grand Preceptor's relief column has gone to attack Mount Liang. The buggers are scared of losing their hideout, that's why they're getting out in such a hurry. It's a great chance for us to pursue them and kill them. We've got to get Song Jiang."
Scarcely had he finished speaking when a messenger galloped up with a letter from the capital, announcing that an army had been sent to capture the viper's nest, and ordering that if the bandits retreated they should be harried. The Governor therefore ordered Vulcan and the Swordsman to assemble their forces and ride out on two sides in pursuit of Song Jiang.
As he retreated Song Jiang saw the troops from the city coming after them, taking few precautions. His army had retreated no further than Flying Tiger Valley when all the guns opened up simultaneously in the rear.
Vulcan and Swordsman were taken completely by surprise. They reined in their horses to look. Behind them was a sea of waving banners, with drums and gongs sounding furiously. As they hurriedly attempted to turn their armies round, Colonel Hua came charging in from the left and Leopard's Head from the right, each with five thousand troops. The two government commanders had no time to act. Realizing they had fallen into a trap, they retreated in panic.
But now directly before them was Twin Rods with a detachment of cavalry, wreaking havoc among their troops. After fighting till their fine helmets were smashed to pieces and their clothing and armour in tatters, Vulcan and Swordsman struggled back to the city, where they bolted the gates. They did not emerge again.
Song Jiang's army was now able to withdraw in an orderly fashion. When they drew near to the Marshes of Mount Liang, they found the Ugly Son-in-Law blocking their path. Song Jiang halted his troops and set up a temporary camp, while he sent a messenger secretly by a hidden route to cross the water and tell the leaders on the mountain that he wanted support from both land and water-borne troops.
The Pilot was in command at the waterside camp. He said to his brother White Eel: "You and I, we haven't made much of a contribution since we joined the stronghold. We always hear the others boasting about what they can do and we got to put up with their bragging. Now this bloke they call Scimitar is attacking us with three divisions. Why don't the two of us go and raid his camp and capture him? A coup like that, all our brothers'd be impressed!"
"But we command the water-borne forces," White Eel objected. "If we're not there to lend support when it's needed, we'll only bring disgrace on ourselves."
"If you're going to be so picky, we'll never get nowhere! All right, if you don't want to go I shall go on my own, tonight." The Pilot refused to listen to his brother's repeated objections. That same evening he assembled fifty or more small boats, four or five men to each, all with light armour to prevent noise and equipped with sharp bamboo spears and broad-bladed knives. By the pale light of the moon on a cold clear winter's night they steered their boats to land.
The time was around nine o'clock. Scimitar was in his tent. The lamp was lit and he was reading, when a sentry came and quietly reported: "Fifty or so boats have been spotted among the waterlilies. The men are all armed with spears and have gone to hide in the reeds on either side. I don't know what they intend, but I came at once to report it."
Scimitar smiled grimly. He quietly gave the order for all his troops to make certain preparations. All three divisions were alerted and each man concealed himself.
The Pilot and his three hundred men emerged from the reeds, taking care to cover their tracks. When they reached the camp, they pushed aside the deer's antlers and poured in. They saw lamps and candles burning in the command tent and Scimitar seated there, fondling his beard and reading a book on military strategy.
Rejoicing in his heart, the Pilot grasped his spear and charged into the tent. Immediately gongs rang out and a shout loud enough to shake heaven and earth, an uproar to split the mountains and cause rivers to burst their banks, arose from the hidden soldiers. The terrified Pilot dropped his spear, turned and fled. On all sides troops emerged from ambush. Poor Pilot, he had no chance! An expert waterman he might be, but what could it avail him when he was caught out in the open like this? Of his three hundred troops not one got away. All were tied up and dragged to the command tent.
Scimitar mocked them: "You outlaw scum, so you think you can make a fool of me, do you?" The Pilot was thrown in a prison cart and the rest were locked up. Now all that was needed was to catch Song Jiang and take the whole lot of them to the capital.
Let us leave Scimitar to his success, and join the three Ruan brothers, who held a meeting in the waterside camp, where it was decided to send someone to Song Jiang for instructions. Suddenly White Eel rushed in and said: "My brother wouldn't listen to my warnings and went to raid Scimitar's camp. I'm afraid he's been taken and they've put him in a prison cart."
Ruan the Seventh jumped up and said: "We have all sworn to live or die together, to stick to each other through thick and thin. You're his natural brother — why did you let him go on his own and get captured? If you don't want to go and rescue him, we will."
White Eel said: "But we don't have any orders from our leader, how can I act without them?"
Ruan the Seventh said: "While you're waiting for orders, your brother is going to get chopped into little bits!"
Ruan the Second and Ruan the Fifth said: "He's right!"
White Eel insisted nevertheless that they should take their orders from him. That night in the fourth watch all the leaders of the waterside camp were enlisted, great and small. With all their boats, over a hundred of them, they headed for Scimitar's camp. The soldiers on shore saw these war vessels swarming like ants close in to the bank and hurriedly informed their leader. Quite unperturbed, Scimitar said: "They're a bunch of incompetent slaves, what is there to worry about?" He summoned his commanders and quietly gave them their instructions.
With the three Ruan brothers in the lead and White Eel behind, the outlaws charged into the camp. They found plenty of weapons there and banners still flying, but not a soul to be seen. Fearing a trap, they turned to leave. Gongs now sounded in front of the tents, and from left and right the enemy emerged, both cavalry and foot-soldiers, in eight separate units. They began to close the intruders in, tightening the noose about them like a housewife sweeping dust into a pile or someone scooping up rice.
Judging the situation to be hopeless, White Eel leapt into the water and vanished. The Ruan brothers raced back along the path to the waterside, closely pursued. Hooks and lassoos came hurtling towards them and Ruan the Seventh, that Living Lord of Hell, was caught and dragged away struggling. The White-Water Dragon and the two Tong brothers at great personal risk managed to rescue Ruan the Second, Ruan the Fifth and White Eel.
Ruan the Seventh was locked up in a prison cart, where we shall leave him, in order to tell how the news from the Waterside camp reached Mount Liang and the Red-Haired Devil sent White Eel off to Song Jiang's camp to inform him of these developments. Song Jiang and the Professor considered how to drive Scimitar off.
The Professor said: "We're going to have it out with them once and for all." Before he had finished speaking they heard the sound of war drums and gongs. It was the Ugly Son-in-Law arriving at the main camp with his three columns. Song Jiang drew up all his forces to oppose him. They watched as the Ugly Son-in-Law rode out in front of the pennants and reined in his horse.
"See that commander on horseback? Go for him first!" Song Jiang ordered.
Immediately Colonel Hua slapped his horse, gripped his spear and charged the Ugly Son-in-Law, who swung his sword and rode to meet him. To and fro and back and forth, they fought ten bouts. Then Colonel Hua feinted, turned his horse and galloped away, his opponent in hot pursuit. He placed his lance in the rest and took out his bow. With the agility of a monkey he turned in the saddle and fired. His opponent heard the snap of the bow-string, the swish of the arrow, and made a quick movement of his weapon to block it. The arrow clattered against the blade. When Colonel Hua saw that one arrow had missed, he fitted a second to his bow and took careful aim. This time he fired at his opponent's chest. The Ugly Son-in-Law crouched low in the stirrups and evaded the shot again. But he had seen enough of his adversary's skill with the bow and thought better of pursuing him further. He quickly turned his horse and galloped back towards his own lines.
Seeing he was no longer pursued Colonel Hua turned and galloped after him. He fitted a third arrow, took careful aim and fired at the retreating back. There was a resounding thwack as the arrow hit the body-armour. Urging his horse forward, the Ugly Son-in-Law disappeared into his own ranks. He sent someone to inform Scimitar.
"Bring my horse, quickly!" Scimitar commanded his orderly. This horse was of impressive dimensions and red as a glowing coal, not a single hair of different hue. Scimitar strapped on his armour and girded himself with three belts. When he was fully accoutred, halberd in hand, he rode out in front of the troops. It was a brave sight as the ranks opened and the horseman rode out under the pennants. Song Jiang was so impressed by the sight of Scimitar, that he could not help quietly expressing his admiration to the Professor. The latter turned and addressed the others as follows: "Commanders and heroes, do not betray your fame!"
Before he had even finished, Leopard's Head cried indignantly: "We brothers have fought in sixty or seventy battles since we joined the Marshes of Mount Liang and when did our ardour ever slacken? Why does the military adviser insult our spirit?" With this he levelled his lance and rode out against Scimitar.
Scimitar greeted him with a shout: "Outlaws from the marshes, you are all traitors to the Emperor. Let Song Jiang himself answer to me!"
Song Jiang beside the pennants commanded Leopard's Head to stop. He loosed the reins and rode out himself. Greeting Scimitar with a deep bow he said: "I am Song Jiang, registrar of Yuncheng, at your service! What can I do for you?"
Scimitar said: "A miserable little clerk like you, how dare you betray the Emperor?"
Song Jiang replied: "The Emperor has been misled, that is the cause of it all. The land is ruled by dissolute and evil courtiers. Slander and flattery hold sway. Unjust and corrupt officials oppress the people. I and my comrades are doing heaven's will, we are no traitors."
Scimitar shouted back: "We are the imperial army! Do you still refuse to yield, do you still think you can deceive us with sweet words and flattering tongue? Dismount and surrender or I shall break you to pieces!"
This was too much for Thunderclap, who slapped his horse, whirled his wolf's-tooth mace and charged.
Scimitar likewise urged on his horse and rode to meet him. Leopard's Head, not wanting to be outdone, also raced forward to encounter Scimitar. The three horsemen circled as they fought like revolving figures on a lantern.
Song Jiang began to fear for the safety of Scimitar, the enemy commander, and had a bugle blown for his own commanders to withdraw. Returning to their ranks Thunderclap and Leopard's Head said to Song Jiang: "We were about to capture the villain, why did you order us to break off?"
Song Jiang said: "My friends,we have to preserve our honour. It is not right to take advantage of superiority in numbers. Even if you captured him he would not admit defeat and we would only incur shame. I have seen his valour. He is one of the most honourable officers there has been since the days of his famous ancestor. If we could get this man to join us on the mountain I would willingly cede my place to him.'
Thunderclap and Leopard's Head remained dissatisfied, but neither army initiated any further action that day.
When Scimitar had returned to his camp and taken off his armour, his thoughts ran as follows: "Two of my commanders fought hard but with no success. When I seemed to be losing Song Jiang ordered a withdrawal. I cannot understand his intention."
He told some of his men to bring in the prison carts with the Pilot and Ruan the Seventh in so he could question them. "Song Jiang is just a minor official from Yuncheng. Why do you lot obey him?" he asked.
Ruan the Seventh replied: "Our leader is famous throughout Shandong and Hebei. They call him the Opportune Rain and the Guardian of Righteousness. But what would a bunch of ignorant, unmannerly bastards like you know about that?"
Scimitar merely lowered his gaze and said nothing. He ordered the prisoners in their carts to be removed.
Scimitar spent a gloomy evening. He felt very restless and went out to inspect his lines. The sky was full of moonlight, frost glittered on the ground. But Scimitar's heart was heavy.
A sentry came to report: "There's a commander here with a beard, rode in by himself, just carrying a whip — says he wants to speak with you."
"Why didn't you ask his name?" Scimitar said.
"He is not wearing armour or carrying any other weapons," the man replied. "He refused to give his name. He just says he wants to see you."
"In that case bring him here," said Scimitar.
A moment later the man entered the tent and greeted the general politely. Something about him seemed familiar. From what he could tell by lamplight, Scimitar thought he must know him. When asked his name, the man replied: "Please dismiss your aides."
Scimitar complied.
"I am known as Twin Rods," said the other. "I used to have command of the united imperial armies. Now I have gone to live on Mount Liang. Those devils caught me out with a trick and I lost my army, so now I cannot go home! I was overjoyed when I heard that you had come. A little while ago when you were fighting, Leopard's Head and Thunderclap were about to capture you but Song Jiang suddenly called off the engagement because he was afraid you might come to harm. I tell you, this man simply wants to be reconciled to the court. He does not agree with the other bandits. He has discussed it secretly with me and we've thought of a way to bring the others in. If you are agreeable, I shall take you to their hideout tomorrow evening. You'll need light arms and fast horses — we'll go by small paths. Together we shall take Leopard's Head and the others alive and deliver them captive to the capital. Then we can all claim to have done loyal service."
Scimitar was greatly pleased by what he heard. He invited Twin Rods inside and regaled him with wine. They talked a lot about the importance Song Jiang gave to honour and loyalty and his misfortune in being obliged to go with the bandits through no fault of his own. The two men expressed the strongest affection for each other, without reservation.
Next day Song Jiang drew up his forces and offered battle. Twin Rods had explained the plan to Scimitar: "Today we must begin by defeating one or two of their leaders. In the evening we will put the plan into action," he said. When Twin Rods had borrowed a suit of armour, everyone mounted and rode out in front of their lines. There in front of the armies Song Jiang berated Twin Rods: "The mountain stronghold never showed you the slightest neglect. What possessed you to steal away in the night?"
"You're just common outlaws, what will you ever achieve?" Twin Rods replied.
Song Jiang ordered the Tamer out. Grasping his double-edged sword Tamer drove his horse forward and charged Twin Rods. The two horses met and before they had fought ten bouts Twin Rods raised one of his rods and knocked Tamer from his mount. Troops rushed out from Song Jiang's lines and carted Tamer off to safety. The jubilant Scimitar was all for ordering his troops into the attack. But Twin Rods said: "Don't pursue them. That Professor of theirs is full of artful schemes. I'm afraid if you follow them it may be a trap."
Accordingly Scimitar called his troops back at once and they returned to camp. Back in his tent wine was served and he questioned Twin Rods about the Tamer. Twin Rods said: "He was originally a famous general in the service of the Emperor, and he deserted to the outlaws at the same time as Thunderclap and Colonel Hua. We've made a good start by defeating that blighter. That'll take them down a peg or two. Tonight when we sneak into their camp we'll finish the job."
Scimitar gladly made his dispositions: the armies of the Ugly Son-in-Law and Hound were to stand by. He himself would muster five hundred lightly armed troops and Twin Rods would lead the way. They would set off in the second watch, not long before midnight, and reach Song Jiang's camp around the third watch. A gun would be fired as a signal for the conspirators within the camp to unite with them and they would attack simultaneously.
It was a moonlit night, clear as if painted. Just after sunset they had put on their armour and removed the bells from the horses' harness. With everyone wearing light armour to diminish noise and the ordinary solders gagged to prevent talking, they rode forward, Twin Rods leading to show the way. For about an hour they followed a mountain path. Suddenly they came upon forty or fifty men-at-arms in concealed positions. "Is this General Hu?" they whispered. "Song Jiang sent us to meet you."
"Don't talk," Twin Rods ordered. "Just follow on behind my horse!"
Twin Rods urged his horse forward, with Scimitar and his troops hard on his heels.
Rounding another shoulder of the hill Twin Rods pointed with his spear and away in the distance they saw a red light. Scimitar reined in his horse and asked: "What's that, where the red light is?"
"That is Song Jiang's main army," Twin Rods said.
They hastened on. When they were close to the red light a gun was fired and they all charged forward behind Scimitar. But when they got there, there was no one to be seen. And when they called out to Twin Rods, they couldn't see him either.
With a shock, Scimitar realized he had fallen into a trap. Hurriedly he turned his horse, but now on the mountainside drums and gongs were sounding from every direction. In the general panic they could not find the way back, and it was every man for himself. As Scimitar galloped off only a few riders were left to follow him. And as they rounded the shoulder of the hill they heard the report of a gun in the forest behind them and hooks shot out on all sides and jerked Scimitar out of the saddle. His sword and his horse were taken from him, he was stripped of his armour and then pushed and shoved towards the main camp.
Meanwhile Leopard's Head and Colonel Hua with a squadron of cavalry had cut off Hound, whose valiant figure was clearly visible under the bright moonlight.
"You there!" Leopard's Head shouted. "Your leader, Scimitar, has fallen into the trap and is our prisoner. You're just a nobody, so you'd better dismount and give yourself up!"
Hound responded by furiously charging Leopard's Head. The two horses met and they fought many bouts, until Colonel Hua joined in and Hound finally found it too much for him and turned to flee. Then Steelbright, the woman warrior, came up from behind and with her red cotton lassoo dragged him from his horse. Footsoldiers rushed forward, made him prisoner and took him to the camp.
Now our story divides in two. First Thunderclap and Colonel Sun led a force to capture the Ugly Son-in-Law. They blocked off the roads to stop him getting away. He slapped his horse and abused them roundly: "You bloody peasants, if you stand in my way you're dead men. Clear off, if you want to live!"
Thunderclap was furious. He galloped forward, whirling his wolf's-tooth mace. The horses met and they fought several bouts. But when Colonel Sun joined in, the Ugly Son-in-Law lost his nerve. His technique with the sword began to desert him, and a blow from Thunderclap toppled him from his horse. All the troops roared their approval and rushed forward to apprehend him. Now Skyhawk and his troops charged into Scimitar's camp and after releasing White Eel, Ruan the Seventh and the other troops from the Waterside camp collected a quantity of fodder and horses, and then spread out in all directions to subjugate the remaining troops. By the time Song Jiang ordered everyone back to camp light was beginning to show in the east.
Everyone took their places in the Ceremonial Hall, and Scimitar, the Ugly Son-in-Law and Hound were brought in one by one. Song Jiang hurriedly came down from the dais, ordered the guards to stand back, and with his own hands released them from their bonds. He escorted Scimitar to the seat of honour and kowtowed. He humbly begged forgiveness, saying: "Mannerless desperadoes that we are, we have offended your dignity. Please pardon us."
Scimitar hurriedly returned the courtesy, but he did not utter a word, nor did he make any other gesture.
Twin Rods now came forward and confessed: "I cheated you, I cannot deny it. It is my earnest hope that you will find it in you to forgive the deception I practised upon you."
Scimitar, seeing the nobility and seriousness of all the leaders, turned to the Ugly Son-in-Law and Hound and said: "We are their prisoners. How should we respond?"
They both replied: "We await our commander's orders."
Scimitar said: "We have lost face and cannot return to the capital. Let us beg for a quick death."
Song Jiang said: "Why do you speak so? If it is not too far beneath you, we would like you to join us in doing heaven's will. If you are not willing, we certainly would not presume to detain you here; we will send you back to the capital right away."
Scimitar said: "When they speak of the honour and loyalty of Song Jiang they tell no lie. All of us now are in the position of having no home we can call our own, no country we can return to. I am prepared to serve under your command even as an ordinary soldier."
Delighted with this outcome Song Jiang organized a celebratory banquet and at the same time sent out parties to round up the routed enemy troops. The strength of Mount Liang grew by a further six or seven thousand. There were some old men and youngsters among the enemy, who were given silver and sent back home. The Pill Monger was sent off with a letter to Pudong to fetch Scimitar's family. Of this no more.
While Song Jiang was drinking he suddenly remembered how the Unicorn and Madcap were still languishing in the Northern Capital, and fought to conceal his tears.
The Professor said: "Don't be sad, brother. I have a solution. Forget your cares for tonight. Tomorrow we will raise an army and attack the Northern Capital. I promise you we will succeed."
Scimitar rose and said: "I have no better way to show my gratitude for your clemency. I would like to lead the vanguard."
This proposal pleased Song Jiang. Next day at dawn the orders were given out and the Ugly Son-in-Law and Hound were given back their former troops so they could also spearhead the attack. All the other leaders who had been involved in the previous assault on the Northern Capital were to join in. The White-Water Dragon and White Eel were to follow with a naval force. In due order they all set off to attack the Northern Capital.
In that city the Governor was just celebrating with Hasty the latter's recovery from his arrow wound, when the leader of a mounted patrol reported: "All the generals from the capital, along with their troops, have been captured by Song Jiang and gone over to the enemy! The forces of Mount Liang are heading this way!"

The Governor was thunderstruck: his eyes nearly popped out of his head and his jaw dropped; he seemed paralysed. But Hasty said: "I got caught by a stray arrow before. Now's my chance to pay them back!."
The Governor rewarded Hasty and ordered him to lead his troops out to oppose the enemy. Vulcan and the Swordsman were to follow in support.
It was midwinter and bitterly cold. For days there had been red clouds veiling the sky and a howling blast from the north. When Song Jiang's army arrived, they found Hasty encamped at Flying Tiger Valley. The following day, when the armies took the field, Song Jiang led his vanguard with the Little Duke and the Halberdier to the top of a knoll from which they could watch Scimitar's attack.
Three beats of the drum and Scimitar rode out. Hasty immediately appeared from the opposing ranks. When he saw Scimitar, he didn't recognize him. One of his troops said: "That's him that's just gone over to the rebels, the one what they call Scimitar." Hasty wasted no time on words: he charged at once to engage Scimitar, who likewise slapped his horse and came on whirling his blade. Before they had completed ten bouts Vulcan, who was with main army, could see that Hasty's axes were failing him and he couldn't get the better of Scimitar, so he came out both swords whirling and joined the attack. Thereupon the Ugly Son-in-Law and Hound also joined in on the other side, each with his own weapon.
The five riders revolved as a single unit. Watching from the knoll, Song Jiang pointed with his whip and his troops charged. Vulcan's forces were routed and fled in total disarray. They retreated into the city that night and bolted and barred the gates. They had no intention of coming out.
Song Jiang led his troops to the walls of the city and made camp there. Next day Hasty sallied forth by himself with a troop of cavalry. When the Professor saw this he instructed the troops to put up only a fake resistance. "If he attacks, find an opportunity to retreat."
Finding himself victorious this time, Hasty was well satisfied when he withdrew to the city. That night the red clouds massed and the snow began to fall thickly. The Professor had everything planned. The foot-soldiers were ordered to move quietly into position outside the city on a narrow road where the river ran close to the mountain. They were to dig a pit and cover it over with soil. The snow fell heavily and the wind blew fiercely all night, so that by dawn there were several feet of snow everywhere you looked. When those in the city observed Song Jiang's camp they seemed to detect a lack of resolve: the defences were continually being moved. Hasty accordingly selected three hundred cavalrymen and charged out of the city. Song Jiang's troops scattered in all directions. The waterside commanders, White-Water Dragon and White Eel, wearing light armour, were ordered to rein in their horses, level their spears and offer a show of resistance. But as soon as Hasty tried to engage them they threw away their spears and fled, deliberately leading him on towards the hidden pit. Hasty, true to his name, took no precautions. At this point the path ran along the river gorge. The White-Water Dragon abandoned his horse and raced ahead on foot, shouting as if to someone in front of him, "Song Jiang, my friend, run for it!"
Oblivious to danger, Hasty galloped after. A gun was fired somewhere on the mountain and both horse and man plunged into the pit. The troops waiting in ambush closed in. Even if Hasty had had 3 heads and 6 arms, he would not have been able to get out of that one! You can say indeed that

Flakes of silver blanket the hidden trap,
Shards of white jade conceal the deadly pit.

AT DAMING, the bandits attacked the town every day, but the government troops inside dared not sally forth for combat. Suo Chao had not yet recovered from the arrow wound, and could not take part in the fighting.
Song Jiang was disappointed at the delay in taking the town, and one night he was sitting in his tent reading by candlelight the Heavenly Books he had received from the Taoist Mystic Goddess, when his orderly entered and said that Wu Yong wished to see him.
When Wu Yong entered he said, "We have been besieging this town for a long time, and it is strange that no troops have come to relieve the town. We know that three horsemen left the town, and I expect they carried dispatches asking for help. As Grand Secretary Liang is son-in-law to Prime Minister Cai Jing the latter must send relief at once. But as no troops have arrived here it is possible that they have gone to Liangshan Marsh, and are adopting the military strategy as used in saving the Zhao by besieging the capital of the Wei. In that case, what shall we do? That is a possibility which we must not overlook. Would it not be better if we quietly sent some of our men back?"
Just then Dai Zong, the "Divine Traveler," came in and spoke, "A large army of Imperial troops have arrived at Liangshan Marsh, in charge of General Guan Sheng. Our leaders there cannot decide as to what should be done, but they ask you at least to send some men back to relieve the assault."
"Though this is the position," said Wu Yong, "we must not send all our men back at once. Tonight we can order our foot soldiers to start off on the return journey. The cavalry must be left here, and be so divided up that the enemy will not notice our reduced numbers. If the imperial troops in the town find out our position they would renew their attacks with greater vigor."
"What you say is quite true," said Song Jiang. He gave orders that Hua Rong should take charge of five hundred men and encamp on the left of the Feihu Gully, while Lin Chong should encamp on the right-hand side of the same village with another five hundred men. Huyan Zhuo should post his artillery about three //from the town, and in case of any attack from the government troops he must at once open fire. All the other men must disperse, and return individually to Liangshan Marsh, and were not to fight with any Imperial troops they might meet on the way. This movement took place secretly in the night, and by about 10 A.M. the following morning most of the brigands were quietly making their way towards Liangshan Marsh.
But the troops inside the town discovered the movement of the brigands, and Grand Secretary Liang was duly informed of this, and he summoned his two Generals for a conference.
"I think that this movement indicates that the Imperial troops are attacking Liangshan Marsh," said General Li Cheng, "and this has forced the brigands to withdraw their men from here. We must embrace this opportunity to attack them and capture Song Jiang."
Just at this point a messenger arrived with a dispatch from the Prime Minister at the Eastern Capital stating that an attack was being made upon Liangshan Marsh, and that if the brigands withdrew from Daming Prefecture the troops in the town should immediately attack them. Grand Secretary Liang therefore ordered his generals to pursue the brigands.
The Imperial troops shortly afterwards left the town for an assault, but when they had only gone a short distance they were fired upon by artillery at their rear. At this Generals Wen Da and Li Cheng were surprised and called a halt. Looking back they saw numerous flags flying, and heard many drums and gongs sounded as though there were many brigands there. While they were still wondering what to do they were attacked from two sides by the brigands in charge of Hua Rong and Lin Chong. General Li Cheng was afraid of a trap, and gave orders for a retreat to the town. The attack was so fierce, however, that the troops were just able to reach the town gates in the nick of time.
The brigands who were on their way to Liangshan Marsh found their roads blocked by Imperial troops, and could not reach their destination. So Song Jiang collected them together in a secluded place, and sent a messenger secretly to Liangshan Marsh informing them where he was, and giving orders for a joint attack to be made from both sides.
At Liangshan Marsh Zhang Heng and Zhang Shun were in charge of a fort on the bank of the lake. When Song Jiang's order was made known Zhang Heng spoke to his brother, "We have been here a long time, but so far have had no chance of doing anything. Now General Guan Sheng's army is approaching by three roads to attack us. How would it be if we attack his camp and capture the General himself? Then our reputation would be much enhanced."
"We are only in charge of this fort," replied Zhang Shun, "and if we do not get help from the other leaders we should be in great disgrace if we lost."
"If we are so circumspect, what day can we achieve a meritorious deed?" said Zhang Heng. "You need not take part in this. I will do it by myself this very night."
Zhang Shun remonstrated with his brother without effect. That night Zhang Heng took fifty boats, with five men on each armed with bamboo poles, spears, and swords, and clad in light short clothing. It was a cold frosty night with very little moonlight. The boats were taken across the lake and the men disembarked.
It was about 11 P.M. and General Guan Sheng was reading a book in his tent. One of his scouts entered, and reported that many boats had just come across the lake, and that the men were now making their way through the reeds and grasses towards the camp. General Guan Sheng smiled at this, and turning to his adjutant spoke quietly some secret word.
Zhang Heng and his two hundred and fifty men made stealthy progress through the reeds towards Guan Sheng's camp and removed sundry obstacles placed there as part of the defenses of the camp. In the camp they saw the General's tent, well lighted by lamps, and the General himself reading a book and stroking his beard. Zhang Heng saw no soldiers about, so he ran forward with his long spear in his hand. He had not gone into the tent when a gong was sounded, and there was such an outburst of shouting that it seemed as though both Heaven and Earth were falling to pieces. Zhang Heng was alarmed, and turned to retreat. But it was too late. He was seized, and also all his men were surrounded and captured. They were all taken before General Guan Sheng who laughed when he saw them. "You rabble of brigands! How dare you visit me like this?" He ordered Zhang Heng to be placed in a prisoner's cart and the rest to be put under guard.
At Liangshan Marsh, Zhang Shun went to the headquarters where the leaders were assembled, and told them what had occurred to his brother.
Upon hearing this Ruan the Seventh was excited, and said, "We are all in the same boat, and we must at once rescue our elder brother. Why did you not rescue him yourself? I and my brothers must go at once to rescue him."
"It was done without any orders," said Zhang Shun, "and therefore I dared not go with him."
"If you wait for orders from our commander-in-chief before you act then you will be too late to save your brother," said Ruan the Seventh.
Zhang Shun and the three brothers Ruan thereupon embarked their men, and about 3 A.M. a hundred boats were filled with men and went across the lake.
The scouts of the Imperial troops seeing this fleet with armed men immediately informed Guan Sheng. He laughed, and said, "These slaves are stupid." He turned and whispered orders to his adjutant again.
The brigands disembarked, and as they approached the camp they saw many lights burning, but not a single man. The brothers Ruan were startled, and decided to retreat. But a gong was sounded, but immediately soldiers sprang forth from hiding places on all sides. The brigands were quite surrounded, and Zhang Shun being near the boats dived in to the water at once. He and about four others escaped in this way, but all the others were taken prisoners.
Upon the news of the disaster reaching Liangshan Marsh, Liu Tang ordered Zhang Shun at once to make his way by swimming to Song Jiang's secluded camp. Upon arriving there Zhang Shun told the news, and Song Jiang discussed with Wu Yong how they could repel General Guan Sheng's army.
"Tomorrow we must have a trial of strength with these Imperial troops," said Wu Yong.
While they were talking of their plans the sound of drums was heard, and Wu Yong was surprised as it indicated that General Xuan Zan was approaching to attack the secluded camp. Song Jiang marched all his men out to meet the attack, and met then the Imperial troops. He turned to his men, and asked, "Who will go for single combat?" In response Hua Rong spurred his horse forward to engage in combat with General Xuan Zan. That General was ready, and they engaged in a fight. After about ten bouts, Hua Rong decided on a change of tactics. After delivering a blow with his sword he wheeled round and retreated. He now took his bow and arrow, and turning in his saddle shot at General Xuan Zan who was pursuing him. The General saw the movement, and lifting his sword caught the flying arrow with it. Hua Rong saw that he had failed, so immediately took another arrow, and shot it at the General who was now quite close. This time the general saw the arrow, and bent down on his horse, and the arrow just missed him. But the General realized the great skill of Hua Rong, and decided to run no further risks. He turned his horse, and went back to his men. Hua Rong seeing this also turned and pursued the General. Again he shot an arrow, but this struck the brass plate on the General's back and did no damage. Now the General rushed back to his camp and reported the feat to Guan Sheng.
General Guan Sheng ordered his attendant to bring his fiery horse. He rode forth with his great halberd in his hand. Song Jiang saw the fine martial bearing of the man, and turning round called out, "He is indeed a great hero!" Lin Chong hearing this expression was annoyed, and called out, "We brothers, since we joined at Liangshan Marsh we have taken part in many fights, and so far have never been daunted in any contact. Today we are not to be despised." So saying he whipped his horse and rushed forward to fight.
General Guan Sheng seeing this called out, "You brigands, it is not worthwhile for me to fall on you. I want Song Jiang to come forward, and explain why he has rebelled."
Song Jiang hearing this called Lin Chong to return, and then rode forward himself. He halted in front of General Guan Sheng, and saluting said, "I am now waiting for your questions."
"You were a clerk in a yamen," shouted General Guan Sheng, "how dare you rebel in this way?"
"The Imperial affairs are in disorder," replied Song Jiang, "and corrupt officials are in power; loyal men are ignored; and covetous men are employed. This results in the suffering of the people. We are the agents of Heaven, and have no personal aims."
Guan Sheng shouted, "It is clear that you are a brigand. Which Heaven has appointed you? My troops carry out the Son of Heaven's wish, but you have only fine words on your side. If you don't dismount at once, I will have you cut into many pieces."
Upon hearing this Qin Ming was angry, and dashed from the rear on horseback. At the same moment Lin Chong did the same. Guan Sheng, however, stood his ground, and fought with the two. The three horses circled round like a small whirlwind. Song Jiang called to the gongs to summon the two leaders to come back, and when they returned Qin Ming protested, "We could have captured that man. Why did you stop us?"
Song Jiang replied in a loud voice, "We are honest and upright, and we do not like to see two men attacking one. It is not fair. If you had captured him you could not capture his mind. He is a loyal and devoted official, and the spirits of his ancestors must be very proud of him. If we could win him over I would immediately resign in his favor."
Both Qin Ming and Lin Chong could say nothing against this. That day nothing further was done, and both armies retired to their bases.
Upon reaching his camp General Guan Sheng doffed his armor and sat down in silent meditation, "I would have been defeated by those two men, but when they were on the point of seizing me Song Jiang summoned them to return. I wonder why he did that?" So he sent for both the prisoners Zhang Heng and Ruan the Seventh and then asked them, "Song Jiang previously was only a clerk in a magistrate's yamen so why do you men serve him so faithfully?"
Ruan the Seventh replied, "Our leader Song Jiang is famous in Shandong and Hebei as 'the Protector.' You do not know honest and upright men, and therefore cannot recognize such men when you meet them."
General Guan Sheng bowed his head, but did not speak except ordering the prisoners to be taken back. That night he was restless, and as he could not sleep he got up, and strolled round his camp in the moonlight. It was a cold night, and hoarfrost covered the ground. Shortly an orderly came and said that a General had arrived and wished to speak to him.
"What is his name?" asked General Guan Sheng.
"He would not tell me that," said the orderly. "He is however unarmed and without armor."
"In that case you can admit him," said the general.
In a short time the man was brought to his tent. General Guan Sheng trimmed his lamp so as to get a clear view of the man, and thought the face was familiar. He, however, asked for his name.
"Can we talk together privately?" asked the man.
General Guan Sheng laughed at this and said, "I am commander-in-chief of these hundred thousand soldiers, and we are all united together with one mind. If we were not of one mind how could I command them? They are all familiar with my affairs, and I keep no secrets from them. You can talk to me without any hesitation."
"I am Huyan Zhuo," said the man, "and was previously a General in the Imperial army, and was once appointed to attack the brigand at Liangshan Marsh. They captured me by a ruse, and all my army was annihilated so that I dared not go back. Yesterday I heard that you had arrived here, and I was much pleased. This morning you were attacked by Qin Ming and Lin Chong, but Song Jiang summoned them to return as he was afraid that they might wound you. He had the idea that at some time he might surrender to you but the others would not agree with him. Just now I have had a secret conversation with Song Jiang, and discussed how we might make all the others surrender to you. So if you are willing we can suggest a plan. Tomorrow night you may come to our camp by a small by-path, lightly armed, to capture Lin Chong and the other bandits. By this not only you will gain great credit, but Song Jiang and I may also redeem our guilt."
General Guan Sheng was much pleased at this, and invited Huyan Zhuo to drink wine with him. Huyan Zhuo talked very much of the honesty and justice of Song Jiang, and dwelt upon his hard luck which had forced him to become a brigand.
The next day General Guan Sheng spoke to Huyan Zhuo, "As you have a certain plot for this evening, it would be better if I attacked and defeated the brigands today."
Huyan Zhuo donned his armor, and rode to the front of the Imperial army. When Song Jiang saw him he cursed him, "We never treated you unfairly why did you desert us last night?"
"Previously you were only a petty officer so how could you undertake a big affair now," replied Huyan Zhuo.
Song Jiang did not reply to this insult, but ordered Huang Xin to engage in single combat with Huyan Zhuo. The two fought for about ten bouts, and then Huyan Zhuo hit Huang Xin a severe blow with his bludgeon and knocked him off his horse.
General Guan Sheng was much pleased at this, and ordered a general attack. But Huyan Zhuo said this was not advisable because Wu Yong was full of tricks which he would use if his men were hard pressed. General Guan Sheng agreed and ordered a retreat to their camp.
Upon reaching the camp Generals Guan Sheng and Huyan Zhuo drank wine in the former's tent, and there the General asked about the opponent who apparently had been killed.
"That man Huang Xin was previously a Lieutenant-General in the Imperial army," replied Huyan Zhuo. "He joined the brigands at the same time as Qin Ming and Hua Rong. He is at variance with Song Jiang about many questions and perhaps that is why Song Jiang today ordered him to attack me so that he would get killed and be removed out of his way."
General Guan Sheng was pleased to hear this. He issued orders that Generals Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen at eleven o'clock that night should lead five hundred cavalry as a reserve on an attack on Song Jiang's camp. At the appointed time everything was ready. The iron accoutrements on horses and men had been taken off so that less noise would be made. Each man had a small gag in his mouth to prevent any talking. Huyan Zhuo mounted his horse and led the way.
It was a bright moonlight night. They had traveled for about an hour, and upon turning round a mountain they encountered a party of about fifty mounted brigands who called, "Are you not Huyan Zhuo's men?"
Huyan Zhuo told the men not to speak, but just follow him. He then whipped his horse, and galloped forward followed by General Guan Sheng and his men. They had soon passed round another ridge of the mountain, and then Huyan Zhuo halted, and pointed to a red lamp burning in the distance on the mountain.
"Where is that red lamp burning?" asked the general.
"That is in Song Jiang's camp," replied Huyan Zhuo.
They proceeded on their way, but when fairly near the red camp a bomb was fired, and General Guan Sheng galloped forward and called his men to follow him. But when they reached the red lamp they found nobody there, and even Huyan Zhuo had vanished. General Guan Sheng was startled and realized that he had been deceived. He turned round and ordered a retreat.
But now gongs and drums were heard on all sides. The path was soon lost, and the General saw his men scattering in all directions so that soon he had only about ten men with him. As they turned the spur of the mountain another bomb was fired, and he now saw a large body of armed brigands blocking his way. He was soon surrounded by men armed with hooked poles, and with these they caught hold of his clothes and pulled him off his horse. They seized his great halberd and horse, bound his arm, and pushed him forward towards their camp. Lin Chong and Hua Rong led another attacking party, to cut off Guan Sheng's reserve forces in charge of Lieutenant-General Xuan Zan who fought for about twenty bouts in the bright moonlight. At the end Xuan Zan was almost exhausted, and turning his horse tried to escape. But the "Ten Feet of Green," Hu San Niang had been watching this at one side, and she now threw her red silk lasso, caught Xuan Zan, and brought him off his horse. He was seized by the men around, and was also taken to the brigand's camp as a prisoner.
We will now see what had happened to the brigands led by Qin Ming and Sun Li against the reserve force of the Imperial troops under Lieutenant-General Hao Siwen. When they met on the road Hao Siwen reviled the brigands, "If you brigands obstruct my progress you will certainly die. If you wish to live then withdraw at once."
Qin Ming was angry at this speech, lashed his horse, and dashed forward for single combat. They fought for a long time, and then Sun Li went forward to assist Qin Ming. When Hao Siwen saw he had two opponents he was undecided what to do and was off his usual guard. Qin Ming seized the opportunity, and knocked Hao Siwen off his horse, who was immediately seized by the brigands.
Li Ying led other brigands to the camp of the Imperial troops, where they overcome the guard, released Ruan the Seventh and Zhang Heng, and took away all the stores, fodder, and accoutrements.
It was near daybreak when all was finished, and Song Jiang ordered all to start for Liangshan Marsh. Upon arriving there all the leaders assembled in the Loyalty and Justice Hall where the three captured Generals were brought. Song Jiang came forward to meet the Generals, and released them himself. He conducted General Guan Sheng, and made him sit in his own chair. He then bowed, and saluted the General and said, "We ruffians have offended your dignity, and beg for your pardon."
Huyan Zhuo now stepped forward, bowed, saluted, and then addressed the General, "I acted under orders from my commanding officer whom I dared not disobey. I hope that you will forgive me for deceiving you."
General Guan Sheng looked round on all the assembled leaders, and realized that they were all actuated by upright principles. He turned round and spoke to his two Lieutenant Generals, "We are prisoners here. What can we do?"

"We will follow your orders," they replied.
"We are too disgraced to return to the capital." said General Guan Sheng to Song Jiang. "Let us have an early death."
"Why do you talk like that?" asked Song Jiang. "If you do not despise our lowly calling perhaps you might join us to carry out the Will of Heaven. But if you are unwilling to do so, then we will not detain you here, but allow you to return to the capital."
"Many people have said that you are loyal and just, but now I know that that remark is true," said General Guan Sheng. "In this life if the Emperor treats me well, I will support him; if a friend treats me well, I will support him too. Now as I am undetermined I will stay here in the capacity of an ordinary soldier."
Song Jiang was much pleased, and ordered a feast to be prepared in honor of the General. He also ordered all the prisoners to be brought to Liangshan Marsh, and to be well treated. Those soldiers who wished to return home were allowed to do so, and presented with money for traveling expenses. A man was also sent to take the family of General Guan Sheng to join him at Liangshan Marsh.
During the aforementioned feast Song Jiang remembered that Lu Junyi and Shi Xiu were still in the prison at the Northern Capital, Daming so he shed tears. Wu Yong then spoke to Song Jiang, "Brother, do not be downhearted. I have a plan of rescuing our brothers. Tomorrow morning we may dispatch men to assist in the final attack on Daming."
Upon hearing this General Guan Sheng stood up and said, "I have not yet had the opportunity of recompensing you for your generosity, please allow me to take charge of this movement."
Song Jiang was much pleased, and agreed to this. Guan Sheng's troops were now enrolled as brigands, and were placed in charge of Hao Siwen and Xuan Zan who were under General Guan Sheng. They were to be the vanguard in the new attack on Daming.
In the Northern Capital, Grand Secretary Liang was now dining with Suo Chao. It was a dull day with a strong wind blowing. A scout entered, and reported that General Guan Sheng and all his troops had been captured, and moreover had all joined the brigands. They were now all advancing towards the Daming Prefecture. When Liang heard this he was astounded, and dropped the wine cup he was holding at the moment.
"I was wounded by an arrow from the brigands, and now must have my revenge," said Suo Chao.
Grand Secretary Liang the filled up a cup with wine, and presented it to Suo Chao saying, "Take the troops to encounter immediately."
It was now the middle of winter, and the weather was very cold with strong winds. The hooves of the horses were frozen and the armor was as cold as ice when they left the town.
Song Jiang had taken up his position on a mound where he could watch the pending battle.
The brigands under Guan Sheng soon faced the troops under Suo Chao. The latter did not recognize Guan Sheng, but his officers told him that fact. Suo Chao did not make any remark, but dashed forward on his horse, Guan Sheng also did the same, and the two fought.
After about ten bouts Lieutenant-General Li Cheng saw that Suo Chao was getting the worst of the combat so he galloped forward to assist him. But Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen on the other side, seeing this move, also came forward to assist Guan Sheng. Now the five horses were so close together that it was hard to follow individual movements. Song Jiang seeing this from his mound ordered a general advance, and the brigands attacked the Imperial troops, and drove them back towards the city. When they were close to the gates Song Jiang signaled for a cessation of hostilities.
The following day was very cloudy and it seemed like it was going to rain. Suo Chao led his troops outside the city, and Wu Yong ordered the brigands to put up a trifling defense. If pressed they were to retire. Thus Suo Chao won a slight victory, but ordered a retreat. That evening the clouds were heavier and quite low, and a big wind also sprang up. This was soon followed by a heavy fall of snow. Seeing this Wu Yong ordered a party of men to proceed to a defile in the hills near the town where a narrow road passed through, and there make pitfalls which, when finished, were to be covered over with earth. This was done. It snowed all night, and next morning the snow was deep enough to reach to the horse's knees.
In the morning Suo Chao went to the city wall to view the enemy. He noticed that owing to the snow the horses moved with difficulty, and were in some disorder. He therefore ordered three hundred of his cavalry to start a sudden raid. The mounted brigands upon seeing the cavalry scattered in all directions.
Song Jiang had ordered Li Jun and Zhang Shun to leave off their armor, and go out for single combat. They opposed Suo Chao, but soon threw away their spears and bolted after their men. Suo Chao was hasty, and pursued these men who induced Suo Chao towards the concealed pitfalls. The narrow path was on the bank of the river, and upon reaching that part the two men dismounted and jumped into the river as though to escape from Suo Chao. In the water Li Jun called out, "Brother Song Jiang, get away quickly!" Suo Chao hearing this dashed forward along the road towards the point where he thought Song Jiang was, fell into one of the pitfalls, and at once brigands were on the scene from all sides. Even if Suo Chao had had 6 arms and 3 heads he could not have got away.

White sheets of snow like silver,
As pure as broken jade.
Concealed a cunning pitfall,
As good as man ever made.

The Tower-Shifting Pagoda Lifter Heavenly King Chao Gai Appears to Song Jiang in a Dream as a Spirit; On the Water, White Streak Eel Fish in the Waves Gets His Revenge & rights an injustice in mid-stream

Suo Chao was seized. The remainder of his cavalry fled back to the city and reported that he had been captured. Governor Liang was panic stricken. He ordered his commanders to defend the city, but not go forth to give battle. He considered executing Lu Junyi and Shi Xiu, but was afraid of angering Song Jiang. The capital could not rush support troops to him in an emergency and he might only get into deeper trouble. He therefore kept the two in prison and sent a dispatch to the capital that he was awaiting instructions from the premier.
Song Jiang returned to camp and seated himself in his central army tent. The outlaws who had caught Suo Chao brought him before Song Jiang's standard. Very pleased, Song Jiang ordered his men back, and personally untied the prisoner. He invited him into the tent and served him wine.
"Take a look at my brother chieftains here. More than half were once imperial military officers," he said comfortingly. "Because the emperor has been deluded and permits corrupt officials to hold power and harm the people, they have all volunteered to help me act on Heaven's behalf. If you don't scorn us, General, join our cause of righteous loyalty."
Yang Zhi came forward and paid his respects. He told Suo Chao what had happened since they parted. Clasping hands, they wept. The situation being what it was, Suo Chao had no choice but to submit. Song Jiang was pleased. That night, they drank in the tent in celebration.
The next morning they discussed how to take the city. But assaults several days in a row produced no results. Song Jiang was depressed. As he sat alone in his tent that night, a strange wind suddenly rose, reducing the lamp flame to the size of a pea. A figure appeared in the shadows. Song Jiang raised his head and looked. Chao Gai the Heavenly King was standing hesitantly in the entrance way.
"Brother," he said to Song Jiang, "you still haven't gone back. What are you waiting for?"
Song Jiang was astounded. He quickly got up and asked: "Where have you come from, brother? I still haven't avenged your wrongful death, and I'm uneasy about it day and night. Nor have I performed the sacrificial rites. And so your spirit appears, to berate me."
"It isn't that," Chao Gai replied. "Step back a bit, brother. Your life aroma stifles me. I don't dare draw any closer. I have come especially to tell you this: You're due for a hundred days of blood aura calamity. Only an earthly fiend star south of the Yangzi can cure you. The best thing you can do is call in your troops, quickly."
Song Jiang sought clarification. He pressed forward and said: "You come as a spirit from the Nether World, brother. Tell me the whole truth."
But Chao Gai gave him a push, and he suddenly wakened, as if from a dream. He shouted for a junior officer to invite the Military Advisor. Wu Yong soon arrived. Song Jiang told him the strange thing that had transpired, and asked him to interpret the dream.
"So Chao the Heavenly King appeared as a spirit. That's something you can't ignore," said Wu Yong. "The weather is cold and the ground is frozen. Our forces can't stay here much longer. It would be better to return to the stronghold for the winter. When spring comes and the snow melts we can attack the city again. It will be time enough, then."
"What you say is correct. But Lu the Magnate and brother Shi Xiu are still languishing in jail. Every day must seem like a year, while they wait for us to rescue them. If we go back now, I'm afraid those scoundrels will kill them. It's a bad situation whether we stay or leave."
No decision was reached.
The next day Song Jiang was dispirited and weary, he ached all over, his head felt as if it was split by an ax, his body burned with fever. He lay down and couldn't get up. The chieftains all came in to see him.
"My back is hot and painful," he said.
They looked and found a red swelling as big as a griddle.
"It's either an ulcer or a carbuncle," Wu Yong proclaimed. "I read a medical book once that said green bean powder protects the heart and prevents poisons from entering. We'd better buy some and feed it to brother. If only we could get a doctor! But we'll never find one here, with a war going on."
White Streak in the Waves Zhang Shun thought of something. "When I lived on the Xunyang River my mother developed a backache, but no medicine seemed to help," he said. "Finally, we called in An Daoquan, a doctor of Jiankang District, and he cured her immediately. I later sent him some silver. Now, brother is so ill. That doctor is the only one who can treat him. Though the road is far and one can't travel very quickly, I'll hurry day and night and bring him here as fast as I can."
"In brother's dream Chao Gai told him he would have a hundred days of disaster, and that only an earthly fiend star south of the Yangzi could cure him. Could that man be the one?" Wu Yong wondered.
"If you know such a person, bring him to me, swiftly," Song Jiang begged. "Never mind the difficulties. This is the time to show your fraternal devotion. Travel day and night and fetch him. Save my life!"
Wu Yong gave Zhang Shun a hundred ounces of gold in leekstrip form to present to the doctor, plus thirty ounces of silver for travel expenses, and said: "Leave today. Come what may, bring him. Let nothing delay you. We're pulling up camp and returning to the fortress. Bring the doctor there. Be as quick as you can."
Zhang Shun said goodbye, shouldered his pack and set forth.
Wu Yong notified the chieftains to call in the troops and return to the stronghold. Song Jiang was transported on a cart. They left that same night. Having been caught in one ambush, the defenders in the Northern Capital guessed this was another trick, and didn't venture out.
Governor Liang, on hearing news of the departure, was at a loss.
Li Cheng and Wen Da said: "That knave Wu Yong is full of crafty schemes. We'd better remain here on the defensive, and not go after them."

As to Zhang Shun, he travelled day and night in his hurry to save Song Jiang. It was then the end of winter, and when it didn't rain it snowed. The road was hard going. But Zhang Shun pushed on, regardless.
When he reached the shore of the Yangzi, not a ferry boat was in sight. Zhang Shun groaned, but continued skirting the banks. Finally, he saw cookfire smoke rising from a cove of withered reeds.
"Boatman," he called, "bring your ferry and take me across."
The reeds rustled and a figure emerged. He was wearing a conical straw hat and a coir raincape. "Where do you wish to go?" he asked.
"I've urgent business in Jiankang. I'll pay you extra if you ferry me over."
"That's no problem. But it's late. When you get to the other side you won't find any place to sleep. You'd better rest on my boat. At the fourth watch, when the wind has died and the moon is bright, I'll take you across. You'll have to pay me a little more."
"What you say makes sense."
With the boatman, Zhang Shun entered the reeds. A small boat was moored to the bank. Beneath its canopy a thin youth huddled beside a fire. The boatman helped Zhang Shun aboard. Zhang went into the cabin, removed his wet clothes, and asked the youth to dry them over the fire. He opened his bundle, took out a quilt, wrapped himself in it, and lay down.
"Can you get any wine around here?" he called to the boatman. "It would be fine if you could buy some."
"There's no place that sells wine, but if you want rice I can give you a bowl."
Zhang Shun finished the rice, lay down and slept. For one thing he was weary from days of continuous travel, for another he was very careless. By the first watch he was sound asleep.
The thin youth who was warming his hands over the charcoal embers pointed pursed lips towards Zhang Shun. "Big brother," he said to the boatman, "have you had a look?"
The boatman circled around to the bundle on which Zhang's head was resting. He squeezed and felt hard metallic objects. He gestured with his hand. "Untie the boat. We'll do him in when we get to the middle of the river."
Parting the reeds, the youth leaped to the bank, loosed the mooring rope, jumped back aboard, and shoved off with a bamboo pole. Then he plied a creaking sweep oar and propelled the small craft to the river's center.
Softly the boatman bound Zhang Shun with ropes in the cabin, and brought out a cleaver from beneath the deck. Just then Zhang awoke and found his hands tied. He couldn't move. The boatman pressed him down and raised the big knife.
"Spare me, bold fellow, and I'll give you all my money!"
"I want your gold and silver, and I want your life as well!"
"Let me die in one piece and my ghost won't come back to haunt you!"
The boatman put down the cleaver and tossed Zhang Shun into the river. He opened the bundle and found a large amount of gold and silver. Frowning thoughtfully, he called the thin youth.
"Come here," he said. "I want to speak to you."
The youth entered the cabin. The boatman seized him with one hand and hacked him cruelly with the cleaver, bringing him to a sorry end. Then he pushed the body into the water, wiped up the blood-stains and rowed on.
Zhang Shun could stay under water for days. When he was thrown in, he sank down and gnawed open the ropes, then swam to the south bank. He saw a lamp gleaming in grove of trees. He climbed the bank and, dripping wet, entered the grove. Ahead was a rustic tavern. The proprietor had got up in the middle of the night and was pressing wine. The light of his lamp shone through a crack in the wall.
Pushing open the door, Zhang Shun saw an old man. He promptly kowtowed.
"Were you robbed on the river?" the old fellow asked. "And did you save your life by jumping into the water?"
"I wouldn't fool you, grandpa. I was on my way from Shandong to Jiankang on business and it was late. I found a ferry, but the two bad men on it robbed me of my clothes and money and threw me in. I'm a good swimmer, so I managed to escape. Grandpa, please help me."
The old man conducted him to the rear of the house, gave him a quilted coat, dried his wet clothes over the fire, and heated some wine for him to drink.
"What's your name?" he asked. "What's a Shandong man doing in these parts?"
"My family name is Zhang. Dr. An of Jiankang District is a close friend of mine. I've come to see him."
"In Shandong you must have passed Liangshan Marsh?"
"I went right by there."
"Song Jiang, the leader on that mountain, doesn't rob travellers or harm the people. He does only meritorious deeds on Heaven's behalf."
"He's loyal and righteous. He never attacks good persons, only corrupt officials."
"I've heard his band is truly righteous. They succor the poor and old, not like the knavish bandits we have here! Our people would be happy if he came. Then we wouldn't have to take any more abuse from crooked overlords."
"Don't be alarmed, grandpa, but I'm Zhang Shun the White Streak in the Waves. Brother Song Jiang has developed a carbuncle on his back, and I was sent with a hundred ounces of gold to invite Dr. An. But I was careless and fell asleep on the boat and those two scoundrels tied my hands and threw me in the river. I gnawed the ropes open and here I am."
"So you're a bold fellow from Mount Liangshan! I'll call my son. He'll want to meet you."
A young man shortly emerged from the rear. On seeing Zhang Shun, he bowed and said: "I've long known of your fame, brother, but never had the chance to meet you. My family name is Wang, and I'm the sixth in our line. Because my movements are swift, I'm called Lightning Wang Dingliu. I've always liked swimming and jousting with staves, but could never find a teacher who would accept me. I've been spending my days selling wine here on the banks of the river. I know those two who robbed you. One is Zhang Wang the River Blockade Demon. The thin young fellow, who is from Huating County, is called Oily Mudfish Sun the Fifth. Those villains are always robbing people on the river. Don't worry, brother. Stay here a few days. When the rascals come to drink, I'll avenge you."
"I appreciate your good intentions. But I'm very anxious about brother Song Jiang. I only wish I could fly back to the fortress in a single day! I must enter the city as soon as it's daylight and request Dr. An to go with me."
Wang Dingliu gave his own clothes to Zhang Shun, and feted him with chicken and wine. Of that, no more need be said.
The next morning the sky cleared and the snow vanished. Zhang Shun was given a dozen ounces of silver and escorted into Jiankang District. He went directly to the foot of Elm Tree Bridge and found Dr. An selling medicines in the doorway of his shop. Zhang Shun entered and kowtowed.
"It's been years, brother," the doctor said. "What wind blows you here?"
Zhang Shun followed him inside and related his adventures, from the trouble in Jiangzhou until he went with Song Jiang up the mountain. He said that the outlaw leader had developed a carbuncle on his back, and that he, Zhang, had been dispatched to fetch Dr. An. He apologized for not bringing a fee, but explained that he had been robbed and nearly lost his life on the river.
"I should go immediately, since it's Song Jiang the renowned fighter for righteousness," said the physician. "But my wife died and I've no one at home. I can't just walk off and leave everything."
Zhang Shun pleaded with him. "If you won't go, I can't return to the mountain."
"We'll discuss it again, later."
Only after much urging did Dr. An finally consent.
An spent a great deal of time with a local prostitute called Clever Pet Li. The doctor doted on her. That evening he took Zhang Shun to eat and drink at her place. Clever Pet hailed the young man respectfully as "brother."
After four or five cups, An was half drunk. He said to the girl: "I'll spend the night here. Tomorrow morning I'm off with this brother for Shandong. I'll be away from twenty days to a month. I'll come and see you when I get back."
"I don't want you to go! If you won't listen to me, stay away from my door!"

"My medicine kit is packed and I'm ready to go. I leave tomorrow. Cheer up. I won't be gone long."
In a childish tantrum the girl threw herself on An's chest. "If you don't listen to me and go, I'll curse you till the flesh flies from your bones!"
White Streak in the Waves was infuriated by these goings-on. He wanted to swallow Clever Pet down in one gulp.
It was growing dark. An was very drunk by now. He staggered into the girl's room and collapsed on her bed.
"Go home," Clever Pet said to Zhang Shun. "There's no place for you to sleep here!"
"I'll wait till brother sobers up. We'll leave together."
Since she couldn't get rid of him, the girl put him in a small room near the front door.
Zhang Shun was burning with impatience. How could he sleep? Around the first watch he heard a knock on the door and peered out through a crack in the wall. He saw a man slip in and speak to the old bawd who tended Clever Pet.
"You haven't been around in a long time," she said. "Where have you been? Tonight, the doctor's sleeping drunk in her room. What can we do?"
"I've brought her ten ounces of gold. She can have them made into hairpins. You must do something, old mother, to get us together."
"Wait in my room. I'll call her."
Zhang Shun recognized the man in the light of the lamp. It was Zhang Wang the River Blockade Demon. He had come to spend on Clever Pet some of the wealth he had recently acquired on the river.
Zhang Shun could scarcely contain his rage. He continued to watch. He saw the old bawd carry food and wine into her room, then fetch Clever Pet. He wanted to dash in after her, but he was afraid he'd mess things up and the robber would get away.
By the third watch the two servants in the kitchen were also drunk. The old bawd, who had been reeling around, sat in an intoxicated stupor beneath the lamp. Zhang Shun softly opened the door of his room and tiptoed to the entry to the kitchen. He saw a gleaming cleaver lying on the oven and the old bawd sprawled in a drunken slumber on a bench with her head to one side.
He crept into the kitchen and picked up the cleaver. First he killed the old bawd. He wanted to destroy the two servants next. But the cleaver had not been sharp to begin with, and hacking the old woman had turned its edge. Then he caught sight of an ax for chopping kindling. He grabbed it. Before the servants could cry out, he finished them both with one blow each.
Clever Pet, hearing the noise, hurriedly opened the door of her room. She found herself confronted by Zhang Shun. He swung the ax and split her chest asunder.
Zhang Wang saw, by the light of the lamp, the girl fall dead. He pushed open the rear window, leaped over the wall, and escaped.
White Streak in the Waves was frantic, but there was nothing he could do about it. Recalling what Wu Song had done under similar circumstances, he tore a strip from the edge of his tunic, dipped it in the blood, and wrote on the wall: "The killer is An Daoquan." He wrote it in dozens of places.
Around the fifth watch, as dawn was breaking, he heard An wake from his drunken slumber and call Clever Pet.
"Don't shout, brother," said Zhang Shun. "There's something I want to show you."
An got up. When he saw the four bodies he was paralyzed with fright. He trembled uncontrollably.
"Brother," said Zhang Shun, "do you see what's written on the wall?"
"You're ruining me!"
"Only two roads are open to you. Either you raise a rumpus, and I leave, and you pay for the crimes with your life. Or, if you want nothing to come of this, you go home, get your medicine kit, and rush with me to Mount Liangshan and save my brother. Take your choice."
"You're too reckless!"
When it was daylight. Zhang Shun wrapped some money for travel expenses and escorted An home. The doctor knocked till someone opened the door. He collected his medicine kit and left the city with Zhang Shun. They went directly to Lightning Wang's tavern.
"Yesterday, Zhang Wang passed this way," the proprietor said. "Unfortunately, I didn't see you anywhere."
"I met him too, but I didn't take any action. I'm on an important mission. Who has time for petty vengeance!"
Before the words were out of Zhang Shun's mouth, Lightning Wang exclaimed: "Here he comes again!"
"Don't alarm him. See where he goes."
They watched while Zhang Wang went down to his craft by the shore. Wang Dingliu hailed him.
"Hey, brother Zhang, bring your boat over. Two relatives of mine want to cross."
"If they want to board my boat, they'll have to hurry."
Lightning told Zhang Shun.
"Brother An," Zhang Shun said to the doctor, "you and I must exchange clothes. That way, we can get on board."
"How?"
"I have an idea. Don't ask."
The two put on each other's garments. Zhang Shun tied a kerchief around his head, and over this a large conical straw hair which shadowed his face. Lightning carried the medicine kit on his back. They walked down towards the boat.
Zhang Wang brought the craft to the bank and the three men went aboard. Zhang Shun crept to the poop deck and lifted up the boards. The cleaver was still there. He took it and returned to the cabin.
Zhang Wang plied the creaking sweep oar and the vessel glided to the middle of the river. Zhang Shun removed his hat and upper garments.
"Boatman, come quick," he called. "This cabin has blood stains."
"Don't joke," said Zhang Wang.
Not realizing it was a trick, he stuck his head in. Zhang Shun wrapped his arms around the boatman's neck.
"Robber," he shouted. "Do you recognize the passenger you ferried that snowy night?"
Zhang Wang stared, speechless.
"You duped me out of a hundred ounces of yellow gold and tried to kill me! Where's that thin young man?"
"I didn't feel like sharing the money with him and I was afraid he'd argue. So I killed him and threw his body in the river."
"You robber! I was born on the banks of the Xunyang and raised at the foot of Little Melon Hill. I sold fish for a living. Everybody knew me! Because I raised a row in Jiangzhou I had to go to Liangshan Marsh and join Song Jiang. We marauded all over. Everybody feared me! You tricked me onto your boat, tied my hands, and threw me in the river. If I wasn't a good swimmer, I'd be dead! We meet today as enemies. I can't forgive you!"
He pulled the boatman into the cabin, trussed his hands behind his back and tied them to his ankles. Then he heaved him into the Yangzi, exclaiming: "I didn't cut you up, either!"
Lightning Wang sighed as the river robber sank beneath the waves. Zhang Shun found his gold pieces and wrapped them up.
The three men rowed for shore. Zhang Shun said to Wang Dingliu: "I'll never forget your chivalry, brother. If you don't scorn me, perhaps you and your father will dispose of the tavern and come to Mount Liangshan where we can seek righteousness together. What do you say?"
"Nothing would please me better!"
At that, they parted. Zhang Shun and Dr. An changed back into their own clothes and disembarked on the north shore. Lightning Wang bid them farewell and rowed the boat home. He packed his belongings and prepared to catch up.
The other two, carrying the medicine kit, started on their journey. An was a man of letters who had always been a doctor. He wasn't used to walking. After about thirty li he was worn out. Zhang Shun invited him to an inn and bought wine. While they were drinking, a man entered and approached them.
"Why have you been so long, brother?" he exclaimed.
Zhang Shun looked up. It was Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller, disguised as a merchant. Hurriedly, Zhang introduced him to An, then inquired about Song Jiang.
"He's only semi-conscious and can't eat or drink. He seems to be dying. The crisis will be soon."
Zhang Shun wept, but An queried: "How is his complexion?"
"Haggard. He groans constantly. The pain never stops. I don't think he can last much longer."
"If he still feels pain, I can cure him. I'm only afraid I won't reach him in time."
"That's easy," said Dai Zong. He affixed two charms to An's legs and shouldered the medicine kit. "You come at your own pace," he said to Zhang Shun. "I'll go on ahead with the doctor."
Dai and An left the inn. Using the marvellous travel method, they sped off.
Zhang Shun remained at the inn for another two or three days. Sure enough, Lightning Wang, carrying their luggage, arrived with his father.
Delighted, Zhang Shun said: "I've been waiting for you."
"Dr. An?" asked Wang.
"Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller came here to meet me. He's gone off with the doctor."
Dai and An, using the marvellous travel method, reached Mount Liangshan the same night. Chieftains, big and small, welcomed them and led them to Song Jiang's bedside. He was scarcely breathing.
But Dr. An, after taking his pulse, said: "You needn't worry, chieftains. His pulse is all right. Although his body is depressed, there's nothing very serious. I don't like to boast, but in ten days he'll recover."
The chieftains all kowtowed. An burned some artemisia over the carbuncle to draw out the poison, then applied a draw poultice externally and gave growth-stimulating medicines internally.
In five days the patient regained his rosy complexion, his flesh became tender, his appetite improved. Before ten days were up, although the wound wasn't completely closed, he was eating and drinking as usual.
Zhang Shun arrived with Lightning Wang and his father. After greeting Song Jiang and the chieftains, he told how he had been robbed and got his revenge, both times on the river.
"You nearly delayed brother Song Jiang's recovery," said the outlaw leaders with a sigh.
As soon as he was better, Song Jiang conferred with Wu Yong on how to attack the Northern Capital and rescue Lu Junyi the Magnate and Shi Xiu, as was their duty in chivalry. Dr. An had reservations.
"Your wound still isn't fully closed," he said. "You mustn't be too active. It interferes with the healing process."
Wu Yong added his own urgings. "Don't concern yourself about this, brother. It will only upset you. Just rest and regain your strength. I have no talents, but now that spring is here I definitely will crack open the Northern Capital, rescue Lu the Magnate and Shi Xiu, and capture the adulterers. We guarantee to avenge you."
"With you aiding me so solicitously, Military Advisor, though I die, I'll be able to close my eyes." Wu Yong issued his orders in Loyalty Hall. And as a result the Northern Capital was turned into a fiery inferno, a forest of spears, and before the governor's residency lay a mountain of corpses, a sea of blood. Truly, his casual remarks caused demons to tremble in fear and gallant commanders to be overwhelmed with admiration.
It was the heavy snowfall that gave the Professor the idea for the plan which resulted in the capture of Hasty. But the rest of the government troops had managed to get away and take refuge in the city again, where they reported Hasty's capture.
The Governor was unavoidably downcast at this news. He gave orders to all his commanders to adopt a purely defensive strategy and under no circumstances go out to fight. He thought about executing the Unicorn and Madcap, but he did not want to provoke Song Jiang, which, if the court had no troops to send as reinforcements, would just be inviting disaster. His only recourse was to keep them under close guard and send to the Grand Preceptor for instructions.
Song Jiang meanwhile had returned to the camp and was sitting in the command tent. Hasty was soon brought into his presence by the men who had captured him. Song Jiang was very glad to see him, and having ordered his guards to withdraw, loosened the bonds with his own hands and invited him in to sit down. He offered Hasty wine and said everything possible to console him: "We band of brothers, you see, are for the most part former servants of the Emperor, and it is only because the Emperor has received bad counsel, because corrupt and venal ministers hold sway and power is given to evil officials who persecute the innocent, that so many have been glad to offer me their services and unite in doing heaven's will. If you do not think it beneath you, I would like you to join us in the service of honour and justice."
Yang Zhi, the Blue-Faced Beast (Hasty's old companion and rival), now came forward, greeted Hasty courteously and spent a while endeavouring to bring him round.
Now Hasty was in fact one of the baleful stars, so it is no surprise that he came into line and agreed to serve under Song Jiang. Wine was served in the tent that day to celebrate.
Next day they discussed how to capture the city. The siege had lasted many days, but the city still stood. Song Jiang was in a gloomy mood. When he laid his head on the pillow that night he heard a sudden sighing of wind and felt a deadly chill. Raising his head to see what was happening, he saw the figure of their dead leader, Chao Gai, hovering on the threshold. The apparition stood before him and exclaimed: "Why have you not turned back, brother? What are you waiting for?"
It was a considerable shock for Song Jiang. He sprang to his feet and asked: "Where have you come from? I still have not avenged the horror of your untimely death. My heart is uneasy about it night and day. You appear to me because I have not yet made the proper offerings and you wish to reprimand me."
Chao Gai said: "That is not it at all. Stand back a little, I beseech you. I cannot enter the room because the energy of your spirit is too strong for me. I come to say that a hundred days of extraordinary peril await you. None can save you but the Earth Spirit from south of the river. You must recall your army as soon as possible. That is your best policy."
Song Jiang wanted to find out more. He started forward and said: "Brother, you come from the regions of the dead, please tell me all." But Chao Gai shoved him away and he suddenly awoke to find it had all been a dream. He told one of his guards to fetch the Professor to interpret the dream for him. When the Professor came, Song Jiang told him of this strange business.
The Professor said: "If Chao Gai has appeared to you, we must take it seriously. The weather at present is cold, the earth frozen. Our troops cannot hold out much longer. Let us withdraw temporarily to the mountain. We can wait till winter is over and then when spring comes, when the snow thaws and the ice melts, it will be the right time to attack the city again."
"What you say is quite right," said Song Jiang. "But for our friends the Unicorn and Madcap who are imprisoned there the time will pass slowly while they wait for us to deliver them. I fear that if we withdraw their lives will be in danger. In this instance both retreat and going forward have perils."
They could not decide what to do.
Next day Song Jiang felt mentally and physically exhausted. His head felt as if someone was splitting it with an axe, his body felt like a bamboo basket in a steamer. He lay there in bed all the time and did not want to get up. When the other leaders came to see him, he said: "I have a sensation of burning pain in my back."
When his comrades examined him they found a red swelling like a hotplate. The Professor said: "This disease is either an ulcer or an abscess. I have looked in the books of medicine. It says he should be given green lentil paste to protect the heart and prevent the poison from reaching it. Someone must buy the lentils and prepare them for him."
Someone was sent off for the medicine, but it did not do any good.
Then White Eel said: "Back in the days when I was working on the Yangtze, my mother had an ulcer like this on her back and none of the medicines we tried would cure it, so in the end we went and got Doctor An Daoquan from Jiankang, south of the river. He knew how to deal with it. I got together some money afterwards and sent someone to him with it. Our brother's illness is very grave and I'm afraid it is a long and difficult journey to Jiankang; it'll take quite a while to get there. For our brother's sake it will be necessary to travel day and night. We must beg the doctor to come here."
The Professor said: "In that dream he had, Chao Gai said 'A hundred days of extraordinary peril, nothing but the Earth Spirit from south of the river can save you.' Surely this must be the person he meant?"
Song Jiang said: "Brother, if there is such a person, please go there for me at once, please spare no effort, for loyalty's sake, travel with all possible haste and implore him to save my life."
The Professor took out a hundred taels of gold in the shape of garlic bulbs for the doctor and another twenty or thirty taels of loose silver for travelling expenses. "Leave at once," he told White Eel. "By hook or by crook you must get him to come back with you, you must not fail. I shall strike camp today and return to the mountain. We will meet you there. Make haste."
White Eel bade them all farewell and set off with his pack on his back.
The Professor now made a general announcement: "We are temporarily withdrawing. We shall break off hostilities and return to the mountain."
Song Jiang was loaded onto a cart and they travelled back the same night. Those in the city, having experienced the previous ambush, assumed this was another ruse and didn't dare pursue them. When it was reported to the Governor next day, he said: "What can be behind this latest withdrawal?"
Vulcan and the Swordsman said: "The Professor is full of wiles, damn him. We must remain on the defensive. It wouldn't be a good idea to follow them."
Here our story divides. White Eel, in order to save Song Jiang's life, travelled on night and day. It was winter and always either raining or snowing, which made the road extremely difficult. Conditions were rendered even more trying by the fact that he had brought no raincoat. After travelling ten days or so he was close to the river Yangtze. It was blowing a gale from the north and low overhead icy clouds were scudding past. It had snowed heavily all day. White Eel battled on through wind and snow. Regardless of his own safety he had to cross the river. Although it was such a desolate scene, the river also had a beauty of its own. There's a poem which describes it:

The cries of waterbirds, freezing mist, a lone goose, an ancient twisted tree, a solitary crow. Snow drifting down from the sky like plum blossom, scattered jade. The inn flag flutters beside a snow-laden bridge, the fisherman's boats at the crossing are clad in silver. Dark, dark the two or three houses of the village ahead; this might be a painted scene of the river at night.

When White Eel came all alone to the banks of the Yangtze, he looked around for a ferry boat but there was none to be seen and all he could do was curse his luck. Wandering along the river bank he saw some smoke rising among the withered reeds. He called out: "Boatman, bring the ferry here quickly and pick me up!"

Something stirred among the reeds, and a man appeared wearing a broad bamboo hat and a raincoat. "Where do you want to go, sir?" he asked.

"I want to cross the river, I have business in Jiankang," White Eel replied. "It's urgent! I'll pay you extra, but just get on with it."

"I can take you of course," said the boatman. "But it's already quite late. If you're crossing the river you'll have nowhere to sleep. You'd better lie down and rest in the boat now. Then in the fourth watch, when the wind dies down and the moon is up, I'll ferry you across, if you pay me a bit more."

"That sounds reasonable," said White Eel.

The boatman disappeared into the reeds and reappeared with a small boat. Under the awning was a skinny youth squatting over a fire. The boatman helped White Eel aboard. White Eel went into the cabin and took off his wet clothing and asked the youth to dry it for him over the fire. He opened his pack and took out a cotton robe. He put it on in the cabin and then called out to the boatman: "Do they sell wine anywhere round here? I'd like to buy some."

The boatman replied: "There's nowhere to buy wine. You can have a bowl of rice if you like."

After eating the rice, White Eel lay down and slept. Well, he had had a rough time for the last few days, that was one thing, but also he was too trusting. He slept like a log until after seven. The skinny youth who was drying White Eel's outer robe over the coals saw he was asleep and called out to the boatman: "Do you see that, boss?"

The boatman took a good look. Then he went over and felt the bundle. Having assured himself that it contained something valuable, he made a sign to the youth and said: "Take the boat out into the middle of the river. We must get to work at once."

The skinny youth drew aside the awning, jumped out onto the bank and cast off the painter. He came aboard again and pushed off with the bamboo pole. He pulled on the sculls and the boat swung creaking out into the river. In the cabin the boatman took a length of rope and very carefully tied White Eel up into a bundle, then reached under a plank in the stern and took out a knife. White Eel suddenly awoke to find himself bound hand and foot and quite unable to free himself, while the boatman had a knife in his hand and was pressing him down. "Friend," said White Eel, "if you'll spare my life you can have all of the gold."

The boatman said: "I'm going to have the gold and your life."

"Then make sure I die in one piece, so my spirit doesn't come back to haunt you," said White Eel hurriedly.

So the boatman put down his knife and gave White Eel a shove which sent him — splash! — into the water.

The boatman next proceeded to open the bundle and seeing that it contained plenty of gold and silver, and having no desire to share this with the skinny youth, called out: "Come 'ere, you, I want to talk to you!"

When the boy slipped into the cabin, a single cut from the boatman's knife robbed him of his life and the body was pitched into the water. After clearing up the blood, the boatman rowed off.

Now White Eel was capable of staying under water several days. After he was pushed out of the boat he sat on the bottom of the river and gnawed through the ropes. Then he swam to the south bank. He saw lights in the darkness of a wood. He crawled out of the river and dripping with water made his way into the wood. There he found a country inn where they were up all night making wine. Light was shining through a crack in the wall. When he called for someone to open the door an old man appeared and bowed to him. "Were you attacked by robbers on the river?" the old man asked. "Did you escape by jumping in?"

"I'll tell you the truth," said White Eel. "I was on my way to Jiankang on business. It was getting late and I was looking for a boat to cross the river. I was unlucky enough to run into two bad characters who stole all my money and clothes and chucked me in. I know how to swim so I managed to escape. Please help me."

The old man took him inside and gave him a padded gown. He took his wet clothes away to dry them and warmed him some wine. "What do they call you, friend?" he asked. "What sort of business would someone from the north have round here?"

"My name is Zhang," White Eel said. "Doctor An of Jiankang is a friend of mine and I've come here to see him."

"If you've come from Shandong, didn't you pass the Marshes of Mount Liang?" the old man asked.

"I certainly did," said White Eel.

"That leader of theirs, Song Jiang, doesn't rob ordinary travellers," said the old man. "Nor does he kill people. He does heaven's will."

"Song Jiang always puts honour and loyalty first," said White Eel. "He never harms innocent people. It is only the corrupt ministers and greedy officials he hates."

"I have heard it said," said the old man, "that Song Jiang's lot are truly humane. They help the poor and assist old people. They're not a bit like the bandits we have round here! If they were to come here the people would have a good life; they wouldn't have to put up with being messed about by a gang of corrupt officials and greedy functionaries all the time!"

"Then you won't be frightened, sir," White Eel said, "if I tell you that I am White Eel, one of the company of Mount Liang, and they have sent me here with a hundred taels of gold to fetch Doctor An because our leader Song Jiang is suffering from an ulcer on his back. Unfortunately I was over-confident and went to sleep on the boat so those two villains were able to tie me up and chuck me in the river. I managed to bite through the rope, and here I am."

"If you are one of them, let me get my son to come and meet you," the old man said. A moment later a young man came in and prostrated himself. "I have heard so much about you," he said to White Eel, "but somehow I never had the chance before to pay my respects. My name is Wang Ding and I am the sixth in my family. Because I'm pretty athletic people call me Fleetfoot. The things I like best in the world are swimming and staff play. I have learnt from many teachers, but I am not yet perfect, so for the time being I make my life selling wine here on the bank of the river. I know those two who robbed you: one is Zhang Wang, whom they call the Pirate. The other, the thin chap, is from Huating. He is Sun the Fifth, known as Mudfish. Those two bastards often rob people on the river. But don't you worry. Just stay here a few days, and when they come in for a cup of wine we'll pay them back!"

White Eel said: "I am truly grateful for your kind offer. But for the sake of my leader Song Jiang I must not delay my return by a single day. As soon as it is light I must go into the city and ask Doctor An to go back with me."

Fleetfoot gave White Eel his own clothes to change into and quickly warmed some wine for him. Of this no more.

In the morning the sky was clear and the snow thawed. Fleetfoot gave White Eel a dozen taels of silver and told him how to reach the city centre. White Eel made his way to the Acacia Bridge, where he found Doctor An selling medicines in the front of his shop. He entered and bowed deeply. There is a poem that speaks of Doctor An's qualities:

Of medical tomes, he has a great store,
With needles and scalpels his skill is renowned;
The equal of all the great masters of yore,
Doctor An's reputation is known all around.

This Doctor An was equally expert in internal and external medicine, hence his fame. When he saw White Eel he asked: "It's such a long time since I saw you last, what wind blows you here?"

White Eel followed him inside and recounted in full the events in Jiangzhou and how he went with Song Jiang to the mountain. Then he told how Song Jiang was infected with an abscess on his back and how he, White Eel, had been sent to find the doctor. He confessed how he had almost lost his life on the river and for that reason had come here empty-handed.

Doctor An said: "If it concerns Song Jiang, such a renowned leader, I certainly ought to go along. Only, since my poor wife died, there's no one else at home and I can't go too far away, that's what makes it difficult."

White Eel earnestly entreated him: "If you refuse, I don't see how I can go back myself."

Doctor An said: "Let me think about it."

After White Eel had urged him many times, Doctor An agreed to go.

Now the fact is Doctor An had long had a relationship with a local courtesan known as Cutie. She was extremely pretty and the Doctor was infatuated with her. Doctor An took White Eel to her house with him that evening and ordered some wine. Cutie greeted White Eel respectfully. Cup followed cup and they drank freely. Finally the Doctor said to the girl: "I shall stay here with you tonight. Tomorrow morning early I have to go to Shandong with this friend of mine. It'll not be more than a month, perhaps only twenty days, before I come back to see you again."

Cutie said: "But I don't want you to go. You'd better take note, or else don't come back here again!"

The Doctor said: "I've already packed all my medicines. I'm ready to go and tomorrow morning I must start. You just take it easy. I'm going, but I won't waste any time."

Cutie brought all her feminine wiles into play. She clung to the Doctor and said: "All right, go then, if you won't listen to me. I shall put a curse on you and all your flesh will peel away!"

White Eel was so disgusted by her behaviour he could have murdered her. It was getting late by now. The Doctor who was dead drunk retired to the bedroom with Cutie and fell asleep on the bed.

The girl came back and tried to throw White Eel out. "You'd better go now, there isn't anywhere for you to sleep," she said.

But White Eel said: "I shall wait till the Doctor wakes, and then we will get going."

Since she could not get rid of him, she had to arrange for him to sleep in a little room by the main door.

White Eel was burning with impatience and he couldn't sleep. In the first watch someone came and knocked on the door. White Eel looked through a crack in the wall of his room and saw a man slip inside and start talking to the bawd.

"It's been such a long time, where have you been?" she asked the man. "Tonight the Doctor is with her, dead drunk. So what's the use?"

The man said: "I've got ten taels of gold here. I want to give it to her to make some trinkets. Please do me this favour. I just want to see her, that's all."

The woman said: "Stay in my room, I'll go and get her."

By the light of the lamp White Eel was now able to see that it was his friend from the river, the Pirate. The fact was, this villain always came here when he had got his hands on something valuable on the river. White Eel could scarcely contain his rage. As he continued to watch he saw the woman lay out food and drink on the table. Then she got Cutie to come out and keep the Pirate company. White Eel thought about bursting in on them, but he was afraid things might go wrong and the Pirate would get away. A little before midnight two servants in the kitchens got drunk and the bawd was also falling about all over the place; eventually she collapsed in front of the lamp and closed her eyes. White Eel quietly opened his door and crept out. A kitchen knife gleamed on top of the stove. The bawd was slumped on a bench to one side. White Eel went in and picked up the knife. He killed the bawd first. He wanted to kill the two servants but the knife wasn't sharp enough: the first killing had taken the edge off it. They tried to cry out. An axe for splitting firewood came conveniently to hand and he killed them both with one blow each. Inside the room the girl heard something. She hurriedly opened the door but she ran straight into White Eel. The axe rose and fell and she crashed to the floor, her rib cage split. Seeing she was dead, the Pirate opened a window at the back and escaped over the wall. Without compunction, White Eel tore a strip of his clothing, dipped it in blood and wrote on the wall "The murderer is Doctor An". He wrote this in a dozen other places as well.

Towards dawn the doctor awoke from his drunken stupor and called for Cutie. White Eel said: "Hush! I want to show you some people!"

Doctor An rose, and when he saw the four corpses he was so frightened he lost all feeling in his body and began to tremble violently.

"Have you seen what is written on the walls?" White Eel asked him.

"You have ruined me!" the Doctor exclaimed.

White Eel said: "There are only two courses open to you: either you raise the alarm, in which case I shall disappear and you will have to pay with your life; or, if you want to get off, you go home and get your medicines and we will travel night and day to Mount Liang to save the Leader's life. Which course you take is up to you."

The Doctor said: "My friend, this experience has really shortened my life!"

There is a verse about all this

The woman had no feelings, money was her aim.
Why defer departure for such a paltry game?
Poor Cutie now is dead, she'll not come to the lover's call.
The joke's on Doctor An, infatuated fool.

When it was light, White Eel bundled up some travel expenses and went back with the Doctor to his home. When the door was opened to their knock, they went in and got the Doctor's medicines. On leaving the city they headed for Fleetfoot's inn.

Fleetfoot received them, saying: "The Pirate came by yesterday. Too bad you missed him!"

"I've more important matters to attend to," said White Eel. "There's no time for petty vengeance." He had scarcely finished speaking when Fleetfoot announced: "Here he is, the bloody Pirate's coming!"

"Don't scare him away, then," said White Eel. "Let's wait and see where he's going."

The Pirate went down to the river bank and looked at his boat.

Fleet-foot called out: "Mr. Zhang, get your boat and come and take two relatives of mine across."

"They'd better get aboard double quick or they'll miss the boat!"

Fleetfoot relayed this to White Eel who said: "Doctor An, would you mind lending me your clothes? I'll give you mine in exchange.Then we can catch the boat."

"What's the idea?" Doctor An asked.

"I have a plan. Don't ask any questions," White Eel said.

So Doctor An took off his clothes and exchanged them for White Eel's. White Eel put on the head-dress and the broad-brimmed protective hat, which shaded his face. Fleetfoot picked up the bag of medicines and they went down to the river bank. The Pirate brought the boat alongside and the three of them got in. White Eel crawled into the cabin and went straight to the stern and lifted up the loose plank. The knife was still there. He picked it up and returned to the cabin. The Pirate began to row and with creaking oars the boat began to move out into the middle of the river. White Eel took off his outer clothing and called out: "Boatmen, come here, quick! Did you know you've sprung a leak here in the cabin?"

Not suspecting anything, the Pirate stuck his head into the cabin. White Eel grabbed him by the arm and shouted: "You bloody thief! Do you remember the traveller you took on board the other night when it was snowing?"

The Pirate took a good look and was struck speechless.

"You cheated me of a hundred taels of gold and silver," White Eel yelled. "And you tried to kill me! Where's that skinny friend of yours gone to?"

"It was when I got all that loot sir, I didn't want to share with him and I was afraid he might make trouble so I killed him and tipped him in the river."

"Do you know who I am?" White Eel yelled.

"Sir, I don't know who you are, I just beg you to spare my life," said the Pirate.

White Eel declaimed: "I was born on the banks of the Yangtze, grew up at the foot of Little Mount Solo, was superintendent of the fish auction, there's no one who doesn't know me! On account of the troubles in Jiangzhou I joined the company on Mount Liang to serve under Song Jiang and there's virtually nowhere I don't get respect. But you, you scum, you chucked me out of your boat with my hands tied. I went straight to the bottom, and if I hadn't known how to swim underwater, that would have been the end of me! Now it's time for revenge! You'll get no mercy from me!" With a sudden jerk he pulled the Pirate into the cabin and trussed him up, tying his hands and feet together as one would a horse. Then he launched him whole and entire, not a knife wound upon him, into the wide waters of the Yangtze. Without a doubt the Pirate became a twilight ghost on the spot, as Fleetfoot reflected with a sigh!

White Eel searched out the stolen gold and loose silver and packed them in his bundle. Then the three men rowed to the bank.

White Eel said to Fleetfoot: "My dear and respected brother, you have shown me such kindness as I shall not forget. If you don't think it beneath you, why don't you and your father pack up things at the inn and come to the Marshes of Mount Liang, to serve the cause of righteousness? How about it?"

"That is exactly what I was thinking," said Fleetfoot.

When they had said their farewells White Eel and the Doctor set off on the north bank, while Fleetfoot got back into the boat and rowed off home to pack his bags before following on.

So White Eel and the Doctor went on their way, carrying the bag of medicines. The Doctor was a scholar and not much of a walker. After ten miles or so he was too exhausted to go on. White Eel invited him into a country inn and treated him to some wine. While they were drinking a merchant came to the door and cried out: "Why are you wasting time like this, brother?"

It turned out to be Magic Messenger, in disguise. White Eel quickly introduced the Doctor and then asked for news of Song Jiang.

Magic Messenger said: "He has sunk into a kind of lethargy now. He won't eat or drink anything. It looks as if he's dying."

White Eel began to weep. But the Doctor asked: "What is his skin condition and colour like?"

"The flesh is all shrivelled up, he cries out all night, he is in constant pain, I don't think he can last much longer."

The Doctor said: "So long as he can still feel pain, he can be cured. I'm just worried we may be too late."

"That's easily remedied," said the Magic Messenger. He took out two of his magic amulets and bound them on the Doctor's legs. Picking up the bag of medicines, he said to White Eel: "You follow on slowly. The Doctor and I will go first." The two sped off, doing the magic walking.

White Eel rested several days at the country inn, till Fleetfoot arrived, with his pack and his father. White Eel greeted them delightedly. "I have been waiting here for you," he said.

"Where is the Doctor?" Fleetfoot asked.

"The Magic Messenger came to meet us and has taken him on ahead."

White Eel with Fleetfoot and his father now set off for Mount Liang.

Doing the magic walking, the Magic Messenger and the Doctor travelled without pause till they reached Mount Liang. All the leaders turned out to meet them. They hurried Doctor An towards the sick bed where the patient lay, hanging on to life, it seemed, by the barest thread.

The Doctor took his pulse and said: "Don't be alarmed. The pulse is quite strong. Although the infection is serious, it's not life-threatening. I'm not boasting when I say that I hope to have him back to normal in ten days."
This caused all the leaders to prostrate themselves before him.
The Doctor first used moxa to draw out the poison. Then he used medicine. Externally he applied a poultice, and internally a strengthening potion. In five days the skin began gradually to turn pink, the flesh became healthy, and the patient was able to take a little food and drink. After ten days though the wound was not completely healed his normal appetite had returned.
White Eel now brought Fleetfoot and his father to introduce them to Song Jiang and the other leaders and recounted how he had been robbed on the river and how he had gained his revenge. They all exclaimed admiringly: "It could have meant the end for our Leader!"
Now that Song Jiang was better, he held a discussion with the Professor. He wanted to attack the capital and rescue the Unicorn and Madcap. The Doctor rebuked him, saying: "The abscess is not fully healed yet, you can't go rushing about, if you do it will be difficult to make a complete recovery."
The Professor said: "I don't want you to worry about all this. Just think about yourself and get your constitution strong again. My skill doesn't amount to much, I know, but I would like during this period to attack the city, rescue the Unicorn and Madcap and capture the adulteress and her wicked lover. Do you approve of this?"
Song Jiang said: "If I can rely on you to do all this, I can die at peace!" So the Professor called a meeting in the Ceremonial Hall. And on this, much was to depend:

The Northern Capital a field of fire, a forest of spears:
This city a mountain of corpses, a sea of blood!
Evil spirits and demons will be laughed to shame,
Brave commanders win universal acclaim.

SUO CHAO'S soldiers did not follow his mad dash, but returned to the city and reported the matter to the Grand Secretary who was much upset by the news. He gave orders for all soldiers to stand on defense, but not go outside the city. He realized now that he could not execute Lu Junyi or Shi Xiu without aggravating Song Jiang for another attack. As the Imperial troops had been defeated he saw disaster facing him. He sent an urgent messenger to the Eastern Capital reporting the position and appealing for help.
Suo Chao was taken to the brigand's camp as a prisoner, and was brought before the assembled leaders in Song Jiang's tent. Song Jiang was much pleased at seeing him, dismissed the guard, untied the prisoner's bonds, and then addressed him, "You will have noticed that among our leaders here more than half have previously served in the Imperial army. If you do not disdain us we request you to join us to execute the Will of Heaven."
Yang Zhi now stepped forward, and greeted Suo Chao as an old friend. They talked and wept together at this meeting.
Since this was the position Suo Chao accepted Song Jiang's proposal. Song Jiang was very glad at this, and ordered a feast to be prepared to celebrate the occasion.
On the following day the attack on Daming continued, and was repeated for several days without any success. One night when Song Jiang was sitting in his tent in a melancholy mood, suddenly a very cold wind sprang up, and his lamp was almost extinguished by the icy blast. Looking up he saw in the dim light the form of a man who looked very like his late commander Chao Gai. The figure did not enter his tent, but spoke, "Younger brother, what are you doing here?"
Song Jiang was startled, but standing up, he replied, "Elder brother, where have you come from? I am very sorry that since you left I have not been able to avenge your death. Just now we have urgent business here so that I have not been able to sacrifice to you for some time. Today your spirit has appeared, and I am quite prepared to be reproved for my faults."
"Brother, you do not understand," said Chao Gai. "We were bosom friends, so I have now come to help you. There is a propitious star 'Di Ling Xing' in Jiangnan which will relieve you of your load of trouble. Of many plans sometimes the best and only one is to leave. Why do you not clear out at once? What keeps you here? If a calamity is approaching how can you avoid it? By that time you must not blame me for giving you no help."
Song Jiang wished for further information and took a step forward. He asked, "Spirit of my Elder Brother! I beg you to speak clearly and truthfully."
"You need not speak any further," said Chao Gai. "Arrange your affairs and depart without any delay. I must go now."
The figure vanished, and Song Jiang thought he had only had a dream. But he sent for Wu Yong to come and see him at once. Upon the latter's arriving Song Jiang told him of his dream.
"We cannot doubt that Chao Gai's spirit has actually conveyed that message to you," said Wu Yong. "It is very cold here, and our men cannot stand these hard conditions very long. We must send them all back to Liangshan Marsh. We can come again in spring and attack this town with greater chances of success."
"What you say is quite true," said Song Jiang. "But Lu Junyi and Shi Xiu are still in prison, and they are expecting us to save them. I am afraid that they will be executed if we leave now. What shall we do?"
They talked the matter over for a long time, but came to no decision.
The following day Song Jiang was feverish, and also had a splitting headache. He felt very tired, and did not get up. The leaders came to see what was the matter, and Song Jiang told them that he had a pain in his back. Upon examining the spot they found a big red swelling. Wu Yong said, "I have read in a medicine book that the poison in these swellings can be kept away from the heart by a diet of green beans. We have no doctor on our strength, so that is the best thing for the remedy."
"Previously my mother had the same complaint," said Zhang Shun, "and although we tried a hundred medicines she got no better. At last we got a doctor named An Daoquan from Jiankang Prefecture (Nanking) who knew the disease and cured her. I was very grateful to him, and whenever I got some money I sent it to him as gifts. I will ask him to come here and cure Song Jiang. But it is a long journey, and will take some time to get the doctor here."
Wu Yong then mentioned Song Jiang's dream of Chao Gai the previous night, and said how Chao Gai had suggested that a propitious star in Jiangnan, south of the Yangtze River could relieve him of a coming calamity. "Can it be that this doctor, An Daoquan, is that very star?"
"Younger brother," said Song Jiang, "send for this man at once, and save my life. There must not be the least delay in this matter."
Wu Yong got about one hundred taels of silver for the doctor and handed them to Zhang Shun. He also told him, "Today we are all going back to Liangshan Marsh, so you must bring the doctor there without any delay."
Zhang Shun started off immediately.
Wu Yong then issued orders for a return to Liangshan Marsh, and they started that very day, Song Jiang being carried on his bed in a cart.
When Grand Secretary Liang heard of the departure of the brigands he discussed matters with his Generals, and decided not to pursue them as they considered this move might be some new plot of the brigands to get them out of Daming Prefecture.
Zhang Shun traveled day and night with all possible speed, but he found it somewhat difficult owing to the snow on the ground. He braved both wind and snow without regard for his own safety. At last he reached the Yangtze River, but there was no boat available. He was very disappointed at this, but continued his way along the northern bank. He soon came to many reeds amid which he saw some smoke. He called out, "Hey brother! Quickly get your boat ready to take me across." A man emerged from the reeds wearing a broad straw hat and a grass raincoat. He asked, "Where do you want to go?"
"I want to go to Jiankang Prefecture, on urgent business," replied Zhang Shun, "and I will pay you much money to row me across the river quickly."
"I can take you across," said the man, "but it is getting rather dark now, and there is no place on the opposite bank for you to sleep. You had better sleep in my boat here, and I will take you across tomorrow morning at daybreak."
Zhang Shun agreed to this, and followed the man through the reeds to the bank where there was a boat with a young fellow on board warming himself at a fire. They went under cover on the boat, and Zhang Shun took off his wet clothing, and the boatman handed it to his assistant to dry at the fire. Zhang Shun undid his baggage, took his quilt, and wrapping it round himself lay down. He then asked the boatman whether it was possible to get some wine, and was informed there was none. Zhang Shun ate some rice, and then lay down again. He had had such a hard day traveling that he was very tired and soon fell asleep.
The assistant, seeing this, pulled his lips awry towards Zhang Shun, and whispered to the boatman, "Brother, do you see?" The boatman crept forward silently and felt at Zhang Shun's bundle. He then went back, and told his assistant to quietly row the boat into the middle of the river where they would kill the passenger.
The assistant jumped ashore, and untied the boat. Then pushing with a bamboo pole and then sculling, he took the boat into the middle of the river. While this was being done the boatman had quietly bound the sleeper with cords, and now carried him from underneath the cover on to the open deck. Zhang Shun was now awake, but found himself bound hand and foot. The boatman took a knife in one hand, and put the other hand on Zhang Shun.
"Please spare my life," appealed Zhang Shun. "I will give you all the money I have."
"I want both your money and your life," replied the boatman.
"Then do not kill me, but only drown me," appealed Zhang Shun, "and then my spirit will not trouble you afterwards."
"That I can do," said the boatman. He then took Zhang Shun and threw him into the water. Taking the bundle he opened it and was surprised to find such a lot of money. He frowned at this, and called his assistant. When the latter came inside, the boatman seized him, and taking the knife killed him on the spot. He then threw the body overboard. He washed the blood from the deck, and then sculled back to the bank.
When Zhang Shun was in the water he soon bit the cords tying his hands, then freed his feet, and swam to the southern bank of the Yangtze River. There he saw a light among some trees, and going near he found that it was an inn where they were distilling wine in the night. He called out, and pushing open the door entered, and saluted an old man who was inside.
The old man said, "I can see that you have been robbed on the river, and have escaped by jumping into the water, and swimming ashore."
"I will be quite straight with you," said Zhang Shun. "I am from Shandong, and am on my way to Jiankang Prefecture on urgent business. Last evening I got on a boat to cross the river, and did not suspect that the boatmen were bad fellows. They took all my silver and clothes, and threw me into the water. But I swam across to this side, and so saved my life. I appeal for your assistance."
The men led Zhang Shun into a room at the back, and gave him dry clothes for a change. He then produced food and wine. He asked for Zhang Shun's name and his business.
Zhang Shun gave his name, and explained that he wished to see an old friend Dr. An at Jiankang.
"On your way here did you pass Liangshan Marsh?" asked the man.
Zhang Shun admitted this, and the man remarked, "At that place there is a man named Song Jiang who does not molest travelers, but acts as the 'agent of Heaven.'"
"Yes," said Zhang Shun, "he is a very honest and upright man. He does not injure the people, but is opposed to all corrupt officials."
"I have heard the same. His followers help the poor, and the old, and are quite different to the brigands about here. If he came to this place he would be welcomed by all the people."
Zhang Shun then disclosed that he was one of the leaders at Liangshan Marsh. That Song Jiang was seriously ill with a boil on the back, and that he had been given a hundred taels of silver to go quickly for Dr. An. It was a misfortune that he had fallen asleep on the boat and been robbed.
The old man said, "As you are one of those leaders I will introduce my son to you." In a short time a young man came from the back room, and saluted Zhang Shun. He said, "I am Wang Dingliu, but the people call me, 'Lightning Goddess,' because I walk very quickly. I like swimming, but so far have not been able to get a good instructor to teach me the use of sticks, and have had to earn a living at this inn. I know those two thieves who assaulted you. One is Zhang Wang, the 'River Devil,' and the other is Sun the Fifth, the 'Oily Eel.' They are always robbing travelers. If you would stay here for a few days you would see them come here, and then you could have your revenge."
"I am grateful for your offer," said Zhang Shun, "but I cannot delay my important affair. So tomorrow I will go to the town, and after finding Dr. An I will see you again on my way back."
This was agreed to, and the following day Wang Dingliu gave Zhang Shun new clothes and ten taels of silver. It was a fine day, and the snow had stopped. Zhang Shun soon reached the town, and found Dr. An's place close to the Huaishu Bridge. He entered the dispensary, and saluted Dr. An Daoquan.
Immediately Dr. An remembered him, and said, "I have not seen you for many years. What wind has blown you here?"
Zhang Shun went into the inner room, and there told the doctor his business. He explained how he had been robbed in crossing the Yangtze River, and therefore arrived without money.
"As Song Jiang, the upright hero, is sick, it is important that he should be cured quickly," said Dr. An. "But unfortunately my wife died recently, and as I have no relative to look after my business here I cannot go to any distant place."
Zhang Shun pleaded earnestly for a long time for the doctor to go, and at last said he would not return without the doctor. Thus after much discussion Dr. An agreed to go.
In the town was a prostitute named Li Qiaonu who was on very familiar terms with Dr. An, and the latter took Zhang Shun to see her. Food and wine were provided, and during the meal Dr. An spoke, "I will sleep here tonight, but early tomorrow morning I will start on my journey to Shandong. I will return however in about a month."
"I do not like you to leave me," said the woman. "If you do not listen to me now you need not trouble to come here again to see me."
"I have made all preparations to start tomorrow," said Dr. An, "and I will come back as quickly as possible, so you must not worry."
The woman threw all discretion on one side, and leaning on his breast said, "If you go and forget me, I will curse the flesh from your body!"
Zhang Shun was very much annoyed with the woman. As it was now late in the evening, Dr. An was drunk, and he went into the woman's room, and lay down. The woman spoke to Zhang Shun, "You can go now, as I have no place here for you to sleep."
"I will wait here until the doctor is sober," said Zhang Shun, "and then we will depart together."
As she could not get him to go, the woman at last gave him a small room to sleep in.
Zhang Shun was annoyed at what had happened, and could not sleep. Shortly afterwards he heard a knock at the house door, and looking through a crack in his own room, he saw the door open and a man enter. The man spoke something to the old woman that ran the house, who opened the door for him and she asked him, "Where have you been lately? I have not seen you for a long time. The doctor is drunk inside, so you cannot stay here tonight."
"I have ten taels of gold here to be made into hairpins for your mistress. Please ask her to come here and talk with me now," said the man.
"Come into my room," said the old woman, "and I will bring her there."
Zhang Shun now recognized the man as Zhang Wang, the "River Devil," who had robbed him, and became excited. But he still watched what was happening as he did not want to delay his own affair by attacking this thief. The prostitute came, and sat drinking wine with Zhang Wang. About midnight the woman and two servants in the kitchen were quite drunk. Then Zhang Shun left his room, and went into the kitchen where he found a meat cleaver there. He killed the woman, but although he wanted to kill the two servants he found that the edge of the cleaver was not sharp enough after hacking up the old woman. He took a wood axe and killed them with that as they were going to call out. The prostitute in the inner room hearing the noise, opened the door, and met Zhang Shun with the wood axe in his hand. He dealt her a blow with it, and killed her on the spot. Zhang Wang, the robber, seeing this happen, jumped up, opened a window, and escaped that way. Zhang Shun was annoyed at this as the man might raise an alarm. He, however, tore a strip of cloth from the woman's clothing and dipping it in the pool of blood he wrote on the wall, "I, Dr. An, have killed these people." He wrote this in several places with the blood. About daybreak Dr. An awoke, and Zhang Shun said to him, "Please keep quiet but look at your lover here." Dr. An got up, and seeing the four corpses he was dumbfounded and trembled with fear.
"Brother, do you see what you have written on the walls?" asked Zhang Shun.
"You have seriously implicated me and endangered my life," said Dr. An.
"There are two ways lying before you," said Zhang Shun. "You can cry out for help in which case I shall run away, and leave you to your fate. Or you can ignore this affair, go to your shop for your medicines, and escape with me to Liangshan Marsh to cure Song Jiang. Which do you prefer?"
"You have been too malicious in your actions," said Dr. An, but he agreed to go.
It was still dark, and they both left the house. Upon reaching the doctor's shop they opened the door, got the medicines and bundle, and started off at once. They left the town, and duly reached the inn owned by Wang Dingliu on the bank of the Yangtze River. When he saw Zhang Shun he said, "It was a pity that you were not here yesterday when Zhang Wang happened to come here."
"I saw him yesterday," said Zhang Shun, "but I was too busy to attend to him. My business is so pressing that I have no time even for revenge."
Just as he finished saying this Wang Dingliu exclaimed, "Why, here is Zhang Wang coming now!"
"Do not alarm him! We will just see where he goes," said Zhang Shun.
Zhang Wang walked to the bank of the river, and was evidently looking around for his boat. So Wang Dingliu called out, "Brother, wait a little, and you can take two of my guests across who are waiting here now."
"I want to cross at once," said Zhang Wang. "Tell your guests to come quickly."
Wang Dingliu informed Zhang Shun of this, and Zhang Shun asked Dr. An to change clothes with him. "What is your idea?" asked Dr. An. "That is my affair," said Zhang Shun, "and you had better not ask any questions."
They exchanged clothing, and then went with Wang Dingliu to the bank where Zhang Wang's boat was waiting. They all three got in the boat. Zhang Shun went to the stern, and lifting up a plank took out a knife that was there. He hid himself under the cover of the boat. Zhang Wang shoved the boat off, and sculled towards the middle of the river. Zhang Shun now took off his clothes and called out, "Hey brother, come here! There are stains of blood on the planks."
"Sir, please do not joke with me," replied Zhang Wang. So saying he left the oar, and went towards the center of the boat. Then Zhang Shun seized hold of him, and said, "Thief! Don't you recognize me? Don't you remember the passenger who came on your boat the other night when it was snowing?"
Zhang Wang looked up, but could not speak.
"You took all my money," said Zhang Shun, "and tried to kill me. Where is your assistant now?"
"Sir," said Zhang Wang, "when I saw such a lot of money I was afraid that he would want an equal share, so I killed him and threw his body in the river."
"Previously I lived at Jiangzhou," said Zhang Shun, "and earned a living as a wholesale fish dealer. But now I live at Liangshan Marsh under our leader Song Jiang, and we are feared everywhere. You falsely decoyed me on your boat, and while asleep you bound me, and threw me into the river. If I had not been an expert swimmer I should have been drowned. We are now enemies, and I must kill you." He then pulled Zhang Wang onto the deck, bound him hand and foot, and threw him into the river.
Wang Dingliu heaved a sigh at this. Zhang Shun found where his money was stored, and took it back. They brought the boat to the northern bank, and there Zhang Shun spoke to Wang Dingliu, "You have been very good to me, and I shall never forget it. But if you do not think yourself above us, we should be very glad if you and your father would come and join us at Liangshan Marsh."
"What you say is just my own idea," said Wang Dingliu.
They then took leave of each other, and Zhang Shun and Dr. An continued on their way. But Dr. An was a literary man, and was not accustomed to traveling, so after walking about ten //he could not go any further. Zhang Shun found an inn, and they went inside to rest a while. While they were eating a meal they noticed a man coming in who spoke to Zhang Shun, "Brother, how is it that you are so late?" Zhang Shun recognized the man as Dai Zong, the "Divine Traveler." Zhang Shun introduced Dr. An, and then asked about Song Jiang.
"He is still very sick," said Dai Zong, "and cannot take any food. It looks as though he might die."

Zhang Shun weeped at this. Dr. An asked what was the state of the patient's complexion.
Dai Zong replied, "His skin is quite dry and wrinkled. He cries out with pain, and we are afraid that he is about to die."
"As he feels the pain I think we can cure him," said Dr. An. "But we must not delay our journey, but get there quickly."
"That is easy," said Dai Zong. He took two of his magic puttees, and fastened them on Dr. An's legs. He then shouldered the Doctor's satchel and spoke to Zhang Shun, "I will go with Dr. An first, and you may follow us slowly." They then went outside the inn, and the two flew away.
Zhang Shun stayed at the inn for three days, and then he was joined by Wang Dingliu and his father. They traveled together to Liangshan Marsh.
Dai Zong and Dr. An reached the mountain stronghold that night, and were at once taken in to see Song Jiang. The doctor found the patient breathing very feebly, and felt his pulse. Dr. An spoke to the leaders, "You need not be afraid, as it is not a serious illness, and I think I can cure him, so that he will be all right again in about ten days." The doctor then took some artemisia, and spread it on the boil to draw out the poisonous matter. He also gave him some medicine to take. After about ten days of this treatment Song Jiang's skin looked quite rosy, and was not so dry and warm as before. He also began to take nourishment.
As he got better, however, he began to worry and weep about Shi Xiu and Lu Junyi being still prisoners in Daming. Dr. An, however, objected to his being moved, or doing anything as he was only convalescent.
"Brother," said Wu Yong, "you can leave matters in my hands while you yourself obey the doctor's orders. It's now springtime, I'll undertake an attack on Daming Prefecture, and release our brothers from prison."
"If you avenge the wrong done to our brothers," said Song Jiang, "I'll die in peace." All the leaders were summoned to the Loyalty and Justice Hall where Wu Yong announced his plans for an attack on Daming Prefecture.

City changed to fiery furnace,
Mass of spears like forest trees;
Corpses piled up high as mountain.
Blood in pools as wide as seas;
Loyal heroes with their laughter
Make the devils turn and flee.

The Flea Shi Qian Sets Fire to & Burns the Blue Jade Cloud Tower Mansion; the Professor Wu Yong plans the city's downfall, by a Ruse Takes Daming City with a Subtle Plan

"Fortunately, you're all right now, brother," Wu Yong said to Song Jiang. "Having Dr. An here treating your illness is a great blessing for our stronghold. While you were confined to bed, I frequently sent scouts into the Northern Capital to nose around. They say Governor Liang has got the jitters. He's afraid we're going to attack. I also had men put up proclamations in all the market places in and around the city assuring the ordinary people that they would not be harmed. We say that each wrong has its avenger and every debt has its creditor, and promise that when our army enters Daming we'll seek out only certain specific enemies. The result is that Governor Liang is more worried than ever. Premier Cai in the Eastern Capital has heard that Guan Sheng has come over to us, but he doesn't dare mention this in the presence of the emperor. Cai favors giving us amnesty and official posts. He feels that will solve everything. He keeps writing to Governor Liang, urging him to spare the lives of Lu the Magnate and Shi Xiu as a sign of conciliation."
On hearing this, Song Jiang wanted to go down the mountain immediately and attack the Northern Capital. Wu Yong had another idea.
"It's now the lunar New Year and the Lantern Festival Day is rapidly approaching," he said. "It's the custom in the Northern Capital to put on a big display of lanterns. I'd like to take this opportunity to slip some men into the city, first, then attack. Coordinating inside and out, we can break through the defenses."
Song Jiang agreed. "Please work out the details," he said to the brigand commanders.
"The most important thing is to set a blaze inside the city as a signal. Which of you brothers will venture to go in and do it?" Wu Yong queried.
A man walked up to the foot of the platform. "I will!" Everyone looked. It was Shi Qian, known as Flea on a Drum.
"I lived in the Northern Capital as a child," he said. "There's one big tavern called Jade Cloud Mansion. Upstairs and down it has well over a hundred rooms. It's bound to be very lively the night of the Lantern Festival Day. I'll sneak into the city before that, and on the fifteenth of the first lunar month I'll climb to the top of the building and light a signal fire. Then the Military Advisor can dispatch forces to raid the prison. That's the best way."
"Just what I was thinking," said Wu Yong. "Start down the mountain tomorrow at daybreak. At the first watch on Festival night, if you can set a fire on top of the Mansion you'll win a lot of credit."
Shi Qian promised to carry out his mission, and departed.
The next day Wu Yong ordered Xie Zhen and Xie Bao to disguise themselves as hunters and go into the city with presents of game for the officials. When they saw the signal fire on the night of the fifteenth they were to stand in front of the government office and stop any officer or soldier who tried to report it. The two consented and left.
Wu Yong then told Du Qian and Song Wan to assume the garb of rice merchants and push two barrows into the city and find quarters. The moment they saw the signal blaze on the fifteenth they were to seize the city's East Gate. They promised and departed.
He instructed Kong Ming and Kong Liang to disguise themselves as beggars. They were to sleep under the eaves of some building in the busiest section of the city. When they saw the fire on the Mansion, they were to hurry and lend a hand. The two consented and left.
Wu Yong directed Li Ying and Shi Jin to dress as travellers, and to put up at an inn outside the East Gate. On seeing the signal blaze they were to kill the soldiers guarding the gate, take it over, and keep it for a convenient exit. The two promised and departed.
He told Lu Zhishen and Wu Song to move into a temple outside the city in the guise of itinerant monks. At the signal they were to go to the South Gate and block the government troops attempting to charge out. They agreed and left.
Wu Yong ordered Zou Yuan and Zou Run to pretend to be lantern sellers and put up at an inn in the center of the city. When they saw the fire on the roof top they were to go to the front of the prison and support the raiders. The two promised and departed.
He told Liu Tang and Yang Xiong to disguise themselves as policemen and take rooms in front of prefectural headquarters. When they saw the signal fire they were to prevent anyone from going in to report it, and thus cut the connection between the municipal administration's head and its tail. The two consented and departed.
He directed the Taoist Gongsun Sheng to assume the garb of a wandering priest, with Ling Zhen disguised as his acolyte, move into a secluded part of the city with hundreds of fireworks, and set them off when they saw the signal blaze. They agreed and left.
Zhang Shun was to enter the city with Yan Qing through the water gate via the moat and seize the adulterers in the home of Lu the Magnate.
Stumpy Tiger Wang, Sun Xin, Zhang Qing, Ten Feet of Steel Hu, Gu Dasao and Sun the Witch were to be three country couples coming to see the lantern display. They were to set fire to Lu's house.
Chai Jin and Yue Ho, dressed as army officers, would go to the home of Cai the prison superintendent and demand that he guarantee the safety of the two prisoners.
When all these dispositions had been made, the chieftains set out upon their various missions. It was then the beginning of the first lunar month.
We'll speak not of the bold fellows who departed, one by one, down the mountain, but tell instead of Governor Liang, as he summoned Li Cheng, Wen Da, Prefect Wang, and other high officials for a conference.
"Every year we put on a big display of lanterns to celebrate the first full moon, and make merry with the populace just as they do in the Eastern Capital," said the Governor. "But the Liangshan Marsh bandits have raided us twice, recently. I'm afraid a lantern festival might attract trouble. I'm considering calling it off. How do you gentlemen feel about that?"
"I think the robbers have stealthily withdrawn," said Wen Da. "Those proclamations of theirs prove that they're at their wits' end. There's nothing else they can do. You needn't let them concern you, Excellency. If we don't have our lantern display this year and those varlets find out about it they're sure to sneer at us. I propose that you issue an edict calling for even more fancy lanterns and celebrations than last year, and construct two hills of lanterns in the center of the city, Follow the example of the Eastern Capital and celebrate the Lantern Festival for five full days, from the thirteenth to the seventeenth, inclusive, with revels all through the night. Have the prefect check to make sure that everyone takes part. You too must join, Excellency, and celebrate with the people. I'll lead a cavalry unit to Flying-Tiger Valley, and there guard against the bandits pulling any tricks. District Commander Li can patrol with his Iron Cavalry around the outskirts of the city, to ensure that the populace is not disturbed."
Governor Liang was pleased with this suggestion. After he and his officials had discussed and agreed upon it, he had public proclamations issued accordingly.
Daming, known as the Northern Capital, was the largest city in Hebei and a thriving metropolis. Merchants and traders flocked there in droves. When they heard there was to be a lantern festival, all came to take part.
On the streets and in the lanes, local officials daily inspected the preparations. Wealthy families vied with one another in their displays, travelling anywhere from one hundred to three hundred //to buy handsome and flowery lanterns. Many vendors brought lanterns to the city annually. Families built special sheds in front of their doors, where they hung up their best lanterns and set off fireworks. Inside the courtyards other sheds were erected. Here, amid beautiful screens and revolving lights, pictures by famous artists graced the walls, and rare antiques and intricate toys were placed on view.
Every household in every street and lane had lanterns ready. Beside the prefectural bridge near the governor's residency an artificial hill had been built. Two paper dragons, one red and the other yellow, coiled around it. Each scale of their bodies was a small lantern, and water spewed from their mouths. Countless lanterns also illuminated both approaches to the bridge.
An artificial hill was erected in front of the Bronze Buddha Monastery. Around this coiled a blue dragon, lit by hundreds of lanterns.
Before the Jade Cloud Mansion was another artificial hill. On it was a white dragon, with innumerable lanterns on all sides. The Mansion was actually a tavern, the finest in the province. Three eaved stories high, with carved beams and decorated pillars, it was an extremely handsome structure of more than a hundred rooms. From morning till night the Mansion resounded with music and song.
All the temples and monasteries were festooned with lanterns to celebrate a prosperous new year. Needless to say, the displays in the houses of joy and amusement were more lavish still.
Scouts reported the news to Mount Liangshan. Wu Yong was delighted. He informed Song Jiang. Song wanted to lead personally an attack on the Northern Capital. But Dr. An disapproved.
"Your wound isn't entirely closed," he said. "You mustn't move about too much. If anger seeps in, the cure will be difficult."
"Let me go in your place," Wu Yong proposed. He and Ironclad Virtue Pei Xuan then mustered eight contingents.
The first was led by Two Rods Huyan Zhuo, assisted by Han Tao and Peng Qi, with Huang Xin, Suppressor of the Three Mountains, commanding the reserve. This was entirely a cavalry outfit. Actually, Huyan's forward unit was not going to fight. It was a ruse to draw Guan Sheng into battle.
The second contingent had Panther Head Lin Chong leading the forward unit, aided by Ma Lin and Deng Fei, with Hua Rong commanding the reserve. This too was entirely cavalry.
The third contingent, also fully mounted, had Guan Sheng the Big Halberd leading the forward unit, seconded by Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen. Sun Li the Sickly General brought up the rear.
The fourth contingent, again fully cavalry, had Qin Ming the Thunderbolt in command of the forward unit, assisted by Ou Peng and Yan Shun. Yang Zhi the Blue-Faced Brute led the reserve.
Mu Hong the Unrestrained, an infantry commander, was at the head of the fifth contingent. His lieutenants were Du Xing and Zheng Tianshou.
Another infantry commander, Li Kui the Black Whirlwind, headed the sixth contingent, assisted by LiLi and Cao Zheng.
Infantry commander Lei Heng the Winged Tiger, aided by Shi En and Mu Chun, led the seventh contingent.
The eight contingent was led by infantry commander Fan Rui the Demon King Who Roils the World, seconded by Xiang Chong and Li Gun.
The eight companies were ordered to march that same day and to brook no delays. They were to reach the city walls by the second watch of the fifteenth of the first lunar month, infantry and cavalry advancing together.
When the command was given, the eight contingents set forth down the mountain. The other chieftains remained with Song Jiang to guard the fortress.
Now Flea on a Drum Shi Qian was a man who flew along eaves and walked atop walls. He didn't enter the Northern Capital on the regular road but clambered over the city wall at night. Unable to find accommodations at an inn for a single traveller, he wandered the streets all day and at night rested beneath the pedestal of a god in a temple. On the thirteenth he went to the center of town and watched the citizens erecting their sheds and hanging their lanterns.
He saw Xie Zhen and Xie Bao, carrying game, also strolling and looking. He observed too Du Qian and Song Wan coming out of a house of pleasure. Shi Qian went to an upper floor of the Jade Cloud Mansion and walked around. Down in the street again, he met Kong Ming, dirty, his hair dishevelled and wearing a tattered sheepskin coat, begging with a staff in his left hand, a bowl in his right. Kong Ming nudged him to go to the back and talk.
"You don't look a bit like a beggar, brother," said Shi Qian, "a big robust fellow like you, with a fair skin and rosy complexion! This city is full of policemen. If any of them sees through your disguise, our whole project may be delayed! You'd better stay out of sight."
While he was speaking, another beggar approached from the edge of a wall. Shi Qian looked at him closely. It was Kong Liang.
"You're another one with a snowy white skin," said Shi Qian. "Nobody would believe you were starving. They'll surely spot you as a fraud." Suddenly, two men grabbed them from behind and barked: "A fine thing you three are up to!"
They turned and saw Yang Xiong and Liu Tang. Shi Qian breathed a sigh of relief. "You nearly scared the life out of me!"
"Come with me," said Yang Xiong. He led them to a secluded spot and said reproachfully: "Don't you have any sense? How could you talk there? It's lucky it's only we two who saw you. If it was one of those sharp-eyed fast-moving policemen, brother Song Jiang's big plan might have to be postponed. We've seen the other brothers. There's no need for you to roam the streets any more."
"Zou Yuan and Zou Run are out selling lanterns," said Kong Ming. "Lu Zhishen and Wu Song have put up in a temple outside the city. That's enough talk. Let each man do his job when the time comes."
In front of a temple they met a Taoist priest coming out. "What are you five doing here?" he cried. It was Dragon in the Clouds Gongsun Sheng. Behind him was Ling Zhen, disguised as an acolyte. The seven exchanged significant glances, nodded in agreement, and went their separate ways.
With the festival day almost upon them, Governor Liang directed Wen Da the Mighty Sword to lead his mounted, troops out of the city and set up a position in Flying-Dragon Valley to guard against the bandits. On the fourteenth he ordered Li Cheng the Heavenly King to take five hundred Iron Cavalry, in full armor, and patrol the outskirts.
The next day, the fifteenth, the Lantern Festival Day, was clear and bright. At dusk, the moon rose, gilding the avenues and streets with silver. Crowds watched the rockets and admired the beautiful shining lanterns.
That night Superintendent Cai Fu instructed his brother to keep an eye on the prison. "I'm going home for a while. I'll be back soon."
As he was entering the door of his house, two men moved in after him. The first was dressed as an army officer. The other appeared to be a servant. But when Cai Fu looked at them in the light of a lamp, he saw that the first was Chai Jin the Small Whirlwind and the second Iron Throat Yue Ho. Cai Fu knew Chai Jin, and he invited them in and started to lay out wine cups.
"No wine, thanks," said the Small Whirlwind. "We've come with an urgent request. We know you've been taking excellent care of Lu the Magnate and Shi Xiu, and for that we can't thank you enough. While all the festivities are going on we'd like to slip into the prison and see them. May we trouble you to lead the way? Please don't refuse."
Cai Fu was an experienced officer. He could guess pretty well what Chai Jin intended. If he refused and the outlaws succeeded in breaking into the city, not only he but his whole family would be exterminated. He had no choice but to risk the dangerous consequences. He gave them some old clothes to wear and disguised them as policemen. Then he changed his head kerchief and led them directly to the prison.
Around the first watch Stumpy Tiger, Ten Feet of Steel, Sun Xin, Gu Dasao, Zhang Qing and Sun the Witch, masquerading as three couples from the country, mingled with the crowds entering the city through the East Gate. Gongsun Sheng and Ling Zhen, carrying large hampers on shoulder-poles, went into the Temple of the City God and sat down on the veranda. The temple was next door to the prefectural government office.
Zou Yuan and Zou Run strolled towards the center of town bearing lanterns for sale. Du Qian and Song Wan, each trundling a wheel barrow, proceeded directly to the front of the governor's residency and merged with the revellers there. The residency was on the avenue leading to the East Gate.
Liu Tang and Yang Xiong, each holding a policeman's staff and with a weapon concealed on his person, sat down on either side of the prefectural bridge. Yan Qing and Zhang Shun swam into the Northern Capital beneath the water gate and concealed themselves in a secluded spot. Of all this we'll say no more.
Soon, the second watch was sounded in the drum tower. Shi Qian appeared with a basket on his arm. In it were sulphur and nitrate and things to ignite them, covered over by velvet ornaments for ladies' hair. He entered Jade Cloud Mansion and walked up the stairs. In every room pipes were tootling, drums and clackers beating, and games being played, as merry-makers noisily celebrated the Festival of the Lanterns. Pretending to be selling his hair ornaments, Shi Qian went from room to room. He met Xie Bao and Xie Zhen in the hallway carrying steel pitchforks from which rabbit game were suspended.
"It's time," said Shi Qian. "Why isn't there any activity outside?"
"We've just been out front and saw a mounted scout go by," said Xie Zhen. "Our troops have probably arrived. You just do your job."
Before the words had left his mouth a clamor arose in front of the building. Someone exclaimed: "The men of Liangshan Marsh are at the West Gate!"
"Hurry," Xie Zhen said to Shi Qian. "We're going to take our posts outside the government office."
He and Xie Bao hurried to their destination and found it crowded with defeated soldiers who had fled back to the city. They said: "Wen Da the Mighty Sword lost his position in a surprise raid. The bandits are headed this way!"
Li Cheng, who was patrolling atop the city wall when he heard the news, galloped to garrison headquarters. He mustered more troops, and ordered that the gates be closed and the city defended.
Prefect Wang had led over a hundred policemen, with chains and fetters, to suppress any disturbances. He returned to garrison headquarters hastily on learning of the impending attack. Governor Liang, who had been seated at his ease outside his residency, had not been alarmed when the first news reached him. But when, less than half a watch later, mounted scouts came flying back like comets, he was shaken to the depths of his soul. He hurriedly called for his horse.
At that moment Shi Qian ignited the sulphur and nitrate on the roof of Jade Cloud Mansion. An enormous flame shot into the sky, paling the moon. Governor Liang hastily mounted and started to ride to the scene. But two big fellows pushed over their wheel barrows, blocking the road, then proceeded to pour oil on them from lamps which had been hanging on the barrows and set them on fire.
Liang headed for the East Gate. Two other big fellows shouted: "Li Ying and Shi Jin are here!" and strode murderously forward, twirling halberds. The guards at the gate fled, but not before a dozen of them had been wounded. Du Qian and Song Wan then joined in, and the four, together, captured the East Gate.
Governor Liang saw he was no match for them. With his retinue he flew to the South Gate. There, he heard voices crying: "A big fat monk with a Buddhist staff and a beast-face pilgrim with a pair of sharp knives are yelling and slaughtering their way in!"
Liang turned his steed and went back to his residency. He saw Xie Zhen and Xie Bao felling men left and right with their steel pitchforks. He thought to go to prefectural headquarters, but dared not draw any closer. Prefect Wang tried to come out to him. Liu Tang and Yang Xiong brought their policemen's staves down on Wang's head with such force that his brains spattered and his eyes bulged, and he fell dead in front of the prefecture. His officers and clerks fled for their lives.

The governor hurriedly rode to the West Gate. The concerted boom of explosives in the City God Temple shook the earth. At the same time Zou Yuan and Zou Run with torches on long bamboo poles began setting fires to the eaves of houses, while Stumpy Tiger and Ten Feet of Steel, in front of the southern brothel section, came fighting forward, aided by Sun Xin and Gu Dasao who had pulled out concealed weapons. Zhang Qing and Sun the Witch barged into the Bronze Buddha Monastery, clambered up the artificial hill and set it ablaze.

All over the city, the people were scurrying in terror. Screams and wails shivered in every household. In a dozen places flames brightened the sky. Confusion reigned.

As Governor Liang was rushing to the West Gate he met Li Cheng and his cavalry, and they all raced to the top of the city wall above the South Gate. Li reined in his steed, mounted the Drum Tower and peered out. Approaching was a huge array of men and horses and a banner inscribed with the words: General Huyan Zhuo. The general was a spirited and courageous figure in the firelight. To his left was Han Tao, to his right Peng Qi, while Huang Xin brought up the rear. Spread out like wings of a goose, the ruthlessly advancing contingent was nearly at the gate.

Unable to leave the city, the governor and Li Cheng concealed themselves beneath the archway of the North Gate and watched the brightly leaping flames. They could see a mounted force of unknown number flying towards them. It was led by Panther Head Lin Chong, who held a lance athwart as he urged on his horse. To his left was Ma Lin, to his right Deng Fei. Hua Rong brought up the rear.

Liang went again to the East Gate. Amid an advancing army of torches he could see Mu Hong the Unrestrained, with Du Xing on his left and Zheng Tianshou on his right. These three gallant infantry commanders, halberds in hand, were rapidly closing in on the city with over a thousand men.

Throwing all caution to the winds, the governor dashed through the South Gate. In the light of torches on the side of the drawbridge he could see Li Kui the Black Whirlwind, with LiLi on his left and Cao Zheng on his right. Buff naked, Li Kui swarmed up from the moat, brandishing his axes. LiLi and Cao came with him.

Li Cheng carved a bloody path out of the city to cover the governor's escape. Murderous cries arose on their left. From amid an army of countless torches, Guan Sheng the Big Halberd rode forth. Clapping his spirited roan and waving his blue steel blade, he galloped directly towards Liang.

Li Cheng, grasping his two knives, advanced to meet the foe. But he had no heart for the fight, and soon pulled his horse around and withdrew. From the left a combined force under Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen, with Sun Li bringing up the rear, charged fiercely. In the ensuing battle, Hua Rong advanced swiftly from behind, fitted an arrow to his bow and brought a lieutenant beside Li Cheng tumbling from his saddle. The startled Li turned and fled.

Before he had gone more that half a bowshot, drums pounded and gongs crashed on his right. In the firelight he saw Qin Ming the Thunderbolt, waving his cudgel on a spirited mount, murderously advancing with Yan Shun and Ou Peng, followed by Yang Zhi. Li Cheng fought as he retreated, still protecting the governor. They managed to break through.

Meanwhile, in the city Du Qian and Song Wan slaughtered the governor's family, old and young, good and bad. Liu Tang and Yang Xiong wiped out the family of Prefect Wang. Kong Ming and Kong Liang had climbed the rear wall of the city prison and were about to go in. Zou Yuan and Zou Run planted themselves at the front of the prison to prevent anyone from entering.

Inside, Chai Jin and Yue Ho recognized the signal fire. "Did you brothers see that?" they called to Cai Fu and Cai Qing. "What are you waiting for?"

Cai Qing was on guard at the door, but Zou Yuan and Zou Run smashed it open and shouted: "The whole band of bold fellows from Liangshan Marsh is here! Bring out Lu the Magnate and Shi Xiu!"

Cai Qing hastily reported to his brother, but by then Kong Ming and Kong Liang had already jumped down from the top of the building. Chai Jin, regardless of whether the Cai brothers were willing or not, pulled out an implement, opened the fetters and released the two prisoners.

"Come with me, quick, to Lu's house and protect his family," Chai Jin said to Cai the Superintendent.

All rapidly emerged through the prison gate, where they were joined by Zou Yuan and Zou Run, and hurried to the home of Lu Junyi. The Magnate led the five Mount Liangshan men in a search for his wife and his steward Li Gu.

When Li Gu heard that an army of bold fellows from Liangshan Marsh had entered the city and saw the fires rising on all sides, his eyes twitched and he consulted with Lu's wife. They packed some valuables and hurried through the door. But then they heard front gates being knocked down and an unknown number of men rushing in. They turned in fright and stole out through the rear gate. They tiptoed along the wall and headed for the river, hoping to find a place of concealment.

On the bank Zhang Shun shouted: "Where does that woman think she's going!"

Panic-stricken, Li Gu jumped into a boat to hide. As he was about to plunge into the cabin, a hand suddenly reached out and grabbed him, and a voice shouted: "Li Gu, do you remember me?"

The steward recognized the voice of Yan Qing. "Young Prodigy," he cried, "we've never been enemies! Don't pull me ashore!"

Zhang Shun, on the bank, already had the woman clapped under one arm. He dragged her down to the boat. Yan Qing held on to Li Gu, and all went towards the East Gate.

Lu the Magnate, when he found his wife and steward gone, ordered his servants to pack his gold and silver and precious things, load them on carts and take them to the mountain fortress for distribution.

Chai Jin went with Cai Fu to his house where the superintendent collected his family and belongings. They prepared to leave for the mountain stronghold.

"You must save the ordinary people of the city, Excellency," said Cai Fu. "Don't let them come to any harm."

Chai Jin relayed his request to Wu Yong. But though the Military Advisor immediately issued appropriate orders, by then half the population had been killed or wounded.

The sky was already light. Wu Yong and Chai Jin, in the city, had the trumpets blow the call to assemble. The chieftains and Lu the Magnate and Shi Xiu all gathered at the governor's residency. The released prisoners praised Cai Fu and Cai Qing for their kindness and said they owned them their lives. Yan Qing and Zhang Shun brought forward Li Gu and Lu's wife. The Magnate told Yan Qing to keep them under guard until their disposition could be decided upon. Of that, we'll say no more.

We'll talk rather of Governor Liang, fleeing the city under the protection of Li Cheng. They ran into Wen Da, returning with the remnants of his defeated army, and joined forces and travelled south together. Suddenly, the forward units set up a clamor. Fan Rui the Demon King Who Roils the World, with Xiang Chong on his left and Li Gun on his right—3 infantry commanders—were advancing on them with flourishing knives and spears. And behind the fugitives appeared Lei Heng the Winged Tiger, plus Shi En and Mu Chun, each leading a thousand foot soldiers and cutting off their retreat. Truly, the keeper sends the prisoner back to jail, the doctor orders the patient to return to bed.

The Professor said to Song Jiang: "Today we have the happiness of knowing that you are going to be all right, and also we have Doctor An here in the camp to treat your illness. This is wonderful news for us. Before you became ill I had already started sending out scouts regularly to report on events in the Northern Capital. Governor Liang has been scared of his own shadow lately. He imagines all the time that we are coming to get him. I have sent people to every district and market, both inside and outside the city, to post an unsigned notice telling the inhabitants they may hold it as certain that, just as every fault has its origin, so every debt has to be paid, and when our army comes to town it will know who its enemies are. This has made Governor Liang even more fearful of sinister plots. In the Eastern Capital the Grand Preceptor has heard that Scimitar has surrendered to us, but he doesn't dare tell the Emperor. He has an amnesty in mind, which would let us all off, for which reason he has been continually sending messages to Governor Liang telling him to keep the Unicorn and Madcap alive as a matter of policy."

When he heard this, Song Jiang was all for sending troops immediately to attack the city. But the Professor said: "We're at the end of winter, on the verge of spring. It's very near the lantern festival. It's the custom in the Northern Capital to have a big display of lights. I'd like to take the opportunity to infiltrate some of our troops into the city and coordinate the attack. With a concerted effort from within and without we can take the city."

Song Jiang said: "Good idea! Just go ahead!"

The Professor explained: "My main idea is this, we will start a fire in the city as a signal for the attack. Which of you is courageous enough to enter the city first and start the fire?"

Immediately one of the company stepped up and said: "Just the job for me!"

It was the Flea who spoke. He continued: "I was in the Northern Capital in my younger days. There's a many-storied restaurant there called Jade Cloud Mansion. Altogether it has hundreds of chambers. On the day of the lantern festival it's sure to be packed. I'll take advantage of a quiet time to sneak into the city and on the evening of the fifteenth I'll climb to the top of Jade Cloud Mansion and start the fire. You can designate some others to raid the gaol. That's our best plan."

The Professor said: "Exactly what I had in mind. Start tomorrow at dawn. Wait till the day of the festival and set fire to the tower in the first watch. That will be your role."

The Flea assented and departed.

Next day the Professor told Snake and Scorpion to dress as hunters, make their way to the government offices in the city and offer to sell them some game. On the night of the fifteenth, when the fire was seen, they were to proceed to the barracks and prevent the guards from spreading the news. They too departed.

Skyscraper and Door-God were ordered to disguise themselves as rice merchants pushing a barrow and seek lodgings inside the city. As soon as they saw the signal on the night of the fifteenth they were to go and seize the east gate. That was their role. They departed.

The two Kong brothers, Comet and Red Star, were told to disguise themselves as beggars, and choose a spot to sleep under the eaves of a building in the market place. On the evening of the fifteenth when they saw the signal they were to go along and lend a hand. They departed.

Skyhawk and the Tattooed Dragon were told to dress as merchants and establish themselves outside the east gate. When they saw the signal they were to kill the guards on the gate and maintain free passage in and out. They departed.

Lu Zhishen, the Flowery Monk and Pilgrim Wu Song were told to dress as pilgrims and wait around at a temple outside the city. When they saw the signal they were to take up a position outside the south gate and prevent any counter attack from that quarter. They departed.

The Forester and Rhinoceros were told to enter the city disguised as sellers of lanterns and find themselves an inn. When they saw the signal they were to proceed to the gaol and wait in front of it. They departed.

The Red-Haired Devil and Morbid, disguised as court officers, were to wait in front of the government offices. When they saw the signal they were to deny access to all messengers and prevent any reinforcements getting through. They departed.

Taoist Gongsun was to disguise himself as a wandering priest, with Thunderer as his disciple. They were told to station themselves at some quiet spot within the city with a hundred or so powerful rockets and explosives which they were to set off when they saw the signal. They departed.

White Eel and the Prodigy were told to enter the city from the river and proceed to the Unicorn's house where they were to seize only the faithless wife and her lover.

Short-Arse, Blackface, and the Gardener, with Steelbright, Auntie Gu and Sister Sun the Ogress, were to dress as three married couples from the country coming up to the city to see the lights and go and set fire to the Unicorn's house.

Mr. Chai and Lungs dressed as army officers were to go to the house of Strongarm, the gaoler, and ensure the safety of the two prisoners.

All these roles were allotted and everyone set about preparing for them. They were all determined that there should be no mistake.

The first day of the festival arrived. There is no need to tell how the heroes from Mount Liang set off down the mountain one by one. Rather let us describe how in the city Governor Liang summoned Vulcan, Swordsman and Magistrate Wang with a thousand of their officers to discuss arrangements for the lantern festival. The Governor said: "It is customary in the city to have a big display of lanterns, in celebration of the festival and for the delectation of the populace, just as it is done in the Eastern Capital. But we have twice been attacked by the bandits of Mount Liang recently, and I am afraid that to set out lanterns may be to invite trouble. I am in favour of cancelling the celebrations. What do the rest of you think?"

Swordsman said: "Those villains sneaked away quietly. Since then all they have done is put up these unsigned notices. I believe they have run out of ideas and can't think of anything else. Why are you so worried about them? If we omit to put out lanterns this year they will get to know about it and we will look foolish. You should issue an edict informing the citizens that there are to be even more lanterns than last year, even more illuminations in honour of the local gods. Two more turtle mountains can be built in the market place and it will all be exactly as in the Eastern Capital. You should order the displays to continue for five whole nights, from the thirteenth to the seventeenth. Have your officials carry out an inspection, to make sure all the citizens are taking part. You yourself can make a tour of the sights. It is important for you to be seen enjoying the festival with the people. As for me, I shall march a body of troops out of the city and station them at Flying Tiger Valley, in order to foil any plot by the bandits. And let General Li take his armoured cavalry and patrol the city walls to allay the fears of the citizens."

Governor Liang gave his consent. Following the commanders' decision notices were posted up to inform the citizens. Now, the Northern Capital was the most important centre in Hebei, home to every kind of trade and a place to which people flocked in droves. As soon as they heard about the lanterns, people rushed to take part. Throughout every street, alley, and pathway of the city the relevant district officials carried out a daily inspection and everyone busied themselves putting up illuminations. The rich households vied with each other in obtaining the best lanterns, which they went anything between thirty and a hundred miles to find. There were merchants also who came as they did every year to sell lanterns in the city. In front of every house stands were built for them and everyone wanted to have the best display of lights and the most original fireworks. Inside their courtyards they built imitation mountains of papier-mâché on which they hung colourful balloon lanterns, whilst inscriptions by famous calligraphers were displayed all around, together with all manner of antiques and curios. Every household in every street of the city, great or small, had to have its lanterns. A turtle mountain was built outside the garrison barracks by the bridge. It had two red and yellow paper dragons on top; every scale on their bodies was a lantern and water spouted from their mouths. There were countless lanterns in the region of the main city bridge and along the river. Another turtle mountain was constructed in front of the Temple of the Brass Buddha, on top of it a green dragon accompanied by thousands of coloured lanterns.

In front of Jade Cloud Mansion there was also a turtle mountain. Coiled around its top was a white dragon with myriad lights on every side. This restaurant was famous throughout Hebei and reckoned to be the finest in the province. It was a particularly impressive building, with three roofs, carved eaves and decorated pillars and it contained a hundred rooms all told, which constantly echoed to the sound of music, of flutes and songs delightful to the ear.

Every palace, monastery, temple, garden, or place of worship was decked with lights to welcome the new year. Needless to say, the houses of entertainment were likewise bedecked.

When the scouts from Mount Liang heard about all this and reported it, it was indeed music to the Professor's ears. He told it all to Song Jiang. Song Jiang would have liked to lead the army against the Northern Capital himself, but the Doctor said: "Your abscess is not completely healed and you are not ready for any violent movement. If inflammation sets in you will most likely not recover properly."

"But I am here to take your place," the Professor said.

Accordingly he had Sterling draw up a roster of eight companies. The first was commanded by Twin Rods, with Victorious and the Supremo, to spearhead the attack, supported by Tamer in the rear. These were all cavalry. When Twin Rods last fought, remember, it was a fake contest with Tamer, a tactical deception designed to draw Scimitar on.

The second column was commanded by Leopard's Head with the Flautist and Redeye leading and Colonel Hua following in support. These too were all cavalry. The third column was led by Scimitar with the Ugly Son-in-Law and Hound leading and Colonel Sun in support, also cavalry. The fourth column was led by Thunderclap, with Golden Wings and the Dandy leading and the Blue-Faced Beast in support — more cavalry. The fifth column consisted of infantry, led by Mu the Unstoppable with Uglymug and Whitey. The sixth column was also of foot soldiers, led by Iron Ox, with the Executioner and Knife. The seventh column was another infantry division led by Sergeant Lei with the Young Master and Mu the Irrepressible. The eighth column was infantry commanded by Demon King with the Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost.

These eight columns of horse and foot were to follow their orders and keep to a precise timetable. The second watch of the evening of the festival was the time set for them all to be there and to carry out an orchestrated attack on the Northern Capital.

Accordingly the eight columns set off down the mountain in due order, while the remainder stayed behind with Song Jiang to guard the mountain fortress.

As for the Flea, that consummate cat burglar, he did not try to march straight into the city, he climbed the walls by night. He could not find a single room at any of the city's inns, so he wandered the streets by day and in the evening went to the Temple of the Eastern Peak where he slept under the plinth of the Buddha's statue. On the thirteenth, he went to watch the residents and visitors building their stands and hanging up their lanterns. As he was looking on, Snake and Scorpion, with a selection of game strung on carrying-poles, also joined the spectators. A little after he caught sight of Skyscraper and the Door-God emerging from a house of entertainment. He went the same day to have a look round Jade Cloud Mansion, and saw Comet with unkempt hair and wearing a ragged old sheepskin, all very dirty; he was begging with a staff in his right hand and a bowl in his left. The Flea stole up behind him and said: "Look at you, mate, with that hale and hearty complexion you don't look one bit like a beggar. There's loads of police about in the city, if they find you out it could ruin the whole business. You'd better go somewhere quiet and keep out of the way."

As he spoke, another beggar appeared from beside the wall. It was Red Star. The Flea said: "You're just the same, mate. A face clean as the driven snow and a healthy look as doesn't belong to someone what's supposed to know nothing but hunger and privation. Anyone can see through that."

But before he had finished speaking, two men grabbed him roughly from behind and shouted: "What the hell are you playing at?"

He turned and saw that it was Morbid and the Red-Haired Devil. "You nearly scared the life out of me!" he said.

"Follow me, all of you," said Morbid.

He took them to a quiet spot and then abused them roundly: "Have you all taken leave of your senses? How could you carry on like that out there? Just as well it was us who saw you; if some sharp-eyed, quick-witted policeman had found you out our leader's whole plan would have been compromised! Now that we've seen what you get up to, we're taking care of everything. We don't need you out on the street any more."

Comet said: "The Forester and Rhinoceros are already in place selling lanterns on the street, Monk and Pilgrim are at their temple outside the walls. Cut the talk and let everyone get on with his own job."

Meanwhile they had come to the entrance of a temple. Out of this now strode a priest, who turned out to be Taoist Gongsun, with Thunderer at his heels, dressed as his disciple. All seven gave each other surreptitious nods and then went their separate ways.

As the day of the festival approached, Governor Liang gave Swordsman the order to lead his troops out of the city and encamp at Flying Tiger Valley to guard them from the bandits. On the eve, Vulcan was ordered to take his five hundred armoured cavalry and patrol the environs. The following day, day of the festival, dawned bright and clear. When the moon rose at dusk every street and market place, every nook and cranny was hung with coloured lanterns; from the broadest avenue to the smallest alley, illuminations everywhere.

The weather for the festival is clear;
After fresh showers, proclaim that spring is here.
Transformed by a fiery filigree of lights
The city's like a view of Paradise.
The glow of lanterns warms the evening air,
With song and dance, the people pass the hour.
Feathers of peacocks deck the double gates;
Three holy mountains ride on turtles' backs.
By crimson curtains stand young girls in red;
Pale cavaliers ride by on handsome steeds.
The sound of flutes the public's ear entrances,
On decorated tiles, the moonlight dances.
Where Jade Cloud Mansion rises to the sky
Come bevies of maidens their charms to try;
The place is filled with lamps like silver globes,
With princes and nobles in their finest clothes;
One moment 'tis with pleasure-seekers teeming,

Next from the roof a plume of smoke is streaming.

In the evening the gaoler Strongarm told his younger brother Blossom to look after the gaol. "I am going home to see about something," he said. "I won't be long." He had just entered the house, when two figures slipped inside. The first of them was dressed as an army officer, the one behind was muffled up. By the light of the lamp Strongarm recognized Mr. Chai. The other was Lungs. When he saw who it was, Strongarm invited them in and got something to eat and drink for them. But Mr. Chai said: "No need to offer us wine. I am here because I have something important to tell you: you have looked after our friends, for this we are deeply indebted to you. But tonight I want to take advantage of the excitement of the festival to visit the gaol and I hope you will be so good as to let me in. Please do not say no."

Now Strongarm was an official and he more or less guessed where this was tending. But if he did not go along with it, the city, he feared, would be destroyed, and where was the advantage of that? The lives of his family were also at stake. The result could be a veritable sea of blood. So he went and got some old uniforms which he gave them to put on to disguise them as policemen. He then changed his own headgear and took them off to the gaol.

Around the first watch, Short-Arse, Steelbright, Blackface, Auntie Gu, the Gardener and Sister Sun the Ogress, three couples disguised as country folk, mixed with a crowd of people and entered through the city gates. Taoist Gongsun and Thunderer, carrying a wicker basket, went to the Temple of the Town God and sat in the porch (the Temple of the Town God was next to the provincial office). The Forester and Rhinoceros were wandering about the city toting their lanterns. Skyscraper and the Door-God pushing their barrows arrived in front of Governor Liang's office where they concealed themselves among a crowd of merry-makers (the office was in the main street leading from East Gate). The Red-Haired Devil and Morbid, each carrying a staff of office but also with concealed weapons, were sitting on the town bridge, one on either side. The Prodigy and White Eel had entered the city from the water and hidden in a quiet place. Of this no more.

Before long the second watch was sounded from the drum tower. The Flea, clasping his basket with supplies of sulphur and saltpetre (materials for starting the fire) covered over with harmless trinkets, strolled into Jade Cloud Mansion. He went upstairs. There was enough blowing of flutes and thumping of drums and cymbals to pierce the clouds and shake the earth. The upstairs rooms were filled with young rowdies celebrating the festival. Under the pretext of selling trinkets the Flea went into every room and had a good look. He came across Snake and Scorpion, wandering about carrying forks with rabbits dangling from them.

The Flea said: "It's time. Why is nothing happening outside?"

Snake said: "When we got here a scout galloped past. Most likely our troops have arrived. You just get on with what you have to do."

Just as he finished speaking a shout went up outside the building: "The forces from Mount Liang are here! They're at the West Gate!"

Snake told the Flea: "Quick, get on with it! We're off to help them at the barracks!"

They reached the barracks in time to see the defeated remnants of the government cavalry gallop into the city, shouting: "Swordsman's camp has been overrun! The brigands from Mount Liang are at the city walls!"

Vulcan at this time was patrolling the city walls. When he heard the news he galloped to the barracks and ordered troops to secure the gates and save the city from capture.

Now Magistrate Wang was on patrol with the hundred or more troops of his bodyguard, ready to clamp down on any disturbances in the streets. When they heard the news they hurried back to the barracks.

Governor Liang had been having a drink or two, sitting in front of his office. When he first heard the reports he was not particularly worried. But less than an hour later the report brought by a flying despatch rider frightened him half out of his wits. "Saddle my horse!" he shouted in a panic.

At the same moment fierce flames were seen shooting skyward from Jade Cloud Mansion, a huge conflagration which eclipsed the moon.

The Governor leapt onto his horse. He was setting off to see what was happening when two big men appeared with barrows and blocked the road. They poured oil from their lanterns over the barrows and set fire to them. The barrows burst into flames. The Governor rode to the east gate but there he was confronted by two big men who shouted: "Skyhawk and the Tattooed Dragon are here!" Twirling their halberds they bounded forward, while the guards on the gate fled in terror. Door-God and Skyscraper, who had already wounded a dozen or so, now appeared and standing shoulder to shoulder with the other two held the gate.

Seeing how unpromising the situation looked, the Governor galloped off with his retinue towards the south gate. There they told him how a burly monk wielding a steel staff and a disciple of ferocious aspect with a pair of swords had charged into the city with bloodcurdling yells. The Governor turned his horse and raced back to military headquarters. Here he found Snake and Scorpion twirling their forks and striking out right and left. He hurriedly headed back to the government office but did not dare enter. When Magistrate Wang tried to come out the Red-Haired Devil and Morbid bludgeoned him with their staves, spilling his brains and bursting his eyeballs. He died on the spot. His guards and court officers fled for their lives.

As the Governor frantically turned his horse and made for the west gate, a series of earth-shattering explosions was heard from the Temple of the Town God. The Forester and Rhinoceros with bamboo poles in their hands were busy setting fire to the eaves of the buildings. Short-Arse and Steelbright charged forward. Blackface and Auntie Gu had taken out their hidden weapons and were also doing their bit. At the Temple of the Bronze Buddha, the Gardener and Sister Sun the Ogress had clambered on to the Turtle Mountain and were setting fire to it. By now every soul in the city was a terrified refugee, every house a scene of disaster and lamentation; on every side dozens of fires lit up the sky, whichever way you looked the same thing met your eyes.

Governor Liang galloping towards the west gate met Vulcan and his patrol and together they dashed to the south gate. They reined in their horses and climbed the drum tower to look out: a host of men, some on foot and some on horseback, were advancing outside the walls in battle array, with banners on which was written "General Twin Rods Huyan Zhuo". Seen by the light of the flames, the General made an intimidating and martial figure. On his left was Victorious and on his right the Supremo, while the Tamer brought up the rear, urging on the troops as they advanced toward the gate in arrowhead formation.

Their escape blocked, the Governor and Vulcan watched from the shelter of the north gate tower as untold numbers of the enemy attacked on that side too, clearly visible in the flames: this was the contingent of Leopard's Head, who led the charge on a fiery steed, lance at the ready, with the Flautist on his left, Redeye on his right, and Colonel Hua urging the troops on from behind.

Back to the east gate again, and here amid a forest of torches was Mu the Unstoppable, with Uglymug on his left and Whitey on his right, three stalwart leaders on foot heaving their halberds, charging into the city at the head of over a thousand troops. The Governor and his followers rushed back to the south gate and fought their way through. But Iron Ox was there by the drawbridge, clearly lit by the torches, with the Executioner on his left, Knife on his right. Iron Ox had stripped naked. Baring his teeth and gripping his two axes he came storming up from the moat with the other two at his side.

Vulcan led the retreat, hacking out a bloody path. Under his protection the Governor escaped from the city. But now from the left, with blood-curdling yells, amid a forest of torches, another mass of enemy troops poured forward. It was Scimitar, who urging on his mettlesome chestnut, his trusty blade dancing in his hand, was making a beeline for the Governor. Vulcan gripped his two swords and rushed to meet him. But by this time Vulcan had no appetite for the fight. He soon broke off, whipped his horse and fled. The Son-in-Law was coming up on Scimitar's left and the Hound on his right, with Colonel Sun behind urging on the troops in a furious charge.

At this critical juncture Colonel Hua arrived from the rear, fitted an arrow to his bow and shot Vulcan's lieutenant from his horse. Vulcan galloped off as fast as his horse would carry him, but had gone no more than half a bowshot when drums and gongs sounded on the right and Thunderclap galloped forward in a blaze of light, whirling his mace, with the Dandy and Golden Wings and the Blue-Faced Beast bringing up the rear. Vulcan fought a stubborn rearguard action. He lost half his troops, but he managed to preserve the Governor. They both got away.

Here our story divides. Let us first describe events in the city. Skyscraper and Door-God and went to kill all of the Governor's evil brood. The Red-Haired Devil and Morbid went to kill Magistrate Wang's family. The Kong Brothers, Red Star and Comet, climbed into the gaol over the back wall, while the Forester and Rhinoceros sealed off the front gate. Inside the gaol Mr. Chai and Lungs, when they saw the signal fires, said to Strongarm and Blossom, the two gaolers: "Do you see what's going on? What are you waiting for?"

When Blossom went to check the gate, Forester and Rhinoceros had already broken it down and were shouting "The company of Mount Liang are here! Bring out our friends the Unicorn and Madcap!"

Blossom hastily told his brother. At this moment the Kong brothers leapt down from the roof. The two gaolers had no option. Mr. Chai took out some instruments and broke open the fetters to release the Unicorn and Madcap. Mr. Chai said to Strongarm: "You two come with me and we'll rescue his family." They went off together. The Forester and Rhinoceros joined the two brothers and everyone went with Mr. Chai to the Unicorn's house to fetch out his family.

The Unicorn aided by Madcap, the two Kong brothers, Forester and Rhinoceros now began a search for the faithless wife and her lover, Manager Li.

Now when Manager Li heard that Mount Liang troops were invading the town and saw all the fires everywhere, he felt disaster impending. He discussed things with the woman and they made their valuables into a bundle, which he hoisted onto his back. They were just about to leave the house when there was a great hammering on the gate, which gave way, allowing the mob to pour in. Li and the woman rushed back inside. They hurriedly opened the back door, slipped over the back wall and headed for the waterside where they hoped to find somewhere to hide. But White Eel was on the bank. He gave a great shout: "Where does that woman think she's going?"

Manager Li, terrified, leapt into a boat and went to hide in the cabin. Just as he was disappearing inside, another man stretched out his arm, grabbed him by the hair and said: "Do you recognize me, Manager Li?"

Recognizing the Prodigy's voice, Manager Li hastily said: "Young friend, there's no ill-feelings between us, please don't put me ashore!"

On the bank White Eel had already grasped the woman by the waist and dragged her to the side of the boat. The Prodigy now took hold of Manager Li and they carried them both off to East Gate.

When the Unicorn failed to find Manager Li or his wife in the house he told his companions to bring out all his possessions, particularly anything of value, and load them onto carts and deliver them to Mount Liang to be shared out.

Mr. Chai went with Strongarm to his home. After they had collected his belongings and family to take to the mountain, Strongarm said: "Sir, please help the ordinary citizens, don't let harm come to them." So Mr. Chai went to find the Professor. As soon as he told him, the order was given to stop killing innocent people. But already half the citizens had suffered:

The city now is lost in smoke, its towers all ablaze. Broken glass reflects the lurid glare, blackened alabaster bakes in the embers. The puppets there that gave such delight, now you can't tell front from back; the papier-mâché mountains which lit up the night, none can tell now which is the light side, which the dark. The old man's white locks are savagely seared; the dandy casts off his coloured parasol and flees. The hobbyhorse rider faces knife thrusts in the dark; even the festive tanner will scarce escape unscathed. The pretty maid strolling in the crowd has all her finery spoiled; the proud beauty come to view the sights sees in an instant her world destroyed. Alas this city for a thousand years the capital of song and dance is now become a bloody battlefield.

By now it was completely light. The Professor and Mr. Chai ordered a gong to be sounded to halt the fighting. All the leaders and the Unicorn and Madcap met at the military headquarters, where the freed captives told how they had escaped harm in prison thanks to the care of the two brothers, Strongarm and Blossom. The Prodigy and White Eel handed over Manager Li and the woman. The Unicorn told the Prodigy to lock them up and guard them himself, until further orders. Of this no more.

Vulcan meanwhile had managed to rescue the Governor from the city. As they fled they ran into Swordsman, returning with the shattered remnants of his army. They joined forces and retreated southwards. Suddenly a cry arose in their front ranks. They were being attacked by Demon King, the Eight-Armed Ogre on his left and Winged Ghost on his right, with three bodies of infantry. From behind came Sergeant Lei with the Young Master and Mu the Irrepressible, each with a thousand foot, bent on cutting off their retreat. It was really a case of out of the frying pan into the fire, or as they say, see the doctor and have a relapse!

"I am very glad that you are getting better," said Wu Yong to Song Jiang. "While you have been sick I have sent many spies to Daming, and they have reported that Grand Secretary Liang is still very anxious and afraid that we will soon renew our attack. I have also had anonymous posters secretly put up in the city and the surrounding villages assuring the people that 'they need not be afraid when the Liangshan Marsh heroes appear again. Our hatred is directed against our enemy only, and the creditor will only collect the debt from the debtor. Our army is only for our enemies.' Liang has got our posters, which have upset him very much. At the Eastern Capital the Prime Minister feels much disgrace because of the disaster to the Imperial troops under General Guan Sheng. Many letters have been sent to the Grand Secretary ordering him not to execute the two prisoners Lu Junyi and Shi Xiu and that he must endeavor to placate us at Liangshan Marsh that we may come over on friendly terms to their side."

Song Jiang upon hearing this urged Wu Yong to depart at once to attack Daming Prefecture.

"Now the winter is over and spring is drawing near," said Wu Yong. "It will soon be the Lunar New Year and during the Lantern Festival that month will be a great display of lanterns in Daming. I am going to embrace the opportunity of the festival to get many of our men in disguise into the city, and then they can cooperate when our men attack the city from outside."

"A splendid plan!" said Song Jiang, "I wish you success."

"It is of first importance," said Wu Yong, "that many buildings should be set on fire inside the town as a signal to our men outside. Who is willing to go inside the town and set the place ablaze?"

A man stepped forward and said he was willing to go. This man was Shi Qian, the "Flea on the Drum." He said, "When I was young I lived in Daming. In the city is a tower called the Blue Cloud Tower, and there are over a hundred rooms there. At the Lantern Festival the city will be crowded, and on that night I will set fire to the Tower, and then our men outside can march in, and take the city."

This was agreed to, and it was arranged for Shi Qian to leave the following day. Xie Zhen and Xie Bao were ordered to be dressed up as hunters, carrying games to Daming, to be presented to the officials at the yamen. They had orders that at the Lantern Festival when they saw the Cuiyun Tower burst into flames they must station themselves near the entrance to the yamen to prevent any messenger from conveying the news to the officials inside.

Wu Yong also ordered Du Qian and Song Wan to be disguised as merchants with a cart of rice to go into the city, and to stay at an inn. When they saw the fire they were to go to the East Gate, kill the guard there, and take their place.

He also instructed Kong Ming and Kong Liang to go to the city as servants. They were to act as messengers.

Li Ying and Shi Jin were to go as travelers, and stay at an inn outside the East Gate. They were to assist in capturing the East Gate.

Lu Da and Wu Song were to be dressed as monks, and were to stay at a monastery outside the city. When the fire broke out they were to go to the Southern Gate, and prevent the soldiers from leaving the town by that way.

Zou Yuan and Zou Run were to stay at an inn inside the town as merchants selling lamps, and when the fire broke out they were to go to the prison.

Liu Tang and Yang Xiong were to go as minor officials, and stay at an inn close to the yamen. On the night of the fire they were to prevent messengers from conveying orders from the yamen.

Gongsun Sheng was to enter the town as a mendicant Taoist with Ling Zhen as his assistant, and to stay at some quiet spot. They were to carry fireworks with them, and when the fire broke out they were to burn the fireworks and make as much noise as possible.

Zhang Shun and Yan Qing were to enter the town by the water gate, and when they saw the signal they were to kill Li Gu and the adulterous wife of Lu Junyi.

Wang Ying and his wife, Hu San Niang, Sun Xin and his wife Gu Dasao, Zhang Qing and his wife Sun Er Niang, were to go into the town as country folks who went to view the sights. They were to set fire to Lu Junyi's house.

Squire Chai Jin and Yue He were to enter the town as military officers, and when the fire took place they were to go to the house of the head jailer Cai and arrange for the safety of the two prisoners.

All these arrangements having been made by Wu Yong the leaders mentioned above took their leave.

In Daming Prefecture, Grand Secretary Liang had called a conference of Generals Li Cheng, Wen Da, and Daming's Prefect Wang to discuss the celebration of the Lantern Festival. He said, "It is a custom that lanterns are in display to celebrate the occasion in the same as they do in the Eastern Capital. By this we let the people enjoy themselves with us. But this year there are exceptional circumstances. The bandits of Liangshan Marsh have attacked us twice, and I am afraid that they are only waiting for an opportunity to attack us again. I therefore think it would be better if we postpone this festival this year."

"I think," said General Wen Da, "that the brigands have all gone back to Liangshan Marsh, and although they have secretly posted up notices, yet I think they have no plan of attack, and that we need not worry about them. If we prohibit the lantern show on the 15th of the first month, the brigands, upon hearing of this, will laugh at us and conclude that we are afraid of them. I think we may issue an order that this year the people are encouraged to display lanterns and discharge fireworks. That we allow them five whole nights for this, from the 13th to the 17th, without interruption and that at the crossroads two additional large mountains of lanterns may be built up. The Prefect must see to it that this order is observed. You yourself will also celebrate the occasion in order to share the happiness with the people. As a precautionary measure against the bandits I will lead a squadron of cavalry out of the city to the Feihu Gully in order to guard the town on that side. General Li Cheng may have his men marching about the town to quell any disturbance."

The Grand Secretary was very much pleased at this proposal, and after further discussion General Wen Da's plans were adopted and put into execution.

On the north of the Yellow River, Daming was the most important prefecture. Daming itself was also a great metropolis and was the center for all government and trade activities. Therefore it was expected that many people from the surrounding country would come to enjoy the festivities of the Lantern Festival. The neighborhood chief in every part of the town supervised the preparations that were being made. The people entered into the spirit of the festival and there was keen rivalry as to who should have the best display. Mat sheds were erected at all the big houses with festoons of curiously shaped lanterns. Door screens were covered with lanterns of all varieties of colors. There were hung large numbers of scrolls of calligraphy and drawings by famous hands. At the Prefect's yamen there was a mountain of lanterns, with two red and yellow dragons with lanterns representing the scales, and arrangements for ejecting water into the river. Lanterns were innumerable, and covered the entire paper mountain. In front of the Tong Fu Monastery there was an erection covered with a thousand lanterns. In front of the Cuiyun Tower was another erection of lanterns with a white dragon similar to the others.

The tower was the most famous inn to the north of the Yellow River. It had threefold eaves, and all the beams were engraved with fancy designs in bright colors. There were over a hundred rooms for guests, and every day there was the sound of music and laughter in the building.

The spies from Liangshan Marsh duly reported this to the stronghold. Wu Yong was much pleased at the prospects, and discussed matters minutely with Song Jiang. The latter was very keen on going to Daming Prefecture to direct the attack but Dr. An would not allow this, so Wu Yong offered to go in his stead. Arrangements were made for most of the men to leave Liangshan Marsh and travel to the town by eight different routes, and they were all to reach the town on the time of the Lantern Festival.

Shi Qian duly arrived at Daming on his mission, but as the inns would not admit single individuals he contented himself with walking about during the daytime, and slept at a temple for the night. During the next few days he came across seven of the leaders from Liangshan Marsh who were in the town on secret service.

When the Lantern Festival was near at hand, Grand Secretary Liang issued an order for General Wen Da to take soldiers to the Feihu Gully and establish an outpost there. On the day before the Festival, General Li Cheng assembled five hundred soldiers, and marched them about the town. The festival day broke with splendid weather, and the Grand Secretary was quite happy and contented. In the evening there was the full moon in a clear sky, and the bright moonlight made the city look as though it was made of silver and gold. On the streets were crowds of men and women of all ages strolling about; fireworks were burnt on all sides; and everybody was enjoying the sights which were the best they had ever seen.

In the city jail the head jailer Cai Fu told his brother Cai Qing to take charge as he wanted to go home. When he had been at his home a few minutes two men came—one dressed as a military officer and the other as his orderly. Upon looking closely he recognized the first as Squire Chai Jin, and the orderly was Yue He whom Cai Fu did not know. Cai Fu requested them to come into a room where refreshments were already spread out, and there he offered them wine and cakes.

"We need not partake of wine," said Squire Chai Jin. "I have come here today to discuss an important matter with you. You have treated very well both Lu Junyi and Shi Xiu, and I wish to thank you for this. As this is the Lantern Festival I should particularly like to go inside the jail and see my friends there. I hope that you will agree with us."

Cai Fu was a government official, and he at once understood that there would be some trouble, and the lives of all his family would be endangered if he refused to do as they wished. So he got some old clothes, and gave them to the two men so that they could disguise themselves as members of the prison staff. He then conducted them to the prison.

When the drum in the tower sounded the second watch, Shi Qian took a basket filled with brimstone and saltpeter covered with paper flowers, and entered the Blue Cloud Tower. He saw that in the rooms were parties of people singing and chatting, while flutes and stringed instruments filled the night with a melody of music. He went upstairs stopping at various rooms as a hawker trying to sell paper flowers and butterflies. He soon met Xie Zhen and Xie Bao who were dressed as hunters, and carried hares stuck on the end of forks over their shoulders. He spoke to them, "The time is now due. Have you seen anything outside?"

"Just now while we were looking outside we saw some scouts going to the yamen. We expect they are reporting the arrival of our troops. You had better get your work done at once."

Just then they heard great noise in front of the Tower, and they heard people shouting, "The brigands from Liangshan Marsh are outside the West Gate."

"Hurry up!" said Xie Zhen to Shi Qian. "Let us go to the yamen now and do our bit there." Upon reaching the yamen they found the defeated troops of General Wen Da had entered the city in disorder. They said, "The brigands attacked our camp, and drove us out. They followed us to the gate of the city."

General Li Cheng had heard the news, and had already dispatched his soldiers to guard the gates. Prefect Wang had taken one hundred soldiers to quell any disorder on the streets, and to arrest anybody attempting to make trouble. When he heard the news he returned to the yamen.

In the yamen Grand Secretary Liang had been drinking, and was slightly intoxicated. When he heard the news he treated it lightly. When the defeated cavalry began to arrive he became dumbfounded, but at last ordered his horse to be got ready. Just then the Blue Cloud Tower burst into flames, and lit up the whole town in a blaze of light. He quickly mounted his horse and started off. When he reached the street, however, two big men tried to stop him, but he avoided them and galloped towards the East Gate which, however, was guarded by Li Ying and Shi Jin.

Upon reaching the East Gate, Liang was attacked by four big men Li Ying, Shi Jin, Du Qian, and Sun Wan, and realizing that his soldiers there had been overcome he turned his horse and galloped off towards the South Gate. On the way however he heard people shouting that a big fat monk armed with an iron monk's staff had got in through the South Gate and was killing people on the way. The Grand Secretary therefore again turned his horse towards the yamen, but when near that place he saw two big men were running amuck on the street so that he could not pass. Just then he saw the Prefect Wang attacked by two brigand leaders Yang Xiong and Liu Tang who struck Wang on the head with a pole with such force that his brains splattered and killed him on the spot.
The Grand Secretary turned his horse again, and raced off towards the West Gate. On the way however he heard a loud explosion in the Temple of the City God. There the two brigand leaders Zou Yuan and Zou Run had long bamboo poles with torches on the ends, and were quickly setting fire to the houses about there. There was general confusion in the town, and the people were shrieking and crying with fear. There were fires in all parts of the town.
Near the West Gate the Grand Secretary happened to meet General Li Cheng, who rushed with him to the South Gate. Upon reaching there they ascended the city wall and went to the gate tower. From there they saw that there were many brigands on the streets with banners bearing the characters "General Guan Sheng, the 'Great Halberd.'" In the blaze of light they could see Guan Sheng mounted on a horse in a defiant attitude. He was supported by other leaders on horseback and they were fighting and killing as they came towards the gate. Grand Secretary Liang and General Li Cheng seeing the weakness of their position descended from the Gate Tower, mounted their horses, and went towards the North Gate. Upon getting near that place they saw so many brigands in charge of Lin Chong that they again turned, and went towards the East Gate. But that was no better as there were about a thousand brigands entering the city in charge of Mu Hong. So they turned to the South Gate. But on the way they met Li Kui and a number of other leaders, and when Li Kui saw them he ran forward wielding his two axes. General Li Cheng went in front with the Grand Secretary behind, and together they cut their way through the brigands. They, however, were attacked from the left by a large number of brigands led by Huyan Zhuo. General Li Cheng fought with Huyan Zhuo, but after about two bouts Li Cheng retreated as he realized that fighting was useless because other leaders were arriving. Among them was Hua Rong who shot an arrow which wounded the adjutant of General Li Cheng. General Li Cheng seeing his adjutant fall galloped off, but soon ran into another party of brigands under Qin Ming.
Li Cheng and the Grand Secretary, however, succeeded in getting through the South Gate, having killed so many men that they and their horses were covered with blood. Thus they rode off.
We will now return and see what was happening inside the city. In the jail Squire Chai Jin and Yue He, seeing the fires breaking out, spoke to the head jailer Cai Fu, "Do you see those fires? What time are you waiting for?" The main entrance of the jail just then was smashed in, and a crowd of brigands entered shouting. Chai Jin drew out his weapon, and breaking the cangues released Lu Junyi and Shi Xiu without waiting for the head jailer. Then he told Cai Fu, "You had better take me to your home, where I will protect your family." This was done.
Li Gu was at Lu Junyi's home, and seeing the fires and hearing the uproar on the streets he discussed escape with the late wife of Lu Junyi. They quickly made up bundles containing jewelry and valuables, with the idea of escaping, but they could not leave by the front gate as there was much noise and uproar there. So they went to the back door, and getting out, turned round corners, and at last reached the bank of the river. But Zhang Shun was there, and upon seeing them he shouted out, "Where is that woman going?" Li Gu did not reply, but jumped on a boat. A man on the boat, however, caught hold of him, and called out, "Li Gu! Do you recognize me?" Li Gu recognized Yan Qing by his voice, and replied, "Younger brother, we are not enemies. Let me go!"
But Yan Qing did not reply. He took Li Gu, and Zhang Shun took the woman, to the East Gate as prisoners. This had just happened when Lu Junyi arrived at his home. As he could not find Li Gu and his wife at once, he gave orders that all his movable wealth was to be packed and placed on carts to be conveyed to Liangshan Marsh. Head jailer Cai Fu also packed up his things and got his family ready to start for Liangshan Marsh. He then addressed Squire Chai Jin, "I request you to use your influence to spare the lives of the people in the city." Squire Chai Jin agreed to this, and went to see Wu Yong about it. Wu Yong concurred and issued orders to that effect but a great many people had already been killed or wounded. It was now daybreak, and Wu Yong gave the signal for his men to assemble. Grand Secretary Liang and General Li Cheng happened to meet with General Wen Da as they fled from the town. They had not gone far, however, before their progress was stopped by a party of brigands blocking their way.

Pardoned man again arrested.
Vile disease returns again.

Song Jiang Rewards His 3 infantry divisions of his Army; Guan Scimitar Sheng Makes 2 Generals Surrender & Defeats the Water & Fire Generals

Fighting desperately, Governor Liang's forces broke through the strong encirclement and fled west. Fan Rui, plus Xiang Chong and Li Gun, tried to catch them in vain. Finally, with Lei Heng, Shi En and Mu Chun, they returned to the Northern Capital to await further orders.
Military Advisor Wu Yong, in the city, directed that proclamations be posted reassuring the citizenry and that the fires be extinguished. All the members of the families of Governor Liang, Li Cheng, Wen Da and Prefect Wang were either killed or ran away. No one bothered to inquire. The prefectural treasury was broken open, and its gold, silver, precious objects, silks and satins were loaded on carts. The conquerors also opened the granary. They distributed relief grain to the entire populace and loaded the remainder on carts also, for removal to the Mount Liangshan fortress.
Wu Yong ordered his commanders and men to prepare to march. Li Gu and the wife of Lu the Magnate were placed on prisoner carts and the cages nailed fast. The outlaw forces were divided into three contingents, then all set out for Liangshan Marsh. Dai Zong went on ahead to inform Song Jiang.
Song Jiang summoned the generals in the stronghold and they descended the mountain to greet the returning chieftains and escort them to Loyalty Hall. On meeting Lu the Magnate, Song Jiang kowtowed. Lu Junyi returned the courtesy.
"It was our desire to invite you here, Magnate, to join us in striving for righteousness," said Song. "We never thought we would encounter such difficulties and that you would nearly lose your life. Our hearts were torn with anxiety! But Heaven protected you, and we meet again. We are infinitely relieved."
Lu bowed. "Thanks to brother's prestigious power and the virtue of his chieftains, with united hearts and strength you have saved my humble self. I could never adequately express my gratitude, though I scattered my innards on the ground." He presented Cai Qing and Cai Fu to Song Jiang and said: "If it weren't for these two I would not be here."
Song wanted Lu to take over as leader. The Magnate was astonished. "How could a man like me command the mountain fortress?" he said. "Let me be your groom, brother, an ordinary soldier, to return your kindness in saving my life. That would be my greatest pleasure." Song Jiang continued to press him, but Lu wouldn't hear of it.
Li Kui protested: "If you hand over the leadership to someone else, brother, I'm going to start killing!"
And Wu Song added his complaint. "You're always trying to give your command away. It chills us brothers to the heart!"
"What do you varlets understand," Song Jiang shouted. "Stop your chatter!"
"You mustn't insist, brother," Lu said hurriedly. "You're making me very uneasy."
Li Kui had a suggestion. "Everything is quiet, now," he said. "You be emperor, brother. Let Lu the Magnate be your prime minister. Make us all big officials. We'll fight our way into the Eastern Capital and seize the friggin throne! That would be a lot better than friggin around here!"
Song Jiang was furious. He swore at Li Kui.
"Let Lu the Magnate rest in the east wing as our guest," Wu Yong offered soothingly. "Later on, when he has performed some meritorious deeds, we can talk again about relinquishing the leadership."
Only then did Song Jiang cool down. He told Yan Qing to share quarters with Lu, and provided accommodations for Cai Fu and Cai Qing and their households. Guan Sheng's family had already been brought to the fortress by Xue Yong.
Song Jiang ordered that a big feast be laid. He generously rewarded his cavalry, infantry and naval forces. He directed his commanders, high and low, to provide wine for their various units. Inside Loyalty Hall the chieftains, politely deferring to one another, drank and made merry.
Lu the Magnate rose to his feet. "The adulterous pair have been caught and are awaiting disposition."
Song Jiang smiled. "I'd forgotten. Bring them here!"
Men opened the cages of the prison carts and dragged the captives into the Hall. Li Gu was bound to the main pillar on the left, Lu's wife to the main pillar on the right.
"There's no need to interrogate these rascals," said Song. "Lu the Magnate, do with them what you will."
A dagger in his hand, Lu walked over to the culprits and cursed them furiously. He carved out their hearts, cut off their limbs and cast their bodies to the ground. Then he returned to the banquet and thanked the assemblage. The chieftains congratulated him and complimented him profusedly.

Meanwhile, Governor Liang, hearing that the outlaw forces had withdrawn, returned to the city with Li Cheng and Wen Da and their defeated army. The three found that nine-tenths of their families had been killed, and they loudly lamented. Armies arrived from neighboring towns to chase the men of Mount Liangshan, but by then they were far away. Governor Liang told the armies to return.
His wife had concealed herself in a flower garden in the rear and had escaped with her life. She advised Liang to petition the emperor to dispatch an army and wipe out the bandits and obtain vengeance, and at the same time to write a letter to her father the premier letting him know. Liang did so, reporting that over five thousand civilians had been killed and innumerable people wounded, with losses to the military exceeding thirty thousand.
The governor's emissary reached the premier's chancellery in a few days. He dismounted and was announced. The premier ordered that he be allowed to enter. The emissary went directly to the ceremonial hall, kowtowed, and presented the secret missive addressed to the throne. He related how the brigands had broken into the Northern Capital, and said they were a large and powerful foe.
Originally, Premier Cai Jing favored an amnesty. The credit Governor Liang would receive for effectuating it would also reflect favorably on himself. But the mission had failed miserably—a fact which could not be concealed. Now Cai wanted an all-out war.
"You may withdraw," he snapped.
At the fifth watch the following morning the Imperial Bell sounded, and civil and military officials gathered in the Waiting Court. Premier Cai stood at their head. Approaching the Jade Dais, he offered Governor Liang's petition to the Virtuous Sovereign. The emperor read it and was shocked.
Zhao Ding, a counsellor, stepped forward and said: "We've sent soldiers after those bandits a number of times, but always suffered heavy losses. That's because the terrain is in their favor. In my humble opinion, it would be better to grant them amnesty, recall them to the throne, give their leaders high rank and put them to the defense of our borders. That would solve it."
Cai Jing was very angry. "You're an imperial counsellor," he shouted, "yet you want to destroy our imperial discipline! Lowly madman, you deserve to die!"
"I order you to leave this court at once," said the emperor. He divested Zhao Ding of his office and returned him to the status of ordinary citizen.
No one dared to offer any other proposals.
"Those bandits are outrageous," the emperor said to Cai Jing. "Who can we send to capture them?"
"They're only a gang of robbers in the wilds. We've no need for a large army. I'd like to recommend two officers—Shan Tinggui and Wei Dingguo, both commandants of Lingzhou Prefecture. If Your Majesty will issue an order and dispatch an emissary to fetch them and their men at all speed, they will be able to sweep away the filth."
Very pleased, the emperor issued commissions and directed the Council of Military Affairs to have them executed. Rising, the monarch left the chamber, followed by the multitude of officials. Many of them smiled sceptically to themselves.
The next day Cai Jing chose a chancellery official to deliver the imperial commissions to Lingzhou.

In the mountain stronghold, Song Jiang distributed among his infantry, cavalry and naval forces the valuables obtained from the treasury of the Northern Capital. Cows and horses were slaughtered, and feasts were held several days in succession to welcome Lu the Magnate. Although they had no fine delicacies, there were mountains of meat and seas of wine. The chieftains imbibed until they were half drunk.
"For the sake of Lu the Magnate," said Wu Yong, "we damaged the Northern Capital, slew many of its people, robbed the treasury, and chased Governor Liang and his generals out of the city. Surely, he'll report to the emperor. He won't let the matter drop, particularly since his father-in-law is the premier. They're bound to dispatch an army against us."
"There's reason for your concern, Military Advisor," said Song Jiang. "Let's send a man to the Northern Capital tonight to ferret out the news. Then we'll know how to prepare."
Wu Yong laughed. "I've already done that. He should be back soon."
While they were still discussing the problem at the banquet, the spy returned. "Governor Liang has petitioned the throne for a punitive army," he reported. "Counsellor Zhao Ding proposed an amnesty, but Cai Jing cursed him and had him kicked out of office. The emperor has commissioned Shan Tinggui and Wei Dingguo, commandants of Lingzhou Prefecture, to proceed against us with their soldiers."
"How shall we confront the foe?" asked Song Jiang.
"Let them come," said Wu Yong. "We'll take them all in one swoop."
Guan Sheng rose and addressed the two. "I'm deeply grateful for the hospitality you brothers have extended to me ever since I arrived at this mountain," he said. "But I haven't done anything in return. I met Shan and Wei many times when I was still in Pudong, and I know all about them. Shan is very clever at using water to inundate enemy troops, and so everyone calls him the Water General. Wei is skilled with fire in his attacks. He employs flame-throwers on the battlefield, and so he's known as the Fire General.
"I have no talent, but if you'll let me have five thousand men, I'll stop those two on the road before they can get started. If they're willing to surrender, I'll bring them here. If they're not, I'll capture them and deliver them as my gift. There's no need for you brothers to use a large heavily armed force and tax your energies and spirits. I wonder whether you would consider my idea?"
Song Jiang was delighted. He instructed Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen to go along, and consented to give Guan Sheng the five thousand men he requested. The following morning Song Jiang and his chieftains feasted and saw the three commanders off at the Shore of Golden Sands, where they departed with their troops.
The chieftains returned to Loyalty Hall and Wu Yong said to Song Jiang: "Guan Sheng has gone, but we don't guarantee his devotion. We'd better have some good commanders follow and keep an eye on him. They can act as support forces."
"He seems a highly chivalrous person to me. He's shown no sign of wavering. You shouldn't doubt him."
"I'm afraid his heart might not be the same as yours, brother. I say let Lin Chong and Yang Zhi, with Sun Li and Huang Xin as their lieutenants, go down with another five thousand men."
"I want to go, too," said Li Kui.
"There's no need for you this time," said Song Jiang. "We already have enough good commanders."
"I'll get sick if this idleness keeps on! If you don't let me go along, I'll go on my own!"
"You listen to orders or I'll have your head!"
Sulkily, Li Kui left the Hall.
Lin Chong and Yang Zhi led troops down the mountain to support Guan Sheng. The next day an officer came and reported: "Black Whirlwind Li Kui left last night at the second watch with his two axes. No one knows where he's bound."
Song Jiang groaned. "All because I said a few harsh words! He's probably gone to join another band!"
"You're wrong, brother," said Wu Yong. "Li Kui may be rough and crude, but his sense of chivalry is very strong. He'd never join anyone else. He'll be back in a day or two. Don't worry."
But Song Jiang was very upset. He first sent Dai Zong after Li Kui, and later Shi Qian, Li Yun, Yue Ho and Wang Dingliu with four more separate search parties.
When Li Kui went down the mountain with his two axes during the night, he followed a small path in the direction of Lingzhou. "So many men and horses to fight two friggin generals!" he muttered. "I'll charge into the town and kill them with one chop of the ax each! That'll shake up brother Song Jiang, and raise my prestige again with the others!"
After walking half a day, he grew hungry. He groped in his waist purse and found that he had left the mountain in such a hurry he'd forgotten to take any money.
"It's a long time since I've robbed anyone," he thought, "but now I'll have to find some oaf to vent my anger on."
By the side of the road he saw a rustic tavern. He went in, sat down, consumed three measures of wine and two catties of meat, then rose and started to leave. The waiter stopped him and asked for money.
"I'll give it to you soon," said Li Kui. "Wait till I do a little business up ahead." He turned to go.
A huge ferocious-looking fellow came in. "You've got your nerve, you swarthy villain," he shouted. "Who runs a tavern so that you can eat for free!"
Li Kui glared. "This lord eats for free wherever he goes."
"When I tell you who I am, you'll be pissing and farting in terror. This lord is Han Bolong of Liangshan Marsh. The money to open this tavern was given to me by brother Song Jiang personally."
Li Kui grinned inwardly. "Our stronghold never even heard of this friggin lout," he thought.
As a matter of fact Han, who originally was a robber, had wanted to join the band on Mount Liangshan. He had sought out Zhu Gui the Dry-Land Crocodile and requested that he lead him to Song Jiang. But because Song first developed a growth on his back and then became very involved in warfare, he had been too busy to see anyone. Zhu Gui had told Han to carry on with his tavern business.
Now, Li Kui took one of the axes from his belt and offered it to Han Bolong. "Keep this as a pledge," he said.
Han didn't know it was a trick. As he reached for the ax, Li Kui whipped out its mate and cracked open Han's forehead with a splitting crunch. What a pity that Han Bolong, who'd been a bold ruffian half his life, should die at the hands of Li Kui!
The two or three waiters fled into the village, sorry that they had been born with only two legs. Li Kui took whatever money he could find, set fire to the thatched building, and continued on towards Lingzhou.
He had travelled less than a day when a big fellow approached from the side of the highway and examined him from head to toe.
"What are you looking at this lord for, varlet?" Li Kui demanded.
"Whose lord are you?" the man retorted.
Li Kui rushed him. With one blow of his fist the fellow knocked Li Kui flat on his backside.
"He throws a nice punch," thought Black Whirlwind, sitting on the ground. He raised his face and asked: "What's your name?"
"This lord hasn't any name. But if you want to fight, come on! Do you dare get up?"

Enraged, Li Kui prepared to jump to his feet. But a kick in the ribs from the big man sent him sprawling. "I can't lick this fellow," cried Li Kui. He hauled himself erect and started to leave.
The man shouted for him to halt, and asked: "What's your name, swarthy fellow?"
"Since I've lost, I'd rather not say. But you're a gallant fellow, so I won't deceive you. I'm Li Kui the Black Whirlwind of Liangshan Marsh."
"Are you, really? Don't lie, now."
"If you don't believe me, look at these two axes."
"What are you doing out alone, if you're a Mount Liangshan man?"
"Big Brother squelched me, so I'm going to Lingzhou to kill two fellows named Shan and Wei."
"I hear that a force from the stronghold is already heading that way. Can you tell me who's in it?"
"Guan Sheng the Big Halberd is in command. He's followed by reinforcements under Panther Head Lin Chong and Yang Zhi the Blue-Faced Brute."
Convinced, the man dropped to his knees and kowtowed.
"Truly," said Li Kui, "what is your name?"
"I was born in the district of Zhongshan. My family have been wrestlers for three generations. Our ways of striking with hands and feet have been passed down from father to son. We don't teach outsiders. But I've never had any good connections, and no one I've tried to throw in with would have me. I'm known all through Shandong and Hebei as Jiao Ting the Merciless.
"Recently, I heard that in Kouzhou Prefecture there's a place called Withered Trees Mountain, and on it is a robber who loves to kill. Though his name is Bao Xu, everyone calls him the God of Death. He goes forth from his mountain to rob and pillage. I'm on my way to join his band."
"A man with your skill ought to be joining Song Jiang, our Big Brother."
"I'd been hoping to go to your fortress for a long time, but I never had anybody to introduce me. Now that I've met you, brother, I'll be glad to join Big Brother Song Jiang."
"I've got to show him a thing or two, first. I've come all the way down the mountain and I haven't killed a single person. I can't return empty-handed. We'll go to Lingzhou, kill the two commandants Shan and Wei, then head back to our fortress together."
"Lingzhou is a fortified town. It's full of soldiers. With all our skill, just the two of us attacking wouldn't be any use. We'd only be throwing our lives away. We'd be better off going to Withered Trees Mountain and persuading Bao Xu to join the band with us on Mount Liangshan. That would be best."
While they were talking, Shi Qian approached behind them. He called to Li Kui: "Big Brother has been very worried about you. Please come back to the mountain. Four parties are out searching for you."
Li Kui introduced Jiao Ting.
"Big Brother is waiting for you," Shi Qian persisted.
"Enough," cried Li Kui. "Jiao Ting and I have it all settled. We're going to Withered Trees Mountain, first, and get Bao Xu to join us."
"You can't. Big Brother is waiting. We have to return to the stronghold now."
"If you won't come with me, tell Big Brother what I'm doing. I'll be back soon."
Shi Qian was afraid of Li Kui. He returned to the mountain fortress alone. Jiao Ting and Li Kui proceeded to Kouzhou Prefecture and headed towards Withered Trees Mountain.
As to Guan Sheng, with Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen and five thousand brigands, he neared Lingzhou. The prefect had already received the imperial mandate to transfer troops to the Eastern Capital, plus a directive from the premier. He summoned commandants Shan and Wei to a conference and transmitted the directive to them. The two officers mustered their soldiers, issued arms, had the horses saddled and bridled, drew grain and fodder, and fixed a date for departure.
Suddenly, a messenger arrived and announced: "Guan Sheng the Big Halberd of Pudong has arrived with troops and is invading our prefecture."
Shan and Wei were furious. At the head of their soldiers, they rode forth to confront the foe. As the two armies drew near they could see each others' drams and flags. From beneath an arch of pennants, Guan Sheng rode forward. On the far side, as drums thundered, the Water General, astride a black steed, appeared, gripping a black lance. His helmet, his armor, his robe, his boots—all were black. He was preceded by a man carrying a northern-style black banner which bore the inscription: Water General Shan Tinggui.
On the near side, bridle bells jingled as the Fire General Wei Tingguo rode out. His accoutrements were mainly red, and he was preceded by a soldier carrying an embroidered red banner in the southern style which bore the inscription: Fire General Wei Tingguo.
The two commandants entered the combat area together. Astride his horse, Guan Sheng greeted them courteously: "It's been a long time since we met, commandants."
Shan and Wei laughed. They pointed at Guan Sheng and reviled him: "Talentless, mad rebel! You're unworthy of the emperor's kindness. You've besmirched your ancestor's name! Now you recklessly lead troops here. It's completely inexcusable!"
"Commandants, you're mistaken," Guan Sheng replied. "Our sovereign has been deceived. Treacherous ministers have taken power. They employ only their intimates, they reprove only their enemies. But brother Song Liang is a man of virtue and benevolence who performs righteous deeds on Heaven's behalf. He has sent me here to invite you to join us. If you don't consider me too lowly, permit me to escort you to our mountain stronghold."
His words infuriated the commandants. Together, they charged, one like a dark cloud from the north, the other like a ball of flame from the south. As Guan Sheng waited to meet them, Xuan Zan flew out from his left and Hao Siwen burst forth from his right, and clashed with the two attackers, head on. Sword against sword flashed icily in ten thousand streaks, lance against lance filled the air with the chill of death.
Guan Sheng, watching from a distance, was full of admiration for the commandants. Suddenly, they broke off the engagement, turned their horses, and rode back into their own position. Hao Siwen and Xuan Zan closely pursued. Wei turned to the left, Shan to the right, followed respectively by Xuan and Hao.
As Xuan Zan gave chase, four or five hundred foot soldiers, with pennants and armor of red, stretched out in a single line and surrounded him. Hooked poles extended, nooses flew, and both horse and rider were snared.
Hao, pursuing Shan to the right, was also surrounded by five hundred infantry, only these had black pennants and armor. They surged up from behind and captured him.
While the two were being led off towards Lingzhou, Shan and Wei, with five hundred troops each, again came racing forth. Guan Sheng was unable to cope. He fell back with his men. Wei and Shan clapped their horses and pursued. Then, ahead of him, Guan Sheng suddenly saw two chieftains galloping in his direction. They were Lin Chong and Yang Zhi, and they swept around his flanks and plunged in among the Lingzhou soldiers, slaughtering and scattering them. Guan Sheng halted his remnant contingent, and united it with the Lin and Yang forces. He met the two, and was joined subsequently by Sun Li and Huang Xin. All made camp together.

The Water and Fire Generals, with Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen as captives, returned triumphantly to the town. Prefect Zhang received them, and had wine served in congratulation. He ordered that cage carts be built for the two prisoners, and directed an aide to set out that very night and deliver them to the Eastern Capital, with a guard of three hundred foot soldiers, and report the arrest to the imperial court.
The party followed a winding road towards the Eastern Capital. They came to a mountain covered with withered trees and dried reeds. To the crash of gongs, a gang of robbers suddenly appeared. The man in the lead brandished a pair of battle-axes, and he had a voice like thunder. It was Li Kui the Black Whirlwind of Liangshan Marsh. And behind him was Jiao Ting the Merciless. They and their outlaws blocked the road and, without a word, seized the prisoner carts.
As the aide turned to flee, Bao Xu the God of Death, with an iron face and bulging eyes, closed in from behind. He swung his sword and hacked the aide from his steed. The rest of the escort party abandoned the carts and ran for their lives.
Li Kui saw that the prisoners were Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen, and he asked how they came to be in such a predicament.
"But what are you doing here?" Xuan countered.
"Big Brother wouldn't let me join in the slaughter, so I came down the mountain on my own. First I killed Han Bolong, then I ran into Jiao Ting, and he brought me here. Bao Xu was like an old friend as soon as we met. He's been treating me like a brother. We'd just agreed to attack Lingzhou when a lookout on the mountain spotted soldiers convoying prisoner carts in this direction. I figured that government troops had captured some bandits, but I never dreamed it was you."
Bao Xu invited everyone into his stronghold and feasted them with mutton and wine. Hao Siwen said to him: "Since you're willing to join us in Liangshan Marsh, brother, why not combine forces in an attack on Lingzhou? That would be an excellent arrangement."
"Brother Li Kui and I were talking about going in together. Combining with you is even better. I also have two or three hundred good horses I can give."
Bao Xu led his six or seven hundred men, and the five bold fellows set out together for Lingzhou.
Soldiers in the escort who had fled back to the town hurried and reported to Prefect Zhang: "Robbers intercepted us on the road. They seized the prisoner carts and killed our officer."
Shan and Wei were enraged. "We'll capture those rogues," they vowed, "and bring them here for execution!"
Then they heard that Guan Sheng was outside the town with troops and challenging them to battle, Shan rushed to be the first to respond. The city gate was opened and the drawbridge lowered and he rode forth at the head of a thousand cavalry. From an arch of pennants five hundred horsemen in black armor sped to the battlefield, with the Water General in the lead. He was an imposing figure as he loudly reviled Guan Sheng.
"Traitorous failure, you're going to die!"
Waving his halberd, Guan Sheng clapped his horse. They fought only twenty rounds when Guan Sheng pulled his steed's head around and quickly departed. Shan chased him for more than ten li. Guan Sheng flung some words over his shoulder.
"You'd better dismount and surrender! What are you waiting for?"
Shan thrust his levelled lance at Guan's back. But Guan Sheng, with his fabulous agility, parried the weapon with a sharp rap, shouting at the same time: "Down you go!" The diverted momentum brought Shan out of his saddle to the ground. Guan dismounted and helped him to his feet.
"I beg your pardon, General," he cried.
The frightened Shan kowtowed. He begged for his life and surrendered.
"I have spoken of you often to Big Brother Song Jiang." said Guan. "He's dispatched me specially to invite you two generals to join us in striving for righteousness."
"Talentless though I am, I will gladly do my humble utmost to work together on Heaven's behalf."
The two rode side by side and continued to talk. Lin Chong saw them and asked what had happened. Guan Sheng said nothing of victor or vanquished.
"We met in the mountains and got to chatting about old times, and I persuaded him to come with us," he merely remarked.
Lin Chong and the others were delighted. Shan returned to the front and shouted a command. Five hundred yelling soldiers in black armor swarmed over to the outlaws' side. The remainder fled back to town and hurriedly reported to the prefect.
Wei was greatly angered by the news. The next day he rode out with his troops to give battle. Shan, Guan Sheng and Lin Chong proceeded directly to the front. From the arch of banners opposite, the Fire General advanced on his battle charger. He cursed when he saw Shan following Guan Sheng.
"Ungrateful traitors, conscienceless wretches!"
With a laugh, Guan Sheng clapped his steed and rode forward to meet him. The two clashed, brandishing weapons. They had fought less than ten rounds when Wei galloped back to his position. Guan Sheng started to follow. He was stopped by a shout from Shan.
"Don't go after him, Commander!"
The Big Halberd quickly reined in. Five hundred fire soldiers, dressed in red, came flying from Lingzhou, and all carried incendiary implements. To the front and rear of their ranks were fifty carts piled high with very inflammable dry reeds. Each man had on his back an iron flask containing sulphur, nitrate and other incendiaries. The fire soldiers set all these ablaze and dashed among their foe. Men and horses, seared by the flames, fell dead or wounded. Guan Sheng's forces scattered in every direction. They retreated forty li before they halted and made camp.
Wei called in his troops and turned towards the town. He found it billowing with flames and smoke. What had happened was that Black Whirlwind Li Kui, together with Jiao Ting and Bao Xu and the robbers of Withered Trees Mountain, had approached Lingzhou from the rear and broken through the North Gate. They tore into the town, setting fires and pillaging Lingzhou's granary and treasury.
When Wei learned of this, he dared not enter. He hastily withdrew his troops, harried from behind by Guan Sheng who had again caught up. Communications between front and rear were disrupted. In any event, Lingzhou was already lost. Wei retreated to Zhongling, a county seat, and settled in. Guan Sheng surrounded the town and ordered his commanders to attack. Wei kept the gates closed and refused to come out.
"He's a brave man," Shan said to Guan Sheng and Lin Chong. "He'd rather die than submit to pressure. Go easy and you'll succeed. You won't get anywhere being impatient. I'm willing to go into the town, whatever the risks, and try to persuade him to surrender."
Guan Sheng was very pleased. He agreed to let Shan go in alone. An officer reported Shan's arrival. Wei came out to greet him and invited him into the hall.
"The imperial court has no lustre and the land is in turmoil," said Shan. "The emperor is confused, wicked ministers hold power. We're now serving Song Jiang, in Liangshan Marsh. Later, when the treacherous ministers have been deposed, there will be time enough to return to court and stamp out evil and restore correctness."
Wei considered this in silence for several minutes. Finally, he said: "I'll surrender only if Guan Sheng asks me to, in person. Otherwise, I'd rather die than submit."
Shan mounted his horse and returned with the reply. Guan Sheng said: "I'm a person of no consequence. The general rates me too highly." He prepared to set out, accompanied only by Shan.
"You'd better think it over, brother," said Lin Chong. "A man's mind is hard to fathom."
"The brave fear nothing," said Guan Sheng.
He rode directly to the county government office. Wei, receiving him with joy, kowtowed and surrendered. They talked of old times together, and Wei entertained Guan Sheng at a feast. That same day, he went with him to the brigands' camp, accompanied by five hundred of his fire soldiers. There he was introduced to Lin Chong, Yang Zhi and the other chieftains. The outlaw forces were re-assembled and all set out for the mountain fortress.
Song Jiang had sent Dai Zong to meet them on the road. When the Marvellous Traveller saw Li Kui he said: "Because you sneaked off down the mountain, we brothers have had to do a lot of wasted running around. Shi Qian, Yue Ho, Li Yun and Wang Dingliu have already gone back. I'd better return too and tell Big Brother, so he won't worry about you any more."
Dai Zong went on ahead. Guan Sheng and the others proceeded to the Shore of Golden Sands, where the naval unit in several trips ferried them across.
A man came running towards them, panting and exhausted. They all recognized him. It was Duan Jingzhu the Golden Dog.
"Didn't you go up north with Yang Lin and Shi Yong to buy horses?" asked Lin Chong. "Why have you come back in such a flurry?"
Duan's reply was brief, but as a result Song Jiang dispatched an army to attack a certain place. An old debt was expunged, vengeance was attained. Truly, he knew very well his words were a hook and line that once more would fish out trouble.

Now when the three fugitives, Governor Liang, Vulcan and Swordsman, rounded up their defeated troops and headed south, they were set upon front and rear by two divisions of infantry. The two commanders fought desperately to defend the Governor, Vulcan in front and Swordsman in the rear. Though completely encircled, they eventually managed to escape, their helmets battered and their armour and clothing in tatters. They had lost their armies, but at least the three of them got out of it alive. They now headed west.
The Demon King, with the Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost did not follow up their victory but returned to the city with Sergeant Lei, the Young Master and Mu the Irrepressible to await orders.
Back in the city the Professor had taken measures to reassure the people and put out the fires. In the homes of the Governor, Vulcan, Swordsman, and Magistrate Wang the families had all either been killed or escaped. No one inquired about them further. The municipal treasury was sacked and all the precious metals, silks and brocades, everything of value, loaded onto carts. The food and grain stores were opened up and their contents distributed among the people. What was left over was also loaded onto carts and sent back to provision Mount Liang. All the leaders and troops were told to get ready for departure, and Manager Li and the Unicorn's unfaithful wife were locked into prison carts. The army was divided into three columns for the return to Mount Liang. It was a triumphant return, stirrups and bridles jingling gaily and the troops singing songs of victory. The Magic Messenger had been sent on ahead to inform Song Jiang, who assembled the other leaders and came down the mountain to receive them.
Everyone now proceeded to the Ceremonial Hall. When Song Jiang saw the Unicorn, he prostrated himself, while the Unicorn hurriedly returned the courtesy.
Song Jiang said: "When we invited you to come here and join our company, it was no part of our intention that you should suffer such misfortune and nearly lose your life. I am truly remorseful. But heaven has enabled us to meet here again today. That is the greatest blessing of my life."
The Unicorn thanked him, saying: "I owe everything to your noble spirit and to the valour of all the leaders. I wish with heart and soul I could repay you all for rescuing me, but no sacrifice would be adequate."
The Unicorn then introduced Strongarm and Blossom to Song Jiang, saying: "If not for these two how could I be here today? I can never sufficiently thank them."
Song Jiang now proposed renouncing the leadership in favour of the Unicorn, but the latter said: "Who am I, to be head of a mountain stronghold? To serve you, even in the most lowly capacity, as one of your ordinary foot soldiers perhaps, to be able thus to repay you for saving my life, that is what I would consider the greatest happiness!"
Song Jiang repeated the offer three times, and three times the Unicorn refused. So then Iron Ox said to Song Jiang: "If you make someone else take over as chief of the stronghold I shall start killing people!" And Pilgrim Wu Song said: "You are making us all very uncomfortable with this talk of stepping down!"
Song Jiang was furious with them: "What do you know about it, all of you? You should keep your mouths shut!"
The Unicorn hurriedly bowed and said: "If you continue to talk of standing down, I really can't stay on here."
Iron Ox shouted: "The present emperor is useless. We'll have Song Jiang for emperor, Mr. Lu can be prime minister and we'll all be counsellors. We'll invade the capital and capture the fucking throne, then we won't be stuck in this fucking hole any longer."
Song Jiang blew up and started yelling at Iron Ox. The Professor intervened: "Let the Unicorn reside in the apartment on the east and be treated as a guest. Later, when he has made a contribution, you can think of ceding your place to him."
Song Jiang was at last satisfied, and ordered the Prodigy to be housed in the same place. Other quarters were allotted and Strongarm, Blossom and their family were housed. Scimitar's family had already been brought to the mountain by the Pill Monger. Song Jiang called for a big banquet to be prepared and rewarded all the troops of all three military arms — cavalry, infantry and marine. The officers and men were told to gather in their own units to drink wine, while the celebration banquet was set up in the Ceremonial Hall. The leaders all treated each other with great courtesy and deference, much wine was drunk and a great time was had by all.
Then the Unicorn rose to his feet and said: "We are still holding the adulteress and her lover. I await your instructions."

Song Jiang said with a laugh: "I had completely forgotten about them. Have them brought in."
The soldiers unlocked the prison carts and pushed the pair of them into the hall. They were tied to pillars, Manager Li on the left, the woman on the right.
Song Jiang said: "No need to question their guilt. Please resolve the case yourself."
Dagger in hand the Unicorn descended the steps. After cursing the woman for a strumpet and a whore, he slit open their breasts and gouged out their hearts. They died on the spot. Shoving aside the bodies he mounted the dais again and prostrated himself in sign of gratitude to all present. The leaders were unstinting in their praise of his resolve.
Now we shall leave the company on Mount Liang feasting and distributing rewards to all while we proceed to the Northern Capital, whither Governor Liang had returned with Vulcan, Swordsman and the remnants of their armies as soon as he heard that the troops from Mount Liang had withdrawn. When they went to their homes to learn the fate of their families they found that the greater part of them were dead. Their grief was immeasurable. The armies raised by neighbouring districts to pursue the forces of Mount Liang had arrived too late, when the latter were already far away, so they were sent home. The Governor's wife had managed to escape by hiding in the garden. She told her husband to make out a report and send it to court so that her father, the Grand Preceptor, might muster an army and appoint a general as quickly as possible to exterminate the bandits and avenge the humiliation at their hands. More than five thousand citizens were reported dead, with countless wounded, and the army's losses amounted to over three thousand.
An envoy set off bearing the confidential report and not losing a day rode straight to the residence of the Grand Preceptor and dismounted. The doorman went to report his arrival. When the Grand Preceptor ordered him to be shown in, he went up to the dais, prostrated himself before it and handed over the confidential report intended for the Emperor. He gave an oral account of how the Northern Capital had fallen to huge rebel forces which had proved irresistible.
Now the Grand Preceptor had originally hoped to find some accommodation with the rebels which might have brought honours to his son-in-law and redounded to his own credit. But this policy had clearly proved disastrous and there was no way the fact could be concealed. He now wanted war. "Leave the chamber.You may withdraw!" he shouted to the envoy in a rage.
At dawn next morning, when the bell sounded, the officials, civil and military, were gathered in the Court of the Water Clock, the Grand Preceptor at their head. Standing at the foot of the jade stair, he made his report to the Emperor. His Majesty was greatly alarmed. Then one of the imperial counsellors came forward and said: "Troops have been sent many times before, and always they have met with disaster. This is because the terrain favours the rebels. In my humble opinion, the best policy would be to declare an imperial amnesty and summon them to court. We could give them responsible posts and send them to guard the frontiers."
The Grand Preceptor expressed outrage at this proposal. "You're supposed to be an imperial counsellor!" he fulminated. "Yet you would have the court abandon all principle! You're a crazy, incompetent fool! You deserve to die!"
The Emperor said: "Indeed, let him leave the court at once."
The unhappy man was stripped of all his honours and reduced to the rank of a commoner. After that no other courtier dared to speak his mind.
The Emperor asked the Grand Preceptor: "If these bandits are so pernicious, who can we get to exterminate them?"
"I assure you, Your Majesty, they are only a bunch of savages. I see no need for a great army. I would recommend two officers who are in Lingzhou. One is Shan Tinggui, the other is Wei Dingguo. They are serving at present in the regional command. I beg you to issue an order and send someone with all speed to summon them and their troops. Give them a fixed time limit for cleaning out the marshes."
The Emperor was happy to accept this advice and promulgated an edict instructing the Privy Council to issue the necessary transfer orders. The Emperor then retired and the ministers left the court, hiding smiles of disbelief. Next day the Grand Preceptor returned to his own office and appointed a messenger to carry the imperial edict to Lingzhou.
Let us return now to Song Jiang, who was in the waterside camp where the booty from the Northern Capital was handed out to the three arms of the Mount Liang forces, after which there were days of feasting in honour of the Unicorn. They may not have dined on phoenixes and dragon flesh, but there were victuals aplenty and the wine flowed like water. All the leaders were more or less drunk. The Professor said to Song Jiang and the rest: "For the sake of Mr. Lu we have just captured the Northern Capital, killed many of its people and plundered the stores and driven out Governor Liang. He must have reported all this to the court, especially as his father-in-law is the Grand Preceptor. What are we going to do about it? Because they will undoubtedly send an army to try and suppress us."
Song Jiang said: "I am sure you are right. Why don't we send someone immediately to the city to find out how things stand? And in the meantime we should be making our preparations."
"I have already sent someone," said the Professor with a smile. "He should be returning soon."
Whilst they were still at table and had not yet finished their discussion, the Professor's scout returned and reported: "It's true, the Governor has delivered his report, and they plan to send an army to annihilate us. One of the counsellors proposed an amnesty, but he was reviled by the Grand Preceptor and has been sacked. The Emperor has been persuaded to send an envoy to Lingzhou to order Shan Tinggui and Wei Dingguo, two army commanders, to muster their own forces and march against us."
Song Jiang said: "How should we oppose them?"
The Professor said: "Wait till they get here and then capture them."
Scimitar rose to his feet and addressed Song Jiang and the Professor. "Your great generosity towards me since I came here has made me your debtor. I have as yet done nothing whatsoever on your behalf. I know these two commanders quite well. Shan, for instance, has made himself a specialist in harnessing water to drown an enemy force, which has gained him the name of Water General. Wei is experienced in the use of fire in battle and has devices to destroy the enemy by combustion, so people call him the Fire General. The forces of Lingzhou and of my district are under a joint command and these two officers are my subordinates. Now I don't mean to overestimate my abilities, but if I could have five thousand troops I would go and encounter them on the Lingzhou road, rather than wait till their attack gets under way. If they are prepared to surrender I will bring them back here. If they won't, I shall have to present them to you as captives. There is no need to mount a large-scale operation with all the leaders present in force. What do you say?"
Song Jiang was happy to accept Scimitar's plan, and ordered the Ugly Son-in-Law and the Hound to go with him. So in a few days' time Scimitar with a thousand troops went down the mountain. Song Jiang and the others arranged a farewell banquet at Golden Sands Landing, after which Scimitar and his two colleagues led their forces off.
When the others returned to the Ceremonial Hall, the Professor said to Song Jiang: "Scimitar has gone, but I am not convinced of his loyalty. We should send someone reliable who can keep an eye on him and also back him up."
Song Jiang said: "I believe Scimitar to be a man of absolute integrity, a man of his word. You shouldn't be so suspicious."
"I am afraid he may not be as perfect as you, that's all. Let us send five thousand troops down under Leopard's Head and the Blue-Faced Beast with Colonel Sun and the Tamer to back them up."
Iron Ox said: "I'll go too."
Song Jiang said: "We don't need you for this. We've already appointed reliable commanders."
Iron Ox said: "If I've got nothing to do I start to feel ill. If you won't send me with them, I shall go by myself, just for the hell of it."
Song Jiang said: "If you disobey my orders I shall have your head cut off!"
Iron Ox walked out in a huff.
We shall say no more of how Leopard's Head and the Blue-Faced Beast set off in support of Scimitar. The next day a soldier came in and reported: "Last night in the second watch Iron Ox went off somewhere with his two axes. We don't know where he was going."
Song Jiang was greatly upset. "It must be because I spoke harshly to him last night, he has probably gone to offer his services elsewhere."
The Professor said: "Don't be worried, brother. I know he's a coarse fellow, but he is truly a man of honour, he wouldn't let us down. I wager he'll be back in a couple of days. Just don't think about it."
But Song Jiang was still anxious. First he sent the Magic Messenger to search for Iron Ox. Then the Flea, Green-Eyes, Lungs and Fleetfoot were all sent off in different directions to join the search.
When Iron Ox set off down the mountain, carrying his two axes, he first found a small path which led towards Lingzhou. As he went he was thinking to himself: "What's the use of wasting so many men just to fight two fucking generals? I shall simply march into the city and finish them off with an axe blow each. That'll make the Leader sit up; it'll give me a bit of fun too!"
After walking half the day he was hungry. In his haste to leave the stronghold he hadn't thought to take any money for travelling expenses. He hadn't seen any action for a long time, so he thought to himself: "Anyway here's a chance to find some stupid bugger I can work off my feelings on!"
Just then he saw a country inn beside the path. He went in and sat down. He polished off three measures of wine and two catties of meat and then got up to leave. The waiter stopped him and asked for the money. "Just let me go and do a bit of business and then I'll pay you," said Iron Ox. With that he started to leave. But at that moment a fellow of ferocious aspect waylaid him: "You black bastard!" the man shouted, "You've got a nerve! Do you know whose inn you've picked to try and get a meal without paying?"
Iron Ox glared back at him and said: "I don't give a fuck whose it is, mate, so long as I eat for free!"
"You're going to shit yourself when you hear this," said the other. "I'm Han Bolong from the Marshes of Mount Liang, that's who I am! And it's Song Jiang what put up the money for this place!"
Iron Ox laughed to himself: "No one ever mentioned this bugger in the stronghold," he thought.
The fact is that this Han Bolong had been practising pillage and plunder among the rivers and lakes and wanted to join the company on Mount Liang. He had gone to the Crocodile and asked to be introduced to Song Jiang. But at the time Song Jiang was suffering from the ulcer on his back, and the stronghold was much too busy with troop movements so there just wasn't time to deal with him. Whilst he was waiting to be considered Crocodile had set him up in this village selling wine.
Iron Ox now took out one of his axes and said: "You can have my axe as a bond."
Not realizing he was being cheated, Han Bolong held out his hand to take it. Iron Ox raised his arm and aimed one crunching blow at his forehead that split him to the ribs. Thus did the wretched Han Bolong who had spent his life intimidating others meet his end at the hands of Iron Ox! The rest of the staff seemed only to wish their parents had endowed them with extra legs — they vanished into the inner recesses of the village! Iron Ox bent down and possessed himself of some money that was lying on the floor, set fire to the thatch and went on his way to Lingzhou.
He had been going less than a day when he came upon a big fellow sitting beside the highroad who was the spitting image of Iron Ox himself. The man was looking at him, so Iron Ox said: "Why are you staring at me, mate?"
The other replied: "I ain't yer mate!"
Iron Ox rushed at him but the other raised his fist and delivered a regular haymaker. "This fellow knows how to fight!" Iron Ox thought, as he came to, sitting on the ground. He looked up and asked: "What's your name, then?"
"I ain't got a name," said the other. "If you want a fight, you got one. Let's see if you can get on your feet."
Incensed, Iron Ox tried to jump up but received a kick in the ribs which felled him again.
"I can't win this one," Iron Ox exclaimed, and he tried to crawl away to safety.
He was stopped by a shout from the other: "What's your name then and where's you from?"
Iron Ox said: "Don't be scared if I tell you. I'm Li Kui, the Black Whirlwind from Mount Liang, that's who I am!"
"Is that the truth? Don't you lie to me!"
"If you don't believe me, take a look at these two axes!"
"If you're one of the company of Mount Liang, whatcher doing' wandering' about on yer own?"
"I had a bit of a set-to with the Leader, and I decided to go to Lingzhou and kill two fellows, one called Shan and one called Wei."
"What I heard was, Mount Liang's already sent troops. Can you tell me their leaders' names?"
"The first is Scimitar, and in support there's Leopard's Head Lin Chong and the Blue-Faced Beast."
The other prostrated himself. Iron Ox said: "Won't you tell me your name now?"
"I'm from Zhongshan. My family was professional boxers for three generations. You just seen what I can do. I learned it off me father, he wouldn't teach no one else. All my life I been unrecognized, never been accepted nowhere. In Shandong and Hebei they calls me Nameless. The other day I heard of a mountain in these parts called Dead Tree Mountain where there's this robber what spends his time murderin' people. His name is Bao Xu, but they calls him Pluto. He uses that mountain as a base for raidin' people's homes. I was just goin' to go off there and join up with his lot."
"With your skills, why don't you think of going to join our leader Song Jiang?"
"That's what I always wanted to do, only I didn't have no introduction. Now I've met you, I'd like to go back there with you."
"Well right now I've left the stronghold because I've got something to prove to the Leader. I can't go back empty-handed, got to kill someone first. Let's go together to Dead Tree Mountain and talk to this Pluto, and then we'll all go to Lingzhou and kill those two generals, Shan and Wei. After that we can go back to Mount Liang."
Nameless said: "Lingzhou is a big place, there's lots of troops there. Just the two of us, it don't matter how good we is at fightin', it wouldn't do no good. We'd be givin' our lives away for nothink. Wouldn't it be better just to go to Dead Tree Mountain, get that Pluto and all go back to the main stronghold to join up? I reckon that's the best plan."
While they were talking, the Flea had come up with them, and he now spoke: "Song Jiang is very unhappy. He wants you back on the mountain. People have gone off in all directions looking for you."
Iron Ox introduced the Flea to Nameless. The Flea began to urge Iron Ox to return to the stronghold, explaining how the Leader missed him.
Iron Ox stopped him. "All right, all right!" he said. "Nameless and I have already decided that we'll go to Dead Tree Mountain first and speak to Pluto. We'll return after that."
"That's not good enough," said the Flea. "Song Jiang wants you, you ought to go back right away."
"Unless you're coming with me, you'd better go back to the stronghold first and tell the Leader I'm coming."
The Flea, who was scared of Iron Ox, did as he was bidden, whilst Iron Ox and Nameless set off towards Dead Tree Mountain.
The story now divides. We will return to Scimitar, who with the Son-in-Law, Hound, and five thousand troops was approaching Lingzhou, where the Governor had received the imperial edict, together with the Grand Preceptor's letter, and had summoned generals Shan and Wei for consultation. The two generals having received their instructions, picked their troops, issued arms, harnessed horses, stocked up with provisions and fodder and set the day for departure. Just then someone reported: "General Guan Sheng from Pudong, known as Scimitar, is advancing with an army to attack us."
This news roused the Water and Fire Generals to action. They mustered their forces at once and marched out of the city to meet the enemy. The two armies approached each other, flags waving, drums beating. Scimitar rode out under the pennants. From the opposite ranks the Water General rode forth. His helmet was black with an exceptionally long black tassel. He wore black armour backed with bearskin, a short-sleeved tunic of black silk embroidered with clusters of kingfisher-blue flowers, a pair of fine leather boots and a belt holding a jade scabbard and fastened with a lion's-head clasp. He was armed with bow and arrows and a spear with a black shaft and rode a coal-black steed. Before him went a big black standard, emblem of the north, bearing seven silver characters: "General Shan Tingui, the Water General".
Then from the same side with a jingling of harness bells out rode General Wei Dingguo, the Fire General. He had a scarlet helmet with a red tassel as long as a broom handle. He wore chain mail with links of beasts joined nose to tail, a red robe embroidered with winged monsters and a pair of leather boots stitched with a jade-green cloud motif. He had a bow with a gilt design of birds and flowers and a sheaf full of wolf's-tooth arrows flighted with peacock feathers. He rode a red roan charger and brandished a bronze sword. Before him went a big red banner, emblem of the south, bearing seven silver characters: "General Wei Dingguo, the Fire General".
When Scimitar saw these two proud commanders riding out together, he cried out: "Generals, it is a long time since we last met!"
Generals Shan and Wei responded with abuse: "You contemptible coward, you insane traitor! You have spurned the court's favour, and stained the honour of your forebears! You'd be better off dead! What are you doing here with this army?"
Scimitar answered: "You are mistaken. The Emperor's judgement is clouded because wicked counsellors hold sway, giving employment only to their relatives and slandering all who oppose them. Our Leader, Song Jiang, is humane and generous. and does heaven's will. He has sent me to make a request to you. He asks you, if you will, to come with us and join the mountain stronghold."
Outraged by this suggestion, the two generals galloped back. They now led their armies out, one like a black cloud from the north, the other like a fierce fire from the south. Scimitar prepared to receive them, with the Ugly Son-in-Law on his left hand and Hound on his right. The cold sparks flew as sword met sword. A deadly chill was born, as spear parried spear. Watching from a distance Scimitar was able to observe that the Fire General grew stronger with every blow, and the Water General was not one whit afraid. But suddenly they both broke off, turned their horses and galloped back to their ranks. Hound and the Ugly Son-in-Law followed at their heels till they were well inside the enemy position. Then Fire General turned left and Water General turned right, the Ugly Son-in-Law and Hound behind each respectively. Just as the Ugly Son-in-Law was about to catch his opponent, four or five hundred foot soldiers, with red flags and red armour, spread out and surrounded him. Hooks flew out, ropes were stretched taut, and both horse and man were taken alive.
The Hound likewise pursuing the Water General on the right was encircled by five hundred infantry with black flags and black armour. When they closed behind him he too was captured. Unhappy commanders, their pretensions were just pie in the sky!
The captives were transferred to the city while the troops continued the slaughter. Before Scimitar could prevent it he had suffered a huge defeat and was obliged to retreat. The Water and Fire Generals pursued him vigorously. As he fled two leaders came galloping towards him. They turned out to be Leopard's Head on the left and the Blue-Faced Beast on the right, who had been waiting with their troops concealed in a hollow. They charged and scattered the enemy. Scimitar rounded up his defeated army and joined forces with the other two. Soon after they met up with Colonel Sun and the Tamer. For the time being they all returned to camp.
When the two enemy generals returned victorious to the city, Governor Zhang welcomed them and honoured them with wine. He had prison carts made for the two captives and ordered an officer to muster three hundred infantry and deliver them to the Eastern Capital with a report. This officer and his troops, closely guarding the Ugly Son-in-Law and the Hound, followed a cir-cuitous route towards the Eastern Capital. But when they came to a mountain covered with dead trees and thick undergrowth, gongs rang out and a bunch of robbers appeared. The foremost toted two axes and spoke with a voice like thunder. It was none other than Iron Ox, the Black Whirlwind of Mount Liang. And who is that behind him?

Like one in a thicket who crouches in wait,
His fists and his kicks are as deadly as fate.
When his anger's aroused like a mountain he falls:
Nameless his name is, whose fierceness appals.

The road was blocked by Iron Ox and Nameless with their troops. Without saying a word, they attacked the prison carts. When the officer tried to escape, another bandit leader appeared behind him:

Face of a murderer, black as a pot,
Eyes like two slits and wolf lips he's got.
Burning and killing he counts but a game,
Lord of the Underworld, Pluto his name.

With one blow of his sword Pluto knocked the officer off his horse and killed him. The rest of the guards abandoned the prison carts and took to their heels. When Iron Ox saw that the prisoners were the Ugly Son-in-Law and Hound, he asked what had happened.

"But how did you come to be here?" the Ugly Son-in-Law asked Iron Ox.

"The Leader wouldn't let me come and fight," Iron Ox said. "So I went off on my own. First I killed someone called Han Bolong, then I ran into this Nameless, who brought me here. We hit it off immediately with this fellow, Pluto, who received us like brothers. We had just agreed to go and attack Lingzhou together when a sentry spotted this bunch on the mountain with the prison carts. We thought it was just a government escort and some thieves they had caught. We had no idea it was you two."

Pluto invited them to his camp, killed an ox and entertained them with wine. Hound said: "Since you're thinking of joining the company on Mount Liang anyway, don't you think it would be best to use your troops now and all of us together mount a serious attack on Lingzhou?"

"That's just what I was saying to my friend Mr. Li here," said Pluto, indicating Iron Ox. "What you say is absolutely right. There's also another three or four hundred horses in my stronghold."

So at the head of five or six hundred troops the five warriors marched on Lingzhou.

By now the government troops who escaped had returned and reported to Governor Zhang: "We were attacked on the way by robbers, who took the carts and killed the officer."

The Water and Fire Generals were furious at this news. "This time when we catch them we'd better execute them on the spot," they exclaimed.

At this very moment Scimitar and his army arrived outside the walls and issued a challenge. The Water General was first to respond. The gates were opened and the drawbridge lowered and with five hundred troops he charged out of the city. He rode out under the pennants and reviled Scimitar: "You worthless traitor, how can you hope to live?" In response, Scimitar waved his sword and slapped his horse. When they had fought fifty bouts, Scimitar reined in his horse and galloped away, with the Water General in hot pursuit. The chase continued for over three miles, until Scimitar turned and shouted: "You'd better dismount and surrender, what are you waiting for?" The Water General levelled his spear and charged, aiming at the middle of Scimitar's back. With incredible skill, Scimitar used the back of his sword to parry the blow and with a cry of "Down you go!" swept the Water General from his horse. He immediately dismounted and rushed to help his opponent up, saying "Forgive me, General!"

The Water General prostrated himself apprehensively, asking to be spared.

Scimitar said: "I have often praised you to our Leader Song Jiang. I came here to invite you and your colleague to join our enterprise."

The Water General said: "I am unworthy, but I am prepared to work like a donkey to help you do heaven's will."

After this conversation the two of them rode back side by side. When Leopard's Head saw them approaching like this, he wanted to know what had happened. Scimitar said nothing of his winning the fight, but instead answered: "We found a quiet spot and had a heart to heart talk, and I persuaded him to join our cause."

Leopard's Head and the others were delighted to hear this. The Water General returned to his troops and shouted something. The five hundred in black armour came over. The remainder went back to the city, where they told the Governor.

The Fire General was outraged. He led his troops out next day to seek an engagement. The Water General rode out in front of the enemy with Scimitar and Leopard's Head. The Fire General was awaiting them under the pennants and when he saw the Water General with Scimitar he reviled them both: "You shameless turncoats, you base villains!"

Scimitar wasn't going to stand for such insults. He slapped his horse and charged. The two horses met, two weapons were raised simultaneously. Before they had fought ten bouts, the Fire General galloped off towards his own side. Scimitar was about to give chase, but the Water General shouted out: "Don't follow him, commander!"

Scimitar immediately reined in his charger. At the same moment from the Lingzhou ranks five hundred fire troops appeared. They wore red and they all carried incendiary devices. Jostling in front and behind came fifty fire carts, all loaded with reeds and other combustible materials. Every soldier had an iron gourd strapped to his back, containing sulphur and saltpetre and five-colour smoke powder, which they all lit simultaneously before dashing forward. Caught by the flames men fell and horses lay writhing on the ground. Scimitar's forces fled in all directions, and the flight continued over ten miles before they halted and took up a defensive position.

However, when the Fire General recalled his troops to the city, he saw that the city itself was burning: fierce flames and thick smoke were rising from it. It was Iron Ox, who with Nameless and Pluto and the men from Dead Tree Mountain had attacked the city from behind, breaking down the north gate, killing and burning and looting the stores and the treasury. When he learnt of this the Fire General was afraid to enter the city, so he hurriedly wheeled his troops round. Now they were attacked and harried by Scimitar who cut them in half. Having lost Lingzhou the Fire General was obliged to retreat to Zhongling and establish his base there. Scimitar surrounded him, ordering up all his troops to join the attack. The Fire General locked the gates and refused to come out.

The Water General now said to Scimitar, Leopard's Head and the others: "He is a gallant soldier. You can attack as hard as you like, but he will choose death rather than dishonour. You'll only get somewhere with him if you relax the pressure and don't push him too hard. I'm prepared to go in there, whatever the danger, and try to talk him round. If he will submit voluntarily, we can avoid bloodshed."

Scimitar liked the idea, so they sent the Water General off alone on horseback. When a sentry reported his approach, the Fire General came out himself to meet him. In his most persuasive manner, the Water General said: "Nowadays policy is uncertain, the land is in turmoil, the Emperor confused and power in the hands of evil men. I am going over to Song Jiang and intend to make my home in the marshes. Later, when wicked ministers have relinquished power, when evil retreats and righteousness returns, that will be the time to go back."

The Fire General considered this for a long time, then said: "If he wants me to go over, Scimitar must come himself to ask me. I will surrender to him. If he doesn't come I shall choose death rather than shame!"

The Water General mounted and rode back to tell Scimitar this. The latter said: "When a true man does business he does not suspect others." He proposed to go alone with the Water General, quite unsupported. Leopard's Head warned him: "It is hard to read a man's mind, sir. Think carefully before you do anything."

Scimitar replied: "It behoves a gentleman to show confidence."

When Scimitar reached the town, the Fire General welcomed him and wanted to prostrate himself in sign of surrender. He talked of old times and entertained Scimitar with a feast. That same day with his five hundred fire troops he went to the main camp where he met Leopard's Head and the Blue-Faced Beast and the other leaders. Then the troops were mustered and they marched back to Mount Liang. Song Jiang sent the Magic Messenger out to meet them. Magic Messenger said to Iron Ox: "Because you stole away down the mountain, many of our brothers had to go out looking for you all over the place. The Flea, Lungs, Green-Eyes, and Fleetfoot are all back now. I will go on ahead to let the leader know so he doesn't go on worrying about you."

We shall not talk about the Magic Messenger's return, but tell how Scimitar and the rest came to Golden Sands Landing and how the waterborne leaders supplied boats. Now as they were rowing the troops across in a series of trips a man came racing up breathless and distressed. It was Yellow Dog. Leopard's Head asked: "You went with Panther and the Guv to the north to buy horses, didn't you? Why do you return in such a state?" Yellow Dog's reply was not lengthy or elaborate but it caused Song Jiang to send troops out on a new campaign, in order to settle an old score and wipe the slate clean. Truly, words can be like hook and line, fishing up old troubles.

WHEN the Grand Secretary and his Generals and their followers found themselves surrounded by brigands they desperately fought their way out and escaped towards the West. The brigand leaders could not catch them so they returned to Daming Prefecture to await further orders.

In the town Wu Yong had ordered his men to help put out the fires. He also had the treasury opened, and had all the loot loaded up. The public grain stores were all opened, and much rice was given to the people, and the remainder was loaded up and sent to Liangshan Marsh. Li Gu and Lu Junyi's former wife were confined in prisoner's carts to be conveyed to the mountain stronghold. The brigands then were formed into three bodies, and so returned to Liangshan Marsh. Dai Zong having already been dispatched to inform Song Jiang of their complete victory.

Upon reaching their stronghold the brigand leaders were welcomed by Song Jiang and all assembled in the Loyalty and Justice Hall. When he saw Lu Junyi, Song Jiang kowtowed, and Lu Junyi did likewise.

"I was very careless," said Song Jiang, "when I requested you to stay at Liangshan Marsh. I did not think that it would cause so much misery to you. The hardships you underwent made me feel as though a sword had pierced my heart. But Heaven helped us, and so today we can see you here again."

Lu Junyi saluted and replied, "I am indebted to you for your powerful assistance, and am grateful to all the leaders for their heroism. Your united strength has rescued me from death. Even if my brains and kidney were rubbed on the ground I could not recompense you for your kindness." He then introduced Cai Fu and Cai Qing, and continued.

"I owe a great deal to these jailers who kept me alive and treated me so well."

Song Jiang then offered to abdicate his position to Lu Junyi who was surprised, and said, "What am I to accept your offer? I am only fit to hold your whip and stirrup, and act as an ordinary retainer."

Song Jiang however insisted upon his offer being accepted.

"Brother, you are not straightforward," interposed Li Kui. "You previously consented to occupy this position, but now you want to yield to another man. This chair must be made of real gold that you always regard it as a present. If you keep on yielding it, you will make me resort to my knife."

"You, fellow!" shouted Song Jiang.

Lu Junyi hurriedly saluted, and said, "If you still press me to take the position I must leave here."

"If Song Jiang became Emperor," said Li Kui, "and Lu Junyi the Prime Minister and all of us were now sitting in the gold palace it would be worthwhile for us to act in these polite ways. But as a matter of fact we are only brigands, so it is better for us to conduct ourselves as such."

Wu Yong interposed, "Would it not be better if we treated Lu Junyi as a guest, and ask him to live temporarily in the rooms on the east side. When he has done some meritorious deed we could then press him to accept the position of commander-in-chief."

Song Jiang agreed to this. He then ordered a feast to be prepared for all the men. The leaders had their feast in the Loyalty and Justice Hall where they all enjoyed themselves. During the feast Lu Junyi stood up, and addressed Song Jiang, "The adulterer and the adulteress are our prisoners here and await your disposal."

Song Jiang laughed and replied, "I had forgotten about them. Let the prisoners be brought in."

The prisoners were taken out of the cart, and tied up to posts in front of the hall.

Song Jiang then said, "There is no need to question them as to their crime. We can leave Lu Junyi to deal with them."

Lu Junyi took a sword, and going outside he cut both of them open and took out their hearts. He then hacked their bodies into small pieces.

When Grand Secretary Liang heard the news that the brigands had gone back to Liangshan Marsh he went back to Daming with his General and their few remaining soldiers. There they found what enormous damage had been done, and how their own families and property had been wiped out. He wrote a dispatch to the Prime Minister at the Eastern Capital giving particulars of the disaster, and requesting that troops be at once dispatched to safeguard the district. Of the civilians about five thousand, and of the soldiers about thirty thousand, had been killed.

Upon reaching the Eastern Capital the messenger delivered the dispatch. When first considering the matter the Prime Minister thought that it would be a good plan to induce the brigands to join the Imperial army as Grand Secretary Liang's success would have reflected favorably on himself. But on second thoughts after the debacle at Daming, he realized that that was now impossible as the brigands had gained such a victory, and as everybody would soon know about it. Therefore he was determined to attack the brigands and reestablish the name of the Imperial army as well as his own.

The following morning when the Emperor had his usual audience with his ministers at daybreak, Prime Minister Cai presented a memorial about this disaster. When the Emperor read the same he was shocked. The Councillor Zhao Ding stepped forward, and addressed the throne, "Many troops have been dispatched, but they have all been defeated. The brigands have the advantageous positions and so are invincible. My humble opinion is that Your Majesty issue an edict pardoning them for their crimes, and conferring upon their leaders official ranks, if they will reform, and help you to restore order in the country."

Prime Minister Cai was very angry at this, and spoke, "The Councillor's suggestion would endanger the moral dignity of the Emperor. Your crazy proposal makes you worthy of death!"

"In that case," said the Emperor, "he will retire from the court."

The Councillor withdrew, and was duly deprived of his office. After that who would dare to offer any suggestion or reproof about the case?

The Emperor then asked Prime Minister Cai Jing, "As these brigands are so truculent, who can be deputed to subdue them?"

"I think these brigands have not much power," replied Cai Jing, "and therefore we need not dispatch a very big army against them. At Lingzhou there are two men—one is Colonel Shan Tinggui and the other is Colonel Wei Dingguo. I recommend that Your Majesty issue an edict ordering them to take command of an expedition against Liangshan Marsh."

The Emperor was pleased at this, and had the edict written at once. He then left the court, and all the officials dispersed. Many of them regarded this event as a laughingstock among themselves. The following day the edict was duly dispatched to Lingzhou to summon the two Colonels.

At the stronghold on Liangshan Marsh the brigands continued their feasting in celebration of their victory. One day during the feast Wu Yong spoke to Song Jiang, "As we have done great damage at Daming Prefecture you may be sure that the Grand Secretary must write a dispatch to the Eastern Capital so that we cannot treat the matter as entirely settled. I expect that it will not be long before we are again attacked by the Imperial troops."

"I quite agree with your view," said Song Jiang. "Why don't we send spies to Daming Prefecture to find out what is being done, and prepare our men here for the coming attack?"

Wu Yong laughed and said, "I have already sent a spy, and he will soon be back." Duly as they were speaking before the feast was over the spy arrived, and reported that Grand Secretary Liang had sent a dispatch to the Eastern Capital asking for reinforcements. He also told them what had occurred at court, and how troops at Lingzhou had been ordered to attack Liangshan Marsh.

"What shall we do?" asked Song Jiang.

"Let them come," said Wu Yong. "We shall arrest them all."

Here Guan Sheng stood up and addressed them, "Since I arrived at Liangshan Marsh I have done nothing yet. I know both of these Colonels who are in command of the expedition against us. Colonel Shan Tinggui is fond of flooding the enemies camp by breaking the dams of rivers. For this reason people call him the 'Water God General.' Colonel Wei Dingguo is skillful at the use of fire attack, and therefore is nicknamed the 'Fire God General.' If you will let me have five thousand men I will go and meet them on their way from Lingzhou before they can reach here. If they will surrender, that would be all right. If they do not surrender, I will bring them to you as captives. I do not need any other leaders to assist me in this matter as I can manage it myself."

Song Jiang was pleased at this offer, and instructed Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen to accompany Guan Sheng under whom they had previously served. The following day they left with five thousand men.

When they had left, the leaders again assembled in the Loyalty and Justice Hall, and there Wu Yong said to Song Jiang, "Guan Sheng has gone, but you cannot guarantee his loyalty so we had better send a reliable man to watch his movements, but ostensibly to assist him."

"As I know," said Song Jiang, "Guan Sheng is quite loyal to us. From first to last he is always the same. You need not harbor any suspicion of him."

"I am afraid that he is not of the same mind as you," said Wu Yong. "I suggest that we dispatch another five thousand men in charge of Lin Chong and three other leaders to follow Guan Sheng."

"I also want to go," interposed Li Kui.

"We do not need you this time," said Song Jiang, "as we have capable leaders for this work."

"If I am idle I shall soon be sick," said Li Kui. "If you do not let me go, then I will go myself."

"If you disobey my order," said Song Jiang, "I will have your head cut off."

Li Kui did not reply to this, but left the hall with a very downhearted spirit.

The men under Lin Chong duly left the next day, and when they had gone a menial reported that the previous night Li Kui had left the mountain by himself with his two axes. Song Jiang was annoyed at this. He said, "Yesterday I injured his feeling and he must have gone somewhere else."

"Though he is a rough fellow," said Wu Yong, "yet he is very faithful, and I do not think he will desert us. You need not worry, he will return in a few days." But Song Jiang was anxious, and sent Dai Zong to find out where he had gone to. In addition he sent Shi Qian and three other leaders to look for him.

Li Kui had as a matter of fact taken the direct road to Lingzhou, and on the way he thought, "Those two Colonels are only minor officers, and I cannot understand why we should send so many men to attack them. I will go myself into the town of Lingzhou, and kill those officers with my axes, one axe for each man, and that will surprise my brother Song Jiang. Then I shall be able to argue the point with him to my advantage." He walked for half day, and then felt very hungry. He had left the mountain without any money. He soliloquized, "I must look out for a traveler and kill him." Soon he came to an inn, and entering he ordered a jug of wine and three jin of meat. He sat down and having eaten the food walked out. But the waiter demanded payment, and Li Kui said, "I have some business to transact, and when I come back I will pay you for the food." Just then he saw a big man approaching who shouted to him, "You black thief, you have some cheek! You eat our food, and won't pay for it. To whom do you think this inn belongs?"

Li Kui glared at the man, and replied, "Wherever I go I never pay for my food."

"If I tell you who I am you would be pissing and farting in terror," said the man. "I am Han Bolong of Liangshan Marsh, and this inn is provided by Song Jiang."

Li Kui was amused at the man's impudence and thought, "I do not know this damned fellow at our stronghold." The fact was that this man had tried to join them at Liangshan Marsh, but as Song Jiang was sick at the time he could not see him. Therefore, Zhu Gui told him to open an inn at this point, and await further instructions. Li Kui took an axe out of his belt, and said, "I will leave this in pawn with you for payment." Han Bolong thought this was a genuine offer, and held out his hand for the axe, but Li Kui lifted it up and cleaved open his head. When the waiters saw this they ran away.

Li Kui went into the inn, and took all the cash about there. He then set fire to the inn which was only made of straw matting. He went on his way, and the following day he met a big man who looked him over very minutely.

Li Kui asked him, "Why are you looking at me like that?"

"Who are you?" asked the man.

Li Kui did not reply, but went forward to attack the man. The man avoided the blow, and hit Li Kui with his fist so that the latter was knocked to his backside. Li Kui had felt the great strength of the man, so he sat down, and looking upwards asked, "What is your name?"

The man standing over him replied, "I have no name, but if you want to fight I'll fight with you. Dare you get up?"

Li Kui was angry at this, and jumped up, but at the same moment received a kick in the stomach which sent him sprawling on the ground.

"I cannot overcome you," said Li Kui, and getting up was walking off. But the man stopped him, calling out,. "What is your name and where do you come from?"

"You have beaten me," said Li Kui, "and I do not care to tell you my name. Seeing that you are a fine fellow, however, I will not deceive you. I am Li Kui, from Liangshan Marsh."

"Are you speaking the truth now?" asked the man. "You need not lie to me."

"You may not believe me," said Li Kui, "but you can see these two axes."

"As you are from Liangshan Marsh where are you going alone like this?" asked the man.
"I had a dispute with our commander-in-chief, because I wanted to go to Lingzhou to kill those two officers, Shan and Wei."
"I have heard that some men have already left Liangshan Marsh. Can you say the name of the leader in charge of them?" asked the man.
"Guan Sheng is in charge of the first body of men, and Lin Chong is supporting him with another body of men."
Upon hearing this the man saluted Li Kui, who then asked, "Will you not tell me your name now?"
The man said, "I am a Zhongshan Prefecture man, and my great grandfather was a great wrestler. My father trained me to fight with the fists, and we have never adopted a pupil. My name is Jiao Ting but I am called the 'Disliked One.' A few days ago I heard that at Kushu Mountain in Kouzhou there is a strong brigand named Bao Xu, nicknamed 'God of Death,' who is very fond of killing people. I was thinking of going there and joining him."
"But instead of that," said Li Kui, "why not go to Liangshan Marsh, and assist Song Jiang."
"I have thought of that too," said Jiao Ting, "but I do not know anybody there who would introduce me. But today as I have met you I am willing to accompany you."
"I left the mountain in an angry dispute with Song Jiang," said Li Kui, "and as I have not yet killed those army officers I cannot very well go back with you. I suggest that we now go to the Kushu Mountain and get Bao Xu to join us in killing those two Colonels, Shan and Wei, and then, we can go to Liangshan Marsh."
"At Lingzhou there is a large army," said Jiao Ting, "and we two by ourselves can do nothing. It would be suicidal for us to go there alone. The best plan is for us to go to the Kushu Mountain and get Bao Xu to join us at Liangshan Marsh."
Just then they were interrupted by Shi Qian who came up and spoke to Li Kui, "Our commander, Song Jiang, was very anxious about your disappearing, and sent us in all directions to look for you, and bring you back to Liangshan Marsh."
Li Kui introduced Jiao Ting to Shi Qian. He then told Shi Qian of his plan, and said he would first go with Jiao Ting to Kushu Mountain. Shi Qian could not get Li Kui to change his mind, and so at last he went back to Liangshan Marsh to report the matter while the other two continued on their way.
Guan Sheng and his five thousand men duly reached Lingzhou. Inside the town Colonels Shan and Wei had received their orders from the Prefect, and had made all arrangements for a march on Liangshan Marsh. When they heard of the arrival of the brigands they were angry, and marched out their soldiers to oppose them. When the two armies met Guan Sheng rode forth. Immediately a man also rode out from the Imperial army. He wore a square iron helmet surmounted by a large plume, his armor was of bearskin covered with iron plates; under which was a black silk gown embroidered with kingfisher-blue flowers; he wore a pair of leather shoes decorated with a design in white; and a leather belt studded with metal plates engraved with lions. He rode a coal-black horse, and was armed with a bow and quiver full of arrows, and a spear. Behind him was a soldier carrying a black flag on which were seven characters in silver, "Shan Tinggui, the 'Water God General.'"
Another officer also rode forth from the imperial troops, and he wore a vermilion-colored helmet with a design in gold surmounted by a red plume; armor decorated with rings in which were animals done in metals, and under that a red silk gown embroidered with animals and clouds in colors; his leather boots were decorated with a Qilin in kingfisher blue. He was armed with a bow, arrows, and a sword, and rode a roan-colored horse. In front of him marched a soldier bearing a red flag on which were seven characters in silver, "Wei Dingguo, the 'Fire God General.'"
Guan Sheng sitting on his horse addressed these two Colonels, "It is a long time since we parted."
The two Colonels laughed, and abused him saying, "You inefficient upstart and rebellious profligate! You have been ungrateful to the Emperor's benevolence, and your ancestors would be ashamed of you. You have no modesty. You bring these armed men here now. What have you to say?"
"You two commanders are mistaken," replied Guan Sheng. "At present the Emperor is a weakling, traitorous ministers are in power, only relatives are employed, and officials are impeached for petty personal enmity. Our commander Song Jiang is benevolent, just, loyal, and sincere, and is acting according to the Will of Heaven. He has instructed me to come here and invite both of you to join him at Liangshan Marsh."
Both Colonels were very angry at this speech, and dashed forward to attack him. They looked like a black cloud and a red cloud threatening a storm. Before they came near Hao Siwen and Xuan Zan rode forth from both sides of Guan Sheng and engaged the opposing men. Sword clashed with sword and spear clanked with spear so that there seemed to be chilly flashes of bloody struggle. Guan Sheng looked on, and admired the great skill displayed by all the combatants. During the fight, however, both Colonels turned their horses at the same time, and withdrew. Hao Siwen pursued Shan Tinggui right into the army where the latter turned to the left. Xuan Zan pursued Wei Dingguo who turned to the right. When they had nearly caught up to the Colonels they suddenly found themselves surrounded by soldiers armed with hooked poles who closed in, pulled them off their horses, and made them prisoners. The prisoners were at once dispatched to Lingzhou, while the main body of soldiers moved forward to attack the brigands. Guan Sheng was surprised at the quick defeat and ordered his men to retreat. But they had only gone a short distance when Guan Sheng saw another body of brigands in charge of Lin Chong, and they joined in the fight against the Imperial troops, who soon retreated to their camp.
The two prisoners were placed in a cart, and dispatched at once to the Eastern Capital while the two Colonels were rewarded for the success attained. The prisoners were escorted by three hundred soldiers, and on the way they passed close to the Kushu Mountain. There they were attacked by brigands in front of whom was their new leader Li Kui with his two axes, and close behind him was Jiao Ting. Turning round to escape the captain of the escort found that in their rear was a big man with a complexion like a copper kettle—no other than Bao Xu—armed with a double-edged sword. Bao Xu hacked the Captain on the spot and the escort all began to run away, and in a minute there was nobody left with the prisoner's cart.
Li Kui released the prisoners, and asked for an explanation of their having been captured. Xuan Zan also asked Li Kui how he had come that way and Li Kui told them how he had made friends with Bao Xu at the Kushu Mountain, and now came down the mountain to attack the the escort of Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen.
Bao Xu invited them all to come to his stronghold on the mountain where he provided a feast. During the festivities Hao Siwen said that as Bao Xu and his men were willing to join with the brigands at Liangshan Marsh they should first join in the attack on Lingzhou. Bao Xu agreed to this, and arrangements were made accordingly.
When the news of the disaster to the escort reached Lingzhou Colonel Shan Tinggui was angry, and said, "If we arrest those two men this time, we must execute them here, and not send them to the Eastern Capital." Just then another report came that Guan Sheng was advancing to attack the town. Immediately Colonel Shan Tinggui mounted his horse, and led his five hundred soldiers outside the town. When near the brigands, the flags separated; and Colonel Shan rode forward by himself, and shouted at Guan Sheng, "You disgrace to your country! You defeated general. You are deserving death!"
Guan Sheng hearing this urged his horse forward, whirling his sword aloft. After about fifty bouts Guan Sheng turned his horse, and galloped off followed closely by Colonel Shan Tinggui.
Guan Sheng led Colonel Shan a long distance away from his troops, and then turning his head he called out, "Why not dismount and submit now? What time are you waiting for?" But instead of doing this Colonel Shan attempted to stab Guan Sheng in the back with his spear, but Guan Sheng seeing the movement shouted "Down you go!" and cut the spear with his sword, and this upset the balance of Colonel Shan who fell off his horse. Guan Sheng sprang from his horse, and ran to raise his enemy and said, "Please forgive me!" Colonel Shan replied, "I humbly submit to you."
"When I was at Liangshan Marsh," said Guan Sheng, "I very often spoke highly of you to Song Jiang. So I have specially come here to request both of you to join us in the cause of justice."
"I am willing to do my best and cooperate with you in carrying out the Will of Heaven," said Colonel Shan.
They then mounted their horses, and rode off abreast. When Lin Chong saw them riding together like this he asked for an explanation.
Now Guan Sheng did not want to say anything about the defeating of Colonel Shan so he replied, "In this secluded spot, we talk about our old friendship and I will try to induce him to join us."
They were all pleased at this, Colonel Shan then went back to his troops, and waving his hand called out, "Let all my men come over here," and his five hundred black jackets all joined the brigands. Those who did not wish to do so returned to the town, and reported this matter to the Prefect.
In the town Colonel Wei Dingguo was exceedingly angry when he heard of this desertion, and the following day he led his men outside the town and challenged the brigands to battle. In front of the brigands he saw Colonel Shan Tinggui and Guan Sheng and Lin Chong so he rode forward, and shouted at them, "You have forgotten the graciousness of our ruler, and have become mean rebels."
At this Guan Sheng only laughed, and whipping his horse dashed forward, and fought with Colonel Wei Dingguo. After about ten bouts Colonel Wei turned his horse, and ran away followed by Guan Sheng. But Colonel Shan called out, "Do not pursue him!" and immediately Guan Sheng stopped his horse. Just then the ranks of the soldiers opened and about fifty carts rushed out. These were piled up with burning reeds and grass. They were pushed by soldiers who carried on their backs iron cauldrons containing sulphur emitting large volumes of smoke. As they came near the brigands, all fell down on all sides, men and horses. Guan Sheng seeing this gave orders for a general retreat, and after withdrawing his men for about three li he called a halt.
Colonel Wei seeing the brigands retreating marched his soldiers back to the town. But as he drew near he was surprised to see the town on fire in various parts.
This was because when Colonel Wei left the town with his soldiers another body of brigands from the Kushu Mountain in charge of Bao Xu and Li Kui entered the town by the north gate, and started to loot and set fire to the houses.
Colonel Wei dared not enter the town, and just as he was going to withdraw Guan Sheng and his brigands had come upon him. So he decided to retreat to the neighboring town of Zhongling County which he duly reached. Guan Sheng had however closely followed him, and surrounded the town with his brigands. But Colonel Wei did not offer to fight, and kept the gates carefully defended and guarded.
Seeing this Colonel Shan spoke to Guan Sheng and Lin Chong, "This man is very brave, and would rather die than submit to a defeat. We must therefore take a broad view of the position and not press him too closely. Instead of fighting I will go by myself into the town, and persuade him to join us. I can talk him over and induce him to submit to you without fighting."
Guan Sheng was much pleased, and agreed to the proposal.
Shan Tinggui went into the town alone, and was duly announced, and taken in to see Colonel Wei Dingguo. He said, "Just now the court is misguided, and stupid ministers are in power. So it would be better for us both join Song Jiang at Liangshan Marsh, and there wait until corrupt officials retire when we may change our course and surrender to the court."
Wei Dingguo was turning this over in his mind for some time before he spoke. "If they really wish me to surrender Guan Sheng himself should come here and make the proposal. If he does not come I would rather die than go."
Shan Tinggui then took his leave, and duly reported the conversation to Guan Sheng, who said, "I am not an important person, but he holds me in such a wrong esteem." He at once mounted his horse and was ready to go to the town.
But Lin Chong remonstrated with them, "It is hard to know men's intentions, and you had better think the matter over carefully before acting."
"He's my old friend so you need suspect nothing," said Guan Sheng. So he set off, and when Colonel Wei saw him he was much pleased, and at once agreed to submit and go with them. He invited him to dine and during the meal, they talked about old times when they were colleagues. That evening Colonel Wei left the town with his five hundred soldiers, and surrendered to the brigands. The next day they all set out for Liangshan Marsh. We will now relate what important news had reached Liangshan Marsh.

Song Jiang Attacks Zengtou Village at Night; The Unicorn Lu Junyi the Magnate Captures Shi Wengong alive as Prisoner

"I went north with Yang Lin and Shi Yong to buy horses," Duan said, "and I picked over two hundred strong, well-sinewed, fine-coated steeds. But on the way back, while passing through Qingzhou Prefecture, we were set upon by a gang of robbers, headed by Yu Baosi, known as the Spirit of the Dangerous Road. There were more than two hundred of them. They stole all our animals and took them to Zengtou Village. I don't know where Shi Yong and Yang Lin have gone. I fled through the night and am hastening to the stronghold to report."
Lin Chong agreed that it was necessary to discuss the matter with Big Brother. They all forded the river and repaired to Loyalty Hall, where they met Song Jiang. Guan Sheng introduced Shan and Wei to the various chieftains. Li Kui told how, after going down the mountain, he killed Han Bolong, met Jiao Ting and Bao Xu and, with them, broke into Lingzhou. Song Jiang was very pleased with the addition of these four brave men.
But he grew very angry when Duan related the robbery of the horses. "They did this sort of thing to me before," he cried, "and now they've behaved discourteously again! I've been unhappy day and night because I haven't avenged the death at their hands of Chao Gai the Heavenly King. If I still don't avenge him now, I'll be the butt of ridicule and shame!"
"Spring is here," said Wu Yong, "the ideal season for battle. When we attacked them before, we failed to utilize the terrain. This time we must be clever."
"I hate them to the marrow of my bones. I'll get my revenge or, I swear, I'll never return!"
"Shi Qian can fly over eaves and skim atop walls. Send him in to scout around. When he comes back, we'll confer."
Flea on a Drum was dispatched to Zengtou. Two or three days later, Yang Lin and Shi Yong, who had escaped, arrived at the fortress. They said that Shi Wengong had been boasting in Zengtou that there was no room on this earth for both him and the outlaws of Liangshan Marsh. Song Jiang was in favor of mustering their troops immediately.
But Wu Yong said. "Wait till Shi Qian comes back and reports. It will be time enough, then."
Song Jiang, filled with rage, was thirsting for revenge. He couldn't contain himself. He sent Dai Zong to fly to the village and report back quickly with all the news he could find. In only a few days Dai Zong returned.
"Zengtou wants to avenge itself for Lingzhou," he said. "They're raising an army and setting up a big emplacement at the village entrance, with headquarters in the Fahua Monastery. Banners mark their outposts for hundreds of li around. I don't know how we can get in there."
The following day Shi Qian returned and reported: "I made very detailed inquiries. They've built five forts. More than two thousand men are guarding the entrance, under Shi Wengong. This is the main fort. The north fort is commanded by Zeng Tu, with Su Ding as his lieutenant. Zeng Mi, the second Zeng son, is in charge of the south fort. Zeng Suo, the third son, commands the west fort. The east fort is under Zeng Kui, the fourth son. The central position, in the village itself, is held by the fifth son Zeng Sheng and the father Zeng Nong. Yu Baosi the Spirit of the Dangerous Road is a huge fellow with an enormous girth. He's feeding those horses he stole inside the monastery grounds."
Wu Yong summoned the chieftains to a conference. "Since they've got five forts," he said, "we'll divide into five columns and attack each separately."
Lu the Magnate rose. "I have not yet shown my gratitude for being rescued and brought here. I would now like to go forward and give my all. Would that, I wonder, meet with your respected approval?"
Song Jiang was delighted. "If you're willing to go down the mountain, Magnate, you may lead the vanguard."
"The Magnate has arrived only recently," Wu Yong intervened. "He has no battle experience, the mountain paths are tortuous and ill-suited for riding. Rather than lead the vanguard, he would be better at the head of a contingent in ambush on the plain. When he hears the sound of our central unit's cannon, he can reinforce us."
Wu Yong was afraid that Lu would capture Shi Wengong and Song Jiang would feel constrained to fulfil the dying wish of Chao Gai that leadership be given to whoever caught his killer. Song Jiang, on the contrary, hoped that Lu would make the capture precisely so that he could turn over command of the stronghold to him out of respect to Chao Gai. But Wu Yong was adamant. He directed Lu to go with Yan Qing and five hundred infantry to paths upon the plain and await the signal.
Wu Yong divided the outlaw forces into five columns. Against the fort due south of Zengtou would go three thousand cavalry under Qin Ming the Thunderbolt and Hua Rong, seconded by Ma Lin and Deng Fei. The fort east of the village would be attacked by three thousand infantry under Zhishen the Tattooed Monk and Wu Song the Pilgrim, with Kong Ming and Kong Liang as their lieutenants. Yang Zhi the Blue-Faced Brute and Nine Dragons Shi Jin, seconded by Yang Chun and Chen Da, would lead three thousand cavalry against the fort north of Zengtou. Sent against the fort to the west were three thousand infantry under Zhu Tong the Beautiful Beard and Lei Heng the Winged Tiger. Zou Yuan and Zou Run were their seconds in command. The central fort would be attacked by five thousand troops under commander-in-chief Song Jiang, Military Advisor Wu Yong, and Gongsun Sheng, accompanied by Lu Fang, Guo Sheng, Xie Zhen, Xie Bao, Dai Zong and Shi Qian. Bringing up the rear would be a five thousand man unit of mixed infantry and cavalry under Li Kui the Black Whirlwind and Fan Rui the Demon King Who Roils the World, with Xiang Chong and Li Gun as their lieutenants. The remaining chieftains would stay to guard the mountain stronghold.
The five columns led by Song Jiang advanced rapidly. Scouts reported their approach to Zeng Senior, who summoned Shi Wengong and Su Ding for a military conference.
"All we have to do is dig a lot of concealed pits and we'll catch their toughest commanders and fiercest men," said Shi. "That's the best way to deal with those scruffy bandits!"
Zeng Senior ordered his vassals out with mattocks and shovels to dig pits all round the entrance to the village, and cover them over with mats and earth. Then he had soldiers lie in ambush near the pits and wait for the arrival of the enemy. He had a dozen of so pits also dug around the northern approach to the village.
While Song Jiang's army was on the march Wu Yong sent Shi Qian ahead to scout. A few days later, Flea on a Drum returned and reported: "Pits have been dug north and south of Zengtou, I don't know how many, to trap us."
Wu Yong laughed. "Nothing remarkable about that!" He led the troops on until they were quite near the village.
Around noon that day the advance unit saw a rider passing by. Bronze bells tinkled on his horse's neck, and pheasant plumes were tied to its tail. The rider wore a black hat and white robe, and he carried a short spear.
Men of the vanguard wanted to give chase, but Wu Yong stopped them. He ordered them to make camp where they were, dig a deep moat on all four sides, and lay out a perimeter of iron spikes. Each of the five columns was directed to do the same.
For the next three days no one came forward from the Zengtou forts to give battle. Wu Yong once again sent Shi Qian, this time disguised as a junior officer manning one of the ambushes, to find out why. Flea on a Drum made a mental note of the concealed pits, how far they were from the various forts, and how many of them there were in total. In a single day, he had all the information required, in detail, and he returned and reported.
The next day Wu Yong instructed the vanguard infantry to divide into two units, equipped with mattocks. He also directed that one hundred carts be loaded with reeds and dry brushwood and be concealed among the central column.
That night he ordered that the infantry columns first attack the forts to the east and west of Zengtou at mid-morning the following day. The cavalry under Yang Zhi and Shi Jin should spread out in a straight line before the northern fort. If the foe there beat drums and waved banners, they should put on a display of fight, but under no circumstances advance. Wu Yong's orders were transmitted.
Shi Wengong was hoping that Song Jiang's forces would attack the south fort and fall into the concealed pits. The road before it was narrow.
Where else could they go?
At mid-morning the next day the sound of cannon was heard up ahead. Pursuit troops gathered at the south gate. Then a messenger arrived from the east fort.
"A monk with an iron staff and a pilgrim brandishing a pair of long knives are attacking us front and rear," he reported.
"They must be Lu Zhishen and Wu Song of Liangshan Marsh," said Shi Wengong. He sent part of his soldiers to support Zeng Kui.
From the west fort another messenger arrived. "A big fellow with a long beard and a robber with a face like a tiger, with banners reading Beautiful Beard Zhu Tong and Winged-Tiger Lei Heng, are pressing us hard," he said.
Shi Wengong sent a portion of his men to aid Zeng Suo. Once more cannon boomed ahead. Shi had no more troops to spare. He could only wait for his adversaries to advance and tumble into the pits, at which time his soldiers hiding behind the hills would come out and help Shi nab them.
But Wu Yong swept forward around the hills in two flanking movements. The infantry guarding the fort was afraid to leave it. The soldiers flushed out of ambush were driven towards the fort by Wu Yong's pursuing troops, and large numbers of them fell into the pits.

Shi Wengong was about to sally forth when Wu Yong pointed with his whip. Gongs crashed and from the midst of the outlaw forces a hundred carts were pushed out and set ablaze. The conflagration of reeds, brushwood, sulphur and nitrate concealed the sky with smoke and flames. By the time Shi and his soldiers emerged their road was blocked by burning carts. They could only avoid them and hastily retreat. Gongsun waved his sword and conjured up a mighty wind which blew the flames into the south gate of the fort. Several buildings and part of the stockade burst into blaze and were destroyed.
A victory had been won. Trumpets summoned the outlaws to reassemble. They returned to their camps and rested. That night Shi repaired his gate and both sides secured their positions.
The next day Zeng Tu said to Shi Wengong: "If we don't kill their leaders it will be hard to wipe those bandits out." Telling his tutor to defend the fort, he donned his armor, mounted, and rode out at the head of his troops to challenge his adversaries to battle.
When Song Jiang heard who it was, he proceeded to the front, escorted by Lu Fang and Guo Sheng. He saw Zeng Tu under an arch of banners, and he burned with hatred. He pointed at him with his whip.
"Who will take that scamp for me and get me my long-awaited revenge?"
Lu Fang the Little Duke clapped his steed and rode against Zeng Tu, holding upright his crescent-bladed halberd. The antagonists met amid a clash of weapons. They fought over thirty rounds. From beneath the arch of pennants Guo Sheng could see that Lu Fang was weakening. He had fought well for the first thirty rounds, but his movements had become clumsy, and he was forced on the defensive.
Fearful that Lu Fang would be defeated, Guo Sheng suddenly mounted and, twirling his own crescent-bladed halberd, flew onto the battlefield and joined in the attack on Zeng Tu. The three horsemen locked in combat.
A panther's tail, with spots like gold coins, dangled from the head of each of the halberds. Both were lifted as the two outlaws closed in to seize their opponent. Zeng Tu had a quick eye. He raised his lance and entangled the tails, but the crimson tassel on his own weapon was also caught. He couldn't pull them apart. All three men were wrenching to free them.
Hua Rong, watching from the outlaws' position, was afraid his two companions would suffer. He rode forward, his left hand grasping his bow, his right hastily fitting a long slim arrow. He bent the bow and let fly at Zeng Tu. At that very moment Zeng Tu had extricated his lance, while the halberds were still entangled and, quicker than it takes to say, was thrusting at Lu Fang's neck. The arrow struck him in the left arm, knocking him from his saddle. Lu Fang and Guo Sheng's halberds swiftly took his life.
A dozen horsemen galloped back and reported to Shi Wengong, who reported in turn to the central fort. Zeng Senior wept aloud. The warrior beside him, his son Zeng Sheng, was enraged. A man of superb skill with arms, he wielded a pair of swords with such deadliness that no foe dared come near him. He ground his teeth in fury.
"Prepare my horse," he yelled. "I'm going to avenge brother!"
His father couldn't stop him. In full armor, he took his swords, mounted, and rode to the front fort.
"You mustn't underestimate the enemy." Shi Wengong warned him. "Song Jiang has many intelligent bold officers. In my humble opinion we should continue holding our five forts while secretly dispatching an emissary to Lingzhou to request that the throne be petitioned immediately for a relief army. One half of it should be sent to attack Mount Liangshan, the other to defend Zengtou. That will take the heart out of the bandits. Their only thought will be to rush back to their stronghold. Then, though I am a person of no talent, I shall be glad to join with you and your brothers in pursuing and exterminating the brigands. We're sure to attain great distinction."
Before he had finished speaking, assistant instructor Su Ding arrived from the north fort. He agreed with Shi's proposal. "That scoundrel Wu Yong is full of tricks," he said. "He mustn't be considered lightly. Defense is the best course. When the relief army arrives, we can discuss long-range plans again."
"They killed my brother," Zeng Sheng shouted. "He must be avenged! Why should we wait! Delay will only give the enemy time to gather strength and make them harder to defeat!"
Neither Shi nor Su could dissuade him. Zeng Sheng mounted and, with a few dozen horsemen, flew from the fort to challenge the foe.
Song Jiang was notified. He instructed the advance force to give battle. Qin Ming, on receiving the order, started to go out, brandishing his wolf-toothed cudgel, against Zeng Sheng. But suddenly Li Kui, axes in hand, rushed forward without a word to anyone and occupied the center of the arena.
One of the enemy recognized him. "That's Li Kui the Black Whirlwind," he said.
Zeng Sheng directed his archers to shoot. Ordinarily, Li Kui went naked into combat, and he relied on the shields of Xiang Chong and Li Gun for cover. But this time he rushed out alone, and an arrow struck him in the leg. He fell like a collapsing Mount Taishan. The horsemen behind Zeng Sheng galloped forward to seize him, while Qin Ming and Hua Rong raced from the opposite side, followed by Ma Lin, Deng Fei, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng. Since Song Jiang's men outnumbered him, Zeng Sheng was afraid to continue the engagement. He and his soldiers returned to the fort. Song Jiang called his forces back to camp.
The next day, Shi Wengong and Su Ding opposed any further combat.
But they had no affect on Zeng Sheng. "Brother must be avenged," he insisted. Shi had no choice but to don his armor and mount. His horse was the famous White Jade Lion That Glows in the Night which he had taken forcibly from Duan Jingzhu. Song Jiang rode out with his chieftains to meet him.
Shi raced fiercely towards them. Qin Ming, eager for first honors, flew forward. The animals met and weapons clashed. After twenty rounds Qin Ming faltered, and he rode back towards his original position. Shi, pursuing, thrust with his lance. He hit Qin Ming in the leg, and the Thunderbolt fell from his saddle. Lu Fang, Guo Sheng, Ma Lin and Deng Fei raced to his defense. Although they managed to rescue Qin Ming, the enemy inflicted casualties. They withdrew and made camp ten //from the fort.
Song Jiang ordered a cart for the Thunderbolt and had him escorted back to the mountain fortress to rest. Then he conferred with Wu Yong. They sent word to the stronghold for Guan Sheng the Big Halberd, Xu Ning the Metal Lancer, Shan Tinggui and Wei Dingguo to come and lend a hand.
Song Jiang burned incense and prayed, and cast divining sticks. Wu Yong looked at the omens and said: "Since this place is penetrable, enemy soldiers will surely slip into camp tonight."
"We'd better prepare, then."
"Don't let it trouble you, brother. Simply order the chieftains of three camps to combine them into two, one east, one west, and place Xie Zhen on the left and Xie Bao on the right of this one. Let the remainder conceal themselves in ambush on all sides."
This was done. That night, the sky was clear and the moon was bright. There was no wind or clouds.
Shi Wengong, in his fort, said to Zeng Sheng: "The bandits today lost two commanders. They must be frightened and depressed. This would be a good time to raid their camp."
Zeng Sheng immediately ordered Su Ding in the north fort, Zeng Mi in the south, and Zeng Suo in the west, to come at once with their soldiers and join in the attack. Around the second watch, they stealthily posted pickets, removed the bells from their horses and the clanking armor from the men, and crept into Song Jiang's central camp. No one was in sight. The camp was empty.
Realizing they'd been tricked, they turned to beat a hasty retreat. But from the left came Two-Headed Snake Xie Zhen and from the right came Twin-Tailed Scorpion Xie Bao, with Hua Rong appearing in the rear, and all closed in together. In the darkness, Zeng Suo was skewered by Xie Zhen's steel trident, and tumbled dead to the ground.
Torches were applied to Shi's fort to the rear and wild shouts rose as outlaw troops smashed into the stockade from the east and the west. A savage melee raged through half the night. Shi Wengong clawed out an escape route and fled.
Zeng Senior's agitation doubled on learning of the death of his son Suo. The next day he asked Shi to write a letter of surrender. The instructor, who was also very frightened, did so, and dispatched it by emissary to Song Jiang's camp. Song Jiang opened it and read:
Zeng Nong, lord of Zengtou Village, bows his head and respectfully greets Song Jiang, commander-in-chief. My sons in a moment of rashness wrongly offended your prestige. When Chao Gai the Heavenly King came with troops and reasonably demanded our submission, one of my underlings dared to snipe at him with bow and arrow. We also criminally stole your horses. There aren't words enough to express my apologies. All of this was against my wishes.
Now that dog of a son is dead, and I sent this emissary to request peace. If you will end the fighting and retire your troops, I will return all of your horses and highly reward your forces with gold and cloth. It is my sincere desire to avoid casualties on both sides. I pray you give this matter your consideration.
By the time he finished reading, Song Jiang was in a rage. "He killed my brother Chao Gai," he fumed. "Why should I quit! I'll raze that village to the ground!"
The emissary, lying prostrate, trembled uncontrollably. Wu Yong hastily intervened.
"You're wrong, brother," he said. "We contended with them because they abused us. But now they are asking for peace. Can we abandon principle because of a moment of anger?"
A reply was written and ten ounces of silver given to the emissary who returned to the village. Zeng Senior and Shi Wengong opened the missive and read:
Song Jiang, commander-in-chief of Mount Liangshan, sets his hand in reply to Zeng Nong, lord of Zengtou: Since ancient times a country without credibility must perish, a man without virtue must die, wealth gained without rectitude must be confiscated, generals without courage must suffer defeat. Originally there was no enmity between Liangshan Marsh and Zengtou Village. Each stayed within its own boundaries. But your evil deeds aroused our hostility. If you seek peace you must return the horses you stole on two occasions, turn over the thief Yu Baosi; and reward our soldiers with money and cloth. Let your generosity demonstrate your sincerity. If you change your mind, we shall have to take other measures.
Zeng Nong and Shi were both shocked and depressed. The next day Zeng Nong dispatched an emissary with another message: "If you want Yu Baosi, please send a man as hostage."
Song Jiang and Wu Yong dispatched Shi Qian, Li Kui, Fan Rui, Xiang Chong and Li Gun as an earnest of a desire for negotiations. Just before they left, they were told what to do in the event of an emergency, and urged to act promptly. The five departed.
Guan Sheng, Xu Ning, Shan Tinggui and Wei Tingguo arrived from the mountain stronghold. After a reunion with the other chieftains they were stationed in the central column.
Meanwhile, Shi Qian and the four bold fellows met with Zeng Senior. "Big Brother has ordered us here to discuss peace," said Flea on a Drum.
"If Wu Yong sends five men he must be up to some trick," said Shi Wengong.
Li Kui angrily grabbed Shi and commenced to beat him. Zeng Senior hurriedly intervened.
Shi Qian said: "Li Kui may be crude, but he has Big Brother's fullest trust. He was specially chosen. You have no need for suspicion."
Zeng Senior was very anxious for peace. Ignoring Shi, he served the five wine and invited them to rest in the camp in the Fahua Monastery, and posted a guard of five hundred soldiers front and rear. He then appointed his son Zeng Sheng his negotiator and sent him to Song Jiang's camp with Yu Baosi.
After presenting themselves at the central column, they delivered the horses they had stolen, plus a quantity of gold and bolts of cloth.
"These are the latest horses you rustled," said Song Jiang. "Where is White Jade Lion That Glows in the Night that you snatched from Duan Jiangzhu the previous time?"
"My instructor Shi Wengong has been riding it," said Zeng Sheng. "That's why we didn't bring it."
"You hurry up and write a letter, and say I want that horse back, quickly!"
Zeng Sheng penned a missive and sent a man with it to the fort. When Shi was informed, he said: "Any other horse he can have, but not this one!"
Several times the messenger shuttled back and forth. Song Jiang absolutely insisted. Finally, Shi dispatched a reply.
"If he really must have my horse, let him withdraw his army first, and I'll give it to him."
Song Jiang went into a huddle with Wu Yong. While they were conferring a man suddenly arrived and reported: "Armies from Qingzhou and Lingzhou are on their way!"
"When those rascals in Zengtou hear about this, they're sure to pull a switch!" Song Jiang averred.
He secretly ordered Guan Sheng, Shan and Wei to engage the Qingzhou army, and Hua Rong, Ma Lin and Deng Fei to engage the forces from Lingzhou. He also summoned Yu Baosi privately, reassured him and treated him with great kindness.
"If you're willing to perform meritoriously, I'll make you a chieftain in our mountain stronghold," said Song Jiang. "Vengeance against you for stealing our horses will be forgotten. I'll break an arrow in pledge. If you won't co-operate, Zengtou will soon be destroyed. It's up to you." Yu decided to give in and accept orders. Wu Yong told him of his plan.
"Pretend to have escaped and run back to your fort. Say to Shi Wengong: 'I was in Song Jiang's camp with Zeng Sheng, negotiating peace. From what I heard, I now have the true picture. Song Jiang's only purpose is to get back his fine horse. He's not interested in peace. Once you return the animal, he's going to turn on us. He's heard that relief armies are on the way from Qingzhou and Lingzhou, and he's in a terrible flap. You must take advantage of this situation and act. It's too good to miss.' If Shi heeds your advice, we'll be ready for him."
Yu went to Shi's fort and spoke as directed. Shi led him to Zeng Senior and said that Song Jiang had no intention of making peace, and that this was a good time to attack his camp.
"But Sheng is there," the father protested. "If we change, they're sure to kill him."
"We'll smash into the camp and rescue him, come what may. Tonight we'll order all of our forts to muster their full complement of men and go with us against Song Jiang's camp. Once we cut off the snake's head its body—the rest of the bandits—will be immobilized. When we return there will be time enough to kill Li Kui and the other four."
"An excellent plan, instructor."
Su Ding in the north fort, Zeng Kui in the east fort and Zeng Mi in the south fort were notified to join in the raid. Yu managed to slip into the fort in the Fahua Monastery and see Li Kui and the others. He surreptitiously told Shi Qian what was going on.
Meanwhile, Song Jiang said to Wu Yong: "I wonder how our plan is working out?"
"If Yu doesn't come back, that means they've fallen for it," said the military advisor. "Tonight, they'll probably raid our camp. We'll pull out, first, and lie in ambush on both sides. At the same time we'll send Lu Zhishen and Wu Song with foot soldiers against their east fort, and infantry under Zhu Tong and Lei Heng against their west fort, while Yang Zhi and Shi Jin attack the north fort with cavalry. This method is called 'The Foreign Hunting Dog Waits for the Quarry in Its Den.' It never fails."
That night Shi Wengong set out with Su Ding, Zeng Mi, Zeng Kui and their soldiers. The moon was hazy, the stars were dim. Shi and Su were in the lead, Mi and Kui covered the rear. Bells had been removed from the horses and clanking armor from the men. All advanced quietly towards Song Jiang's camp.
They found the gates open and not a soul inside. It was completely still. The raiders knew they had been duped, and quickly departed. As they hurried back towards their fort they heard gongs clashing and cannon booming in Zengtou. Shi Qian, who had climbed into the bell tower of Fahua Monastery, had clangorously tolled the big bell. This was the signal for outlaw artillery to open fire on the East and West Gates of the village. With a roar, countless brigands poured through the blasted portals, slaughtering as they came. In the monastery, Li Kui, Fan Rui, Xiang Chong and Li Gun vigorously fought their way out.
Shi was anxious to return to the fort, but he couldn't find the road. The fort itself was a scene of mad confusion. Zeng Senior, on being informed that the men of Liangshan Marsh were charging murderously in from two directions, hung himself in despair.
Zeng Mi, hastening to the west fort, died from a thrust of Zhu Tong's halberd. Zeng Kui, fleeing to the east fort, was trampled to jelly in the chaos by horses' hoofs.
Pursued by Lu Zhishen and Wu Song. Su Ding rushed pell-mell through the North Gate, outside of which were innumerable concealed pits. He ran into Yang Zhi and Shi Jin, who killed him with arrows. The men and horses fleeing in his wake tumbled one on top the other into the pits, countless numbers dying in their fall.
Shi Wengong's White Jade Lion steed was fleet. He galloped through the West Gate into the wilderness. A black mist curtained the sky. Shi couldn't tell north from south. He rode on for twenty //, not knowing where he was.
A gong crashed in a wood and four or five hundred troops surged out. The commander at their head held a long staff, which he swung at the legs of Shi's mount. The magnificent stallion, before the blow could land, leaped over its attacker's head and galloped on.
Shi continued to race through the night. Dark clouds massed, chill vapors floated, a black mist spread, a fierce wind blew. In the emptiness, wherever he turned he was dogged by Chao Gai's spirit. Shi resumed his original road, and he ran into Yan Qing the Prodigy and Lu Junyi the Magnate.
"Where do you think you're going, wretched thief!" shouted Lu. With one thrust of the halberd into Shi's leg, he brought him from his saddle. Lu tied him up and marched him to Zengtou. Yan Qing led the famous steed to the main camp.
Song Jiang was both delighted and angry. While glad that Lu Junyi had distinguished himself, he was enraged to see Shi Wengong, who had slain Chao Gai the Heavenly King.
First he had Zeng Sheng decapitated and every member of the Zeng family slaughtered, old and young, without exception. Then he stripped the village of all gold, silver, valuables and grain and loaded them onto carts for delivery to the mountain stronghold, where they would be distributed as rewards among the chieftains and troops.
Meanwhile, Guan Sheng drove off the army from Qingzhou, and Hua Rong scattered the soldiers from Lingzhou, and they and their forces returned to the village. Not a chieftain, big or small, had been lost, and Song Jiang had regained the White Jade Lion That Glows in the Night, to say nothing of large quantities of booty.
Shi Wengong was locked in a cage cart, the outlaw troops were assembled, and all headed back for Mount Liangshan. None of the towns, villages or hamlets en route were molested.
On arriving at Loyalty Hall, they gathered before Chao Gai's spirit tablet. Xiao Rang the Master Hand, at Song Jiang's direction, wrote the memorial address. The chieftains wore mourning and wept. Shi Wengong's heart was cut out and offered as a sacrifice to the departed. The ceremony was completed.
Song Jiang then discussed with the chieftains the question of Chao Gai's successor.
"You, brother, should be the supreme leader, with Lu Junyi the Magnate as second in command," said Wu Yong. "The remaining brothers should retain their original ranks."
"Don't you remember Chao Gai's dying wish? 'Let whoever captures Shi Wengong become the ruler of Liangshan Marsh.' Today, Lu Junyi caught the knave and brought him up the mountain as a sacrifice to brother Chao Gai. Vengeance has been attained. It is only proper that he command. There's no need for a lot of talk."
"I'm lacking in both virtue and talent," Lu protested. "I wouldn't dare to assume such a position. Even if I were given the lowest rank, it would be too much."
"I don't mean to be overly modest." said Song Jiang, "but in three respects I am your inferior. First, I'm short and swarthy, ugly and incompetent, while you are handsome, stalwart, and of noble men. Second, I was only a petty functionary who committed a crime and had to flee. Because these brothers didn't scorn me, I was allowed to rule temporarily. But you are the son of a powerful family, and renowned for gallantry. Although you were in a bit of danger for a while, Heaven has defended you, and you're now out of trouble. Third, I can neither maintain stability in civil affairs nor win the support of troops in military matters. I haven't the strength to strangle a chicken, or draw a bow as much as an inch, whereas you can deal with a thousand enemies at once. You understand the present and are learned in the past. There's no one who doesn't concede your superiority. Because of your talent and virtue it is entirely fitting that you be the ruler of our mountain stronghold. Later, when you return to the service of the emperor and through merit build your career, you surely will become a high official, and we brothers will bask in your reflected glory. My mind is made up. You mustn't refuse any longer."
Lu Junyi respectfully and humbly kowtowed. "Brother, say no more," he begged. "Even if I die for it, I cannot accede to your order!"
"Remain as leader, let Lu be second in command," Wu Yong urged, "and everyone will be satisfied. You'll chill our men's hearts if you keep on relinquishing like this!" He had already noted the expressions on the faces of the others before making this statement.
Li Kui the Black Whirlwind raised his voice loudly: "I risked my life at Jiangzhou to come here with you. We've given you your way in everything. I'm not afraid of Heaven itself, so I ask you: Why do you keep trying to give up the friggin command? I'll start killing again! We can dissolve the gang!"
Wu Song also took Wu Yong's hint. "There are many high military officers under you, brother," he said, "who once took their orders from the emperor. They'll listen to you, but not to anyone else."
Liu Tang said: "There were seven of us when we first came up the mountain. It was our intention then to make you our leader. We couldn't serve another now."
"If you give up command, brother," Lu Zhishen shouted, "I say we should pack it in and each go his separate way!"
"Enough," Song Jiang cried. "I have a method. Whatever is Heaven's will, we'll act accordingly."
"What is your proposal," said Wu Yong. "Please tell us."
"It involves two matters," said Song Jiang. And because of these, 2 heroes were added to Mount Liangshan, and the district town of Dongping was stricken by calamity. The stars of Heavenly Spirits joined in loyal righteousness, and in Liangshan Marsh the stars of Earthly Fiends gathered.

When Yellow Dog caught up with Leopard's Head and the others he said: "I went up north with Panther and the Guv to buy horses. When we got there we chose only the best thoroughbreds, sturdy, swift horses with strong legs and healthy coats. We bought over two hundred. When we got back into Qingzhou territory, a band of robbers attacked — at least two hundred there were and the leader of them was Yu Baosi, otherwise called Perilous — they stole the whole lot and carted them off to Zengside. What became of Panther and the Guv I don't even know. I didn't wait around but came back as fast as I could to tell everyone what had happened."

Scimitar said they should return to the stronghold at once and confer with the Leader about this. So they crossed the water and went straight to the Ceremonial Hall to see Song Jiang. First Scimitar introduced the Water General and the Fire General to all the others and Iron Ox told of his encounter with ill-fated Bolong and how he had happened upon Nameless and Pluto and how they went together to attack Lingzhou. Song Jiang rejoiced that four new heroes had been added to the company. Then Yellow Dog gave a detailed account of the theft of the horses. Song Jiang was incensed. "They stole my horse once before. Now it's the same old story. It is a constant worry to me that Chao Gai's untimely death, for which they were responsible, has still not been avenged. If we do not go and teach them a lesson, we shall be a laughing-stock."

The Professor said: "It's spring and the weather is warm, it's a good time for a campaign. Previously when we fought them they were favoured by the terrain. This time we must go about it more astutely."

Song Jiang said: "This hatred has entered into the very marrow of my bones. I swear never to return till I have vengeance."

The Professor said: "The Flea has the right qualities for this job, we must send him first to reconnoitre. When he comes back we'll make our plans."

The Flea accordingly took himself off. Two or three days later Panther and the Guv were back, having managed to escape unharmed. They told how at Zengside Instructor Shi Wengong was boasting away and saying how he wasn't prepared to share power with the forces of Mount Liang.

Song Jiang was all for setting out at once, but the Professor said: "Wait till the Flea reports back, then we can go."

But Song Jiang was choking with rage. Until he had his revenge, he couldn't bear to sit still, so he sent the Magic Messenger off with orders to spy out the land and report back as fast as he possibly could.

Just a few days later, the Magic Messenger returned and said: "It seems Zengside wants to get back at us for the sacking of Lingzhou. They're raising an army. They've set up a camp just outside their town, with the main army headquarters in the Fahua Temple and flags planted for dozens of miles all around. It's hard to see how we can find a way through."

A day later the Flea returned and reported: "I went right into Zengside and I found out everything. They have built five well-fortified camps. Right outside Zengside there are two thousand plus troops guarding the town. In the main camp Instructor Shi Wengong is in command, with Zeng Tu, that's the eldest, on the north and Instructor Su Ding as his deputy. The second son, Zeng Mi, is on the south, number three, Zeng Suo, on the west, number four, Zeng Kui, on the east and number five, Zeng Sheng, in the centre with his father Zeng Nong. The fellow they call Perilous, who is extremely tall and broad to match, is looking after the stolen horses at the Fahua temple."

After hearing this the Professor called all the leaders together and it was agreed that since the enemy had five camps they should appoint five leaders, each to lead a division against one of the camps.

At this point the Unicorn sprang up and said: "You did me the service of rescuing me and bringing me here and I have not been able to repay it yet, so I would like now to offer myself to lead the attack. Have I your consent?"

Song Jiang was pleased with this and said: "If you are willing to go, you can command the first unit."

The Professor said: "You only arrived recently and you have not had any experience in battle yet. The mountains are steep and precipitous, treacherous terrain for riding. It's not a good idea for you to go first. Instead of leading a troop of cavalry, you should set up an ambush on level ground. Then at a given signal you can come up in support."

What was behind the Professor's proposal was the fear that the Unicorn might capture Instructor Shi Wengong and then in accordance with Chao Gai's last wishes Song Jiang would step down in favour of their enemy's vanquisher. That is why he didn't want the Unicorn to lead the first contingent. Song Jiang's idea, on the other hand, was precisely for the Unicorn to make some important contribution so that he could take the opportunity to make him chief of the mountain fortress.

Well, the Professor wasn't having any of it and insisted that the Unicorn should take the Prodigy and five hundred foot soldiers to take up a position on one of the small roads on the plain and await the signal.

The five army divisions were also announced: they were Thunderclap and Colonel Hua, with the Flautist and Redeye as his lieutenants and three thousand cavalry to attack the camp due south of Zengside; Monk and Pilgrim, with the two Kong brothers and three thousand infantry against the camp on the east; the Blue-Faced Beast and the Tattooed Dragon with White-Spotted Snake and the River-Jumper and three thousand cavalry against the camp to the north, Whiskers and Sergeant Lei with the Forester and Rhinoceros, against the camp on the west with three thousand infantry; the commanders-in-chief, Song Jiang, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun, aided by the Little Duke, the Halberdier, Snake, Scorpion, the Magic Messenger and the Flea and five thousand troops against the camp in the centre. Bringing up the rear would be five thousand infantry led by Iron Ox and the Demon King, with the Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost. The remainder were to stay behind and guard the mountain stronghold.

We shall leave Song Jiang and his five armies preparing their attack, and go to Zengside, whose scouts had observed these preparations and reported back. The head of the Zeng clan summoned instructors Shi Wengong and Su Ding to discuss the military situation.

Shi Wengong said: "We must oppose the Mount Liang attack by digging a lot of pits so we can capture this whole gang, troops and leaders together. That's the way to deal with this rabble. It's a pretty good plan, I think!"

Accordingly the head of the clan ordered all peasants and retainers to take their mattocks and shovels and dig dozens of concealed pits at the approaches to the village, covering them over with loose earth. Soldiers were to be concealed all around, lying in wait for the enemy. A few dozen pits were also dug on the road to the north.

But before Song Jiang's army set out, the Professor took the precaution of sending the Flea out on another spying mission. After a day or two the Flea returned and reported: "To the south and north of the Zengside camps a whole lot of pits have been dug to catch our cavalry."

"That's nothing to bother us!" said the Professor with a contemptuous laugh.

Under his orders, the army advanced and halted a little way off from Zengside. By now it was noon. The advance guard saw a Zeng horseman approach. His horse was decked with bells and a pheasant feather was attached to its tail. The rider wore a black headband and a white robe and carried a short spear. The troops wanted to give chase, but the Professor stopped them and told them to make camp. He gave orders for a ditch to be dug around the camp and filled with iron spikes. Each of the five divisions was to set up its own camp and dig a similar ditch filled with iron spikes.

They remained here three days and no one came out from Zengside to offer battle. The Professor sent the Flea off again to Zengside, disguised as a soldier from one of the Zeng ambushes, to find out why. He was also to inquire discreetly about the concealed pits, what distance they were from the camps and how many there were in total. Within a day the Flea had all the details. He made secret notes and reported back to the Professor.

Next day the Professor gave orders for the first division of infantry to be equipped with mattocks and split into two units. And over a hundred of the provisioning carts, loaded with reeds and firewood, were to join the main army. That night the commanders in each camp were told that in the morning the infantry were to start the attack on the east and west, and then the cavalry on the north led by the Blue-Faced Beast and Tattooed Dragon were to spread out in a line and if they heard drums and saw waving flags on that side make a deceptive show of power but not advance. These were the Professor's instructions.

Back in Zengside, Shi Wengong's plan was to draw Song Jiang on to attack his position and catch him in the pits. There was only a narrow road leading towards his camp and it was assumed that was the way the enemy would attack. Next morning cannon fire was heard in front of the camp. A large force of pursuit troops was mustered at the south gate. Next a report came from the camp on the east: "A monk with a steel staff and a pilgrim with two whirling swords are attacking us from two sides!"

"That must be Mount Liang's Lu Zhishen and Wu Song," said Shi Wengong. Fearing for the outcome, he sent reinforcements for Zeng the Fourth. But then it was reported from the camp on the west: "A fellow with a long beard and another most ferocious looking villain are attacking fiercely under banners which say "Whiskers Zhu Tong" and "Lei Heng the Winged Tiger". Shi Wengong sent off further reinforcements for Zeng the Third. More gunfire was now heard in front. Shi Wengong told his troops to keep calm and wait until the enemy fell into the pits, when the troops in ambush would come out and help to capture them.

At this point the Professor brought his cavalry round the side of the mountain taking a short cut along two small paths to arrive right in front of the enemy camp. The infantry guarding the camp at this point dared not move from their positions, and the troops in ambush were spread out on either side ahead of them. The Professor now attacked from behind and drove them all towards the pits. When Shi Wengong was about to make a sortie, the Professor pointed with his whip, a gun went off in their position and over a hundred carts were driven out and set fire to, so that the reeds and faggots on them, the sulphur and saltpetre all went up and the sky was filled with smoke and flames. When Shi Wengong and his troops rode out their way was blocked by the blazing carts. All he could do was tell his men to avoid them and try to withdraw. Taoist Gongsun now waved his sword and conjured up a great wind which swept the flames towards the south gate, burning down the enemy stockade and towers.

Reckoning the day was theirs, the Mount Liang commanders sounded the gongs to call all their forces back to base. That evening there were celebrations.

Shi Wengong spent all night repairing damage to the gates and both forces secured their positions.

Next day Zeng the First declared to Shi Wengong: "These bandits won't be finished till we've killed all their leaders." Leaving the defence of the camp in the hands of Shi Wengong, he led his troops out, mounted and in full armour, to challenge the enemy. When Song Jiang heard about this he told the Little Duke and the Halberdier to follow him and rode out in front. He halted under the pennants. The sight of Zeng the First rekindled all his rage. Pointing with his whip he shouted: "Who will take that bastard for me and avenge the former insult?"

The Little Duke slapped his horse, readied his square halberd and charged Zeng the First. Two horses met, two weapons were raised, and they went at it for thirty bouts. Waiting under the pennants, the Halberdier could see that one of the two was weakening. The fact was that the Little Duke's skill was no match for Zeng's. When he couldn't overcome his opponent in thirty bouts, his work with the halberd became ragged and all he could do was defend himself and try to dodge. Fearing his comrade was about to suffer defeat, the Halberdier urged his horse forward and charged, twirling his halberd, identical to the Little Duke's, and pressing Zeng the First hard. Out there in front of the armies the three riders blended into a single mass,

Now, to the end of the halberds was tied a golden panther's tail. Eager to capture Zeng, the Little Duke and the Halberdier both raised their weapons together, while Zeng with a quick eye used his spear to strike them aside. The tassel on the tip of his spear became entangled with the panther's tails and he could not pull it free. So there they were all three, tugging at their weapons but unable to use them.

Colonel Hua, a spectator among the ranks, saw this and fearing that both his comrades would be defeated urged his horse forward. He grasped his bow in his left hand and with the right hand took an arrow and fitted it to the string, bent the bow to the full and fired at Zeng. Zeng had just managed to wrench his spear away, while the two halberds remained entangled. It's slow in the telling but happens in a flash. Just as Zeng freed his spear and thrust at the Little Duke's neck, Colonel Hua's arrow hit him in the left shoulder, knocking him head over heels from his horse, the Little Duke and the Halberdier struck with the joined halberds and Zeng the First expired on the spot. A dozen of his cavalrymen galloped back and told Shi Wengong and the news spread throughout the main camp.

The head of the clan wept bitterly on hearing the news. At his side his youngest son, Zeng the Fifth, was inflamed with anger. Now this youngest son was remarkably skilled with his favourite weapon, a pair of javelins. No one liked to take him on. Maddened by the news of his elder brother's death, he ground his teeth and shouted: "Saddle my horse! I shall avenge my brother!" His father could not dissuade him. He donned full armour, seized his javelins, mounted and galloped out of the camp. "Don't underestimate the enemy," Shi Wengong warned him. "Song Jiang has a great many bold and resolute commanders. If you want my opinion, I think we should concentrate on defending the five camps and send a secret envoy to Lingzhou asking them to pass on an urgent request to the Emperor for reinforcements. With a good general and enough officers it would be possible to attack the bandits on two fronts. An attack on Mount Liang combined with a determined defence of Zengside would make them lose heart and send them scurrying back to their mountain. Then with my assistance, for what it's worth, and with the aid of your brothers we would rout them and undoubtedly win great glory."

Before he finished speaking the second in command from the northern camp, Su Ding, arrived. He heard the word "defence" and agreed: "That bloody Professor of theirs is a cunning bastard, don't underestimate him," he said. "Our only hope is to pull back. Until reinforcements arrive we must be very cautious."

Zeng the Fifth shouted: "They've killed my brother! How long must we wait to avenge him? We'll never get the better of them by just sitting on our arses while they grow in strength and confidence!"

Neither of the two instructors could stop him. He mounted and raced out of the gates, accompanied by only a few dozen riders, to issue his challenge. When Song Jiang heard, he ordered the advance guard to engage. In response to the order Thunderclap was just about to ride out to take on Zeng the Fifth, whirling his mace, when Iron Ox appeared. He made no inquiries, but axe in hand charged into the thick of things. There was someone in the enemy ranks who knew him and he muttered: "This is Mount Liang's Black Whirlwind, alias Iron Ox". When Zeng the Fifth saw him he ordered his archers to shoot. Now when Iron Ox fought he liked to strip naked and normally he had the barbarian shields of Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost to give him protection. But this time he charged forward on his own and was hit in the leg by Zeng the Fifth's arrow. He fell like a mountain. The horsemen following Zeng the Fifth charged forward eagerly. But from Song Jiang's ranks Thunderclap and Colonel Hua sped to the rescue, and behind them came the Flautist, Redeye, the Little Duke and the Halberdier to cover their retreat. When Zeng the Fifth saw how many people Song Jiang had, he dared not continue the fight and ordered his men back to camp. Song Jiang also recalled his forces.

Next day Shi Wengong and Su Ding had not intended to fight but Zeng the Fifth was so determined to avenge his brother that Shi Wengong was obliged to arm himself and mount his horse. This horse was in fact Moonlight, the thoroughbred originally stolen from Yellow Dog.

Song Jiang arrayed his forces against the enemy. When Shi Wengong came at them, Thunderclap thought to wrest the chief honour for himself and galloped forward to meet him. Two horses met, two weapons were raised. They fought around twenty bouts, till Thunderclap's strength began to fail him, and he retreated towards his own ranks. Shi Wengong gave chase and owing to his superlative skill with the spear caught Thunderclap in the back of the leg, toppling him from his horse. The Little Duke, the Halberdier, the Flautist and Redeye rushed forward to the rescue. But although the leader was saved the battle line was broken.

When the defeated troops were rallied they took up a defensive position some three miles from the main camp. Song Jiang called for a cart onto which Thunderclap was loaded. Whilst Thunderclap was taken back to the mountain stronghold to recuperate, Song Jiang conferred with the Professor. His idea was to fetch Scimitar and the Spearsman from the mountain, and for the Water General and the Fire General to lend a hand.

Song Jiang personally burnt incense and prayed for guidance and a horoscope was cast. When the Professor had examined the signs, he said: "Our position is not impregnable, without a doubt the enemy will attack tonight."

Song Jiang said: "We'd better make preparations then."

The Professor said: "There's no need to worry. First we must tell the leaders to abandon the camps on the east and west and set up an ambush with Snake on the left, Scorpion on the right. The rest of the troops should conceal themselves all around."

Evening came. It was a bright moonlit night, still and cloudless. Shi Wengong said to Zeng the Fifth: "The enemy lost two of their generals today. Their morale is bound to be low. We must take this opportunity to seize their camp."

Zeng the Fifth accordingly requested Su Ding in the north camp, Zeng the Second in the south and Zeng the Third in the west to bring up their forces for a joint assault on the enemy position. Some time before midnight they rode out silently with muffled harness bells and clad in light armour towards Song Jiang's main camp. When they found no one and knew they had seized an empty camp, they recognized a trap and hurriedly tried to pull out. Snake now attacked from the right and Scorpion from the left. Immediately behind them was Colonel Hua. In the darkness Zeng the Third was tumbled from his horse by a thrust from Snake's trident. Then torches were lit and a great cry went up, as troops came pouring in from all sides, attacking the camp. The battle raged half the night before Shi Wengong managed to fight his way out and return to base.

When the head of the Zeng clan heard he had lost another son he was overwhelmed with grief. He wanted Shi Wengong to write next day offering surrender. Shi Wengong was also scared, so he wrote the letter and sent a messenger with it to Song Jiang's camp. When the sentry reported there was an envoy from Zengside, Song Jiang had him brought in.

Song Jiang opened the letter and read:

Zeng Nong, laird of Zengside, respectfully greets General Song Jiang and begs to inform him: yesterday my youngest son, responding to a mad impulse, committed a grave offence against your dignity. On a previous occasion also when the great Chao Gai led an expedition here and quite understandably sought our compliance with his will, an unlucky arrow was regrettably fired by a foolish soldier. There is also the matter of some stolen horses. Words cannot sufficiently express the regret that I feel on account of all this, none of which was of my own seeking. Now my foolhardy son is dead and I send my ambassador to you to sue for peace. If you will graciously agree to abandon hostilities and withdraw your troops all the previously stolen horses shall be restored to you and a quantity of valuables handed over in recompense to your armies, that further bloodshed may be avoided on either side. I beg you to give this proposal your most considered attention.

This letter greatly annoyed Song Jiang when he read it. He tore it to pieces and abused the sender: "How can I call an end to the quarrel when they killed our brother? I must wipe out their village, nothing else will do."

The envoy was cowering on the ground, trembling in terror. The Professor hurriedly intervened, saying to Song Jiang: "You are mistaken, my friend. We fought them to avenge an insult. But now they have sent someone with a peace proposal and we cannot sacrifice what is right to the indulging of our resent-ment." He wrote out a reply and gave two taels of silver as a reward to the envoy, who returned to his camp and presented the letter. Old Zeng and Shi opened the letter and here is what they read:

Song Jiang, commander in chief of the forces of Mount Liang, in reply to Zeng Nong, laird of Zengside: it is said that a nation is licensed to rule by its good faith, a general enabled to dominate barbarians through his bravery; that a man without courtesy is nothing and that ill-gotten gains have no worth. Originally Mount Liang and Zengside had no quarrel. But through an unprovoked act of aggression on your part hostility arose. If you would speak of peace you must make restitution of the horses stolen on two occasions, hand over the thief known as Perilous, and recompense our armies financially. Let generosity be the mark of your sincerity. If not, we shall draw our own conclusions.

This communication dismayed Zeng Senior and Shi Wengong. The following day Zeng Senior sent someone else to say: "If you agree to make peace, we should exchange hostages."

Song Jiang was reluctant, but the Professor said: "We lose nothing by it." Accordingly five hostages went off, the Flea, Iron Ox, Demon King, the Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost. Just before they left the Professor took the Flea aside and whispered in his ear: "You must do this, and this.... Make sure you get it right."

So now the hostages were gone and Scimitar, Spearsman, the Water General and the Fire General arrived. After being greeted they were lodged in the main camp.

The Flea and his four companions presented themselves in Zengside. The Flea said: "I am here at our Leader's behest, with Iron Ox and these others, to negotiate peace."

Shi Wengong said: "The Professor has sent five of them. It must be a plot."

Iron Ox lost his temper. He grabbed Shi and started hitting him. Zeng Senior hurriedly tried to calm him down, while the Flea said: "Iron Ox may seem a little uncouth, but he is very dear to the Leader's heart. He sent him especially to allay your suspicions."

Zeng Senior desperately wanted to make peace, and he did not listen to his second-in-command. He entertained them with wine and then let them go to the camp at the Fahua Temple to rest. Five hundred soldiers were positioned all around them. Then he sent his son Zeng the Fifth with Perilous to Song Jiang's camp to negotiate terms.

The two men presented themselves and then the horses which had been stolen on the second occasion, together with a cartload of gold and silk, were handed over.

Song Jiang said: "These are all horses that were stolen last time. But what about that special white horse called Moonlight that Yellow Dog was bringing me; why isn't it here?"

Zeng the Fifth said: "It's the horse which instructor Shi rides, that's why we didn't bring it."

Song Jiang said: "Well, you'd better write a letter and tell them to return it to me, and be quick about it."

Zeng the Fifth wrote the letter and sent one of his followers back with it. Shi Wengong responded by saying: "I'd be prepared to part with any other horse. But I won't give him that one."

The messenger came and went several times. Song Jiang was adamant: he must have the horse. Shi Wengong finally sent a man to say: "If he insists on having this horse of mine, tell him I'll give it to him when he withdraws all his troops."

Song Jiang discussed this reply with the Professor. Before they had reached any conclusion, a man rushed in and said: "There are troops heading this way along the Qingzhou and Lingzhou roads."

"If those buggers hear about this, they'll pull out of the deal," Song Jiang said. Orders were given quietly and Scimitar, the Water General and the Fire General set out to confront the forces on the Qingzhou road, while Colonel Hua, the Flautist and Redeye went to meet the army on the Lingzhou road. Then Song Jiang secretly called in Perilous, and after a good deal of flattery and friendly treatment said: "If you are willing to join us in our enterprise, I will make you one of the leaders. We'll forget about the theft of the horses. I break this arrow as my pledge. If you don't agree, Zengside will sooner or later be destroyed and it will be your fault."

Perilous was nothing loath to bow and submit. The Professor now expounded a plan to him: "Pretend you've managed to escape and return to their camp. Tell Shi Wengong, 'When Zeng the Fifth and I were discussing peace terms with Song Jiang, I learnt the truth. Song Jiang only wants to get back the famous horse, Moonlight. He has no real intention of making peace. As soon as he's got the horse it will all change. I also heard that our reinforcements are coming up on the Qingzhou and Lingzhou roads. They are very worried about this. All we need do is devise some way to take advantage of it. We can't fail.' If he believes you I shall know what to do."

Perilous went straight to Shi's camp and said everything he had been told to say. Shi took him to see old Zeng and he repeated in detail how Song Jiang had no real intention of making peace and how they could use the opportunity to seize his camp. Zeng Senior said: "But they've got my son there, if we don't keep our word they'll kill him."

Shi said: "If we break into their camp we'll rescue him somehow. Send out the order to all the camps tonight for everyone to join in an attack on Song Jiang's main camp. Cut off the snake's head and the rest of the bunch will be helpless. We can kill Iron Ox and the others when we get back."
Zeng Senior said: "I leave you to plan the operation then."
Orders were immediately sent to Su Ding in the north camp, Zeng the Fourth in the east camp and Zeng the Second in the south camp to join in the attack. Perilous managed to slip into the camp at the Fahua Temple and secretly divulge the news to Iron Ox and the others.
Meanwhile Song Jiang was saying to the Professor: "What exactly is your plan then?"
The Professor said: "If that Perilous does not return, it will mean they have fallen for it. If they are coming to attack the camp tonight, we will stay hidden on either side, while Monk and Pilgrim take their infantry and enter their camp from the east and Whiskers and Sergeant Lei with their infantry enter on the west. The Blue-Faced Beast and the Tattooed Dragon can attack with cavalry on the north and cut off their retreat. It's what is called the Strategy of the Hidden Watchdog. It never fails."
Shi Wengong set off that night with Su Ding, Zeng the Second and Zeng the Fourth. It was a misty night with only the faintest starlight. Shi and Su were leading with the two Zeng brothers in the rear. Harness bells were muffled and the men wore light armour to prevent noise. When they reached Song Jiang's camp they found the gates open and absolutely no one there. There was not even the least sign of movement. Realizing they had fallen into a trap, they turned round and hastened back towards their own camp.
They found Zengside filled with the sound of gongs, drums and explosions. The Flea had climbed the bell tower of the Fahua Temple and rung the bell and at this signal the attack on the east, west and south gates had commenced, the sound of cannon fire mingling with the shouting of countless troops. Iron Ox, Demon King, the Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost had also set to work, bursting out of the Fahua Temple compound. In his haste to get back to his camp Shi Wengong lost the way. The Zeng Senior of Zengside seeing such turmoil in his camp and hearing that two columns of Mount Liang forces were attacking hanged himself. Zeng the Second rushed back to the camp on the west and was dispatched with a blow of Whiskers' halberd. Zeng the Fourth tried to re-enter the camp on the east but was trampled into the mud in the mêlée of men and horses. Su Ding fought his way desperately to the north gate but here there were innumerable pits and with Monk and Pilgrim at his heels and the Blue-Faced Beast and the Tattooed Dragon facing him he died in a flurry of arrows. The troops pressing behind him were driven into the pits where countless numbers perished.
Shi Wengong had his magnificent horse which could go so fast and he galloped out of the west gate and escaped into the wilderness. A black mist veiled the sky at this time and you couldn't tell north from south. When he had gone half a dozen miles he was completely lost. Then suddenly he heard harness bells from the direction of a small wood and four or five hundred troops appeared. Their leader carried a staff with which he struck at the horse's legs. But the horse was a real thoroughbred. It saw the blow coming, leapt over it and galloped on. As he raced forward Shi felt the clouds fly past and the cold air strike his face, while the black mist folded around him.
Suddenly in the void a man stood blocking his way, a ghost warrior as it seemed to him. He pulled his horse up short and turned back. But on every side, north, south, east and west, shades of Chao Gai entangled him. He returned to his former way, but now it was the Prodigy who stood before him, and the Unicorn also, who shouted: "Villain, where do you think you're going?" A blow from a halberd struck him in the leg and dragged him from the horse. He was bound with rope and taken back to Zengside. The Prodigy led Moonlight back to the main camp.
Song Jiang regarded the results of this action with mixed feelings. He was glad for the Unicorn's achievement. But it hurt him to remember how Shi Wengong had shot Chao Gai. The sight of his enemy was too much for him.
First Zeng the Fifth was executed. Not one of the Zeng clan now remained. The treasure and stores were seized and all they contained loaded onto carts and transported to Mount Liang, to be divided among the leaders, the biggest share going to the three armies.
By now Scimitar had repelled the Qingzhou forces and Colonel Hua had scattered the Lingzhou forces and all had returned safely. They had also obtained a magnificent horse, and a great deal of booty besides. No need to say more of that. Shi Wengong was locked in a prison cart, the troops formed up and all returned to Mount Liang. In the countryside they passed through on the way not a soul was harmed. Back in the stronghold all the leaders gathered in the Ceremonial Hall for a service for the benefit of Chao Gai's spirit. Song Jiang ordered Magic Hand to make out a proclamation requiring all the leaders to wear mourning and to express their grief. As for Shi Wengong, his chest was cut open and the heart ripped out and offered to Chao Gai's spirit.
Song Jiang now broached the subject of the leadership to the company assembled in the Ceremonial Hall.
The Professor said: "My worthy friend, I say the Unicorn should be number two, and the rest of us should keep our original places."
Song Jiang said: "Do not forget Chao Gai's last words: 'If someone captures Shi Wengong, whoever it may be, let him be leader on Mount Liang.' Today the Unicorn has taken that villain alive and brought him here as an offering to Chao Gai, avenging his death and obliterating the dishonour. He deserves it. There is no more to be said."
The Unicorn said: "My merit is slight and my talents scant, how can I be worthy to fill this post? Let me be least among you — it is still more than I deserve."
Song Jiang said: "I am not being modest when I say that there are three things in which I cannot compare with him. The first is my appearance: I am short and dark-skinned — I have neither his looks nor his talents. He is dignified in bearing and of imposing mien; he has the looks of an aristocrat. The second is my background: I am a mere government clerk and a criminal on the run. Our comrades were kind enough not to reject me and to allow me temporarily to be their leader. But he was born to a rich and noble family and has the name of a gentleman. It is true he faced certain troubles recently, but heaven has delivered him. The third thing is that I have neither knowledge of statecraft, nor confidence in my military leadership. There is no strength in my arm, no power in my body. Mr. Lu has the strength of ten thousand and knowledge of many things both ancient and modern, he is second to none. With such gifts as these it is only fitting he should be lord of the mountain stronghold. If the court accepts our allegiance again, he will accomplish great things. He will rise high in public service and his glory will be reflected on us all. My mind is made up. Do not oppose me."
The Unicorn prostrated himself and said: "All these words are of no use. I would prefer to die, I would solve the problem by relinquishing my life."
The Professor now urged: "My honoured friend, let Mr. Lu be second, we will all support that. If you persist in wanting to step down, it will be very bad for morale." The Professor had been watching the others' expressions when he came out with this. Iron Ox immediately gave a great shout: "I risked my life for you in Jiangzhou when I came with you. Everyone always gives way to you. But I'm not scared of anyone, not even heaven. You keep on stepping down to this one and that one, what's the fucking point? I warn you, I shall start killing and burning again!"
Pilgrim Wu Song guessed the Professor's intention and also put in his oar: "You've all kinds of military men under your command, many with commissions from the court. They accept your leadership, why should they be loyal to someone else?"
The Red-Haired Devil said: "In the beginning it was seven of us who came to the mountain. We chose to honour you with the leadership, and now you want to give it away to someone else!"
Lu Zhishen the Flowery Monk shouted: "If you insist on handing over to someone else we will each go our own way."
Song Jiang said: "Shut up, all of you! What I say makes sense. Let us consider what is heaven's will and then decide."
The Professor said: "If you have something more to tell us, please let us hear it."
Song Jiang said: "I've two points to make." And in consequence of what he now said, 2 new heroes were to be added to Mount Liang and disaster was to strike in Dongping:

The Mountain will have its complement of heavenly stars,
In the Marshes the earth stars will throng.

COLONEL WEI and his men had reached Liangshan Marsh, and were making arrangements for the men to cross the lake when Lin Chong saw one of their leaders, Duan Jingzhu, also arrive, and asked him where he had been.
Duan Jingzhu replied, "I went with Yang Lin and Shi Yong to the north to buy some horses. We bought two hundred very fine animals, and were bringing them here when we were stopped near Qingzhou by some brigands under the leadership of Yu Baosi, whose nickname is the 'Dangerous Road Spirit.' They seized all our horses and took them off to Zengtou, the Zeng Family Village. Yang Lin and Shi Yong went away somewhere I did not know, so I hurriedly came here by myself to report the matter."
Lin Chong saw the importance of the matter, and at once took Duan Jingzhu across the lake to the stronghold to report matter to Song Jiang. The two Colonels from Lingzhou were also introduced to Song Jiang and the other leaders. Li Kui also introduced Bao Xu and his men from the Kushu Mountain.
Song Jiang was very angry at the horses having been stolen, and said, "It is these thieves who shot Chao Gai to death, and so far no punishment has been inflicted upon them. As they have now robbed our horses again we shall be disgraced if we do not take our revenge."
"As it is now springtime," said Wu Yong, "and we have not much to do, we can arrange to attack them. When Chao Gai was fighting, he lost the advantageous position, but this time we must use some strategy. Shi Qian is excellent in scaling walls so we can send him as a spy, to detect the position inside Zengtou." This was agreed to, and Shi Qian took his departure. In a few days Yang Lin and Shi Yong returned to Liangshan Marsh, and reported that at Zengtou, Shi Wengong was very boastful, and declared that they would not live under the same Heaven with the brigands at Liangshan Marsh. Song Jiang upon hearing this wanted to dispatch his men to attack Zengtou, but Wu Yong objected, and urged that they must wait until Shi Qian came back. Song Jiang, however, was in a towering rage at this insult, and wanted immediate revenge. He sent Dai Zong to go there and quickly return with the latest news.
In a few days Dai Zong returned, and reported, "The leading family at Zengtou are preparing for an attack on Liangshan Marsh, and have established a big encampment at the Fahua Monastery."
The following day Shi Qian arrived and reported, "I got inside the village and made careful inquiries. The villagers are divided into five companies under the command of Shi Wengong. Yu Baosi keeps our horses in the Fahua Monastery."
Upon hearing this Wu Yong held general conference of all the leaders and addressed them, "As these men are divided into five companies so we can divide our forces in the same way, and proceed to the village by five different roads."
Lu Junyi stood up, and said, "You saved my life, but since then I have had no opportunity of recompensing you. I am willing to risk my life on this expedition, but I don't know what is your opinion."
Song Jiang asked Wu Yong whether he could agree to Lu Junyi doing this, and Wu Yong replied, "The roads between here and Zengtou are very rugged and wild, and we could not allow Lu Junyi to lead the vanguard. He had better lead a body of men in ambush on the open field, and when he hears the sound of our bombs, he can come and join in the fight."
Song Jiang instructed Lu Junyi to act in this way. The other leaders were then divided into five detachments, and altogether 22,000 men were placed under their charge. They were given full instructions.
In the village of Zengtou the scouts duly reported the approach of the brigands, the headman of Zengtou sent for Shi Wengong and Su Ding, the two military instructors, for a discussion. Shi Wengong said, "We must dig pits and traps for these brigands." The head of the village ordered all the people to make pits in the different places and cover them over with soil. The village guard was to be stationed near these traps.
Before the Liangshan Marsh brigands drew near the village, Shi Qian was sent in advance as a spy. He found out the whereabouts of these hidden pitfalls, and duly reported the matter to Song Jiang.
Upon hearing this Wu Yong laughed and said, "That is not important." He gave orders for the men to move forward, and they soon reached the outskirts of the village. It was about noon, and a horse galloped towards them with copper bells tinkling, and with a long plume on its tail. Its rider had white clothes and a black hat, and carried a short spear. The brigands wanted to rush forward and fight with him, but Wu Yong forbade this, and ordered encampment there. He also ordered that trenches were to be dug all around their position, and these were to be protected by iron palisades. He instructed the five detachments raise defensive works accordingly around their separate camps.
They encamped there for three days but the soldiers in the village did not show themselves. So Wu Yong instructed Shi Qian to enter the village again as a spy, and to find out what was happening. He was also to locate exactly where the hidden pits were. Shi Qian did this, and within a day had found out all about the hidden pits, and duly reported the details to Wu Yong.
This information was made known to all the leaders, and Wu Yong then ordered that a body of men was to be armed with hoes, and that a hundred carts were to be loaded with grass and reeds, and all these were to be concealed in the center of the camp. This was done, and then Wu Yong issued orders that at 10 A.M. the next day an attack would be made on the village on the west and east sides by foot soldiers only. On the north side, however, other mounted men were to be on parade with flags flying and drums beating, but they were not to move forward.
The following day Shi Wengong heard the noise of bombs and was informed of the approaching of the brigands on all four sides, but he held his men back waiting for the brigands to advance and fall into the hidden pits. But Wu Yong gave orders for his men to attack the soldiers at the South Gate from two sides instead of a frontal attack. This was done, and they not only avoided the hidden pits, but actually drove the soldiers into their own traps.
Shi Wengong upon seeing this brought soldiers to the South Gate to repel the attack, but Wu Yong had given orders for all the carts to advance avoiding the pits, and when near the gates the dry grass and reeds were all set on fire. The flames spread to the gate tower, and so set that on fire, and Gongsun Sheng having control of the wind caused a south wind to blow, which carried the flames into the village.
When Wu Yong saw this desired result he withdrew his men to their camp while Shi Wengong inside the village had the fires put out, and during the following night endeavored to repair the damage done at the South Gate.
The following day a son of the village head Zeng Tu expressed his opinion to Shi Wengong that if they did not capture the chief leader of the brigands they would have no chance in defeating them. He therefore proposed to take some men to fight outside, while Shi Wengong guarded the South Gate. This was agreed to.
When Song Jiang was informed that Zeng Tu had come out to fight he accepted the challenge, and rode forth accompanied by Lu Fang and Guo Sheng. When he saw Zeng Tu he was angry, and pointing at him with his whip called out, "Who will fight with that fellow and revenge the death of our late commander?"
Upon hearing this Lu Fang whipped his horse and galloped forward. The two men fought for about thirty bouts. Guo Sheng then noticed that Lu Fang would be defeated as his opponent proved more skillful. Lu Fang was showing weakness, and was making mistakes. He was acting entirely on the defensive. So Guo Sheng whipped his horse, and galloped forward with his halberd in hand to engage Zeng Tu. Both of the two brigands had leopard tails fastened to the end of their halberds, and as they both lunged at Zeng Tu he, in a flash, took his spear to ward off the halberds.
But the spear happened to catch the two leopard tails and so the three weapons were entangled. All three men pulled in order to free their weapons without success. Hua Rong seeing this realized that Zeng Tu had the advantage so taking his bow he shot an arrow which hit Zeng Tu in the shoulder and sent him off his horse. Lu Fang and Guo Sheng now drove their halberds into Zeng Tu, and killed him immediately.
This fatality was reported to the village and when the village head heard of his son's death he cried. But a younger son, Zeng Sheng, was very angry, and called for his horse, and shouted out that he would avenge the death of his elder brother. Zeng Sheng would not heed his father's objections, and rode out to the South Gate. There he met Shi Wengong who said, "You must not treat these men too lightly, as they are very talented and skillful warriors."
But Zeng Sheng was determined. "They have killed my brother, and I must have revenge." He rode forward accompanied by about ten men on horseback.
Qin Ming was in charge of the brigands' advance post, and he was ready to accept the challenge when he saw that Li Kui with his axes had already gone forth. The Zeng troops recognized Li Kui, and Zeng Sheng ordered his archers to shoot at him. An arrow hit Li Kui on the leg, and he fell down. Zeng Sheng ordered his cavalry to capture Li Kui, but the brigand leaders Qin Ming, Hua Rong, and four others, also moved forward at the same time to rescue him. Zeng Sheng seeing so many opponents ordered his cavalry to retire, and so Li Kui was rescued.
The following day Shi Wengong again was opposed to any offensive, but Zeng Sheng was still keen on having revenge, so at last Shi Wengong put on his uniform and mounted his horse. The brigands were ready for action, and Qin Ming rode forward to fight with Shi Wengong. But after about twenty bouts Qin Ming felt being overcome, and turned his horse to retire, but Shi Wengong was too quick for him, and wounded Qin Ming in his leg, so the latter fell off his horse. Four brigand leaders, however, rushed to his rescue, and took him back to the camp. The defeated brigands retreated about three //where they encamped. Qin Ming was placed in a cart and sent back to Liangshan Marsh. Reinforcements under Guan Sheng and three other leaders were at the same time called for from the mountain stronghold.
Song Jiang burnt incense and prayed to the spirits, and secretly caste lots to divine the further proceeding of the battle. Wu Yong read the indication of the lots and said to him, "Congratulations, as there is no need for fear. This night I am sure the villagers will again press their attack. We must warn our leaders of this, and divide our men into two camps to the east and west of this place. The mounted men must be stationed all around, and wait for orders." This was done accordingly.
That night the moon shone brightly. There was neither wind nor cloud. Shi Wengong spoke to Zeng Sheng, "We have wounded two of the brigand leaders today, and as they have retired after being defeated they will be afraid of us now, so we must press forward our attack." Orders were given for a march that night. Horses were not to carry bells, and all was to be done in silence. About 11 P.M. they started off, but upon reaching the place where the brigands had stopped, they found nobody there. Suspecting some trick, Shi Wengong gave orders for all to return to the village. But they had not gone far when they were attacked from both sides. Fires were set up by the brigands on all sides, and the fighting went on till midnight when Shi Wengong got back to the village and wrote a note to Song Jiang admitting defeat, and offering to surrender. It read as follows:
"Zeng Nong, head of the Zengtou village, sends greetings to Song Jiang, commander of the army. Previously my son seized your horses, and offended you by his ignorance. When Chao Gai came here we ought to have surrendered to him. Unfortunately one of our soldiers sent a stray shot which wounded Chao Gai, and we recognize the seriousness of that offense, and can offer no excuse for same. Allowance may however be made of the fact that it was done without orders. My two sons have been killed, and I plead with you for peace. If you will withdraw your men I will return to you all the horses. I will also send you money, for distribution among your men. By peace we shall avoid further bloodshed. I write this with all due respects, and hope for your kind consideration."
When Song Jiang read this letter he seemed to he angry and tore it into pieces. He said to Wu Yong, "How can we settle things in this way when they have killed our leader? We must wipe them out."
The messenger heard this, and trembled on the ground in fear.
Wu Yong exhorted Song Jiang, "I think you may be wrong. In this fight both sides were merely in a display of temper. Now that they desire peace we should be in the wrong if we refuse to consider their proposal." After further discussion he wrote at once a reply, and handed it to the messenger with ten taels of silver.
The messenger duly returned, and handed the reply to Shi Wengong and Zeng Nong who read it as follows:
"Song Jiang, commander at Liangshan Marsh, replies to Zeng Nong, head of the Zengtou. It has always been a fact that a country without confidence among the people must become extinct in the end; without propriety soon become of no account. Unjust gains must be robbed, Generals without bravery must soon be defeated. These are definite laws. Liangshan Marsh and your village had no enmity before, and we both guarded our own domains respectively. But recently you did a wicked thing, and so we are now enemies. If, however, you wish to have peace then you must return to us the horses you stole, and also hand over to us Yu Baosi who stole the horses. You must also give money to our men. If you are sincere you must not treat lightly the proper procedure."
When they read this both men were surprised. But the following day they sent a messenger to talk with Song Jiang that if Yu Baosi was handed over to the brigands they must also hand over a man in exchange.
When Song Jiang received this message he agreed, and sent not one man, but five of his leaders to be exchanged for Yu Baosi. Shi Qian and Li Kui were two of the five, and before they left Wu Yong gave Shi Qian secret instructions what to do in case of treachery.
When they reached the village they were taken before Zeng Nong and Shi Qian said to him that they had come to arrange peace. But Shi Wengong replied, "As Wu Yong has sent you five men to arrange peace I think he must have some trick."
Li Kui was very angry at this, and seized hold of Shi Wengong to fight, but Zeng Nong interposed.
Shi Qian also spoke, "This man, Li Kui, is very rough but he is a personal friend of Song Jiang. You need not suspect him as Song Jiang specially sent him here."
Zeng Nong wanted peace, and would not listen to Shi Wengong's remarks. He ordered a meal for the five men from the brigands and provided them a room in the Hahua Monastery, and placed a guard of 500 soldiers to look after them.
Zeng Sheng and Yu Baosi were duly dispatched to discuss peace with Song Jiang. They took with them all the stolen horses, and also a cartload of silver and embroidered cloth. When Song Jiang saw the horses he noticed that the splendid white race horse presented to Liangshan Marsh by Duan Jingzhu was not among them and therefore asked why it had not been returned also.
"That horse is now ridden by Shi Wengong," replied Zeng Sheng.
"Then you quickly write a letter at once demanding the immediate return of that horse," said Song Jiang.
Zeng Sheng did this, and sent the letter off by a messenger. When Shi Wengong read the letter he spoke to the messenger, "I will not return the horse, but am quite willing to send another horse instead of it."
The messenger went back with this message, but was soon back again with the word that the identical horse must be returned. Shi Wengong then spoke, "As Song Jiang insists upon the horse being returned, I will return it, but only on the condition that he first withdraws his men from the environs of our village."
When this message was delivered to Song Jiang he consulted Wu Yong, and while they were talking a scout arrived, and reported that Imperial troops were approaching by two roads from Qingzhou and Lingzhou. Song Jiang said, "If Shi Wengong gets to know this he will probably change his mind, so we must keep the matter secret." He then divided his men into two bodies, and gave orders that they were to march along the two roads to oppose the coming troops on the way. He then summoned Yu Baosi and said, "We have a very important commission for you to carry through, and if you succeed I will promote you to a position as leader at Liangshan Marsh. I will take a solemn oath by this arrow that I will bear no more grudge to your taking my horse. But if you do not agree I shall recommence the attack on Zengtou."
Yu Baosi agreed to do what he was requested. Wu Yong then said to him: "You must enter the village quietly as though you have secretly left us, and tell Shi Wengong that you think we do not really desire peace, but that Song Jiang will try to get back the white race horse by some deception. That as soon as he gets the horse, his attitude towards the village will change. That as troops are approaching here from Qingzhou and Lingzhou, the brigands are in great terror and the villagers may now embrace the opportunity to attack Song Jiang."

Yu Baosi left with these orders, and duly came back to Zengtou. When Shi Wengong heard the news he decided to recommence his attack on the brigands. Zeng Nong however objected to a renewed attack as it would endanger the life of his son Zeng Sheng who was then staying with the brigands. But Shi Wengong said that when they had seized the brigands' camp Zeng Sheng would be saved. Shi Wengong then gave orders for all the men to be ready for an attack that very night.
Yu Baosi knowing all this went secretly to the Fahua Monastery, and told Shi Qian and the other leaders there what had been arranged.
In the brigands camp Song Jiang asked Wu Yong whether their plan would be carried out.
"If he does not return," said Wu Yong, "then we can assume that Shi Wengong suspects us. We may expect them to attack us this night, but we will not oppose them, but retreat and lay in ambush on both sides of their road. At the same time we may dispatch our men to their village while it is depleted of soldiers, and so we can establish ourselves there. That plan is called, 'Drawing the wild dog from its hole.' It generally succeeds."
That night Shi Wengong got his men together, and marched out of the village. There was little moonlight. When they reached the brigands' camp they were surprised to find the gate open and the place quite deserted. Shi Wengong now suspected a plot and ordered a retreat. But they had not gone far when they heard bombs being fired in their village, and also heard the large bell in the Fahua Monastery booming. From the noise it seemed that the brigands had got into the village.
In the Fahua Monastery, Li Kui and the other three leaders were armed, and rushing out with swords in their hands. When the headman, Zeng Nong, heard that the brigands had got into the village he committed suicide by hanging himself. His son, Zeng Mi, was killed in resisting the brigands on the west side of the village. Another son, Zeng Kii, was also killed in the confused fighting on the east side. Su Ding was killed near the North Gate where he found himself opposed by Lu Da and three other leaders. Many of the villagers met their death by falling into the traps while trying to escape from the village.
Shi Wengong being mounted on the white race horse reached the village before any of his soldiers, but seeing the confused mass of fighting in the streets he immediately left by the West Gate. There was a great deal of mist that night, and in the dark and confusion he was soon uncertain where he actually was. He had gone about two //when he heard a gong sounded in a forest, and soon he saw a body of about five hundred men. In front of them was their leader armed with a cudgel. He ran up to Shi Wengong and struck his horse with the cudgel. But the horse leapt over his head and carried Shi Wengong off. The mist here however was extremely thick, and it was blown about by a very strong cold wind. He thought he saw the spirit of Chao Gai everywhere in the mist, so he turned his horse and went back by the same road. He soon met Yan Qing, the servant of Lu Junyi. He then met Lu Junyi himself who called out. "Thief! Where are you going?" So saying he wounded Shi Wengong in the leg with his sword. The latter fell off his horse, was immediately seized, bound with ropes, and taken back to Zengtou as a prisoner. The coveted horse had also been captured and brought to the village.
Song Jiang was excited to get the horse again. He gave orders that every member of the Zeng family must be executed, including Zeng Sheng who was a prisoner. The whole village was then looted, all valuables and rice being loaded on carts, and transported to Liangshan Marsh.
The troops from Qingzhou and Lingzhou were attacked and defeated, and then all the brigands returned to Liangshan Marsh. In the Loyalty and Justice Hall all the leaders assembled, dressed in mourning, and held a memorial service to the spirit of Chao Gai. A prayer was written addressed to Chao Gai, and then burnt as a sacrifice. Shi Wengong was executed, and his heart was also offered as a sacrifice.
After this Song Jiang raised the question for discussion as to who should now be the commander-in-chief at Liangshan Marsh.
"You should remain in that position," said Wu Yong, "and Lu Junyi should be your assistant. All the other leaders can remain as before."
"But we must not forget the will of Chao Gai," said Song Jiang. "He said that whoever should capture Shi Wengong should be our commander-in-chief, no matter who he was. As Lu Junyi captured that thief and avenged the injury to Chao Gai, he must be our head without any question."
"My virtue is insignificant, and my ability is meager, so how dare I accept the position? Even if I occupy the lowest position my abilities would hardly be enough for that work," said Lu Junyi.
"It is not for the sake of modesty that I decline the honor," said Song Jiang, "but because Lu Junyi is superior to me in three things. First, I am of smaller stature and have a sallow complexion, while he has a majestic bearing, and nobody can be compared to him. Secondly, I was once only a petty official and became your head only through the generosity and kindness of the brothers here; while he was a very wealthy and important person and was famous for his heroism. Thirdly, I had no influence in pacifying the country and am without military knowledge. I could not even capture a chicken. In my body there is not even an inch of merit, while he has the power to oppose ten thousand men, and is very well versed in both ancient and modern affairs. Having these abilities he is very suitable for the job. If the Emperor wants us to return, and help him to achieve meritorious deeds then we shall he honored, and shall be able to gain promotion in official rank. These are my firm convictions, and I hope that you will raise no objections."
Lu Junyi kowtowed, and said, "Your talk is useless, because even if you threaten to kill me I cannot accept the position."
"We all recognized you, brother, as our leader," said Wu Yong, "with Lu Junyi as your assistant. If you do not accept this, I am afraid that our men will regard you as being cold-hearted." So saying he glanced round inviting the approval of all the others.
Li Kui instantly called out, "I risked my life at Jiangzhou in your service and we all admitted you as our commander. You issued all the orders, so it is now useless for you to be hypocritical as to abdicate your post in another's favor. Why do you keep trying to give up the damned command? If there is any change I shall create a disturbance, so that everybody has to leave."
Wu Song had noticed Wu Yong appealing for support, so he now stood up and said, "We have many ex-military officers, and I am sure they all wish you to remain as our commander-in-chief. We are unwilling to have any other man in that position."
Liu Tang then spoke, "When we first came here, there were only seven brothers, and we unanimously elected you as our chief. Why do you now think of another man for that position?"
Lu Da spoke in a loud voice, "If you, brother, still stand on politeness we must disband."
"You need not say anything else," said Song Jiang; "I have an alternative. We must discover the Will of Heaven in this matter, and follow that."
"What is your own exalted view?" asked Wu Yong. "Please tell us."
"There're two things to be done," said Song Jiang.

Liangshan Marsh gains 2 more heroes.
Dongping Prefecture becomes scene of remorse.

The Tattooed 9 Dragons Shi Jin Is Trapped & apprehended in Dongping Prefecture; Song Jiang Chivalrously Releases & treats General Twin Spears Dong Ping with generosity

"We're short of money and grain," Song Jiang said to the assembled chieftains, "but to the east of here are two prefectural towns where they have both. One is Dongping, the other is Dongchang. While we've never disturbed their people, when we asked them to lend us some grain, they flatly refused. I'm going to have the names of these towns written on separate slips of paper. Lu Junyi and I will each draw one. Whoever first conquers his town will become the ruler of Liangshan Marsh. Agreed?"
"Good," said Wu Yong. "We'll abide by Heaven's will."
"Don't talk like that," said Lu. "Big Brother must remain as leader. Otherwise I won't accept the mission."
But Lu was over-ruled. Ironclad Virtue Pei Xuan wrote out the slips. Prayers were offered and incense burned. Then the drawing was made. Song Jiang picked Dongping, Lu got Dongchang. All of the chieftains were satisfied.
That day a feast was laid. While they were drinking wine, Song Jiang announced the disposition of the forces to be used in the attacks. His own command would consist of twenty-five chieftains including himself. They would lead an army of ten thousand infantry and cavalry. The three Ruan brothers—Second, Fifth and Seventh—would support them with a naval flotilla.
Under Lu Junyi would be another twenty-four chieftains. They too would command an army of combined infantry and cavalry numbering ten thousand, and would be supported by a naval flotilla under Li Jun, Tong Wei and Tong Meng.
The other chieftains, and those convalescing from wounds, would remain to guard the fortress. The dispositions having been made, the two armies set forth against the prefectural towns.
It was the first day of the third lunar month. The days were warm, the wind mild, the grass green, the turf soft—perfect conditions for battle.
We'll speak first of Song Jiang, as he marched on Dongping, Forty //from the town, he and his forces came to a village called Anshan, and there made camp.
"Cheng Wanli the governor of Dongping and his district military commander are both natives of Shangdang County, east of the river. The commander's name is Dong Ping. Because he's skilled with a pair of spears, he's known to everyone as General Two Spears. He has the courage of ten thousand," said Song Jiang.
"Although we're going to attack his town, we should treat him courteously. I want to dispatch two men with a written declaration of war. I shall urge him to surrender and avoid a battle. If he refuses, no one will be able to blame us for the carnage. Who dares to deliver my message?"
A man stepped forward. He was Yu Baosi. "I know Dong Ping by sight," he said. "I'll be glad to deliver the declaration."
Another man emerged from the ranks of the chieftains. His name was Wang Dingliu. "I haven't proven my mettle to the stronghold yet," he said, "and so I'd like to go with him on this mission."
Song Jiang was very pleased. He wrote his letter and gave it to the two volunteers. It stated only a request for grain.
When Governor Cheng of Dongping heard that an army under Song Jiang was camped in Anshan, he summoned his district commander, General Two Spears to discuss the military situation. Just as they had sat down, the gate-keeper entered and said: "Messengers from Song Jiang are here with a declaration of war."
Cheng directed that they be allowed in. Yu and Wang entered and presented the letter. Cheng read it. He turned to the general.
"They're demanding money and grain. What shall we do?"
The general was furious. He shouted for the emissaries to be taken out and decapitated. Cheng intervened.
"No! Since ancient times messengers between hostile states have never been killed. It would be highly improper. Let them each be beaten twenty strokes and sent back. We'll see what Song Jiang does next."
But the general was still fuming. He had the two bound and beaten till their skin split and their flesh burst asunder, and then had them driven from the town.
They returned to the camp, weeping. "That lout of a general has no sense of fitness," they complained. "He holds our fortress in contempt."
Anger filled Song Jiang's breast. He longed to level the town immediately. He instructed Yu and Wang to return to the stronghold and rest.
Nine Dragons Shi Jin rose and said: "I used to live in Dongping and was sweet on a girl in a pleasure house there. Her name is Li Shuilan. We were having a really warm affair. If I take some gold and silver and slip into town, I can stay in her house. I'll set a time, Big Brother, and you can attack. As soon as General Two Spears goes out to fight, I'll climb up into the Drum Tower and start a fire. Operating from within and without, we'll win a big victory."
"Excellent," cried Song Jiang.
Shi Jin put some gold and silver in a bundle, concealed a weapon on his person, and bid a respectful farewell.
"I won't move my troops, brother, until you pick an appropriate moment," Song Jiang informed him.
Nine Dragons entered the town and went directly to the home of Li Shuilan in the western pleasure house district. The pander of the establishment was startled to see him. He led Shi Jin inside and called the girl. Shuilan escorted Shi Jin upstairs and they sat down.
"I haven't seen so much as your shadow in ages. How come?" she queried. "I hear you're a big chieftain in Liangshan Marsh now. There's a notice out for your arrest. The last couple of days the streets have been buzzing with talk that Song Jiang is going to raid the town for grain. What are you doing here, anyway?"
"The truth is I am a chieftain on Mount Liangshan, but I haven't distinguished myself yet. Big Brother plans to attack the town for grain, all right. I told him about your place and he sent me here to spy. I've brought you some gold and silver. You're not to breathe a word. After this is over, I'll take you and your family up the mountain, and we'll be happy."
Shuilan glibly promised to do everything he asked. She accepted the money and served him food and drink. But later she discussed it with the bawd who was the pander's wife.
"When he was a regular caller, he was a good person," the girl said. "His coming here didn't matter. But now he's gone bad. If there's trouble, it won't be any joke for us."
"It's dangerous to provoke those bold fellows of Song Jiang in Liangshan Marsh," the pander cautioned. "They can take any town they like. When they break in here, they'll wreck everything. They'll go hard on us if we don't keep our word."
"Old idiot," his wife the bawd swore. "You're just ignorant! If there's a wasp in your bosom, pluck it out, as the old saying goes. Informants are never prosecuted—that's the universal rule. Go to the district court, quick, and inform on Shi Jin. Let them take him. Then, whatever happens, we won't be involved."
"He's brought us a lot of money," the pander said hesitantly. "What's the point of it if we don't do anything for him?"
"Animal," his wife exclaimed. "Your words are just farts! We bawds have harmed thousands! What's one more? If you don't inform on him I'll go down there myself and cry for justice—against you, as well!"
"Control yourself," urged the pander. "Tell Shuilan to hang on to him. We don't want to stir the grass and alarm the snake. He mustn't get away. I'll report to the police first, and let them nab him. Then I'll inform the court."
Shuilan went back upstairs. Shi Jin was struck by her alternating flushes and pallor.
"Is anything wrong? Why do you look so frightened?"
"I missed my step on the stairs and nearly fell. My heart's all aflutter."
Suddenly they heard footsteps running up the stairs and shouts outside the window. Dozens of policemen burst into the room. They hustled Shi Jin like a bound lion down the stairs, and rushed him to the district court of Dongping.
"You impudent scoundrel," shouted the governor. "How dare you come here to spy? If Li Shuilan's protector hadn't informed, you might have caused severe damage to our citizenry? Tell us the whole story, quickly! What did Song Jiang send you to find out?"
Shi Jin didn't speak.
"Rogues like that never talk unless you clout them," growled the general.
"Police and jailors, beat the villain," shouted Governor Cheng.
Shi Jin's captors spewed cold water on him, then struck him a hundred blows with big rods on each leg. He endured it, and didn't say a word.
"Put a heavy cangue on the lout and put him in the cell for the condemned," said General Two Spears. "When we catch Song Jiang we'll deliver them both to the Eastern Capital for punishment!"
To return to Song Jiang. After Shi Jin left, he wrote a letter to Wu Yong saying that Shi Jin had gone to the home of Li Shuilan the doxy to spy. The military advisor was shocked. He hastily conferred with Lu Junyi and hurried to Song Jiang that same night.
"Who told Shi Jin to go?" he demanded.
"It was his own idea. He said that the girl had been his mistress, that they were very close."
"You've made a mistake, brother. If I were here, I never would have agreed. Courtesans become intimate quickly, but they like new things and tire of the old. They've harmed countless talented men. They're as unstable as water. Even if she felt some genuine affection for him, she'd have a hard time going against her procuress. Shi Jin is sure to have come to grief."
Song Jiang asked what they could do about it. Wu Yong summoned Gu Dasao and gave her instructions.
"We must trouble you to go into Dongping. Disguise yourself as a poor beggar woman and slip into town. If anything's stirring, report back at once. If Shi Jin is in prison, approach one of the jailors and say you want to bring him some food, for the sake of past kindness. After you get inside, tell Shi Jin secretly. 'We're breaking into town the last day of the month around dusk. During the excitement, find a way to get yourself free.' The night of the last day of the month, you, Gu Dasao, start a fire as a signal. That's when we'll launch our raid."
Wu Yong turned to Song Jiang. "First, you must attack the county town of Wenshang, brother. The people are bound to flee to Dongping. Gu Dasao can mingle with the refugees and go in with them. No one will recognize her."
The military advisor mounted his horse and returned to Dongchang.
Song Jiang mustered five hundred men and sent them against Wenshang, under Xie Zhen and Xie Bao. Sure enough, the residents, supporting the old and carrying the young, scurried to Dongping to escape the battle. The town was thrown into confusion.
Gu Dasao, her hair dishevelled, her clothes in tatters, mingled with the crowds and entered the town. She begged along the streets until she came to the prefectural government compound. Her queries revealed that Shi Jin was indeed in prison.
The next day, carrying a jug of rice, she walked back and forth in front of the prison, waiting. Finally, an elderly policeman came out. She dropped to her knees and kowtowed, her tears falling like rain.
"What are you crying about, woman?"
"My former master Shi Jin is in there. It's been ten years since he left us. I heard only that he was travelling around as a merchant. I can't imagine what he's doing in jail. Nobody's sending him anything to eat, so I want to bring him this mouthful of food I've begged. Have pity, brother. Take me in. You'll be performing a greater blessing than building a seven-story pagoda."
"He's a bandit from Liangshan Marsh, and he's committed a capital offense. No one would dare to take you in there."
"He must accept what he deserves, even if it's death by slow slicing. But have pity on an old woman who only wants to deliver a mouthful of food for the sake of kindness in the past." Again Gu Dasao wept.
The old policeman thought to himself: "If it were a man, I couldn't do it. But what harm is there in a woman?" He led Gu Dasao into the prison where she found Shi Jin wearing a heavy cangue on his neck, and iron chains around his waist.
Nine Dragons was amazed to see her, but he remained silent. Gu Dasao pretended to weep and sob as she fed him from the jug. Jailors hastened towards them.
"That's a condemned evil-doer," they shouted. "Not even the wind gets in here. Who let you bring him food? Get out, quick, and save yourself a beating!"
There were too many people around. She couldn't say much, but only had time to whisper: "We're breaking into the town the last night of the month. Fight to free yourself."
Before Shi Jin could ask her what time of the night, the jailors drove her with blows out of the prison door. He remembered only "last night of the month."
It happened that the third lunar month had thirty days that year, instead the usual twenty-nine. But when Shi Jin asked one of the jailors, "What's the date?" the man remembered wrongly and said: "The last day of the month. I must buy some spirit paper to burn for the wandering souls."
Shi Jin could scarcely wait. Near evening, he got one of the keepers, who was half drunk, to take him to the latrine.
"Who's that behind you?" Shi Jin suddenly exclaimed.
As the man turned, Shi Jin wrenched open the cangue and struck him on the forehead with a corner of it, knocking him to the ground. With a brick Shi Jin smashed the wooden fetters on his feet. Falcon eyes glaring, he charged into the central pavilion, where several policemen were sodden with drink. He killed a few, the others fled.
Nine Dragons opened the prison gate, in anticipation of rescue from the outside. He released all the inmates, about fifty or sixty men. They came cheering out of their cells.

When the situation was reported to Governor Cheng, his face turned an earthen hue. Hastily, he sent for his district commander.
"There must be an enemy spy in town," General Two Spears averred. "Dispatch guards at once to surround the scoundrel! I'll seize this opportunity to lead troops out and capture Song Jiang. Defend the town well. Excellency. Send a dozen men to hold the prison gate. Let no one escape!"
The general mounted, mustered his troops and set forth. Cheng formed a force of keepers and guards, armed with spears and staves, and dispatched them to prison gate, where they stood, shouting. While Shi Jin didn't dare to come out, neither did they have the courage to go in. Gu Dasao could only bemoan the miscarriage of the plan.
General Two Spears, sallying out with his infantry and cavalry at the fourth watch, raced murderously towards Song Jiang's camp. A scout reported their approach.
"Gu Dasao must have run into trouble," Song Jiang said. "Now the foe is attacking. We'll give them a hot welcome!" He ordered his army to get ready.
By dawn the contending hosts were deployed in battle positions. General Two Spears Dong Ping rode forward.
Clever and ingenious, he was a man of considerable accomplishments. There were few skills he hadn't mastered, including the playing of string instrument and bamboo flutes. Throughout Shandong and Hebei he was famed as the dashing General Two Spears.
He cut a fine figure, and Song Jiang was filled with admiration. Attached to the General's arrow quiver was a pennant reading: Heroic General Two Spears, noble lord of ten thousand families. Song Jiang ordered Han Tao to joust with him.
Han Tao's weapon was a long lance. Grasping it firmly, he cantered towards Dong Ping. The General wielded his two spears with dazzling artistry. Han Tao was unable to cope.
Song Jiang next ordered Xu Ning the Metal Lancer into battle with his hooked weapon to replace Han Tao. Xu Ning at once galloped forward and locked Dong Ping in fierce combat. They fought desperately in a cloud of dust for over fifty rounds, with neither emerging the victor.
It was lasting too long. Song Jiang was afraid Xu Ning would lose. He had the trumpeter sound retreat, and Xu Ning turned his steed and rode back. General Two Spears closely pursued him right into the midst of the outlaws' position. Song Jiang waved his whip, and from all sides his troops closed in.
He rode to the top of a bluff and watched Dong Ping, surrounded by the outlaws. When the General headed east, Song pointed east with his pennant and the troops moved east and cut him off. When he tried to go west, Song pointed west with his pennant, and the troops shifted west and blocked him again.
Dashing first one way, then another, General Two Spears fought until late afternoon, when he finally broke through. Song Jiang did not give chase.
It was clear by then to Dong Ping that he could not wrest victory. He withdrew his forces into the town that same evening. Song Jiang moved his army up during the night and surrounded the walls. Inside the town Gu Dasao dared not light a signal fire and Shi Jin was unable to come out. Both were stalemated.

Now, Governor Cheng had a daughter of exceptional beauty, and Dong Ping, who was unmarried, had frequently sent intermediaries to plead his suit. But Cheng would not consent. As a result, there was some hostility between the two men, though they spoke to each other pleasantly enough. The morning after Dong returned to the town with his soldiers, he again sent a spokesman to press for the girl's hand.
"I'm a civil and he's a military official. Such a marriage would be ideal," said Cheng. "But I'd be a laughing stock if I consented now, with bandits at our gates and the situation so dangerous. Let's wait until we've driven them off and the safety of town preserved. It won't be too late then to talk about marriage."
The spokesman reported Cheng's reply. "Well put," said Dong, but in his heart he was very annoyed. He wasn't at all sure Cheng would agree later on.
Song Jiang, after arriving during the night, was intensifying his attack. The governor requested Dong Ping to go out and fight. Angrily, General Two Spears donned his armor and mounted. With three armies he marched from the town.
Beneath an arch of pennants on the field of battle, Song Jiang shouted: "How dare you, a lone general, oppose me? I've a hundred thousand men under me and thousands of able commanders, all united in carrying out Heaven's will to succor the needy and rescue the endangered! Better surrender now and avoid being killed!"
"Little clerk with the criminal tattoo on his cheek, death-deserving rogue," Dong fumed, "you're raving mad!"
Spears in hand, he galloped towards Song Jiang. From the left of his target Lin Chong and, from the right Hua Rong, rode out to meet him, each of them armed. They fought several rounds, then the two chieftains withdrew, while the outlaw army beat a confused retreat, as if already vanquished. Dong clapped his horse and courageously pursued.
Song Jiang pulled back to the border of Shouchun County, with General Two Spears closely following. When they were about a dozen //from the county seat, they came to a village. The post road running through its center was lined by thatched huts. Dong, racing after them on his horse, didn't know it was a trap. Out of healthy respect for Dong's power as a warrior, the night before Song had placed Stumpy Tiger Wang, Ten Feet of Steel, Zhang Qing, Sun the Witch and over a hundred men in ambush in the huts. They had laid ropes across the road and covered them with earth. At the sound of a gong, they were to raise and pull them taut, trip the steed, and catch the general.
When Dong reached the stretch of road, he heard Kong Ming and Kong Liang shout behind him: "Don't harm our ruler!" A gong crashed in front of the huts, the doors flew open, and ropes sprang up athward the road. As Dong's horse turned, more ropes rose behind it. Down went the animal and its rider. From the left Stumpy Tiger and Ten Feet of Steel leaped out, from the right Zhang Qing and Sun the Witch. Together they seized Dong and stripped him of his helmet, armor and spears, and removed his horse. The two women generals bound his hands behind him and, each bearing swords, led him under guard to meet Song Jiang.
Song Jiang, who had gone past the thatched huts, reined in beneath a leafy poplar and watched the two women chieftains approaching with their prisoner.
"I instructed you to invite General Dong Ping here," he shouted. "Who told you to tie him!"
The 2 murmured apologies and withdrew as Song Jiang hastily dismounted and removed Dong's bonds. He took off his own armor and robe and gave them to the general to wear, prostrated himself and kowtowed. Dong hurriedly returned the courtesy.
"If you don't scorn us as too lowly, General," said Song Jiang, "please be the ruler of our mountain stronghold."
"I am your prisoner. Even death would be too light a punishment. If you are willing to spare me, I will consider myself infinitely fortunate!"
"Recently, we've run short of grain, and so we requested Dongping Prefecture to lend us some. We had nothing else in mind."
"That lout Cheng was once just a tutor in the house of Lord Tong Guan. Now he uses his high position to oppress the populace. If you'll allow me, brother, I'll fool them into opening the gates. You can charge in and take their money and grain as my thanks for your kindness."
Song Jiang was delighted. He ordered that Dong's possessions be returned. General Two Spears put on his armor and mounted. He rode back to Dongping Town, followed by the outlaw army, its banners and pennants rolled.
"You, on the walls," shouted Dong. "Open the gates!"
The soldiers above the gates brought torches and, in their light, recognized the district commander. They opened the big gates and lowered the drawbridge. Dong rode over and smashed the iron lock. Song Jiang and his army surged into the town.
They went directly to the prefectural government compound. An order was quickly transmitted that none of the ordinary people were to be killed, or their homes burned. Dong burst into Cheng's residency, slaughtered the governor and his entire household and took the daughter. At Song Jiang's direction, the prison was opened and Shi Jin rescued.
Song Jiang then looted the treasury of its gold and silver and valuables, and had grain from the government granary loaded onto carts, with instructions that it be delivered to the Shore of Golden Sands for the three Ruan brothers to take up the mountain.
Shi Jin led a party to the home of Li Shuilan in the western pleasure section. He hacked her, her pander, and bawd to pieces.
Song Jiang distributed Cheng's private possessions among the populace and put up proclamations that read: "We've executed the tyrannical governor. Good citizens go about your business in peace."
He then withdrew his army. Bai Sheng the Daylight Rat hurried towards the chieftains when they reached the town of Anshan. He told of a battle in the district of Dongchang. Song Jiang frowned, and his eyes grew large with anger. "Brothers," he cried, "we won't return to the mountain. Come with me!" Truly, the heroes of the Marsh in powerful assault marched again on Dongchang, a town of lavish and elegant riches.

Song Jiang, remember, had not yet carried out Chao Gai's dying wish. He was keen to resign the leadership to the Unicorn, but the others would not let him. What Song Jiang now said was this: "We are getting short of cash and provisions. There are two districts to the east of Mount Liang that are well stocked: Dongping and Dongchang. We have never bothered the people there before, but if we ask them for provisions, they will certainly refuse. Let us now draw lots. The Unicorn and I will each draw one of the cities, and whoever captures his city first shall be the leader on Mount Liang. How about that?"
The Professor said: "So be it. Let fate decide."
The Unicorn said: "No, I don't like it. I will only accept the mission if our friend remains leader."
But this time the Unicorn's wishes were ignored. Sterling was asked to write down the two city names and after burning incense and praying they each chose one. Song Jiang drew Dong-ping and the Unicorn drew Dongchang. No one said anything more.
There was a banquet that day, and while they were drinking Song Jiang picked his troops: Leopard's Head, Colonel Hua, the Red-Haired Devil, the Tattooed Dragon, Spearsman, the Dandy, the Little Duke, the Halberdier, Victorious, the Supremo, the Kong brothers, Snake, Scorpion, Short-Arse, Steelbright, the Gardener, Sister Sun the Ogress, Blackface, Auntie Gu, the Guv, Perilous, Fleetfoot and Yellow Dog, twenty-five leaders in all, together with ten thousand cavalry and infantry; they would be supported by three leaders of the water-borne troops, the three Ruan brothers, with boats and crews.
In the Unicorn's force were the Professor, Taoist Gongsun, Scimitar, Twin Rods, Whiskers, Sergeant Lei, Hasty, the Blue-Faced Beast, the Water and Fire Generals, the Ugly Son-in-Law, Hound, the Prodigy, Panther, Golden Wings, Thunderer, the Flautist, Redeye, the Young Master, Demon King, the Eight-Armed Ogre, Winged Ghost, the Flea and the Daytime Rat, a total of twenty-five leaders, together with ten thousand infantry and cavalry; also supported by three water-borne leaders, the White-Water Dragon and the two Tong brothers, Cave Dragon and River Rider, with their boats and crews. The rest of the leaders, including the wounded, were to guard the fort.
The arrangements made, they all set off down the mountain as ordained, Song Jiang and his group to attack Dongping, the Unicorn and his group to attack Dongchang. It was early spring and the weather warm with a light breeze, the grass green and the ground soft: ideal conditions for a campaign.
Song Jiang led his troops on towards Dongping and when they were just a dozen miles away, at a place called Anshan they made camp. Song Jiang said: "The Dongping Magistrate, Cheng Wanli and his military commander come from the same town. This commander is called Dong Ping and because he is an expert at fighting with two spears they call him Twin Spears. He is an extremely brave man. Although we plan to attack his city, he deserves to be treated with respect. We should send them both a written declaration. If they are willing to surrender, there will be no need to send in troops. If they won't listen to us and there is a massacre, no one can blame us. Who will deliver the letter for me?"
Someone now stepped forward, someone immensely tall and broad. The poem tells who it was:

He's keener on honour than treasure,
He's built like a door god you'd say;
His shoulders are broad beyond measure,
This Lord of the Perilous Way.

Perilous, for it was he, said: "I know Dongping. I'd like to deliver the letter."
Then another stepped forward, a gangling individual: "I'll go with him," he said. Who was this? Again, a poem tells us:

A grasshopper's pointy-head and shiny eyes,
Stalking on knobbly legs like a fishing egret's;
When there's travelling to do he simply flies;
Fleet-foot he is, born on the banks of the Yangtze.

The two of them now said: "We haven't done any important work yet for the mountain stronghold. Now we really want to go and give it a try."
Song Jiang was delighted and composed the letter immediately for Perilous and Fleetfoot to take. In the letter he explained all about their need for provisions.
Now when the Dongping Magistrate heard that Song Jiang had raised an army and was camped at Anshan he summoned the garrison commander, Twin Spears Dong Ping, to discuss the military crisis. Whilst this meeting was in progress the doorman came and announced: "Song Jiang has sent messengers with a letter."
The Magistrate ordered them to be brought in. Perilous and Fleetfoot presented the letter. The Magistrate read it and said to Twin Spears: "They want cash and provisions from us. What do you think we should do about it?"
Twin Spears was indignant. He advised that the request be rejected and the messengers executed. The Magistrate said: "We can't do that. It has always been the custom in war that you do not execute emissaries. It's against all the rules. We'll just give them twenty strokes of the cane and send them back. Then we'll wait and see what they do." But Twin Spears was still angry. He ordered the two messengers to be trussed up and beaten till they bled and then threw them out. When they returned to the camp they complained bitterly to Song Jiang: "That swine Twin Spears was determined to show us all how he despised us!"
When Song Jiang saw they had been beaten, anger choked him. He wanted to raze the city to the ground. But first he had Perilous and Fleetfoot placed on a cart and carried back to the mountain to recuperate.
Then the Tattooed Dragon stepped forward and said: "I lived in Dongping once. In those days I had a liaison with a certain lady from the entertainment world. She was called Li Ruilan — Jade Li. We were very intimate. Suppose now I take a quantity of gold and silver, slip into the city secretly and take up residence with her. We can fix a day for you to launch an attack. As soon as the Dongping forces march out to fight, I will climb up into the drum tower and start a fire. By coordinating the attack from within and without, we can achieve our objective."
"That's an excellent plan," said Song Jiang.
So the Tattooed Dragon got together the cash and put it in his bundle, concealed a weapon about his person, bade farewell and set off. "I won't make a move until you're ready," Song Jiang told him.
The Tattooed Dragon entered the city and made his way to Jade Li's residence in the entertainment district of the western quarter. When he saw who it was, the man who came to the door had quite a shock. He asked Tattooed Dragon inside and called the girl. Jade Li's beauty was exceptional and is described in a poem:

She has a thousand charms, this peerless lass,
Fragrance of pear blossom when clouds pass,
Like birdsong-awakened dreams of heaven
Or plum blossom with its dawn-fresh vision.

She led him upstairs and made him sit down while she questioned him: "How is it we haven't see you for ages? I heard you had become a robber chief in the marshes of Mount Liang, there's a police notice out for your capture. The streets have been buzzing lately with the news that Song Jiang wants to attack the city to get provisions. What are you doing here?"
"Well, I'll be frank with you," said the Tattooed Dragon. "I am one of the leaders on Mount Liang now, though I haven't done much to help them yet. Our Leader wants to get provisions here. I told him all about your house. I've come to do some spying. I've got a bagful of gold and silver, all for you. Please don't give me away. When the business is finished I'll take you and your family to the mountain. You'll have a great time there."
Jade babbled her consent and took the money. She arranged wine and food for him, and then went to discuss the matter with the madam. "When he used to come here before, he was a respectable person, I didn't mind having him here. But now he's become a criminal. If this gets out it will be no joke."
Her man said: "That Song Jiang and his company aren't the kind to mess with. If they do attack the city, it's bound to fall. If we grass on them, do you think they won't settle the score when they enter the city?
The bawd scolded him: "You old idiot! What do you know about the way things work? Don't you know the saying. 'When a bee gets under your shirt, you'd best take it off'? If you inform the authorities you'll avoid prosecution, it's a universal rule. Quickly, go to the government office and report him, get them to take him away. We don't want to be involved."
"But he's brought us a lot of money," the man objected. "Why should he have done that, if we aren't prepared to take a bit of a risk for him?"
"You old fool," she said. "I don't give a fart for what you say. Women in the business like us have trapped thousands of people, he certainly won't be the first. If you won't go and report him, I shall go to the government office myself and lodge a complaint. And I'll say you're in it too!"
"All right, keep your hair on," the man said. "Just make sure the girl keeps hold of him. No point in beating the grass and scaring the snake — so don't let him get away! Once I've told the police and got them to come and arrest him, we can make out the accusation."
When the girl came upstairs the Tattooed Dragon noticed she had coloured. "Is there some problem?" he asked. "You look so frightened."
"I made a false step when I was coming up the stairs just now and nearly fell," she said. "It gave me quite a turn."
The Tattooed Dragon may have been a hero, but she was easily able to deceive him. He suspected nothing. There is a poem which says:

Houses of pleasure? No, cradles of guile;
The girl's just a thing at the bawd's beck and call.
Plotting behind your back like a demon.
You think you can buy their love? — dream on!

Not more than a couple of hours later, whilst Jade was engaging in some rather risqué talk, sounds were heard on the stair as of someone dashing up and a lot of shouting outside the window. Several dozen constables burst into the room. The Tattooed Dragon had no chance to raise a finger. It was like an eagle taking a sparrow or a pellet bringing down a rock dove: trussed up like a disconsolate lion he was dragged downstairs and borne away to the court room.
The Magistrate greeted him with a roar: "How can you have the effrontery to come here all on your own to spy? If the gentleman from Mrs. Li's had not denounced you, innocent people would have suffered throughout our district! Quickly now, confess what you've been up to. What did Song Jiang send you here for?"
The Tattooed Dragon refused to speak. Twin Spears said: "You never get these bloody villains to confess unless you beat them."
"Take this bastard and give him a really good thrashing for me," said the Magistrate.
A number of gaolers and their assistants pounced on Tattooed Dragon. First they splashed cold water on his legs. Then they administered a hundred heavy blows to each leg. He bore up well under the beating and revealed nothing to them. Twin Spears said: "Fit him with a wooden cangue and throw him in the death cells. When we've captured Song Jiang we'll send them to the capital together."
Now after the Tattooed Dragon left, Song Jiang had written to the Professor giving a detailed account of what was happening. When the Professor read Song Jiang's letter, telling how the Tattooed Dragon had gone as a spy to stay in the house of the courtesan Jade Li, he was deeply disturbed. After telling the Unicorn, he went off in great haste to see Song Jiang. "Who told the Tattooed Dragon to go?" he asked.
"It was his own wish," Song Jiang said. "He said this courtesan was an old flame of his. It seems they had been very intimate, that's what gave him the idea to go."
"You weren't thinking, brother," said the Professor. "If I had been here I would never have allowed it. There's a saying: 'In the harlot's house don't let five words pass your lips.' They can give you a good time, but they're always hankering after novelty and won't stick with anything old. Many's the good man they've ruined. Not only is it their nature to be inconstant as water, but even supposing she had any real feeling for him, she takes her orders from the bawd. If that's where he's gone, you can bet your life he's in trouble!"

Song Jiang asked the Professor what he should do. The Professor summoned Auntie Gu and said to her: "Would you mind going and having a look? You can disguise yourself as an old woman and slip into the city on the pretext of begging. If you see anything untoward come back at once. If the Tattooed Dragon has landed in prison, go and tell the assistant gaoler: 'He once did me a good turn, I'd like to take him a spot of food.' When you get inside, quietly tell the Tattooed Dragon this: 'We will attack the city on the last night of the month just before dusk. Say you've got to go to the latrines and then work out some way to escape.' You, Auntie Gu, must start a fire on the last night of the month. This will be our signal to attack and complete the business. But first the Leader must attack Wenshang. The people will flee and seek refuge in Dongping which will give Auntie Gu a chance to mix with them and slip into the city without being noticed." Having expounded his plan, the Professor mounted and rode back to Dongchang.

Song Jiang ordered Snake and Scorpion to take 500 troops and attack Wenshang. As expected the people, old and young, fled in panic and sought refuge in Dongping.

Then Auntie Gu with dishevelled hair and tattered clothing, mingled with the crowd and was carried with them into the city, where she wandered the streets begging. When she came to the government offices, she heard of course that the Tattooed Dragon was in the gaol and was thus able to confirm the Professor's intuition. Next day she went to wait outside the gaol with a rice box. When she saw an elderly guard come out, she prostrated herself weeping copiously.

"Why are you weeping, old woman?" the guard asked.

"Mr. Shi is locked up in there, my old benefactor," said Auntie Gu. "He went away almost ten years ago now, they say he was trading among the rivers and lakes. I don't know why he has landed in prison. There's obviously no one to take him food. I've managed to beg a bit of food that I want to give him to relieve his hunger. Please, friend, if you could see your way to letting me in, it would be a worthy deed, with more merit in it than building a seven-storey pagoda!"

The guard said: "He's a robber from Mount Liang, his crime has earned him the death penalty, I dare not let you in."

"So he's really for it then. But why not let him have the food and die a little bit content? Just be merciful and let me in to give him this bite to eat, so I can repay his kindness in days gone by." She started crying again.

The guard thought to himself: "If it was a man I couldn't let him in, but what is there to fear from an old woman?" So he allowed her into the gaol, where she saw the Tattooed Dragon with a heavy cangue round his neck and a rope tied to his waist.

The Tattooed Dragon was astonished to see her but he made no sound. She went on pretending to weep and at the same time offered him the food. Another gaoler came along and shouted: "This is a malefactor awaiting execution. No one's supposed to get in here. Who said you could come in and give him food? Get out of here double quick, before I order you a beating."

With so many gaolers about, Auntie Gu couldn't say much. All she told Tattooed Dragon was: "There will be an attack on the last day of the month in the evening. They want you to start something inside the gaol."

Before the Tattooed Dragon could ask her more she was driven out by the gaoler. All he could remember was "last day of the month."

Now the third month of course was a long month. When the twenty-ninth arrived the Tattooed Dragon saw two gaolers talking and he asked them what the date was. The junior replied, and he got it wrong. He said "It's the last day of the month. This evening I'd better buy some paper to burn for wandering souls." The Tattooed Dragon waited impatiently for evening to come. One of the gaoler's assistants who was half drunk escorted him to the latrines. The Tattoed Dragon suddenly shouted out: "Who is that behind you?" When the man turned to look, Tattooed Dragon wrenched off his cangue and hit the gaoler with the end of it, knocking him out. Then he got a piece of brick and smashed his fetters with it. Carefully looking in all directions first, he rushed into the guardroom where there were several policemen, all drunk. He charged into the midst of them. Some were killed and some got away. He opened up the gates of the gaol, expecting to receive help from outside. He also released the other criminals in the gaol, fifty or sixty of them, who burst out of their cells tumultuously and fled.

Someone informed the Magistrate, whose face became ashen with fear. He hurriedly summoned his cavalry general to discuss what to do.

Twin Spears said: "There must be spies in the city. You must send a lot of troops to surround this villain. Meanwhile I shall take the opportunity to ride out and capture Song Jiang. You, Sir, must defend the city and send a few dozen constables to guard the prison gate. Don't let them get away."

With this he mounted and mustered his troops for the sortie. The Magistrate got together a force of gaolers, prison guards and officers of the law, who picked up their spears and truncheons and went to the prison where they made a lot of noise. The Tattooed Dragon was still inside and did not dare come out, nor did anyone from outside dare force an entry. Auntie Gu could only lament.

Twin Spears meanwhile had assembled his forces and ridden out of the city before dawn to attack Song Jiang's camp. When Song Jiang's scouts reported this to him, he said: "This must mean Auntie Gu has met with some misfortune. They're coming to attack us. We must prepare for battle."

Orders were given out and the troops all roused. It was getting light when Twin Spears' force drew near. The armies formed up on each side and Twin Spears rode out in front. He was indeed a hero without compare, exceptional in daring, and he made a noble picture. He had, moreover, a subtle mind, a thorough knowledge of all the classics and skill in all the musical instruments. In Shandong and Hebei they called him Twin Spears the Virtuoso.

When Song Jiang saw such a display of personal character he was partly pleased. Twin Spears also had a little flag planted in his sheaf on which was written: "Twin Spears the bold, renowned worldwide".

Song Jiang ordered Victorious to ride out to encounter the enemy. Armed with his steel lance Victorious attacked, but Twin Spears with his two spears was masterly and no man could best him. Song Jiang ordered out the Spearsman, master of the hooked spear technique, to take over from Victorious. Spearsman galloped at Twin Spears in a furious charge. The two fought more than fifty bouts on that field of battle and neither could prevail. The fight continued so long that Song Jiang feared Spearsman might lose and ordered a gong to sound the retreat. Spearsman reined in his horse and returned, with Twin Spears in hot pursuit, a weapon in either hand. Song Jiang waved his whip and troops encircled Twin Spears. Song Jiang was holding in his horse watching from the top of a knoll and could see Twin Spears in the encirclement. Every time Twin Spears turned east Song Jiang gave a signal and troops flocked east to surround him; when he turned west the signal flag pointed west and troops massed to the west. Twin Spears charged this way and that, wielding his two spears manfully until late afternoon when he managed to open up a path and escape. Song Jiang did not pursue him.

Seeing he could not win, Twin Spears withdrew his troops to the city that night. Song Jiang the same night moved his troops up under the walls of the city and completely surrounded it. Auntie Gu was inside but did not dare start the fire. Nor had the Tattooed Dragon managed to get out of the gaol. His way was blocked on either side.

Now, the Magistrate had a daughter who was extremely pretty. Twin Spears was not married and had repeatedly sent people to ask for her hand, but the Magistrate had not given his consent. Because of this, relations between the two were somewhat strained. The night that Twin Spears brought his troops back into the city he sent someone who was in his confidence to discuss this personal matter with the Magistrate. The latter said: "I am a civilian, he is a soldier. That is a good reason for such an alliance. But right now the bandits are at our gates, there is a crisis on. People will think it very odd if we announce a betrothal at such a moment. Wait till the bandits are gone and we have successfully defended the city. Then will be the time to arrange this marriage."

This is the reply Twin Spears' friend took back to him. Although Twin Spears replied quite respectfully: "So be it!", he had certain misgivings and was not entirely satisfied, fearing that later on the Magistrate would refuse him.

Song Jiang pressed them hard for a number of days. When the Magistrate kept urging combat, Twin Spears became irritated. He armed himself and mounted and led his forces out into the field.

Song Jiang himself stood before his troops under the pennants and shouted: "A single officer on his own like you, how can you take us on? Don't you know the old saying 'When a great building starts to lean, it takes more than one beam to prop it up.' You can see I've got ten thousand valiant troops here, and thousands of brave commanders, all ready to do heaven's will, to help the poor and rescue the beleaguered. Surrender at once and save your life!"

Twin Spears replied angrily: "A branded petty criminal, a rebel fit only to die, how can you talk such shit!" Then he levelled his two spears and charged. On the left Leopard's Head and on the right Colonel Hua rode forward together to oppose him with their weapons. After a few bouts they both turned and ran. Song Jiang's troops also feigned defeat and fled in all directions. Twin Spears, avid for glory, slapped his horse and galloped in pursuit.

Song Jiang and his forces retreated with Twin Spears in pursuit. About four miles out from the city they reached a small village where there were thatched huts on either side and the road running between. Not realizing it was a trap, Twin Spears eagerly urged his horse on. Now Song Jiang understood full well how brave Twin Spears was and the night before had ordered Short-Arse, Steelbright, the Gardener and Sister Sun the Ogress with a hundred soldiers to hide in the thatched huts. They had stretched tripwires across the road and covered them lightly with soil. They were to wait till the very moment he passed, then at the sound of a gong raise the tripwires to catch him. When Twin Spears in headlong pursuit reached that place he heard the two Kong brothers shout behind him: "You shall not touch our Leader!" At the same time a gong sounded from the thatched huts, the doors of each one flew open and the ropes were stretched taut. Twin Spears turned his horse's head but the tripwires were behind him as well and the animal stumbled, throwing its rider. Steelbright and Short-Arse rushed out from the left, the Gardener and Sister Sun from the right; they fell on him and made him prisoner. They relieved him of his helmet, his armour, his two spears and his horse. The two women warriors tied his hands behind his back and took him off to see Song Jiang.

Song Jiang rode through the huts and reined in his horse under a green willow. There he met the two women warriors with their captive, General Twin Spears Dong Ping. He sent the two women packing: "I told you to go and invite General Dong here, no one said you were to tie him up!"

The women obediently withdrew and Song Jiang hurriedly dismounted and undid the bonds with his own hands. He divested himself of his padded robe and gave it to Twin Spears to wear. Then he prostrated himself. Twin Spears immediately returned the courtesy. Song Jiang said: "If you do not consider it beneath you, please join us as one of our leaders."

"I am your prisoner," Twin Spears said with humility. "A thousand deaths would be nothing. If you consent to spare my life I shall count it a blessing."

Song Jiang said: "Our humble place is situated among the marshlands, it's very tranquil there. It is only because we are short of provisions that we came to Dongping. We have no other aim."

Twin Spears said: "That stuck-up Magistrate once held the post of tutor in the household of Marshal Tong Guan. Naturally he thinks himself so great he can oppress the people at will. If you will give me leave I will go back and open the gates, so you can enter the city and pick up money and supplies. That will be my way of repaying you."

Song Jiang accepted with alacrity and ordered a servant to return Twin Spears' helmet, armour, spears and horse to him. Twin Spears put on his armour and mounted. With Twin Spears leading and Song Jiang and his troops behind they headed for Dongping, keeping their banners furled. Arriving first on his own, Twin Spears shouted, "Guards, open up quickly!"

Recognizing Twin Spears by the light of the torches, the guards opened the gates and lowered the drawbridge. Twin Spears slapped his horse and rode forward. When he reached the gate, he smashed the iron lock, and Song Jiang and the rest poured in behind him. When they reached the government offices the order was given out that the people were not to be harmed, nor were any houses to be burnt. Twin Spears went to the Magistrate's residence, killed him and his family, and seized his daughter. Song Jiang ordered them to open up the prison and let the Tattooed Dragon out. Next, the treasury was unlocked and all the gold, silver, valuables and silk taken out. The granaries were opened and the grain supplies loaded onto carts and sent under escort to Golden Sands Landing for the Ruan brothers to take up the mountain. The Tattooed Dragon himself led them to Jade's house, where he hacked her to pieces, together with the bawd and all her household. The Magistrate's goods Song Jiang distributed among the people. A notice was posted along the streets, informing the citizens that the Magistrate had been executed as an oppressor of the people, but the innocent were free to go peacefully about their business. After this announcement, the troops were mustered for withdrawal and all the leaders went back to Anshan. Suddenly the Daytime Rat rushed up with news of the action at Dongchang. Song Jiang listened in horror and then gave a great shout: "My friends, do not return to the mountain. Come with me!" Indeed, it was a time for the forces of Mount Liang to advance again and capture the rich city of Dongchang.

THE leaders would not agree to Song Jiang's handing over the command to Lu Junyi, and Song Jiang did not like to disobey Chao Gai's dying wish so he addressed them, "Just now we are short of money and rice, but there is a good supply of those things at the cities to the east of Liangshan Marsh. The cities I refer to are Dongping and Dongchang Prefectures. We have never troubled those towns, so I think we may go there now, and borrow some rice from them. We will write the two names on slips of paper, and Lu Junyi and myself will draw lots. Whoever takes his city first will take command here."

"A good plan," said Wu Yong.

"That will not do," said Lu Junyi. "Song Jiang is our commander, and I prefer to obey his order only."

But the assembled heroes would not agree to Lu Junyi's suggestion. The slips of paper were written out, and after offering incense to the spirits, the lots were drawn. Lu Junyi drew Dongchang while Song Jiang drew Dongping. That evening Song Jiang divided the leaders and men. He took Lin Chong and twenty-four other leaders and altogether ten thousand men. Lu Junyi took Wu Yong and an equal number of leaders and men.

Everything was soon ready, and both forces left the mountain on the first day of the third month. The weather was warm with a refreshing wind blowing, and the fresh grass was of brilliant green color. The prospects for a campaign could not have been better.

Song Jiang led his force to within thirteen li of Dongping, and encamped there at a town called Anshan. Song Jiang addressed his leaders, "I know that the Prefect here is Cheng Wanli, and that with him is a great warrior who can face ten thousand men without defeat. He is called Dong Ping, and his nickname is the 'Two Spears General,' because he can use two spears at the same time. If we attack his town we must be polite, and inform him of our intention, so I will now write such a letter and send it to him. If he is willing to surrender, then all the fighting will be avoided. But if he is unwilling, then he cannot complain about the results. Who will take the letter?"

Yu Baosi stepped forward and said, "I know the Lieutenant General Dong Ping, and am willing to take the letter to him."

But Wang Dingliu also stepped forward and said, "I am a newcomer, and so far have not done anything to show my merits. So I should like to go on this mission."

This was agreed to, and after the letter had been written asking for the loan of some rice, the two men departed.

In Dongping the Prefect discussed with the Lieutenant General upon hearing of the arrival of the brigands at Anshan. While they were conferring, the letter from Song Jiang arrived, and the messengers were called in. Yu Baosi and Wang Dingliu duly presented the letter. The Prefect read the letter, and then spoke to the Lieutenant General, "The brigands want to borrow some rice. What do you think about it?"

The General was very angry, and ordered that the two messengers be taken outside and executed.

But the Prefect objected to this. He said, "There is an ancient rule, 'When two countries are at war, the delegates must not be killed.' That is only proper. The most we could do would be to give them ten blows each with the bamboo and send them back."

The Lieutenant General was still angry, but he agreed to this, and gave orders accordingly.

When the two messengers returned and reported the matter with tears Song Jiang was very angry. Shi Jin came forward and said, "When I lived in Dongping Prefecture I was on very intimate terms with a woman there named Li Shuilan. Now I can take some money to the town and stay at that woman's house. When you are ready you can attack the town, and I will set fire to the Drum Tower inside the town. By working together, both inside and outside, we can accomplish our object."

Song Jiang approved of this plan. Money was given to Shi Jin, and he left that day for the town. He duly reached the house of Li Shuilan, and she asked Shi Jin, "I have not seen you for a long time. I heard that the magistrate wanted to arrest you, and that you had escaped to Liangshan Marsh where you became a leader among the brigands. These two days there has been a great stirring on the streets because the brigands are coming to attack us. Why have you come here?"

"I will tell you the truth," replied Shi Jin. "I am a leader of the brigands, but so far I have done no meritorious deed. Just now they have come to borrow some rice from the town, and I have told them all about you. I come here really as a spy and here is a parcel of money for you. You must not let anybody know of my arrival. When the thing is finished, I will bring you to the mountain stronghold to enjoy pleasures.

The woman assented, and received the money. She then entertained Shi Jin with wine. During the meal she went down below, and spoke to the pimp, "This man was previously a good visitor here, and so we admitted him. But he has now become a bad man, and is wanted by the authorities, I think we may be implicated by his coming here."

The man said, "These brigands are very fierce, and never failed to take the town they attacked. If we betray this Shi Jin, they will kill us when they enter the town."

The madam of the brothel said, "How stupid you are! You do not know very much! An old proverb says, 'If a bee is on the breast, loosen the clothes immediately.' This is a rule. If we inform the authorities about this man, then we are free from blame. You had better go to the yamen at once, and tell them about this man. They will arrest him, and so we shall avoid any trouble."

The man said, "But he has given us plenty of money so we cannot treat him that way."

The woman abused him, "You brute! You're just talking farts! Our business here injures a countless number of men, not to say a single man. If you do not do as I tell you, then I will go to the yamen myself, and inform against you as well."

The pimp said, "Do not be so hasty. Shuilan must entertain and keep him here. We must not beat the grass to drive away the snake. I will go to the yamen, and inform them to have him arrested."

When Li Shuilan came upstairs again after this conversation Shi Jin noticed her face was changing colors so he asked her, "What has upset you like this?"

The girl replied, "I am somewhat upset because in coming up the staircase I missed my footing, and nearly fell down."

They had hardly had time to drink a cup of tea, when they heard the noise of men down below. About ten policemen entered the room, and seized Shi Jin, bound him with cords, and took him to the yamen.

When the Prefect saw Shi Jin he abused him, "Your courage appears to be bigger than your body. You come here as a spy all by yourself. If the father of the girl Li Shuilan had not informed against you, you might have done much injury to the people. Tell us quickly what you have to say in defense. What instructions did Song Jiang give you?"

Shi Jin did not speak, so the Lieutenant General said, "This kind of thief will not confess without a sound beating." The Prefect ordered that the prisoner be beaten. The attendants brought a pail of cold water, and after pouring it over the legs of the prisoner they gave him about a hundred blows on the same parts.

But still Shi Jin would not speak. Lieutenant General Dong Ping therefore, ordered that the prisoner be taken to the jail.

When Shi Jin had left for the town Song Jiang wrote a letter to Wu Yong informing him what had been done. When Wu Yong read the letter he was very surprised, and told Lu Junyi that he would go at once to see Song Jiang. This was agreed to, and Wu Yong traveled all that night. When he reached Song Jiang's camp Wu Yong asked him who had given the order for Shi Jin to go as a spy.

"He was willing to go, and made the proposal himself," replied Song Jiang. "He was previously very friendly with a girl Li Shuilan there."

"Brother, you have not thought the matter over," said Wu Yong. "If I had been here he would not have gone. Those girls injure many good men, and prefer new to old acquaintances. They have dispositions as changeable as water, and are quite controlled by their pimps. I am sure that Shi Jin will have met trouble there."

Song Jiang asked Wu Yong whether he had any plans to rescue Shi Jin. Wu Yong sent for Gu Dasao and spoke to her, "There is a troublesome affair which I want you to take in hand. I want you to dress as an old woman, and stealthily get into the town as a beggar. You must get the latest news there, and quickly return with it. If Shi Jin is already in prison, then go and speak to the jailer that the prisoner helped you sometime before, and therefore you want to bring him some food. When you are allowed to see Shi Jin you must tell him secretly that at the end of the month we shall come during the night and attack the town. He must find a place where he can afterwards escape that night. He must set fire to the buildings as a beacon for us to attack the town. Turning to Song Jiang he said, "You, brother, must take your men, and attack Wenshang, a town near-by, and the people there will escape to Dongping Prefecture. Gu Dasao will easily enter the town as one of the refugees without any suspicion being aroused. Then you can do what I have already told you."

When this plan had been arranged Wu Yong mounted his horse and returned to Dongchang Prefecture. Song Jiang then gathered his men together and marched on Wenshang. The people in that town fled to Dongping for protection as anticipated.

Gu Dasao joined the refugees as an old woman with hair and dress in great disorder. Upon entering Dongping with the others she began to beg for food on the streets. She soon found out that Shi Jin was in prison. The next day she got a basket of food, and went to the entrance of the prison. Soon a jailer came out, and Gu Dasao weeping bitterly saluted him, and the jailer asked her what she was crying about.

Gu Dasao replied, "My old master, Shi Jin, has been imprisoned; I have not seen him now for ten years. I heard that he was living as merchant, and do not know how he came to get imprisoned. I see that nobody gives him anything to eat, so I have brought him some food. I beg you to allow me to present this gift. By doing this your merit will be enormous."

"That man is a brigand from Liangshan Marsh," said the jailer, "and his crime deserves his execution. Who would dare allow you to see him?"

"If he has committed such a crime then he must answer for it," said Gu Dasao. "I pray you have pity on me and allow me offer him this food to show my gratitude to him." So saying she began to weep again.

The jailer thought, "If this were a man I would not dare to take him into the prison, but as it is only an old woman perhaps I might do it." So he told her to follow him, and took Gu Dasao to the cell where Shi Jin was chained up. Shi Jin recognized her, but although surprised dared not say a word. Gu Dasao burst into tears again, and gave Shi Jin some food. Other attendants seeing this called out, "That is a bad man waiting for execution. Why give him food? Get out of this place at once, or we will beat you with the bamboo." As Gu Dasao saw no means of staying, so she whispered to Shi Jin, to struggle by the night of the end of the month. Gu Dasao was then jostled out of the prison so that Shi Jin could not ask for further information as he had only caught the three words, "The night of the end of the month." It was the third month, and had 30 days, but on the 29th day he heard two jailers talking, and one asked, "What is the date?" The other man evidently made a mistake for he replied, "Today is the last day of the month, and I must buy some paper money and sacrifice to the spirits."

Shi Jin was not aware of the mistake in the date, and for the rest of the day was anxiously waiting for the coming of the night. That evening the jailer was half drunk, and when he took Shi Jin to the place where the paper money was to be burnt Shi Jin called out, "Who are those men at your back?" The jailer looked round to see, and Shi Jin seized his cangue, tore it off his neck, and knocked the jailer down with it. He then seized a stone, and broke the wooden fetters fastened to his feet. He then rushed into the guardroom where many of the jailers happened to be drunk, and using his wooden cangue he killed a number of them while some ran out of the room. He opened the prison gate expecting the brigands to be somewhere near at hand, but as nobody was there he entered the prison and released about sixty prisoners. There was now a great uproar from the released brutes.

When the Prefect heard of the disturbance in the jail he summoned General Dong Ping who expressed his opinion that the trouble must have been caused by a spy who had got into the town. He immediately issued an order for the soldiers to turn out and capture the spy. He also ordered other soldiers to march out of the town and attack the brigands. He asked the Prefect to defend the town and dispatch guards to the prison to prevent the prisoners from escaping.

The prison was soon surrounded, and Shi Jin was still inside, daring not to venture out. Gu Dasao was outside, and was sad because she could not get in.

The Lieutenant General and his soldiers marched out to attack the brigands' camp about 3 A.M. When Song Jiang heard the news he assumed that Gu Dasao must have been arrested and their plans discovered. He however ordered all his men to get ready for the coming attack.

It was the hour just before dawn. The two forces soon met and halted, when General Dong Ping rode forth. He was very intellectual and was well acquainted with the three religions of Confucianism, Taoism, and Buddhism, and also the nine schools of philosophy. He was also a skilled musician. Song Jiang noticed his stylish manner, and was very glad to meet such a man. He noticed that his quiver was full of arrows, and from it was also sticking out a small flag with the characters, "Heroic Two Spears General, Marquis over 10,000 families." Song Jiang ordered Han Tao to give battle to the challenger.

Han Tao was armed with a long handled mace, while Dong Ping used his iron spears with great skill. After they had been fighting for some time Song Jiang thought that Han Tao stood no chance of victory so he ordered Xu Ning to relieve Han Tao. This was done, but after Xu Ning had fought about fifty bouts he had not gained any advantage. So Song Jiang being afraid that Xu Ning might be defeated ordered a gong to be sounded as a signal for him to return.

Upon seeing this Dong Ping raised both spears, and dashed after Xu Ning right into the brigands. Song Jiang signaled for his men to surround the foe, while he himself took his position on a mound so as to overlook the conflict. If Dong Ping tried to escape to the east Song Jiang signaled for his men to block that route and the same if Dong Ping tried another way. But Dong Ping used his spears with deadly effect every time, so that he could not be captured. After fighting like a rat in a trap he at last found a means of escape, and cut his way through the brigands. He had had enough fighting for that day so he ordered his soldiers to retire to the town.

But that evening Song Jiang ordered an advance on the town according to his original plan. They surrounded the town, but Gu Dasao, although she saw this, dared not set fire to any building. Shi Jin also had no courage to venture out.

Now the Prefect Cheng had a daughter who was very beautiful, and General Dong Ping being single had several times sent a matchmaker to try and arrange a marriage. But his offers had always been rejected by the Prefect. For this reason the General secretly did not like the Prefect, although openly they were friends. When Dong Ping got back to the town that evening he remembered this old grudge and sent a matchmaker to reopen negotiations for the marriage.

Prefect Cheng replied that the proposal was an excellent one, but on account of the present dangerous crisis he could not agree to the marriage as people would only be amazed and jump to wrong conclusions. But he would be pleased to discuss the matter when the brigands were driven away from the town.

The matchmaker reported this to Dong Ping, who ostensibly accepted the Prefect's idea but in his heart he was really dissatisfied as he was afraid that the Prefect would eventually decline his offer.

That night, however, the brigands attacked the town and the Prefect again ordered Dong Ping to defend the town. General Dong Ping was very angry at this renewed attack, and taking three regiments of soldiers he left the town.

Song Jiang was on horseback in front of his men, and when he saw Dong Ping he called out, "How dare you a lone General fight me with my overwhelming strength? If you submit I may spare your life."

Dong Ping was angry, and shouted, "You were only a petty clerk, so how dare you talk to me like this!" So saying he whipped his horse and dashed towards Song Jiang. But Hua Rong and Lin Chong were on both sides of Song Jiang, and they both galloped forward to fight with Dong Ping. After several bouts the two brigand leaders suddenly galloped away as if defeated, and in accordance with Song Jiang's previous orders the bandits upon seeing this scattered in all directions. Seeing this Dong Ping was elated, and wished to show off his abilities further, and whipping his horse galloped after the now retreating bandits under Song Jiang. After racing for about three li like this they came to a village with a single road between two rows of straw huts. Across the road the brigands had laid several ropes covered with a thin layer of earth to catch the enemy's horse. As Dong Ping dashed up the street a gong was sounded, the doors opened, and the ropes were stretched across the road as soon as he was going to pass. Dong Ping had hardly rushed forward, but his horse was tripped by the rope, and fell. The brigands leapt out of the huts, and seizing Dong Ping bound him with ropes. He was disarmed, and taken before Song Jiang who had pulled up his horse under a poplar tree. When Dong Ping came up Song Jiang pretended to be angry, and shouted, "I told you to invite General Dong Ping to come, why have you tied him with ropes like this?" He hurriedly dismounted, released the prisoner, and then saluted him. Dong Ping also saluted in response. Song Jiang then spoke to him, "If you do not disdain us we shall be pleased to receive you as a commander of our stronghold."

Dong Ping replied, "I am your prisoner, and deserve nothing more than death, but if you will forgive me, then I shall be very fortunate. But as you ask me to become your leader it makes me astonished."

"In our stronghold we are short of grain, and came to Dongping Prefecture to borrow some, and had no other intention," replied Song Jiang.

"That fellow, Prefect Cheng Wanli," said Dong Ping, "was previously a tutor in the family of His Excellency Tong Guan, and that was how he got the office of Prefect at Dongping. If you like I could return to Dongping, and by false pretenses get the gate of the town opened so that your men could enter, and so get all you require."

Song Jiang was very pleased at this offer and accepted same. He ordered the prisoner's arms, armor, and helmet to be returned to him. They mounted their horses with Dong Ping riding in front, and soon reached the town. Dong Ping called out for the gate to be opened. It was still dark, and the gatekeeper lit a torch to see who it was, and when he saw Dong Ping he at once opened the gate, and lowered the drawbridge. Dong Ping entered and killed the gatekeeper, and Song Jiang and his brigands nocked through the open gate, and were soon in control of the town. Song Jiang ordered his men not to kill the civilians, or set fire to the houses. Dong Ping went to the yamen, and killed the Prefect and all his family with the exception of the daughter whom he kept for himself. Song Jiang ordered the jail to be opened, and rescued Shi Jin. He also seized the treasury, and looted the gold and silver there. The town granary was also looted, and the grain was sent to Liangshan Marsh. Shi Jin took the men to the house of the woman Li Shuilan and killed everybody there. Song Jiang distributed all the goods in the Prefect's house among the people. He also issued a proclamation, "We have killed the officials who injured you people, so that now you may continue your avocations without fear." He then ordered his men to leave the town and return to Liangshan Marsh. When they were on the way however, Bai Sheng arrived with news as to how the expedition to Dongchang Prefecture had progressed.

The Hotshot Featherless Arrow Assaults & knocks down Heroes with Stones; Song Jiang Abandons & gives away Grains to Catch, Capture, & gain a Brave Warrior

Bai Sheng said: "Lu Junyi has had two failures in a row in besieging Dongchang. The town is defended by a fierce general named Zhang Qin. He hails from Zhangte Prefecture and began his career in the cavalry. He flings stones with remarkable accuracy, hitting the mark every time. People call him the Featherless Arrow. Under him are two commanders. One is Gong Wang the Flowery-Necked Tiger, so named because he had a tiger tattooed all over his body, with its head decorating his neck. He throws a spear while riding. The other is Ding Desun the Arrow-Struck Tiger. His face is scarred from his cheeks to his throat. He throws a trident while riding.

"Lu waited outside the town for ten days, but no one came forth to fight. A few days ago, Zhang Qin emerged and Hao Siwen fought him for many rounds. Zhang then withdrew and Hao gave chase. A stone hit Hao on the temple and knocked him from his saddle. Yan Qing managed to strike Zhang's horse with an arrow, and so we were able to save Hao's life. That was our first failure.

"The next day, Fan Rui the Demon King Who Roils the World rode forth with Xiang Chong and Li Gun, who brandished their shields. Unexpectedly, in an underhand pitch, Ding flung his trident and struck Xiang Chong. That was our second failure.

"Both men are nursing their wounds on one of our boats. Our general Lu Junyi has sent me here to request you to come to his aid."

Song Jiang sighed. "How unlucky he is. I even dispatched Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng to help him. I was sure he'd succeed in battle and thus gain face in our stronghold. Who'd have thought he'd meet his match. But that being the case, I and my brothers will have to go to his rescue."

He ordered the three armies to march. The chieftains mounted and went with Song Jiang to the outskirts of Dongchang. Lu met them and related what had transpired. Then all made camp.

While they were conferring, a junior officer entered and reported: "Zhang Qin the Featherless Arrow is challenging us to personal combat."

Song Jiang and his chieftains rose and proceeded to a wide plain and deployed their troops. Three times the drums thundered, and Zhang Qin the Featherless Arrow rode forward. Back and forth, from one end of the line to the other, he cantered, his animal's hoofs churning dust. Gong Wang the Flowery-Necked Tiger emerged abruptly from the left side of the enemy's arch of pennants. From the shadows on the right came the Arrow-Struck Tiger Ding Desun. The three rode onto the field of battle. Zhang Qin pointed at Song Jiang.

"Robber varlet of the swamp, I challenge a fight to the death!" Song Jiang asked his chieftains: "Who will contend with Zhang Qin?" Angrily aroused, one of the heroes beside him leaped into the saddle and galloped forward, brandishing a sickle-bladed lance. It was Xu Ning the Metal Lancer.

"Just the man!" thought Song Jiang approvingly. The two horses met, the two weapons vied. After less than five rounds Zhang Qin retreated. Xu Ning pursued. Featherless Arrow raised the lance in his left hand as if to thrust, while with his right he quietly extracted a stone from an embroidered pouch. Xu Ning was quite close. Zhang Qin suddenly twisted around and let fly with the stone. He hit poor Xu Ning squarely between the eyes, knocking him from his horse.

Gong Wang and Ding moved up to grab him. But Song Jiang's forces were many, and Lu Fang and Guo Sheng both rushed out with their crescent-bladed halberds and snatched the victim back to safety.

The shocked Song Jiang turned pale. "Who will take on that scoundrel?" he asked.

Before the words were out of his mouth, from behind him a horse flew forward. It was Yan Shun who next contended. He fought many rounds, but there was no holding Zhang Qin, and Yan turned and withdrew. Zhang Qin, racing in pursuit, pulled out a stone and threw. It clanged against the back plate of Yan's armor. Bending low over his saddle, Zhang Qin cantered away.

"That wretch is nothing to be afraid of!" a voice among the outlaws shouted. And a chieftain clapped his steed and flew on to the field, holding a long lance. Han Tao the Ever-Victorious General engaged Zhang Qin without another word!

A mighty cheer went up as the horses met. Han Tao wanted to display his skill before Song Jiang. Concentrating all his energies, he battled with Zhang Qin. But after less than ten rounds, Featherless Arrow withdrew. Han, wary of his stones, did not give chase. When Zhang looked back and saw he was not being followed, he wheeled his mount. Han Tao advanced with levelled lance. Zhang Qin stealthily extracted another stone. His hand rose and the missile struck Han Tao on the bridge of the nose. Blood streaming from the offended organ, Han fled back to his position.

Peng Qi was furious. Without waiting for Song Jiang's orders, waving a three-pointed, two-edged blade, he galloped towards Zhang Qin.

But before the two horses could meet, Featherless Arrow once more threw a stone concealed in his hand. Peng Qi was clunked on the forehead. He dropped his three-pointed, two-edged sword, and returned to the position in great haste.

One defeat after another. Panic gripped Song Jiang's heart. He was about to call a retreat. Then a mighty voice shouted from behind Lu Junyi the Magnate: "If our prestige is broken, how will we be able to fight in days to come? Let's see if those stones can hit me!"

It was Xuan Zan the Ugly Son-in-Law. He kicked up his horse and flew towards Zhang Qin, waving his blade.

"Singly come, singly go. Doubly come, flee in pairs," cried Featherless Arrow. "Haven't you seen my trick with stones?"

"You've hit others," retorted Xuan Zan, "but you'll never hit me!"

Even before he had finished speaking, Zhang Qin flung the stone in his hand. He struck Xuan Zan on the side of the mouth and tumbled him from his saddle. Gong Wang and Ding Desun advanced to seize him, but the outlaw forces, who outnumbered them, got there first and brought him back.

Song Jiang was consumed with rage. Sword in hand, he rent his gown and swore: "I'll either take Zhang Qin personally or I won't return to my army!"

Huyan Zhuo heard him make the vow. "What use are we brothers if you have to go forth yourself," he exclaimed. Astride his Ebony Steed Which Treads in Snow, he rode onto the field and reviled Zhang Qin.

"Over-rated scamp! What have you got except a bit of strength and courage? Do you recognize the great warrior Huyan Zhuo?"

"Traitor and vanquished general! See what you can do with this!" Featherless Arrow sent a stone sizzling through the air.

Huyan hastily raised his rods to ward it off and it struck him a paralyzing blow on the wrist. Since he could no longer swing the steel rods he returned to his base.

"All of the cavalry chieftains have been wounded," said Song Jiang. "Who of the infantry dares to capture Zhang Qin?"

Liu Tang, twirling his halberd, strode onto the field of battle. Zhang Qin laughed.

"Puny commander! I've beaten your cavalry. What good are footsloggers!"

Enraged, Liu Tang charged. Featherless Arrow turned his steed and cantered towards his position. Liu Tang raced after and caught up. With a swift hack, he struck the animal. It lashed out with its rear hoofs and switched its tail across Liu Tang's eyes, blinding him temporarily. A stone from Zhang Qin felled him to the ground. As he struggled to rise, government soldiers pounced on him and dragged him away.

"Who will rescue Liu Tang?" Song Jiang yelled.

Yang Zhi the Blue-Faced Brute, brandishing his halberd, rode out against Zhang Qin. Featherless Arrow feinted with his lance. Yang Zhi swung, Zhang Qin ducked down to his stirrups, and the blade struck empty air.

"Take that!" cried Zhang Qin, with a quick underhand toss.

The stone clanged against Yang Zhi's helmet, chilling him to the marrow. Bending low over his saddle, he hurriedly withdrew.

"If we lose our manhood today, how can we return to Liangshan Marsh?" thought Song Jiang. Aloud, he said: "Who will work off this rage for me?"

Zhu Tong looked at Lei Heng. "They've taken Liu Tang. So what!" he said. "If one man can't deal with Zhang Qin, we'll attack him together!"

Both men carrying halberds, they advanced murderously, Zhu Tong on the left, Lei Heng on the right. Zhang Qin laughed.

"One's not enough, so you've added another. Even if there were ten of you, it wouldn't matter!" Not a flicker of fear crossed his face. In each hand he concealed a stone.

Lei Heng reached him first. Zhang Qin's arm rose in god-like stance, and the stone flew so quickly it was impossible to dodge. Before Lei Heng knew what was happening the missile struck his cheek and knocked him flat on his back. As Zhu Tong rushed to the rescue, a stone hit him in the neck.

Guan Sheng, from the position, saw that both were wounded. Gathering all his might, he galloped out on his swift roan, brandishing his dragon sword. Zhang Qin, who had just driven off the other two, returned to the field. Again he threw. Guan Sheng hastily raised his weapon to ward off the stone, and it nicked the edge, striking sparks. His taste for battle vanished. Guan Sheng pulled his roan around and went back to base.

When General Two Spears Dong Ping saw this, he said to himself: "I surrendered to Song Jiang only recently. If I don't display some of my military skill, people won't think much of me when we go up the mountain." He galloped onto the field, his set of spears in hand.

Zhang Qin rebuked him harshly. "Yours and mine are neighboring prefectures, as close as lips and teeth. Together we exterminated robbers, which was only fitting and proper. Why have you turned against the imperial court? You ought to be ashamed!"

Furious, Dong Ping charged. The horses met, the weapons rose. It was lance against spears, with four arms wildly darting. Sixty or seventy rounds they fought, then Zhang Qin rode away.

"Others may fear your stones," said Dong Ping, "but they can't touch me!"

Featherless Arrow set his lance in its socket, pulled a stone from his embroidered pouch, and threw. But Dong Ping's eyes were sharp and his hands fast. He flicked the missile aside. Zhang Qin extracted a second stone and threw again. Again, Dong Ping evaded it. Two stones had missed their mark. Zhang Qin was growing panicky. Dong Ping's steed pounded in hot pursuit of his own, almost nose to tail.

As Zhang Qin neared the left side of his army's arch of pennants, General Two Spears thrust at his back. Twisting, Featherless Arrow ducked low over his stirrups, and the blade went harmlessly by.

The two steeds were now racing parallel. Zhang Qin set aside his lance. With both hands he grasped Dong Ping, his arms and spears, and tugged. But he couldn't budge him. The two men grappled on horseback.

Suo Chao, watching from Song Jiang's position, hurried to the rescue, brandishing his big ax. Gong Wang and Ding Desun galloped out from the opposite position and intercepted him. They fought savagely. Zhang Qin and Dong Ping were locked in inseparable combat, while the mounts of the other three milled furiously about.

Lin Chong, Hua Rong, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng advanced together, two with lances, two with crescent-bladed halberds, to assist Dong Ping and Suo Chao. Zhang Qin saw that the situation was worsening. He abandoned Dong Ping and rode quickly back to his own position. But Dong Ping would not give up. He rode after Featherless Arrow right into the midst of the enemy, forgetting all about the stones. Zhang Qin stealthily pulled one from his pouch and waited for Dong Ping's horse to draw nearer. Then, "Take that!" he cried.

General Two Spears hastily dodged, and the stone whizzed past his ear. He returned to his base. Suo Chao left Gong Wang and Ding Desun and hurried after him Zhang Qin didn't use his lance but softly extracted a stone and flung it at Suo Chao. It struck him in the face before he could avoid it. Streaming blood, he returned to base with his ax.

Meanwhile, Lin Chong and Hua Rong had Gong Wang pinned down on one side, and Lu Fang and Guo Sheng had engaged Ding Desun on the other. Flurried, Gong Wang cast his javelin, but it hit neither of his opponents. He was weaponless now, and Lin Chong and Hua Rong captured him easily and took him back to their position.

Ding Desun twirled his trident and contended desperately with Lu Fang and Guo Sheng. He was unaware that Yan Qing was watching him from the arch of pennants.

"They've defeated fifteen of our chieftains in a row," thought the Prodigy. "We'll lose face if we don't nab at least one lieutenant."

He cast aside his staff, took up his bow, fitted an arrow, and let fly. It whistled into the hoof of Ding's mount, which stumbled to the ground. Lu and Guo immediately seized the fallen rider.

Zhang Qin wanted to go to his rescue, but the foe were too many. He returned to Dongchang with Liu Tang under guard. The prefect, from the town wall, had seen Featherless Arrow vanquish fifteen Mount Liangshan chieftains in succession. Although Featherless Arrow had lost Gong and Ding, he had captured Liu Tang.

The prefect proceeded to his office and celebrated his victory with wine. Then he had Liu Tang put in jail with a cangue around his neck, and sat down to confer with Zhang Qin.

As to Song Jiang, he returned with his army to camp. Gong and Ding he sent to the stronghold in Liangshan Marsh under escort. Afterwards, he consulted with Lu Junyi and Wu Yong.

"In the Five Dynasties period, Wang Yanzhang of the Great Liang beat thirty-six Tang commanders before the sun so much as moved their shadows," he said. "Today, Zhang Qin vanquished fifteen of our chieftains. Truly, a splendid general, no less a man than Wang Yanzhang!"

The others had no reply, and Song Jiang continued.

"It seems to me he relies completely on Gong and Ding to cover his flanks. Now that we've captured them, we ought to be able to think of some good way to catch him as well."
"You can rest assured, brother," said Wu Yong. "I've been observing his movements, and I have it all worked out. Send the wounded chieftains back to the fortress, and direct Lu Zhishen, Wu Song, Sun Li, Huang Xin and LiLi to bring as many of our naval forces as they can muster. We want carts and boats so that we can advance both by land and water, coordinate navy and cavalry, and trick Zhang Qin. In this way we will succeed." And Wu Yong explained how the forces were to be deployed.
In the town, Zhang Qin was saying to the prefect: "Although we won, the robbers' strength is still intact. Send scouts to investigate, then we'll decide what to do."
When the scouts returned, they reported: "Northwest of their camp there's vast amount of grain. We don't know where it came from, but it's loaded on over a hundred carts and five hundred boats, large and small, on the river. Both convoys are moving forward, under several supervisors along the way."
"Can those scoundrels be up to something?" the prefect pondered. "We must be careful that they don't trick us. I'll send out more scouts to make sure it's really grain they're carrying."
The next day a junior officer returned and said: "Those carts are laden with rice. Some of it spilled out. And although the cargoes on the boats are covered, we could see the ends of grain sacks."
"I'm leaving tonight," said Zhang Qin. "First, I'll stop the carts along the bank, then I'll seize the boats upon the river. If you'll lend a hand, Prefect, we'll capture them before the first beat of the watch drum!"
"An excellent plan. Just make sure you time it right." The prefect directed that the soldiers, after eating and drinking their fill, put on armor and take plenty of empty sacks.
Holding his long lance, Zhang Qin quietly left the town at the head of a thousand men. Though the moon was faint, the sky was studded with stars. Before the expedition had gone ten //they saw a convoy of carts and a banner reading: Righteous Loyalty Grain of the Marsh Fortress. Walking in the lead was Lu Zhishen. He carried his Buddhist staff. His cloak was girt up around the waist.
"I'll bounce a stone off the skull of that bald-pate!" muttered Zhang Qin.
By then Lu had seen him, but he pretended to be unaware, and continued striding forward. But he forgot to take precautions against Zhang Qin's stones.
"Speed!" shouted Featherless Arrow, astride his steed.
The flying stone struck Lu's head, drawing blood and knocking him flat. Zhang Qin's cheering soldiers charged. Wu Song whipped out his two knives, rushed forward and rescued Zhishen, then fled, abandoning the carts.
Featherless Arrow seized them. They were indeed laden with grain. Too pleased to bother pursuing Lu Zhishen, he brought the carts into the town. The delighted prefect took them over. "Now for the grain boats," said Zhang Qin.
"Be sure you time it right," the prefect admonished.
Featherless Arrow mounted and rode to the South Gate. Grain boats without number could be seen on the river. He shouted for the gate to be opened. Yelling, his army charged down to the river's edge. Suddenly, heavy clouds gathered and a dark mist spread and covered the sky. Zhang Qin's soldiers, infantry and cavalry, couldn't see a thing. Gongsun Sheng had worked a magic spell.
Zhang Qin grew flurried, and his eyes dimmed. He wanted to go back, but there was no way open to either advance or retreat. Wild shouts rose on every side. He had no idea where the attackers came from. Lin Chong, leading his Iron Cavalry, drove Zhang Qin, horse and rider, into the water. Waiting for him in a line in the river were eight naval chieftains: Li Jun, Zhang Heng, Zhang Shun, the three Ruan brothers and the two Tongs. Zhang Qin could not struggle loose. The three Ruan brothers grabbed and bound him, and took him into camp. The naval chieftains hurried to report his capture to Song Jiang.
At Wu Yong's urging, the outlaws attacked the town the same night. It was impossible for the prefect to withstand them by himself. On four sides outside the town cannon boomed. The gates swung wide. The terrified prefect had nowhere to run.
Song Jiang's forces surged into the town. First, they freed Liu Tang. Then they broke open the granaries, sent part of the grain and money to the mountain stronghold, and distributed the rest among the people. They spared the life of the prefect, since he ordinarily had been a decent official.
Song Jiang and chieftains gathered in the prefectural office. The naval commanders brought forward Zhang Qin. He had wounded many of their brothers, and the chieftains, grinding their teeth in rage, wanted to kill him. But Song Jiang ordered that he be untied, and came down the steps to greet him.
"We offended your mighty prestige by mistake," he apologized. "Please don't hold it against us." He invited Featherless Arrow into the hall.
Before the words were out of his mouth, Lu Zhishen, his head bound with a kerchief, rushed up with raised staff to smite Zhang Qin. Song Jiang blocked him and shouted at him to stand aside.
Moved by Song Jiang's chivalry, Featherless Arrow kowtowed and declared his surrender. Song Jiang poured wine upon the ground and broke an arrow.
"If you brothers insist on vengeance, Heaven will not protect you, and you'll die beneath the sword!" he prophesied.
The chieftains had no reply. They smilingly relaxed and acceded. Everyone was pleased. The troops were mustered in preparation for the return to the mountain. Zhang Qin had a suggestion.
"In Dongchang district there is a veterinary named Huangfu Duan," he said. "He's a good judge of horses, and knows the causes of their chills and fevers. With potions and needles, he cures them all. His skill is truly remarkable. He's from Youzhou Prefecture, originally. He has blue eyes and blond hair and foreign features, and is known as the Purple Beard. We could use him on Mount Liangshan. We could tell him to bring his family and come with us, if that meets with your approval."
Song Jiang agreed with pleasure. "If Huangfu Duan is willing to join us, we'll be glad to have him."
Happy that Song Jiang manifested such a clear fondness for him, Zhang Qin summoned the veterinary. Song Jiang and the chieftains were favorably impressed. Huangfu Duan was certainly out of the ordinary. His blue eyes had two pupils each, and his curly beard extended down below his waist. Huangfu was received with such chivalry that he willingly agreed to join the band. Song Jiang was more than content.
Having restored internal harmony, he ordered the chieftains to muster the carts, laden with grain and gold and silver, and set out for the mountain fortress. The two armies, front and rear, also marched.
The return journey was uneventful, and they soon reached Loyalty Hall. Song Jiang summoned Gong Wang and Ding Desun and spoke to them kindly. The two kowtowed and declared their allegiance. Huangfu Duan became the stronghold's official veterinary. General Two Spears Dong Ping and Featherless Arrow Zhang Qin were enrolled as chieftains.
Extremely pleased, Song Jiang called for a feast of celebration. Each took his place in Loyalty Hall according to rank. There were exactly one hundred and eight of them.
"Brothers," said Song Jiang, "from the time we began to gather on this mountain, we've never had any real losses anywhere. This is due to Heaven's beneficence, to the ability of no man. I'm leader today only thanks to the courage of you brothers. Joined here in righteous assembly, I've a few words I would like to say. I hope you brothers will listen."
"Please speak, Big Brother," said Wu Yong. "We'd like to hear you." Song Jiang expounded his ideas before the chieftains. And as a result, the 36 stars of Heavenly Spirits confirmed their destined number and the 72 stars of Earthly Fiends tallied with the divine design.

Now after taking Dongping Song Jiang withdrew his forces to Anshan, and was about to return to the mountain stronghold when the Daytime Rat came and announced: "The Unicorn has lost two divisions in the attack on Dongchang. They've a very brave general called Zhang Qing, a fellow who's immensely strong. He's a crack shot with a stone, never misses. People call him Hotshot. He has two lieutenants: one is Gong Wang, otherwise known as Stripes, because he's these tiger stripes tattooed all over his body and a whacking great tiger's head on the back of his neck. He can hurl a javelin from horseback. The other is Ding Desun, known as Scarface, who's got this great scar running from his cheek to his neck. He throws a trident from horseback. The Unicorn marched right up to the walls of the city, see, but for ten days no one came out to fight. Then a few days Fago Hotshot came out and challenged us. The Hound answered him. They fought a good many bouts and when Hotshot broke off the Hound chased him and got caught with a stone on the temple that knocked him off his horse. The Prodigal hit Hotshot's horse with an arrow, which allowed us to rescue the Hound, but we lost the battle. The next day Demon King, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost went out to fight with their whirling shields, but unfortunately the Eight-Armed Ogre caught one of Scarface's tridents in the ribs, so we lost that fight too. Because we have two leaders wounded and laid up in the boats, the Professor sent me to ask you to come and lend a hand as soon as possible."
Song Jiang sighed and said: "The Unicorn has had no luck. I especially got the Professor and Taoist Gongsun to help him, because I wanted him to have a military success. I thought it would stand him in good stead among our comrades. I never thought he would meet with such adversity! But since this is how it's turned out, we must all go and lend a hand."
Orders were given and three contingents were mobilized. The leaders mounted and rode with Song Jiang, till they reached the boundaries of Dongchang. There the Unicorn was waiting for them. He explained all that had happened, and they made a bivouac.
Whilst they were considering the situation, a soldier came in and reported: "Hotshot is challenging us." Song Jiang ordered his forces out. They formed up on a flat piece of wasteland. The leaders on horseback rode to the pennants gate, from whence Song Jiang observed the opposing army. They were drawn up in a straight line, under five different banners. Three beats of the drum and Hotshot Zhang Qing rode out.
From where he stood under the pennants Song Jiang admired Hotshot as he turned his horse this way and that, churning up the dust. On his left now appeared Stripes and on his right Scarface. The three rode forward together and Hotshot pointed towards Song Jiang and abused him: "You bog-dwelling rebel, your time has come!"
"Who will fight him for me?" Song Jiang asked his men.
A furious hero on a prancing steed appeared beside him, a spear dancing in his hand as he rode forward. It was the Spearsman. "A good match," Song Jiang thought.
The Spearsman flew at Hotshot. Two horses met, two weapons were raised on high. But before they had completed five bouts Hotshot turned away. When the Spearsman gave chase, Hotshot, distracting attention with the spear in his left hand, plunged his right hand into a cotton bag he had and picked out a stone. Twisting in the saddle he took careful aim at Spearsman's head, waited his moment and hurled the stone. It caught the unfortunate hero right between the eyes and knocked him from his horse. Stripes and Scarface rushed forward to take him prisoner. But Song Jiang had many commanders at his disposal, and the Little Duke and the Halberdier, both mounted and wielding halberds, rescued him and brought him back.
Nevertheless it had given Song Jiang and his companions a fright. They had all turned pale. "Who wants to take the fellow on now?" Song Jiang asked. Before he finished speaking, another warrior rode out from behind him. It was the Dandy. Song Jiang would have stopped him, but the Dandy was off already. He closed with Hotshot and they fought many bouts. Eventually the Dandy could no longer parry and he broke off and galloped away. Hotshot galloped after him. He took out a stone and hurled it at the middle of the Dandy's back. It struck the armour with a resounding clang. The Dandy crouched low in the stirrups and fled.
Someone else among Song Jiang's ranks now shouted: "I'm not scared of that oaf!" Slapping his horse and levelling his weapon he charged. It was Victorious, who engaged Hotshot without more ado. Two horses met and a great shout rose to the heavens. Victorious was eager to demonstrate his prowess in front of Song Jiang. Summoning up all his resolve he launched a furious onslaught. Before they completed ten bouts Hotshot turned away. Victorious, wary of his stones, did not pursue him. When Hotshot looked back and saw he was not being followed, he turned his horse round again. Victorious was ready to receive his charge with his spear, but Hotshot had concealed a stone in his hand which now he threw, catching Victorious right between the eyes. The blood spurted out and Victorious galloped back to his own ranks.
The Supremo was enraged by this and without waiting for Song Jiang's order flew at Hotshot, his three-bladed weapon dancing in his hand. But before the horses even met Hotshot raised his arm and the stone concealed in his hand caught the Supremo in the forehead. He dropped his weapon and galloped back.
After seeing so many of his leaders defeated, Song Jiang felt fear in his heart and was about to withdraw his forces. But then from behind the Unicorn someone shouted: "If we allow ourselves to be made fools of today, how will we fight tomorrow? Let's see if he can hit me with his stones!" It was the Ugly Son-in-Law. He slapped his horse and charged Hotshot, with whirling sword. Hotshot said: "Come one, come all. What do I care? Don't you know about my skill with a stone?"
The Ugly Son-in-Law said: "You hit the others, but you can't hit me."
Before he even finished speaking, Hotshot had raised his hand and the stone smashed into the side of his opponent's mouth, knocking him from his horse. Stripes and Scarface tried to take him prisoner, but Song Jiang still had plenty of commanders and they rescued him and brought him back. Song Jiang's anger knew no bounds and drawing his sword he slit the edge of his robe and made this solemn oath: "If I don't get this man I swear I shall never return to the army!"
When he heard the oath, Twin Rods said: "If you speak like that, what are we all here for?" So saying, he urged on his famous horse, the Emperor's gift, and rode to the front, shouting: "You upstart, you think you're great because brute strength and recklessness have brought you a bit of luck. Do you recognize Marshal Huyan Zhuo?"
Hotshot answered him: "You national disgrace, you miserable failure, now you are going to feel the weight of my dread arm!"
Before he even finished a stone was on its way. Twin Rods saw it coming and tried to fend it off with one of his rods. It struck him on the wrist. No longer able to wield his rods, he was obliged to return to his own ranks.
Song Jiang said: "The cavalry leaders have been put out of action. Which of the infantry commanders will take this villain on?"
The Red-Haired Devil stepped forward to do battle, spinning his halberd, his head held high. Hotshot reacted scornfully: "That's pitiful! Your cavalry are all defeated, what chance do you think the infantry will have?"
Needled by this, the Red-Haired Devil charged. Instead of facing him, Hotshot rode away. The Red-Haired Devil gave chase. As he closed the gap between them the Red-Haired Devil struck a crafty blow at Hotshot's horse. The horse lashed out with its hind legs. Its tail swept across his face, obscuring his vision and one of Hotshot's stones knocked him to the ground. As he struggled to rise enemy troops rushed out and dragged him off to their own lines.
Song Jiang gave a shout: "Who will go to rescue the Red-Haired Devil?"
Then the Blue-Faced Beast slapped his horse and whirling his sword charged at Hotshot. Hotshot feinted with his spear and, when his opponent slashed with the sword, bent low in the saddle so the blade cut nothing but air. He took a stone in his hand and shouted "Pow!" The stone whizzed past his opponent's ribs. The next stone hit the helmet and frightened the life out of the Blue-Faced Beast, who crouched low in the saddle and galloped back.
Song Jiang mulled it all over and thought to himself: "If we allow them to get the better of us like this, how can we return to Mount Liang? Who is going to bring me relief?"
Whiskers gave Sergeant Lei a look and said: "It can't be done by one man alone, but the two of us together will press him hard!"
Whiskers rushed forward on the left and Sergeant Lei on the right, both armed with halberds.
"One can't do it so you add another," said Hotshot with a sneer. "Make it ten if you like, it will please me even better." With the utmost calm he sat his horse and hid two stones in his hand. Sergeant Lei came on first. Hotshot raised his hand with a fluent motion and a stone whistled through the air. There was no chance of dodging; before Sergeant Lei realized what was happening it had hit him full in the face and he crashed to the ground. Whiskers rushed to the rescue and another stone hit him in the neck.
When Scimitar saw them wounded, he rode forward impressively twirling his black dragon blade, gave his chestnut steed its head and raced to the rescue of Whiskers and Sergeant Lei. Under cover of Scimitar's weapon the two of them made it back to the army, but Hotshot now fired another of his stones at Scimitar, who quickly parried with his sword. The stone struck the guard and sparks flew out. Scimitar having no stomach to continue the fight reined in his horse and returned. Twin Spears had only watched so far and he thought to himself: "I only changed sides recently. If I don't give some proof of my military skill, I shall be without honour when I go to the mountain with them." He took up his two spears and galloped forward.
Hotshot jeered at him: "You and I are from neighbouring provinces, as close as lips and teeth; what we should be doing is collaborating to exterminate the bandits. Why have you turned traitor? Aren't you ashamed of yourself?"
Twin Spears flew at him in a fury. Two horses closed, weapons were raised, the spears clashed and arms tangled. After half a dozen bouts Hotshot turned his horse and put distance between them. Twin Spears said: "Oh no, other people got hit by your stones, but you won't get me!" Hotshot rested his spear and picked a stone out of the bag. The action of his arm was like lightning, the flight of the stone awesome. But Twin Spears' eyes were sharp and his hand quick and he struck the stone away. Seeing he had missed, Hotshot took out another stone and threw it. Again Twin Spears dodged. Having missed with two stones, Hotshot began to feel worried. With his horse's tail flaunted almost in the face of his pursuer's mount, he galloped back to his own ranks on the left. Twin Spears thrust at the retreating back. But he struck only air because Hotshot flattened himself in the saddle. After this blow had missed the two horses were level with each other. Abandoning his own weapon, Hotshot grabbed his opponent's spear arm and tugged. But he was unable to pull the spear from his grasp and the two adversaries became locked together.
In Song Jiang's ranks Hasty was watching. He whirled his great axe and charged to the rescue. On the enemy side Stripes and Scarface galloped out to intercept him. Hotshot and Twin Spears still had not managed to extricate themselves and Hasty, Stripes and Scarface were also locked in combat. Leopard's Head, Colonel Hua, the Little Duke and the Halberdier now added the assistance of their two spears and two halberds. Alert to the danger, Hotshot finally broke away from Twin Spears and galloped back to his own side. Equally anxious that he should not escape, Twin Spears charged after him, forgetting to guard against his stones. Hotshot surreptitiously took up a stone, waited till his pursuer was close and yelled "Pow!" as he let fly. Twin Spears quickly dodged and the stone skimmed past his ear. Now Twin Spears turned back, while Hasty broke off the fight with Stripes and Scarface and charged Hotshot. The latter rested his spear, took up a stone and fired it at Hasty, who ducked too late. It hit him in the face and the blood flowed freely. He put up his axe and returned to his ranks.
Leopard's Head and Colonel Hua were still occupying Stripes on one side, while the Little Duke and the Halberdier had intercepted Scarface on the other side. In a panic Stripes flung his spear but failed to hit either of his opponents. Weaponless, he was captured alive by Leopard's Head and Colonel Hua and taken back to their lines. Scarface was still battling furiously against the Little Duke and the Halberdier with his throwing tridents. He didn't notice the Prodigy, who had been watching from the other side and said to himself: "In a short space of time I have seen them defeat fifteen of our leaders. If we can't capture even one of theirs, it's a huge loss of face!" Laying down his staff he took up a bow, set an arrow to the string and fired: swish! it hit Scarface's horse in the leg. The horse fell and the rider was captured by Little Duke and Halberdier and taken back to their ranks. Hotshot would have tried to rescue him but it was one against many and all he could do was retire into Dongchang, with his captive, the Red-Haired Devil.
The Magistrate, watching from the walls, had seen Hotshot defeat fifteen commanders from Mount Liang. Although they had lost Stripes and Scarface, they had taken the Red-Haired Devil. Once inside the city, the Red-Haired Devil was fitted with a heavy cangue and thrown into prison. Further discussions followed.
Song Jiang regrouped his forces. Stripes and Scarface were sent off to Mount Liang. Song Jiang said to the Unicorn and the Professor: "I have heard it said that in the era of the Five Dynasties the Liang emperor Wan Yanzhang defeated thirty-six Tang leaders, all in a short space of time. Today this Hotshot has bested a full fifteen of our leaders in no time at all. Although he is not one of ours, he is definitely a redoubtable warrior." Since no one had anything to say to this, Song Jiang went on: "I have noticed that he relies greatly on Stripes and Scarface to help him out. Now he is deprived of his lieutenants, perhaps we can devise some stratagem to capture him."
The Professor said: "Don't worry brother. I have observed his movements and I have a plan. But first the wounded commanders should be sent back to the mountain stronghold. You can ask Monk, Pilgrim, Colonel Sun, the Tamer and the Executioner to prepare a force of waterborne troops equipped with carts and boats to advance on land and water. The boats will pose a great temptation to Hotshot when he sees them. Thus will our objective be achieved." The Professor went ahead and made his dispositions.
Back in the city, Hotshot had been advising the Governor as follows: "Although we won, the threat has not been eradicated. You must send a spy to find out what is actually going on. Then we will decide what to do."
When the spy returned he reported: "Behind their camp to the northwest they've got several hundred carts carrying an unknown quantity of supplies. On the river they've also got boats with fodder for the horses, some five hundred of them. They're advancing by land and water, with horses and boats. Along the road there are several leaders supervising the operation."
The Magistrate said: "The villains are up to something. I fear we shall suffer the consequences. We'd better send someone out again to find out if it really is supplies."
Next day the soldier came back and reported: "The carts are definitely carrying food supplies. There's even some grain leaking from them. The boats on the river are covered over, but you can still see grain sacks."
Hotshot said: "I'll lead a party out tonight to cut off the carts on the bank first. Afterwards we'll seize the boats. If you back me up, we'll have it all wrapped up."
The Magistrate said: "It's a good plan. We must not let this opportunity escape." He ordered the army to be liberally supplied with food and wine, following which everyone was told to put on armour and issued with cotton sacks. Spear in hand Hotshot with a thousand troops quietly left the city.
It was a clear night with pale moonlight and a star-filled sky. They had only gone a few miles when they saw a string of carts, with a banner on which was clearly written "Official supply convoy of the waterside camp."
Hotshot also saw the Flowery Monk striding along at the head, with his monk's staff at the slope and his black habit rolled up. "I'm going to hit that bald ass on the pate with a stone," he said.
As he strode along Monk was not paying attention. He had eyes only for the road and didn't think to defend himself against stones. So when Hotshot on horseback released his stone with a cry of "Pow!", it hit Monk smack on the head. Blood gushed from the wound and he toppled over backwards. Hotshot's men cheered and charged forward. Pilgrim hurriedly drew his two swords and after a desperate struggle succeeded in rescuing his comrade. The carts were abandoned.
Having seized the carts, Hotshot ascertained that they did indeed contain food supplies and was well pleased. He did not pursue Monk but escorted the carts back to the city. The Magistrate gleefully disposed of them, and Hotshot said: "Now we're going to get the boats."

"Make the most of this opportunity," said the Magistrate.
Hotshot mounted and rode over to the south gate. From here he could see the cargo boats at the jetty, hundreds of them. He ordered the city gates to be opened and cheering loudly they charged down to the river. At this point dark clouds filled the sky, a black mist obscured the heavens. When the troops looked about them they could not even see each other. It was one of Taoist Gongsun's magic spells. Fearful and sightless, Hotshot wanted to turn back. But there was no way either forward or back. All around him were the shouts of the enemy but there was no knowing where they were coming from. Leopard's Head with his armoured cavalry pushed Hotshot's forces back to the river where eight leaders — the White-Water Dragon, the Pilot, White Eel, the three Ruan brothers and the two Tong brothers — were waiting for them, spread out in a line. Even if Hotshot had had three heads and six arms, he wouldn't have had a chance of fighting his way out of this. He was captured by the three Ruan brothers, trussed up and taken back to the camp. The leaders of the water-borne troops rushed to tell Song Jiang. The Professor urged them all to mount a concerted attack on the city that same night.
The Magistrate had no hope of surviving by his own efforts alone. Guns were going off all around the city. He opened the gates but was horrified to find there was no way to escape. Song Jiang's forces poured in. They rescued the Red-Haired Devil first, and then opened up the stores. Part of the cash and grain was set aside to be sent back to Mount Liang, and part was distributed among the people of the city. The Magistrate, because he had generally been honest and fair, was spared.
Song Jiang called all his people together in the government offices. The boat captains brought Hotshot and handed him over. All the leaders who had been wounded by him were licking their lips at the prospect of seeing him die. But Song Jiang immediately came down from the dais to receive him personally. He apologized saying: "Forgive us for the offence, please do not hold it against us." Then he invited Hotshot up onto the dais. Even as he spoke, Monk, his head swathed in bandages, rushed up steel staff in hand to beat Hotshot. Song Jiang stood between them and hurriedly ordered him back. "Hands off!" he commanded.
Hotshot, seeing Song Jiang so generous of spirit, bowed deeply in sign of submission. Song Jiang, after offering him wine, broke an arrow and swore a solemn oath: "Any member of our company who seeks vengeance, let heaven abandon him and let him die by the sword."
After this no one dared open his mouth. For this was indeed a destined meeting of heavenly stars, bound in honour and loyalty to become allies. After his oath, Song Jiang said: "Let no member of this company harbour resentment," and they all relaxed and were merry. The troops were assembled for the return to the mountain.
Hotshot now happened to recommend to Song Jiang's attention a certain veterinary surgeon of Dongchang . The man was called Huangfu Duan, a double-barrelled surname. "This fellow is brilliant with horses," said Hotshot. "He knows all the animals' ailments, their chills and fevers, he treats them with medicines or acupuncture and never fails of a cure. He's really like the famous vet of antiquity. He has blue eyes and a red beard and looks like a foreigner, so people call him Uncle Redbeard. He could be extremely useful to Mount Liang. Why not invite him with his wife and family to go to the mountain?"
Song Jiang was pleased with the idea. "If Uncle Redbeard is willing to join us it will be most gratifying," he said.
Happy to find Song Jiang was so warm-hearted and generous, Hotshot went and invited Redbeard to meet him and the other leaders. Song Jiang saw immediately that this was someone quite out of the ordinary. He had prominent blue eyes and a curly beard reaching to his waist. Not only was Song Jiang immensely impressed with him, but Redbeard likewise was won over by Song Jiang's noble spirit and willingly agreed to follow the cause.
After some encouraging words to the newcomer, Song Jiang now gave orders for all the leaders to prepare the carts with the valuables and supplies and set off together. The cash and supplies from two provinces were all to be taken back to the mountain resort. One after another the leaders set out. Nothing of importance happened on the journey. Soon they were all gathered in the Ceremonial Hall on Mount Liang. Song Jiang had Stripes and Scarface released and after he had soothed them with flattering speeches they both declared their allegiance. Redbeard was added to the complement as expert in animal care. Twin Spears and Hotshot became new leaders. Song Jiang expressed his satisfaction by at once organizing a banquet to celebrate and all sat down in the Ceremonial Hall according to their rank. Song Jiang took note of the fact that they were now one hundred and eight in all. He made a speech in which he said: "My very dear friends, since first we gathered here on the mountain there have been no losses to our company. This is undoubtedly due to heaven's benevolence, not to human power. Recently you have honoured me as your leader, but I owe everything to your valour. Now for the sake of our brotherhood, and because I have a few more words to say, I ask you to hear me."
The Professor said, "We're yours to command." Song Jiang now spoke to them all and expressed what was on his mind. And it was to have important consequences:

36 heavenly stars have come to earth,
And 72 earth stars, born amid strife.

WHILE the brigands were on their way to Liangshan Marsh, Bai Sheng arrived and reported to Song Jiang, "Lu Junyi attacked Dongchang Prefecture twice, but was twice defeated. In that town there is a very fierce general named Zhang Qing who is a Zhangte Prefecture man, and is a very skillful horseman. He is unexcelled at throwing stones, and hits his mark every time. He is nicknamed, 'Featherless Arrow.' He has two capable adjutants: Gong Wang, nicknamed 'Flowery Necked Tiger' because his skin is all tattooed like the tigers. He wears a tiger's head, and on horseback throws his spear with great speed and precision. The other adjutant is called Ding Desun nicknamed 'Arrow Struck Tiger.' Both his face and neck are scarred. On horseback he throws his three-pronged trident.
"Lu Junyi arrived in Dongchang with his men, but for the first ten days the troops in the town did not come outside. Two days ago, however, General Zhang Qing came out with his army, and was challenged by Hao Siwen but after a few bouts Zhang Qing was going to retire into the town. Hao Siwen pursued him on horseback, but Zhang Qing threw a stone which knocked Hao Siwen off his horse. But Yan Qing had also followed them, and he now shot an arrow which wounded Zhang Qing's horse, and so saved Hao Siwen's life.
"The next day Xiang Chong and two others of our leaders went out to challenge combat, and adjutant Ding Desun came out to fight them, but he threw his three-pronged trident, and wounded Xiang Chong in the back. Xiang Chong then retired, and that was our second defeat.
"Those two wounded leaders are being attended to on our boats. Wu Yong however told me to come and request you to bring all your men to Dongchang to help him."
When Song Jiang heard this he was sad, and exclaimed, "Lu Junyi has had bad luck! I never anticipated this! We must all go and help him." He at once gave orders for all his men to march to Dongchang Prefecture.
The two forces were soon united, but while the leaders were discussing the situation a scout arrived and reported that General Zhang Qing and his soldiers had again left the town for a fight. The leaders at once mounted their horses and proceeded to an open field. The two forces faced each other with drums beating.
General Zhang Qing was attended by his adjutants Ding Desun and Gong Wang. All three rode forward, and when they halted General Zhang Qing pointed at Song Jiang and said, "You thief from the swamp! Shall we have a fight?"
"Who will fight this man?" asked Song Jiang to his leaders.
Immediately one of his heroes dashed forward armed with a hooked spear, and Song Jiang saw that it was Xu Ning, the "Spear Expert." Song Jiang was pleased as he knew that this man would be a suitable match for General Zhang Qing.
The two men fought, but after about five bouts General Zhang Qing retired. Xu Ning chased him on horseback, but General Zhang Qing put his spear to his left hand and held a stone in his right hand, and when Xu Ning drew near he turned in his saddle and threw the stone which struck Xu Ning in the face and knocked him off his horse. Both the adjutants galloped forward to capture Xu Ning, but at the same time Lu Fang and Guo Sheng also rode forward, and they succeeded in reaching Xu Ning first, and rescuing him, carried him back on their horses.
Song Jiang now asked for another volunteer, and at once another horseman dashed forward. He was Yan Shun, the "Elegant Tiger." He fought with General Zhang Qing for several bouts, but then realizing that he had no chance of winning he withdrew. General Zhang Qing pursued him, and threw a stone which struck Yan Shun in the back so hard that the latter rode with pain. A man shouted, "Who is afraid of this man?" and rode forward holding his long mace. This was Han Tao, the "Ever Victorious General." Han Tao wished to display his skill before Song Jiang so he did his best. After about ten bouts General Zhang Qing withdrew. Han Tao did not pursue him as he suspected that Zhang Qing would throw a stone as before. General Zhang Qing did turn round, but seeing that his opponent was not following him he wheeled his horse round and returned. But just as he neared he threw a stone which hit Han Tao on the nose, and caused blood to flow, so that Han Tao hurriedly retreated.
Upon seeing this Peng Qi, without waiting for orders, dashed forward, but before the two could fight General Zhang Qing suddenly threw another stone which struck Peng Qi right in the face, and made him drop his sword and ride back to the brigands' ranks.
Song Jiang was rather annoyed at these repeated repulses, and was inclined to withdraw all his men. But just then a man called out from behind, If we were repelled today, how can we fight tomorrow? Will he hit me with a stone as well?"
General Song Jiang saw that it was Xuan Zan, the "Disgraced Son-in-law." General Zhang Qing called out, "They come, and go, one by one, but it would be just the same if they come in pairs. Do you know how I throw stones?"
"You have hit others, but you cannot hit me," said Xuan Zan.
He had not finished saying this when he was struck in the mouth by a stone, and fell off his horse. The adjutants Gong Wang and Ding Desun were going to take him prisoner but they were outnumbered by the brigands who rushed forward and took Xuan Zan back.
Song Jiang was very angry at this, and drawing his sword he swore an oath, "If I do not capture this man I will not return."
Huyan Zhuo interposed, "If you take this oath of what use are we?" He at once whipped his horse, and galloped forward. He called out, "You proud one! You have strength without wisdom. Do you recognize the great General Huyan Zhuo?"
"You are a disgrace to our country and a deserter! You want also to suffer at my hand!" replied General Zhang Qing. So saying he again suddenly threw a stone, but Huyan Zhuo put up his whip and received the stone on his wrist. His whip fell to the ground, so he wheeled his horse and retired.
Song Jiang called out, "All our mounted men have been repulsed, so now a foot-soldier had better have a try."
Liu Tang now stepped forward armed with a halberd, but General Zhang Qing laughed at him, and said, "You, defeated bandits, your horsemen have suffered at my hand, not to say you a footman."
Liu Tang was very angry and advanced, but General Zhang Qing declined to fight with him and turned back to his army. But Liu Tang ran forward, and struck the general's horse with his halberd. The horse kicked Liu Tang, and knocked him down while General Zhang Qing threw another stone. Liu Tang was arrested and taken prisoner.
"Who will rescue Liu Tang?" shouted Song Jiang. Yang Zhi now dashed forward on horseback, and General Zhang Qing pretended to defend himself with his spear, but as Yang Zhi thrust with his halberd General Zhang Qing merely evaded the blow. Before Yang Zhi could recover his position he was struck on the head by a stone, and he quickly retreated.
Zhu Tong now turned to Lei Heng, and said, "Men are beaten singly, but we two might succeed."
Lei Hong agreed, and they both advanced on foot, armed with halberds. General Zhang Qing laughed when he saw them, and said, "One alone was useless so an extra one is added. But why don't they play for safety and send ten?" He secretly got two stones in his hand, and suddenly threw one at Lei Heng whom it hit on the forehead and knocked him down. Zhu Tong ran to assist Lei Heng, but another stone hit the former. In the ranks of the brigands Guan Sheng was angry when he saw this further repulse, and whipping his horse he galloped forward to rescue the two leaders. As he got near, however, General Zhang Qing threw a stone, but Guan Sheng received it on his sword so that it fell to the ground. Guan Sheng rescued the two leaders, and took them back into safety.
Dong Ping, the "Two Spears General," thought, "I have only recently joined these brigands, and it is now a suitable opportunity to show my skill. If I don't do something here, I shall have no distinction at the mountain stronghold." So he rode forth and charged General Zhang Qing who called out to him, "We were in command in neighboring towns, and assisted each other in a common cause. Why do you now oppose me? You are a disgrace!"
Dong Ping was annoyed at this, and they fought. The four arms and three spears whirled around and flashed, as numerous lunges were made. After about seven bouts however General Zhang Qing retired.
"You threw stones at the others," said Dong Ping, "so why not at me?"
General Zhang Qing put his spear in its buckle, and taking a stone threw it at his opponent. But Dong Ping knocked the stone to one side with the shaft of his spear. The general threw another stone, but this time Dong Ping crouched and avoided it. This rather disappointed the general, and made him afraid as Dong Ping was now quite close. Dong Ping lunged with his spear as the two horses galloped one behind the other, but General Zhang Qing evaded the blow. The two horses were now level, so General Zhang Qing seized Dong Ping with both arms, but failed to pull Dong Ping off his horse. The two men and two horses were now close together in one mass.
Suo Chao seeing this dashed forward with his axe to help Dong Ping, but on the other side the adjutants Gong Wang and Ding Desun also galloped forward to intercept the fresh opponents. Now there were two separate groups of fighters. Among the brigands Lin Chong and three other leaders rode forth. Upon seeing that he was outnumbered General Zhang Qing released his hold on Dong Ping and retreated. But Dong Ping pursued him right among the soldiers, having forgotten at the moment about the stones. General Zhang Qing reigned in his horse, and when Dong Ping was near he suddenly threw a stone. But Dong Ping saw the move, ducked, evaded the stone, wheeled his horse, and galloped away in safety. The general now threw a stone at Suo Chao which struck that man in the face, so that he at once wheeled his horse and retreated.
The other six horsemen were still fighting in two groups. At last Gong Wang was captured by Lin Chong while Yan Qing on the brigands' side took his crossbow and shot an arrow which wounded adjutant Ding Desun's horse, and he was immediately made prisoner. General Zhang Qing would have liked to rescue his adjutants, but decided not to do so as the opposing force was greater than his. So he ordered his army to return to Dongchang. Upon reaching the town the prisoner Liu Tang was sent to prison, and the Prefect entertained General Zhang Qing at a feast.
On the other side adjutants Ding Desun and Gong Wang were sent to Liangshan Marsh as prisoners.
Song Jiang was conferring with Wu Yong and Lu Junyi when he said, ' I have read that during the Five Dynasties (A.D. 907) there was a man named Wang Yanzhang who defeated thirty-six generals in about an hour. Today this General Zhang Qing has done almost the same thing, having defeated fifteen of our leaders in about the same time. He is undoubtedly a doughty warrior. But it is evident that he depends a great deal on the assistance of his two adjutants, but as we have captured them we can capture him with some strategy."
"You need not worry about him," said Wu Yong. "I have carefully noticed his method of fighting: I have long had a plan to capture him. We must now send all our wounded leaders back to Liangshan Marsh and then order Lu Da and four other leaders to arrange carts and boats to proceed by land and water to induce Zhang Qing into our trap.
In the town General Zhang Qing said to the Prefect, "Although we have twice defeated the brigands yet we have not entirely crippled their activities. We must send spies to find out what they are doing."
This was done, and it was not long before a scout returned and reported, "On the northwest side there are about a hundred carts and about fifty boats on the river. They are evidently all loaded with rice, but I do not know where they came from—but they are approaching the town."
"I am afraid that this is some plot of those brigands," said the Prefect. "We had better send a spy to find out whether it is really rice or not."
This was done, and the following day the scout returned and reported, "The carts are covered with straw, but I saw some grain fell from the cart, and found that it was rice. The boats have covers over the hatches, but I could see the sacks inside evidently filled with rice."
"I will take soldiers tonight, and capture both those carts and boats," said General Zhang Qing.
The Prefect agreed to this, and arrangements were made accordingly. That night a thousand soldiers left the town very quietly. There was not much moonlight, but the sky was clear of clouds and the stars were numerous. After going about three //the advance guard saw a train of carts bearing a flag. "Grain for the Loyalty and Justice Hall at Liangshan Marsh," General Zhang Qing saw Lu Da walking in front with his monk's staff over his shoulder. Lu Da pretended not to be aware of the arrival of General Zhang Qing, and for the moment had forgotten about the stone that was to be expected. General Zhang Qing suddenly threw a stone, which struck Lu Da on the head, made a serious wound, and knocked him down. The soldiers now all shouted and rushed forward. Wu Song was there with a halberd, and abandoned the carts, and rushed to rescue Lu Da. General Zhang Qing seized the carts and was much pleased to find that they really contained rice, so he did not pursue Lu Da, but took the carts into the town with his men. He then left with his army for the South Gate, where from the wall he saw many boats on the river loaded with rice.
He ordered the gate to be opened, and when they marched out they found there was a thick dark mist obscuring their view so that the men could hardly see each other. This was conjured up by Gongsun Sheng. General Zhang Qing decided to return, but was now uncertain as to which way to go. Just then there came loud shouts from the brigands, but he could not know where the brigands were. In trying to evade the brigands he found himself in the water, and was surrounded by brigand leaders who soon arrested him, and took him as prisoner to their camp. When this news was reported to Song Jiang he ordered a vigorous attack on the town.
The Prefect found himself helpless. The city gate was open, and there was sound of bombs outside the town. The brigands were soon in the town, and at once took the prison and released Liu Tang. They also looted the public granary and treasury, and sent half of the rice and money to Liangshan Marsh on carts—the other half being distributed among the people. As the brigands had no fault to find with the Prefect they did not touch him. The leaders assembled in the yamen and General Zhang Qing was brought there as prisoner. Many of the leaders showed their anger at the General who had wounded many of their friends, and wished to have him executed. But Song Jiang advanced, and saluted him saying, "We offended you unintentionally, we ask you to forgive us." He then conducted him to the hall. He had no sooner entered the hall than Lu Da with his head bandaged up, stepped forward with his monk's staff to get his revenge. But Song Jiang intervened, and protected General Zhang Qing, who, seeing this exhibition of kindness to a defeated defenseless man, at once saluted Song Jiang and agreed to join the brigands.
Song Jiang now took an oath, broke an arrow, and scattered a cup of wine on the ground, and said. "If we seek revenge Heaven will not support us."
Nobody could say a word against this, and they all agreed to abandon all ideas of revenge. There was soon general rejoicing at this auspicious climax. The next day they all departed for Liangshan Marsh.
Before departing, however, General Zhang Qing introduced to Song Jiang a famous veterinary surgeon who had a double surname Huangfu and a personal name Duan. He knew all diseases of horses, and could cure any sickness by either medicine or needle. He was a Yuzhou man, and had green eyes and light colored beard. He looked like a barbarian, and had the nickname, "Purple Bearded Uncle." There was need for such a man at Liangshan Marsh, and he was duly enrolled. He took his family with him to the bandits' stronghold.
Upon reaching Liangshan Marsh an assembly was held in the Loyalty and Justice Hall, and there Song Jiang talked very friendly with the two adjutants who were prisoners, and they also agreed to join the band. The new recruits were made leaders, and this brought the total number of the leaders to 108. We will now recount the speech made to the assembled leaders by Song Jiang.

36 heavenly heroes replete,
With earthly 72 complete.

In Loyalty & Justice Ceremonial Hall, a Stone Table is Found & a Stone Tablet Bears a Mystic writing in Heavenly Script with Heaven's Commands; The Heroes of Liangshan Marsh Take Seats in Order of Rank established once & for all

"After my trouble in Jiangzhou I came up the mountain," said Song Jiang, "and later, thanks entirely to the support of you heroic brothers, I was made leader. Gathered here today we have a total of one hundred and eight chieftains. I am very happy. Since brother Chao Gai's death, on each of the occasions we led troops down the mountain we always returned intact. This is because Heaven defended us. It was not due to the talent of any man. Whenever one of us was captured by the enemy, whether imprisoned or wounded, he always came back safely. All of this was the work of Heaven. None of us can claim any credit. And here we are today, one hundred and eight of us gathered in righteous meeting. Truly an event rarely witnessed from ancient times to the present!
"These are days when armed soldiers roam, slaughtering at will and committing unpardonable crimes. I'm thinking of holding a great mass to thank the spirits of Heaven and Earth for their protective benevolence. We should pray first that they continue to preserve our health and security. Second, that the emperor will pardon our terrible crimes and allow us to serve our country loyally to the death. Third, that Chao Gai's ghost may soon become a spirit in Heaven so that in later reincarnations we may meet again.
"We should pray also that those who died by violence—the burned, the drowned, the murdered innocents—be allowed to cross over into Heaven.
"This is what I'd like to do. I wonder what you brothers think of the idea?"
"Excellent," said the chieftains. "A fine thing that can bring only good."
"Let Taoist mentor Gongsun Sheng conduct the mass," suggested Wu Yong. "Send men down to invite Taoist priests of high attainment to attend and bring the necessary paraphernalia. Have someone buy scented candles and paper horses, plus fruit and flowers, vegetables and other meatless dishes, and all things required for the sacrifices."
It was decided to hold the mass for seven days, starting the fifteenth of the fourth lunar month. The stronghold spent money freely and made full preparations. As the time drew near, four banners were hung in front of Loyalty Hall. Inside, three high altars were built, and idols of the Seven Precious and Three Clean Saints were set. On either side stood the Spirits of the Twenty-Eight Constellations and the Twelve Watches—for these were the true officiators over all important masses. Outside the hall were placed idols of the guardian generals Cui, Lu, Deng and Dou. Then the paraphernalia was laid out and the Taoist priests invited to begin. Including Gongsun Sheng, they numbered forty-nine.

It was a clear, bright day, pleasant and mild, with the moon white in the summer sky and the breeze gentle. Song Jiang and Lu Junyi lit the incense first, followed by Wu Yong and the other chieftains. Gongsun Sheng, officiating over the sacrifices, handed out the required texts and orders. He and the forty-eight Taoist priests would conduct mass thrice daily for seven days. Then they would disperse.

Song Jiang begged Heaven for a sign. He asked Gongsun Sheng to burn special prayers written on paper three times daily, so that their smoke would waft them to the Emperor of Heaven. And so, the third watch of the seventh day found Gongsun Sheng on the first tier of the altar, the other priests on the second, and Song Jiang and the chieftains on the third. The lesser commanders and officers stood below. All were earnestly entreating Heaven for a sign.

Suddenly, there was a sound like the ripping of fabric in the northwest corner of the sky. Everyone looked. They saw an object resembling an upended golden platter, narrow at both ends and broad in the middle. Known as Heaven's Gate, or Heaven's Eye, it was dazzlingly bright and resplendent as sunset clouds. A column of fire, shaped like a willow basket, twirled down from the center of the Eye towards the altar. It circled the altar once, then plunged into the earth near the southern end of the hall.

Heaven's Eye was closed by then, and the Taoist priests descended from their altar. Song Jiang ordered men to dig with shovels and mattocks where the fire had vanished. At a depth of three feet, they found a stone tablet. It was inscribed on both sides with mystic writing. Song Jiang ordered that the ashes of the paper prayers be scattered.

At dawn the next day, after the priests had their breakfast, he gave them gifts of gold and cloth. Only then did they examine the stone tablet. It was covered with weird squiggles, like tadpoles, which no one could decipher. But one of the priests, named Ho, was skilled in the occult.

"I have a set of books at home, handed down from my ancestors," he said, "which teaches how to read Heavenly writing. Since ancient times, it's always been this tadpole script, and I've learned how to decipher it. Let me have a look and I'll tell you what it says."

Pleased, Song Jiang handed over the tablet. The priest perused it for some time. Finally, he spoke.

"These are names of all of you gallant warriors. On one side it says: 'Act in Heaven's Behalf.' On the other: 'Complete Loyalty and Righteousness.' At the top are diagrams of the Great and Small Dippers. Below that are your names. If there's nothing unfavorable, I'll read them aloud, one by one."

"How fortunate that you can solve the mystery. We're extremely thankful. If you can enlighten us, we'll owe you our deepest gratitude. Please don't hesitate even if it contains criticism. Hold nothing back. We want to hear every word."

Song Jiang told Xiao Rang the Master Hand to take notes on yellow paper.

Ho the Taoist priest said: "The thirty-six lines on the front are names of stars of Heavenly Spirits. The seventy-two lines on the back are names of stars of Earthly Fiends." He gazed at them for several minutes, then told Xiao Rang to copy as he dictated.

On the front of the stone tablet were the names of the 36 stars of Heavenly Spirits. They are:

When he had finished, the chieftains stared at the list in amazement. "Who would have thought," Song Jiang mused, "that a petty functionary like me would be the highest of all the stars. And you, brothers, originally were with me up in the sky together. Today, Heaven has indicated that it is right for us to be united in chivalry. We've reached our full number, and our ranks have been decided by Heaven, with a general division into higher and lower. We've been listed in order, under the star categories of Heavenly Spirits and Earthly Fiends. Each of you chieftains must keep to his particular rank. Let there be no squabbling. Heaven's edict must be obeyed."

"Who would dare go against Heaven's will!" said the chieftains.

Song Jiang rewarded priest Ho with fifty ounces of gold. He also gave some payment to the other priests. They collected their paraphernalia for the mass and departed down the mountain.

Song Jiang then conferred with Wu Yong and Zhu Wu. They decided to hang a tablet reading "Loyalty Hall" on the building of that name, put another sign on Unity Pavilion, and build stockades around all three passes in front of the stronghold. Behind the hall they would level a "V" shaped terrace up the slope, and construct a large pavilion at the apex, with building wings extending down on the east and the west. In the pavilion they would place the spirit tablet of Chao Gai. Song Jiang, Wu Yong, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng would occupy the east wing. Lu Junyi, Gongsun Sheng, Kong Ming and Kong Liang would occupy the west.

New pennants and banners were made. On the very top of the mountain an apricot-yellow banner was stretched reading: "Act in Heaven's Behalf." In front of Loyalty Hall were two banners. One said: "Defender of Justice from Shandong," the other: "Jade Unicorn from Hebei," meaning Song Jiang and Lu Junyi, respectively. In addition there were banners of dragons, tigers, bears and panthers rampant; pennants of blue dragons with white tigers, vermilion birds on black backgrounds; golden axes with white tassels, blue banners and black umbrellas, and large fringed banners of black. These were for the use of the armies. There were also banners of the Four Stars in the Big Dipper, Central Heaven and the Four Directions, the Three Essentials and the Nine Elements, the Twenty-Eight Constellations, the Sixty-Four Diagrams, the Nine Heavens and the Eight Diagrams—in all a hundred and twenty-four Heaven-governing banners, all made by Hou Jian. Metal tallies and seals were forged by Jin Dajian.

When everything was ready, an auspicious day was chosen, and oxen and horses were slaughtered in sacrifice to the Spirits of Heaven and Earth. The signs "Loyalty Hall" and "Unity Pavilion" were hung, and the apricot-yellow banner "Act in Heaven's Behalf was also put in place. To the pillars on either side of the entrance to the hall two vermilion vertical tablets were attached. Reading downward, and continuing from the right tablet to the left, they said: "Be ardently righteous and loyal always, never covet wealth or harm the people."

That day Song Jiang ordered a huge feast. He took up his tallies and seals of office and addressed the gathering. "Brothers," he said, "let each of you carry out your duties of leadership, and hearken without fail to orders. To do otherwise would harm our chivalry. Whoever willfully disobeys shall be punished according to military law. None will be let off lightly."

He then read the chain of command, which was as follows:

The decree was dated "a lucky day of the fourth lunar month, in the second year of the Xuan He Period (1121CE), at the great meeting on Mount Liangshan, when assignment of duties was proclaimed."

Each chieftain then received his appropriate tallies and seals and the feasting ended. Everyone was very drunk. The chieftains left to take up their posts. Those who had not yet been appointed retired to quarters before and behind the "V" terrace to await orders.

Song Jiang selected another auspicious day, burned incense, and ordered drums beaten to summon the chieftains. When all had assembled in the hall, he addressed them.

"This is no ordinary occasion. I have something to say. Since we have come together as the stars of Heavenly Spirits and Earthly Fiends, we must vow before Heaven to unite to the death without reservation, rescue one another from danger and aid one another in misfortune, while striving jointly to defend the country and preserve peace for the people."

The chieftains heartily concurred. They too lit incense and knelt together in the hall, Song Jiang continued.

"I was only a petty functionary, and have neither learning nor ability. But thanks to the protection of Heaven and Earth and the illumination of the sun and the moon, we brothers have gathered here on Mount Liangshan in the Marsh and formed a heroic host. There are now one hundred and eight of us, which conforms to the number ordained by Heaven and is pleasing to the hearts of men. From this day on, if any of us acts in a deliberately unvirtuous manner, or offends our code of chivalry, we pray that Heaven and Earth scourge him, that the spirits and men destroy him, that he never again be reincarnated in human form and remain forever sunk in the depths. We vow to serve our country in righteous loyalty, act in Heaven's behalf, defend our borders and secure our people. Heaven examine us, and by Your Luminance reply."

In chorus the chieftains swore their eternal unity. That day, they reaffirmed their fraternity in a blood oath. They imbibed heavily of wine before the convention finally disbanded.

This, reader, was the grand confluence of chivalry in Liangshan Marsh. The origin of these men and their assignments was preordained. We shall not repeat ourselves.

The gallant fellows often went down the mountain, alone or at the head of a body of men, or simply a few of the chieftains together, and patrolled the roads. Ordinary travellers and merchants were not molested. But if they encountered a high official, they lightened his coffers of their gold and silver. Not a member of his family was left alive. Loot was delivered to the mountain stronghold and put in the treasury for collective use. Trifling items of booty were divided among the men.

Ranging within a radius of three hundred li, the outlaws openly plundered the wealth of prominent families which oppressed the people. Who dared to oppose! They raided the accumulations of such persons and newly rich upstarts, near and far, and carried them up the mountain. They staged well over a thousand such raids. No one could resist them, and they cared nothing about possible public lamentations by their victims. In any event, no one spoke out and they were never exposed.

Song Jiang remained on the mountain after the oath of unity. The scorching heat of summer was replaced by the cool of early autumn. The Ninth Day of the Ninth Lunar Month Festival was fast approaching. Song Jiang directed Song Qing to lay a feast at which the brothers could enjoy the flowering chrysanthemums. All those who were away from the fortress were summoned back.

There was a mountain of meat and a sea of wine that day. Quantities were first dispensed among the outlying forces of the cavalry, infantry and navy, and among the junior commanders, so that they might form their own gatherings and dine together.

Chrysanthemums were banked in Loyalty Hall, where the chieftains sat according to rank, wine cups in hand. In the front of the hall, on either side, gongs crashed and drums pounded. The chieftains revelled, to the clink of cups and chopsticks, with much noise and laughter. Ma Lin played the flute and sang, Yan Qing strummed the zheng lute.

Before they knew it, it was dusk. Song Jiang, very drunk, called for paper and a brush-pen, determined to write a poem. When he had finished, he sang it to musical accompaniment. It went like this:

Welcoming the Double Ninth
With newly distilled good wine,
We gaze at the blue waters, red bills,
Yellow reeds and dark bamboo.
The grey in my hair is ever increasing,
But a yellow chrysanthemum is tucked over one ear.
Let us savor our friendship,
More precious than gold or jade.
We've controlled the savage foe and can defend our borders,
Our orders are wise, our discipline tight.
We want only to repel the barbarian invaders,
Defend the people and our country.
Constantly we burn with loyal ardor, though wicked officials
Are blind to our exploits.
May the emperor soon hand down an amnesty,
Then will our hearts be fully at ease.

"Day in and day out you talk about amnesty," Wu Song shouted. "You're cooling our enthusiasm!"

And the Black Whirlwind glared and exclaimed: "Amnesty, amnesty, who needs a friggin amnesty!" He kicked over the table, smashing everything on it.

"How dare that swarthy oaf behave so rudely," Song Jiang cried. "Guards, take him out and cut his head off!"

The chieftains dropped to their knees. "He's drunk. Forgive him, brother," they pleaded.

"Rise, brothers. Put him in jail, then."

The chieftains were relieved. A few jailors approached Li Kui.

"Are you afraid I'll resist?" the Black Whirlwind demanded. "I wouldn't complain if Big Brother had me sliced to ribbons! He could have me killed and I wouldn't care! Though Heaven itself can't scare me I'll listen to him."

He walked off with the guards to the jail. The incident shook Song Jiang into sobriety. He was very depressed. Wu Yong spoke to him soothingly.

"Everyone is enjoying this feast you ordered. Li Kui's a crude fellow and goes a little wild when he's drunk. Why take it to heart? Join our brothers in their revelry."

Song Jiang said: "When I got drunk in Jiangzhou and wrote that rebellious poem, he fought for me. Today I wrote another and nearly had him killed. Luckily, you brothers spoke up. My emotional ties with Li Kui are the strongest. We're as close as flesh and bone. I can't help having tears in my eyes."

He turned to Wu Song. "Brother, you're an intelligent man. I advocate amnesty so that we can return to a respectable life and become government officials serving our country. Why should that cool your enthusiasm?"

"All the ministers today, whether civil or military, are crooks," said Lu Zhishen, "and they've got the emperor fooled. Those rogues are as black as my cassock. Who can wash the imperial court clean? An amnesty won't solve anything. Let's have a ceremonial parting, and tomorrow each can go his separate way and be done with it."

"Listen to me, brothers," said Song Jiang. "The emperor is sacred and pure. Because he's surrounded by corrupt ministers he's temporarily confused. But the day will come when the clouds will part and the sun will emerge again. He'll know that we act on Heaven's behalf and never harm the people, and he'll pardon our crimes. We'll serve the country with one heart and strive to distinguish ourselves. What could be finer? That's why I hope we'll be amnestied soon. I want nothing else."

The chieftains thanked Song Jiang profusely. They drank heartily and with good cheer. The banquet broke up and they returned to their respective posts.

Early the next morning chieftains went to see Li Kui. He was still asleep. They awakened him.

"You were drunk yesterday," they said, "and you swore at Big Brother. Today, you're going to be executed."

"I wouldn't dare swear at him even in my dreams," said the Black Whirlwind. "But if he wants to kill me, let him."

They led him into the hall and asked Song Jiang what punishment he should be given. Song Jiang berated Li Kui sternly.

"I have many men under my command. We'd have no law and order whatever if they all behaved as rudely as you! For the sake of these brothers, I'll suspend sentence on your execution. But it will go hard with you if you misbehave again!"

Li Kui, murmuring submissively, withdrew. The chieftains also departed.

The days were uneventful as the winter solstice drew near. Snow fell, mantling the world with silver. The sky cleared and a man came up from below and reported: "Seven or eight //from here we captured a group from Laizhou transporting lanterns for the Eastern Capital. What shall we do with them?"
"Don't bind them," said Song Jiang. "Bring them up here." Not long after, the travellers were led into the hall. Two were government bailiffs, eight or nine were lantern artisans. Their wares were on five carts. The leader of them spoke.
"I'm a bailiff in Laizhou. These fellows are lantern artisans. Every year the capital orders three sets of lanterns from our prefecture. This year they've asked for two more in addition. The lanterns are the Jade Shed Intricate Nine-Hued type."
Song Jiang treated the travellers to wine and food, then asked them to display the lanterns. The artisans hung the Jade Shed lanterns, a total of eighty-one, on four sides. Suspended in Loyalty Hall, they extended from the rafters to the floor.
"I'd keep all your lanterns," said Song Jiang, "if I weren't afraid it might get you into difficulty. Just leave me one Nine-Hued lantern set, and you can deliver the rest to the officials. And here are twenty ounces of silver for your trouble."
The travellers thanked him and departed. Song Jiang had the lanterns lit and placed in Chao Gai's memorial hall. The next day he spoke to the chieftains.
"I was born in Shandong and I've never been to the capital. I hear that the emperor is having a big lantern show, with public merry-making and a celebration of the first full moon of the new year. Manufacture of the lanterns began in the winter solstice and has finished only now. I'd like to go into the city secretly with a few brothers and take a look at the lanterns."
"That's not feasible," said Wu Yong. "The Eastern Capital has more police than anywhere. If anything went wrong, what could we do?"
"I'll stay out of sight in an inn during the day. I'll only go into the city at night. What'd happen?" The chieftains tried to dissuade him in vain. Song Jiang insisted. And because Song Jiang went to see the lanterns, a theater was reduced to rubble and a street of brothels became a battlefield. Truly, bold tigers approached the Imperial Palace, fierce stars encroached on Reclining Ox Fort in the night.

Now, after capturing first Dongping and then Dongchang, they are back again on the mountain, and when a count is made there are found to be altogether one hundred and eight leaders. This causes great rejoicing.
Song Jiang spoke to them all: "Since the fight at Jiangzhou, when I first came to the mountain, upheld by your valiant spirit I have served as your leader. Now there are one hundred and eight of us gathered here together, and we have reason to rejoice. True, our friend Chao Gai has passed on, but many new recruits have come to the mountain and our position is secure. All this is due not to human efforts but to the protection of heaven! Those of us who have been captured or suffered imprisonment or been wounded are now safe and sound. That one hundred and eight of us are met here together is truly a rare and unprecedented event. So far the shocks and stresses of a turbulent time have left us no opportunity for thanksgiving. It is my heartfelt desire to hold a thanksgiving service in which we may express our gratitude to the powers of heaven and earth for their great benevolence towards us. Firstly this will afford us an opportunity to pray for the spiritual and physical well-being of all our company; and secondly we can pray for my dearest wish — that the Emperor may soon see fit to grant us amnesty and full pardon for all our transgressions, in order that each and every one of us may dedicate his life to the preservation of this land, even unto death; thirdly we must honour our leader Chao Gai and pray that he may quickly be reborn into this world and that we meet again. Let us pray also for all who have died violent deaths, by fire or flood, and all innocent victims of murder, in order that their spirits may soon cross over. That is what I propose. How say all of you?"
All the leaders praised this resolution, saying, "This is a path of virtuous merit, your idea is a good one."
The Professor said: "First let us ask Taoist Gongsun to conduct the service and then send someone down the mountain to invite eminent priests from all around with their ritual objects. We will have someone buy incense and candles, paper offerings, flowers and fruit and vegetarian food and everything else that is needful for this service."
It was decided that the ceremony should commence on the fifteenth day of the fourth month and last for seven days. They spent freely on the preparations. When the time drew near four long banners were hung in the front of the Ceremonial Hall and three high altars set up within. The interior of the hall was decorated with representations of the Seven Treasures and images of the three Pure Ones. Arranged in two rows were the twenty-eight constellations and the twelve mansions which properly preside over sacrifices of this kind. Outside the hall were the Four Generals, customary guardians of the altar. All the ritual objects pertaining to the ceremony having been laid out, the Taoists were invited up. Counting Taoist Gongsun there were altogether forty-nine priests.
The day of the sacrifice dawned clear, the weather most propitious, with a clear moon and a gentle breeze. Headed by Song Jiang and the Unicorn, with the Professor and the rest of the company following, they took it in turn to light incense. Taoist Gongsun officiated, presiding over the sacrifice and handing out pledges and spells in aid of the dead. Of this no more. Here's how it was at the service:
Clouds of incense fill the air, the ornamental screen is richly patterned. Thousands of coloured candles shed their light, hundreds of silver lanterns illuminate the scene. Feather umbrellas rise in pairs, funeral banners cluster in profusion. The sound of chanting is wafted on the breeze, the world of appearances is suffused with moonlight. As the bell sounds, the priest goes in to make the offering to the Lord of the Void: while jade ornaments tinkle, the celebrant mounts the altar to worship the Lord of Heaven. Red silk robes are resplendent in the light of dawn, the priests' caps as exotic as royal regalia. The gods, guardians of the altar, are of truly hideous aspect; the ministers, governors of the firmament, of truly ferocious mien. In unison the priests proclaim repentance, on the sacred altar the libation is poured; the holy man quietly intones the mystic verse, with his priestly sword held on high he treads out the pattern of the Dipper. The green dragon comes secretly to the yellow road, the white crane flutters down to the purple mansion.
Thus did Taoist Gongsun and the forty-eight invited priests perform the service in the Ceremonial Hall that day. Each day three offerings were made at dawn. After seven days had gone by, Song Jiang wanted to request a sign from heaven and instructed Taoist Gongsun to devise and burn special prayers to this effect.
In the third watch of the seventh day they were all assembled before the altar of the Void: Taoist Gongsun on the first level, the other Taoists on the second level, Song Jiang and the leaders on the third level, minor leaders and junior officers down below. All together they entreated heaven to grant them a sign. At that very moment, that is to say, in the third watch of the seventh day, there was a sound in the sky as of a cloth being rent, issuing from the northwest portals of heaven. They all saw something like a golden disc, elongated at either end and broader in the middle, stand upright in the sky. It was the phenomenon known as "The portals of Heaven open" or "Heaven's eye opens". From it shot a ray of light dazzling to the eye, a kaleidoscope of colour; this gave birth to a fireball, round as a basket, that came spinning down onto the altar. Round and round the altar it rolled and then plunged into the ground somewhere to the south.
Heaven's eye had now closed and the Taoists came down from the altar. Song Jiang ordered people to take picks and shovels and excavate the place where the fireball had fallen. Not more than three feet down they came upon a stone tablet, carved on both sides with mystic characters. The poem says:

Around the altar stand the loyal and good,
Heaven's intentions are not easily understood.
Good and evil each its harvest reaps;
That time does not exist when heaven sleeps.

Song Jiang ordered them to scatter the ashes from the burnt paper offerings. Early next morning the monks were fed and presented with generous alms of gold and silk. Then the stone tablet was brought out. It was found to be covered with dragon letters and phoenix characters, in a script consisting of strange tadpole-like squiggles, that nobody could read. But among the Taoists there was a monk called Ho, whose religious name was Xuan Tong — he was a student of the occult. He said to Song Jiang: "I have an heirloom, a set of books, handed down by my ancestors. They enable one to decipher mystic writing. These ancient writings are always in tadpole script, and I am able to read and interpret it. I can tell you what this tablet means."
Song Jiang was delighted to hear this and quickly had the tablet shown to Taoist Ho, who studied it for some time and then said: "This stone has all the names of the heroes inscribed on it. And down one side are the four characters 'To Do Heaven's Will' and on the other 'Loyalty, Righteousness, Twin Virtues'. On top are the stars of the heavens and under them names and titles. Provided the meaning is good I will expound it all to you from beginning to end."
"It is lucky that you are able to enlighten us, Master," said Song Jiang. "Fortune indeed is kind to us. We shall be most grateful if you can tell us what it says. Only, if there is anything un-favourable, please do not leave it out. I truly wish you to explain everything and not omit a single word."
Song Jiang ordered the Magic Hand to make a copy on yellow paper. Taoist Ho said that the thirty-six lines of writing on the front were the names of heavenly stars and on the back were the seventy-two earth stars. Below each was inscribed the name of one of the heroes. After studying it for quite a while he told Magic Hand to copy down everything from beginning to end. On the front were written the names of the thirty-six stars of the Marshes of Mount Liang, as follows:

Chief Star of the Heavens: the Guardian of Righteousness, Song Jiang
Righteous Star of the Heavens: the Unicorn, Lu Junyi.
Opportune Star of the Heavens: the Beacon of Learning, Professor Wu Yong

Thieving Earth Star: Shi Qian the Flea on the Drum
Dog Earth Star: Yellow Dog Duan Jingzhu

Thus Taoist Ho deciphered the stone tablet and Magic Hand recorded what he read out. Everyone marvelled greatly at it. Song Jiang said to the others: "I am just a humble official, yet apparently I am also the chief star of the heavens and we all share a common destiny. It has been revealed to us that our coming together here is predestined. Now our number is complete. The powers above have fixed the order of the heavenly bodies in their rank and precedence, and we must all observe the order, without rivalry or dissent from heaven's will."

They all replied: "The order of heaven and earth is fixed in nature. Who would dare to question it?"

Song Jiang took out fifty taels to reward Taoist Ho. The other monks received their fees, collected up their ritual objects and went their various ways down the mountain.

Bright moon, cool breeze for the sacrifice;
The birds of the air provide sweet music;
The stars of heaven and earth have been listed in right order.
Their hearts are set for life on loyalty and righteousness.

We shall not follow the priests back to their temples, but describe the discussion between Song Jiang, the Professor and the Strategist. They determined to have a plaque set up over the Ceremonial Hall bearing the words "Hall of Loyalty and Righteousness". Another plaque was to be placed in the Pavilion of Unity and new stockades built around the three gates. Behind the Ceremonial Hall a platform was to be constructed, at the centre of which a big hall would be raised with smaller buildings to east and west. The great hall would commemorate the spirit of Chao Gai, while the building on the east would house Song Jiang, the Professor, Little Duke and Halberdier, that on the west the Unicorn, Taoist Gongsun, Star and Comet. On the second level Strategist, Tamer, Colonel Sun, Magic Hand and Sterling would be housed on the left, Magic Messenger, Prodigy, Hotshot, Doctor An and Redbeard on the right. On the left of the Ceremonial Hall, controlling the Treasury and Stores, would be Mr. Chai, Skyhawk, Calculator and Thunderer; on the right Colonel Hua, Demon King, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost. The first gate on the front approach would be guarded by Snake and Scorpion. The second gate by Monk and Pilgrim. the third gate by Whiskers and Sergeant Lei. Tattooed Dragon and the Red-Haired Devil would guard the eastern approach, Morbid and Madcap the western approach. On the north would be the Unstoppable and Iron Ox. Beyond the gates there were to be eight camps, four manned by land troops, and four waterside camps: to the south Thunderclap, Hasty, Golden Wings and Redeye; to the east Scimitar, Spearsman, the Ugly Son-in-Law and Hound; to the west Leopard's Head, Twin Spears, the Fire and Water Generals; to the north Twin Rods, the Blue-Faced Beast, Victorious and the Supremo. White-Water Dragon and Ruan the Second would be in the southeastern waterside camp, with the Pilot and White Eel on the southwest, Ruan the Fifth and Cave Dragon on the northeast, and Ruan the Seventh and River Rider on the northwest. The rest all had special duties.

Flags and other items were renewed. An apricot yellow ensign was made for the summit bearing the words "To Do Heaven's Will"; in front of the Ceremonial Hall two red embroidered banners saying "Shandong's Guardian of Righteousness" and "The Hebei Unicorn". Other flags depicted flying dragons, tigers, bears and leopards, green dragon and white tiger, scarlet birds on black, golden orioles on a white background; there were blue banners and black umbrellas, with purple tassels and black borders.

Besides the army's war banners, there were banners with the stars of the Dipper and the five directions (north, south, east, west and centre), banners depicting the three powers (heaven, earth and mankind) and the nine classes, banners for the twenty-eight signs of the zodiac, the sixty-four figures of the Book of Changes and the colour combinations: in all, one hundred and twenty-four banners representing the governors of destiny. All these were made by the Ape. The Craftsman manufactured all the tallies and stamps for the army.

When all the preparations were complete, an auspicious day and time was chosen, oxen and horses were slaughtered and an offering made to the gods. The tablets were put up in the Ceremonial Hall and the Hall of Unity, and the yellow flag with "To Do Heaven's Will" was flown.

Song Jiang ordained a great feast that day and himself handed out the warrants and chops to the commanders and the orders, saying: "Let every one of our comrades, every leader great or small, note and respect the orders, with no argument or backsliding. If anyone does not obey he will be judged according to military law and will not easily escape punishment."

The duties allotted were as follows:

When Song Jiang had issued the orders setting out all these duties and every officer had received his warrant and the feast was over, everyone was very drunk and they all went back to their allotted quarters. Those among them who had not received duties gathered around the platform awaiting orders. There are some lines which describe the excellencies of Mount Liang:

Throughout the domain there may be various names but there is just one family. In the universe their nature as celestial stars is revealed; among human society their heroic quality is displayed. Drawn from far and wide, they have always been close for they are of one mind, to live and die together is their only wish. Though faces and language differ, as do north and south and east and west, they are all alike in feeling and spirit, constant in loyalty, truth, faith and righteousness. They include the descendants of emperors, representatives of the rich and famous, adherents of all three religions and all the philosophies, but also hunters and fishermen, butchers and public execu-tioners, and all call each other brother, making no distinction between noble and base-born. Some are closely related, as husbands and wives, uncles and nephews, while others are servants following their masters, yet all are united in the fight against injustice, all sit down together to eat and drink, not asking whether they are close or distant relatives. Spiritual or coarse, rustic or refined, there is no mutual suspicion between them, but all live together in friendship. Each has his special skill, whether with tongue and pen or sword and spear, whether in direct attack or the use of stealth: it is truly a case of each according to his ability. When the problem is forging a document, they can avail themselves of a Magic Hand to fashion an appropriate style; when it is a question of tyranny , they can boast of having killed the Failed Scholar. Wang Lun, to wipe out petty spite. Within these hundred leagues live one hundred and eight heroes. Once upon a time their fame spread far and wide among the rivers and lakes, just as in olden days sound used to carry from the bell towers. Now they know their order of precedence among the stars, each joined to another like the beads of a rosary. After Chao Gai, entrusted with the leadership, incontinently returned to heaven, it fell to Song Jiang to assume command in the stronghold. But speak not of a mere assembly of outlaws, for this leader's wish has ever been to give his allegiance to the highest authority in the land.

The orders that had been given out in the Ceremonial Hall of Mount Liang were strictly observed by all. Song Jiang chose an auspicious day and time, burnt incense, and had the drum sounded to summon everyone to the hall. He said to them: "Things are not now as they used to be and I have a few words to say to you. Now that all the heavenly and earthly stars are assembled, we must all swear an oath, that we will unhesitatingly live and die together, support each other through thick and thin, and fight to preserve the nation and protect the people."

All were content to do so. Each man lit incense and knelt together in the hall while Song Jiang took the oath first: "I, Song Jiang, humble provincial official though I am, with little knowledge and less skill, give thanks that with the protection of heaven and earth, and assisted by the light of sun and moon, I am able to join with this company of brothers here on the mountain, to be united with this company of heroes here in the marshes, numbering one hundred and eight in total, in accordance with heaven's plan and our own wishes. From now on if any one of us swerves from his duty or abandons the path of righteousness, may heaven punish him, may the gods secure his downfall, may he not for ten thousand years be reborn in human form, but rather for a hundred thousand years be plunged in darkness without hope. I trust however that all will set their hearts on loyalty and righteousness, working together for the benefit of the nation, following heaven's will, defending the borders of our land and preserving its people. May heaven bear witness and vouchsafe a sign."

Everyone concurred with these sentiments, desiring to remain united in every life, to meet in every future world and never more be parted. The oath was sealed in blood, wine was drunk and finally the meeting broke up.

You must all of you, my friends, have heard of this occasion, known as the Great Meeting in the Marshes of Mount Liang!

The positions had now been established and no more need be said of this. The heroes went their own way down the mountain, some with troops, some setting out in small groups of their own. If they met merchants and their carts on the road they let them pass on unmolested. If they met high-ranking officials and found gold or money in their baggage, they killed them and their families and sent their possessions up the mountain to be placed in the general coffers. Small items were divided up ad hoc. Whether it was fifty miles or a hundred, whenever there were great riches which had been extorted from the people by local bigwigs, troops were dispatched there to expropriate the goods and take them up the mountain. They met with no resistance. If they heard of any who cheated the innocent and rode roughshod over the poor, amassing great personal riches, whether it was near or far troops were sent to confiscate the wealth and take it up the mountain. This happened in hundreds of cases and no one called them to account for it. Nor did they give any cause for accusations of injustice, so no one denounced them and they had no difficulties.

Since the time of the oath of loyalty Song Jiang had not been down the mountain again. Gradually the weather was becoming cooler with the approach of autumn and soon it would be the Festival of the Double Ninth. Song Jiang ordered his brother, Iron Fan, to organize a banquet, so that all the company could come together and enjoy the chrysanthemums in what is known as the Chrysanthemum Meeting. All those leaders who resided elsewhere than on the mountain, whether far or near, were summoned to participate. On the festive day there was meat stacked in mountains and wine flowing in torrents. Provisions were first distributed to all the leaders of the three arms, horse, foot and waterborne, with orders to assemble their men and entertain them. The Ceremonial Hall had been decked out with chrysanthemums. The leaders all took their allotted places, cups in hand. Gongs, flutes and drums set up a clamour in front of the dais and they all opened their hearts and gave themselves up to enjoyment. The Flautist played his instrument, Lungs sang an air, the Prodigal entertained them on the harp, everyone was having a good time. As evening fell Song Jiang, who was very drunk, called for paper and brush because he wanted to compose an ode while the effect of the wine was still on him. When he finished he gave it to Lungs to sing:

Joyfully we meet today
To celebrate and fill our cups
With a new and heady brew.
We gaze upon green waters,
Red hills, pale reeds
And sad bamboo.
Much white the years have heaped upon
My head, but still I wear
A chrysanthemum in my hair.
Telling tales of days gone by
We sit before the wine-jar here,
More precious to us than gold or jade
The friendship of this company.
The wild beasts all are conquered now,
Our territory is secure,
Our orders wise, our army strong,
Our one desire
To fight our country's foe,
Our land and kin defend.
Constant in loyalty are we,
Our valour plain to see;
Though venal hearts deny it
And lying courtiers' tongues.
To ease our hearts there's but one way,
To the Highest we direct our plea,
And beg for amnesty.

When Lungs reached the line about begging for amnesty, Pilgrim suddenly shouted out: "We go on and on begging for an amnesty. It'll drive me to distraction!"

Iron Ox now glaring about him with a most ferocious expression shouted out: "Beg for amnesty, beg for amnesty, beg for what fucking amnesty!" and kicked over the table, smashing everything that was on it.

"What does that ugly brute think he's playing at?" Song Jiang roared. "Guards, take him out and cut off his head!"

The others all knelt and said: "He's had too much to drink, it makes him wild, please forgive him, brother."

"Get up, all of you. Just put him under lock and key." Song Jiang said, to everyone's great relief. Some duty guards came forward and nervously asked Iron Ox to go with them. Iron Ox said to them: "You're scared I'm going to resist. If the Leader kills me I won't hold it against him, if he cuts me to pieces I won't mind. But apart from him I'm afraid of no one." Having said this, he went meekly with the guards to his room and slept. When Song Jiang heard what he said, he immediately became sober and bitterly regretted his own anger. The Professor consoled him: "You organized this feast for us, and everyone drank and had a wonderful time. He's a rough type and when he gets drunk he goes berserk. It's not something to get upset over. Be merry now like all the rest of us."

Song Jiang said: "When I got drunk in Jiangzhou I made a fool of myself by writing that seditious poem. Under the influence today I composed that ode and nearly destroyed a life! Thank goodness the rest of you prevented it! He is very close to me. It makes me weep inside." Then he said to Pilgrim: "Brother, you're an intelligent man. All right, suppose I have set my heart on an amnesty, so we can become legitimate again and serve our country, why should that make us lose heart?"

Monk spoke up: "The problem is that nowadays among the court officials, the civilians as much as the military, there is so much envy and corruption; how can we wash it clean? An amnesty won't solve the problem. Maybe we should all agree to part and each go his own way tomorrow to fight his own fights."

Song Jiang said: "Listen to me, all of you. Our Emperor is both illustrious and wise. The problem is only that he is thwarted by evil counsellors and temporarily deluded. I believe the day will come when he can see how we are doing heaven's will, how we do no harm to the innocent; then he will accord us a full pardon so that we can unite to serve the nation and leave behind a glorious name, what is wrong with believing that? This is why we must concentrate our hopes on obtaining the amnesty, we can have no other aim."

The company were utterly won over by his eloquence. More wine was drunk that day and a great time was had by all. Finally the party broke up and everyone returned to their quarters.

Next day at dawn when they went to find Iron Ox he had still not sobered up. The leaders woke him up, shouting: "Yesterday you were filthy drunk and abused the Leader. Today they're going to execute you."

Iron Ox said: "Even in my dreams I wouldn't dare abuse him. If he wants me killed, then so be it."

They took him to the Hall to ask forgiveness of Song Jiang. Song Jiang said sternly: "If all the troops under my command were as unruly as you, what sort of discipline would we have? In deference to all our comrades I will suspend the sentence of execution, but if you offend again you won't get off so lightly!" With many muttered apologies Iron Ox withdrew, and the others all left.

Nothing further happened until the new year drew near. On a day when the snow had begun to melt, a messenger announced that some of their troops had captured a convoy carrying lanterns from Laizhou to the capital some three miles from the stronghold and were awaiting instructions outside the first gate.

Song Jiang said: "Do not bind them. Ask them politely to come in." Soon they were standing in front of the Ceremonial Hall: two policemen, nine lantern makers, travelling with five carts. The chief of them said: "I am a constable of the Laizhou constabulary and these others are lantern makers. As a rule the capital orders three stands of lamps from us, but this year they've added two more. They're lamps painted in nine colours, richly decorated."

Song Jiang offered them all wine and asked them to show him the lamps. When they had taken out a painted lantern and fixed it all up, it was seen to consist of something like nine rows of nine lamps and it hung from the ceiling of the Ceremonial Hall right down to the floor. Song Jiang said: "I had thought to keep your whole production, but I'm afraid that might get you into trouble, which would not be fair, so I have decided to keep just the one set. You can deliver all the rest to the authorities in the capital. I shall pay you twenty taels of silver for this one." They prostrated themselves, thanking him profusely, and then left.

Song Jiang ordered the lantern to be lit and hung in the Chao Gai Memorial Hall. Next day he said to the company: "I was born in Shandong and I've never been to the capital. I have heard that the night of the full moon is to be celebrated for the benefit of the citizens by a grand display of lanterns, which they have been busy making since the beginning of winter. I would like to go secretly with a few comrades to see the illuminations for myself."

The Professor was dismayed: "You mustn't do that," he warned. "The capital will be swarming with police. Suppose something goes wrong, what would we do?"

Song Jiang said: "I'll hide away in an inn by day and only go out to see the illuminations at night. Where's the harm in that?" None of them could dissuade him. He was determined to go. And this is how it came about that

Fierce tigers approach the city's glorious gates
A baleful star assaults the stall of the sleeping ox.

WHEN the leaders who now numbered 108 were all assembled in the Loyalty and Justice Hall Song Jiang addressed them: "Since I escaped here as a consequence of some outrageous conduct at Jiangzhou I have ever been elected and supported as a leader by you heroic brothers. For that I shall always be grateful. Now I am very glad that we have assembled altogether 108 leaders. Since our late commander Chao Gai passed away we by the help of the spirits have always been victorious in every conflict. This has been due to no person's ability but to the protection of Heaven. Some of our leaders have been imprisoned, and some wounded, but so far not a single one has been killed. There has never been such an assembly of heroes since the world began. We however have killed many men so I propose that we conduct a great sacrificial ceremony for the pacification of their souls, and also to thank Heaven and Earth for their great assistance to us. By this I wish you first get peace at heart. Second, I wish that the Emperor will forgive us our crimes, that we may volunteer ourselves to the service of our country. Thirdly, I wish the early reincarnation of our late leader Chao Gai into a Heavenly spirit so that we may always be with him. Lastly I wish that all those who lost their lives in our fighting will be profited by our prayers. What do you think of this proposal?"

All the leaders approved of this, and Wu Yong said, "I think that the arrangements may be left to Gongsun Sheng, and we can get Taoist priests from everywhere to take part in the ceremony." The 15th day of the fourth month was selected as the first of the seven days of prayers. Sufficient money was appropriated from the treasury to cover the expenses. When the day was drawing near they erected two large flag-staffs in front of the hall, and also a three-storied terrace for the use of the service. Inside the hall they had statutes of ten Taoist Heavenly Immortals, and on each side of them were the spirits of the Twenty Eight Constellations. The Ten Celestial Branches and the Twelve Heavenly Stems were drawn in the hall and outside was erected a sacrificial altar. Four idols were prepared, and dressed up as the Guardian Generals of Cui, Lu, Deng, and Dou. The Taoist priests invited for this service were altogether 49 including Gongsun Sheng and they duly arrived on the appointed date.

Song Jiang and Lu Junyi took the leading part in the ceremony, and Wu Yong and all the other leaders were next to burn incense. Gongsun Sheng wrote the prayers which were distributed among the 48 priests for incantation. There were three services each day, and it took a whole week to finish the whole ceremony. On the last day about midnight Gongsun Sheng was on the first floor of the terrace, the 48 priests were on the second floor, while all the 108 leaders were on the third floor. All the brigands were kneeling around the terrace. They were all united in prayer to Heaven. About 1 A.M. a sharp noise was heard in the sky as though a huge piece of silk was being torn apart. Gazing upward the assembled mass saw in the sky a golden tray with two sides elongated. This was known as "Heaven's Gates Opened," or "Heaven's Eyes Opened." In the bright gap there shone a dazzling blaze of light. Circling around it were clouds of variegated colors. From the middle of the lights came a ball of fire which descended on the first floor of the terrace. It circled round the other two floors and then went to the south side where it disappeared. The Heaven's Gates were now closed. The priests and leaders descended from the terrace. Song Jiang called for shovels and spades to dig the ground where the fire had disappeared. They had dug down only about three feet when they found a stone tablet on which characters were engraved. Orders were given for incense and paper to be offered to Heaven for this gift.

The following day the stone tablet was examined, but nobody could decipher the characters which were evidently of very ancient style. But among the priests was one named He Xuantong who came forward and addressed Song Jiang, "At my home there is a very ancient book which might decipher these characters, and I have studied it a little." He examined the characters carefully for some time, and then said that he thought they were the names of the heroes of Liangshan Marsh. Then turning to the right lateral side he made out the four characters, "Carrying out Heaven's wish," and on the other side were also four characters, "Loyalty and Justice Achieved." On the top side there was a drawing of the Big Dipper. On the front of the stone were the names of the heroes which he said he could make out if Song Jiang permitted him. Song Jiang asked him to do this and hide nothing from him no matter what the message was. He then ordered Xiao Rang to prepare ink and paper, and write down what He Xuantong should decipher. The latter then deciphered one by one all the names of the 108 heroes of Liangshan Marsh, each of whom represented a star in the heaven.

When this was all disclosed the leaders were astonished.

Song Jiang addressed the assembly: "Who should know I, a humble clerk, am under a star, but you, my brothers, are also each under a star. Heaven evidently has intentionally brought us all together to uphold the rule of justice. Heaven has also given each of us our respective positions and responsibilities, so we can raise no disputes among us as to our duties."

All the leaders replied, "This is the Will of Heaven, and we will not disobey it." Song Jiang paid the priests and they all left the mountain.

He then assigned each leader his duties and also quarters. These were clearly written out on paper, sealed, and handed to each man. Song Jiang addressed the assembled leaders and impressed upon them the extreme importance of loyalty. He then told them, "We're now all bound together, must live and die as one body, and you must all support me to act up to the Will of Heaven."
All the assembled leaders took a solemn oath to observe these conditions and then all swore, "We're all united today and so we'll remain throughout this life. Any one among us who'll turn out to be traitor or coward will be noticed by Heaven and Earth and be killed by sword or lightning and his soul will be banished to the afterlife forever, never to be reincarnated in human form. " They then pledged each other in wine in which blood had been mixed. So was achieved this great assembly of heroes sworn to unite to uphold justice.

That night Lu Junyi had a very dreadful dream in which he met a giant warrior who arrested him and brought him to a grand mansion where he and the other 107 leaders of Liangshan Marsh were examined and sentenced to death. On the point of being executed he happened to look upward as he dreamt, and saw a tablet on the top of the door with four big characters meaning, "Universal peace throughout this kingdom."

Mandarins lead an honest life,
Great peace reigns in empire's bounds;
Far and wide no sound of strife,
Elders pass their time at feasts.
People rejoice and regard
Music and proprieties as their heritage;
They wish to voice their merriness,
With lavish songs and joyous ballads.
Graves of fathers, in trees' shade,
Hundred years pass, we'll be dead;
Emperor's taxes being all paid,
Sun's as warm as fur coat.
Zi Jian's fame sounds in vain,
Zhuangzi held official as ox;
Verses written when I'm drunk,
Attract no admiration when sung.

Suddenly, Lu Junyi let out a sharp cry and opened his eyes, his body drenched in a cold sweat that soaked through his ceremonial robes. The terrifying image of the executioner's blade and the headless corpses of his brothers vanished instantly, replaced by the warm, flickering candlelight of the Liangshan Hall. Around him, the grand banquet was only just drawing to a close, and the merry shouts of the hundred and seven heroes still echoed vibrantly through the rafters. Seeing his brother's sudden distress, Song Jiang raised his wine cup and laughed heartily, dismissing the horrific vision as a mere trick of the mind brought on by the heavy drinking and the overwhelming solemnity of their grand assembly. Lu Junyi forced a smile and drank, allowing the boisterous cheers of the hall to drown out his terror. Yet, as the stars faded and a new day dawned over the misty marsh, an icy shadow remained permanently cast over his heart—a silent, divine warning of the tragic path of amnesty and betrayal that lay just ahead.

Chai Jin Wears a Cockade & Enters the Forbidden Courtyard in the palace with a flower in his hat; Iron Ox Li Kui on Festival Night Disturbs the Eastern Capital & raises hell

In Loyalty Hall that day Song Jiang announced the disposition of those who would go to see the lanterns: "I will travel with Chai Jin, Shi Jin with Mu Hong, Lu Zhishen with Wu Song, and Zhu Tong with Liu Tang. The rest of you will remain and guard the fortress."
"They say the lanterns of the Eastern Capital are a pretty sight," said Li Kui. "I want to go too."
"Impossible," said Song Jiang.
Li Kui insisted stubbornly. There was no refusing him. Finally, Song Jiang relented.
"All right. But only on condition that you don't make any trouble. Dress as a servant."
He told Yan Qing to accompany them also, with the specific task of keeping a watchful eye on Li Kui.
You will remember, reader, that Song Jiang's face bore the tattoo of the criminal. How could he appear in the capital city? After the skilled doctor An Daoquan had arrived at the stronghold he had removed the mark with a powerful caustic. Later, he treated the wound with good medicines. When a red scar formed he removed this gradually with daily applications of poultices containing powdered gold and ground jade. That is what medical books refer to when they talk of "obliterating blemishes with fine jade."
Song Jiang instructed Shi Jin and Mu Hong to go first, disguised as travellers. Lu Zhishen and Wu Song would go next, as wandering monks. Lastly would be Zhu Tong and Liu Tang, in the garb of merchants. All wore swords and carried halberds and, needless to say, had concealed weapons on their persons. Song Jiang himself and Chai Jin pretended to be vacationing officials. Dai Zong went as a lieutenant. In the event of any emergency, he could rush back to the stronghold with a report.
Li Kui and Yan Qing, the "servants," transported the luggage of the "officials" down the mountain on carrying-poles. The chieftains saw the travellers off to the Shore of Golden Sands. Wu Yong cautioned Li Kui. "Whenever you set out on your own you get into a jam. This time you're going to the Eastern Capital with Big Brother to see the lanterns. It's not your usual jaunt. You're not to drink on the road. Behave with caution and curb your temper. If you provoke any clashes, we brothers may have to terminate our relationship."
"Don't worry, Military Advisor," said the Black Whirlwind, "I won't stir up anything."
They parted, and the travellers set out. They touched Jizhou, passed Tengzhou, went through Danzhou, reached Caozhou, and at last arrived at an inn outside the Wanshou Gate of the Eastern Capital, where they took quarters. It was the eleventh day of the first lunar month. Song Jiang conferred with Chai Jin.
"I don't dare enter the capital tomorrow in daylight," he said. "I'll wait until the evening of the fourteenth, when the celebration is noisiest, and go in then."
"I'll scout out a route for you with Yan Qing tomorrow."
"Excellent."
The following day Chai Jin dressed handsomely, bound his head in a fresh kerchief, and put on clean shoes and stockings. Yan Qing also garbed himself fashionably. The two left the inn. The suburban households were festive and gay as they prepared to enjoy the lantern festival and celebrate the peaceful atmosphere. Chai and Yan reached the gate without incident and entered the city.
They strolled along Imperial Road, taking in the sights, and came to the area adjoining the palace's East Glory Gate. Here were many taverns and tea-houses, patronized by people richly garbed in silks and satins, each in a distinctive color. Chai Jin led Yan Qing to a small tavern. They went upstairs and sat down in a room overlooking the street.
They could see attendants going in and out of the palace grounds. Each wore a cockade in the shape of a flower with jade-green leaves tacked to the side of his head kerchief. Chai whispered some instructions in Yan's ear. Yan nodded, went swiftly down the stairs and left the tavern. Fortunately, the attendant he approached was rather simple-minded. Yan hailed him respectfully.
"I don't know your face," the man said. "We've never met."
"My master is an old friend of yours. He's sent me to invite you to join him. Aren't you Inspector Zhang?"
"My name is Wang."
"Oh, Inspector Wang, of course. That's the name. I was in such a hurry, I forgot."
Wang went with Yan into the tavern and up the stairs. Yan raised the door curtain and announced: "Inspector Wang is here." He gave Chai a hidden signal with his hand.
The two men exchanged courtesies. Wang looked at Chai Jin. He didn't know him. "My eyesight is poor," he said. "I'm afraid I don't remember Your Excellence. Would you be good enough to tell me your name?"
Chai Jin smiled. "We were friends as children. You'll think of it without me saying." He summoned the waiter and ordered wine.
Tasty dishes were served, and Yan Qing saw to it that the attendant's cup remained filled. When the man was half drunk, Chai questioned him.
"What is the meaning of that cockade?"
"Today, the emperor is celebrating the first full moon. There are twenty-four companies of us palace attendants, nearly fifty-eight hundred men in all. We've each been issued a new robe, a cockade in the shape of green leaves and a golden flower, and a small metal badge pinned above it reading: 'Celebrate with the People.' We're on call at all times. Only those with this palace cockade and robe are allowed in."
"I didn't know that," said Chai Jin. They downed several more cups, and Chai said to Yan Qing: "Get us a pot of warm wine."
Before long, Yan brought the wine. Chai Jin rose and addressed Attendant Wang, cup in hand.
"Drink this round I respectfully offer and you'll know my name."
"I just can't think of it. Please tell me."
Wang raised his cup and drained it. Almost instantly he began to drool from the corners of his mouth. His feet flailed, and he fell back off his bench. Chai quickly stripped Wang of his head kerchief, clothing and footwear, and put them on, including the cockade and the colored silk robe.
"If the waiter should ask," he said to Yan Qing, "tell him the attendant is drunk, and that the other gentleman will be back soon."
"No need to instruct me. I'll handle it."
Chai Jin left the tavern and went to the East Glory Gate of the palace. Because of the cockade and the color of his robe, no one stopped him from entering. It was a splendid, lavish place of glorious hues, a paradise on earth. Chai passed a number of compounds whose gates were closed and fastened with golden locks. Then, off to a side, he saw a sign in letters of gold, "Hall of Deep Thought." This was the imperial library.
Its vermilion doors of ornately carved wood were open. Chai Jin entered. Directly opposite was an imperial chair, flanked by tables on which lay brush-pens with ivory handles, decorated paper, imperial ink-slabs, and the famous grinding stones from Duanxi. Innumerable sets of books lined the walls, each with ivory fastenings. Behind the chair was a screen decorated with a scenic panorama in lovely colors. Chai Jin walked around to the back of the screen. It was blank, except for a listing of the four major outlaws, as follows: "Song Jiang of Shandong, Wang Qing west of the River Huai, Tian Hu of Hebei, Fang La south of the Yangzi."
"We are the ones who are ravaging the country," Chai Jin reflected. "It has been written here so that no one will forget." He drew a concealed knife and cut out the words "Song Jiang of Shandong" and hastily quit the building. Others were already entering.
Chai Jin left the inner grounds, departed through the East Glory Gate, and returned to the tavern. Attendant Wang was still in a drugged slumber. Chai took off Wang's clothes and put on his own. He directed Yan Qing to pay the bill and give the waiter a large tip.
As he and Yan were leaving he said to the waiter: "Attendant Wang and I are close friends. He's drunk, so I signed in for him at the palace. He still hasn't come to, but I have to go outside the city and must leave before the gates close. You can keep the change. Wang's clothing and identification are all here."
"I'll take care of everything, sir," the waiter assured him.
Chai and Yan left the tavern and exited from the city through the Wanshou Gate.
Towards evening the attendant awakened, Since his identifying robe and cockade were still with him, he didn't suspect what had happened. The waiter told him what Chai Jin had said. Still befuddled with drink, Wang returned home.
The next day a colleague informed him: "The words 'Song Jiang of Shandong' have been removed from the Hall of Deep Thought. Today security at every gate is as tight as the bands on a bucket. Anyone going in or out is closely checked."
Wang at last understood. But he didn't dare breathe a word.
On reaching the inn, Chai told in detail what he had seen in the palace, and handed over the "Song Jiang of Shandong" which he had cut from the imperial writing. Song Jiang examined it with many sighs. On the evening of the fourteenth he and several of his men went into the city to view the lanterns.
During the Song Dynasty the Eastern Capital was the leading metropolis. It grew prosperous and rich under the Taoist Sovereign.
At dusk that day a bright moon rose in the east in a cloudless sky. Song Jiang and Chai Jin were disguised as vacationing officials. Dai Zong wore the garb of a lieutenant. Yan Qing tagged along as servant. Only Li Kui remained at the inn.
The four men mingled with the noisy crowds swarming in through the Fengqiu Gate and wandered about the streets and marts. It was a warm evening with gentle breezes, ideal for strolling. On the main thoroughfare sheds had been erected in front of every door and hung with lanterns, which vied for beauty and turned the night into day. The buildings too were decked with lanterns, and the streets thronged with carriages and people.
The four men turned away from Imperial Road to a street lined on both sides with signboards denoting establishments of "misty moonlight." The four were struck by one house midway down. Its doorway was covered by a blue cloth drape, behind which was a curtain of spotted bamboo. Green silk gauze screened the windows on either side. Between them and the doorway hung two vertical plaques reading: "A Fairy Maid of Song and Dance, A Flower of Surpassing Grace."
Song Jiang and his companions went into a tea-house opposite and sat down. "Which courtesan's place is that?" they asked the waiter.
"The leading lady of her profession in the Eastern Capital, Li Shishi. And in the house next door to us is Zhao Yuannu."
"Isn't Li the one who's having a hot affair with the emperor?" Song Jiang asked.
"Not so loud," said the waiter. "There are eyes and ears all around."
Song Jiang leaned close to Yan Qing and whispered: "I want to meet Li Shishi and arrange something with her privately. Invent some story to get us in. We'll wait for you here." He remained with Chai Jin and Dai Zong, drinking tea.
Yan Qing walked up to the door of the courtesan's residence, pushed aside the drape, raised the bamboo curtain, and entered. He saw fine smoke rising from a bronze incense burner on a rhinoceros-hide table beneath a hanging duck and drake lamp. On two of the walls were scenic paintings by four famous artists. Below stood four armchairs, also covered by rhinoceros hide.
There didn't seem to be anyone around. Yan Qing crossed a small courtyard into another parlor. Here were three small beds of ornately carved camphor wood, cushioned with purple mattresses bearing a fallen-petals-in-a-flowing-stream design. A fine lamp hung on a jade stand, here and there were rare antiques.
Yan Qing coughed softly. A serving maid rounded a folding screen, saw Yan Qing and curtsied.
"What is your name, big brother? Where are you from?"
"Can I trouble you, sister, to ask mama to come out? I have something to say."
The girl left and, a few moments later, returned with the bawd. Yan urged her to be seated. He kowtowed four times. "What is your name, young brother?"
"You've forgotten me, mother. I'm Zhang Xian, son of Zhang the Second. I've been away from the city since childhood. I only returned today."
Zhang was a very common name. The bawd thought for several moments. She couldn't see the young man clearly in the lamplight. Suddenly, she imagined she remembered.
"Not little Zhang Xian near the Taiping Bridge? Where have you been? I haven't seen you in ages."
"Of course not. I've been away. Today, I'm looking after a guest from Shandong. He's got more property than words can say. He's probably the richest man in his province. He's here on business. One, he wants to enjoy the lantern festival; two, he's visiting relatives here in the capital; three, he's buying and selling merchandise; and four, he's longing to meet your lady. He asks only to sip tea at the same table, and he'll be satisfied. I wouldn't dare ask otherwise. I'm not kidding—that man has thousands in gold and silver, and he'd like to present some of it to this house."
The greedy bawd was very fond of money. Yan Qing's story went to her heart. She hastily called out Li Shishi and introduced her to Yan. He could see in the lamplight that the girl truly had a form that could sink fish and down geese, a face that eclipsed the moon and put the flowers to shame. Yan dropped to his knees and kowtowed. The bawd relayed his story to Shishi.
"Where is the gentleman now?" asked the girl.
"In that tea-house across the way," said Yan.
"Invite him to have some tea here."
"He wouldn't dare enter without your permission."
"Hurry over and ask him," said the bawd.
Yan Qing went to the tea-house and related the news in Song Jiang's ear. Dai Zong paid the bill and the three men followed Yan to the courtesan's house, On entering, they were escorted to the main parlor, where Li Shishi stood with hands folded demurely.
She greeted Song Jiang politely and said: "Zhang Xian has just been talking about your munificence. Your visit brings luster to our humble dwelling."
"I'm an ignorant man from an obscure mountain hamlet," replied Song. "To be able to gaze upon your beauty is my greatest good fortune." The courtesan asked him to be seated. "Who is this other gentleman?" she queried, indicating Chai Jin.
"My nephew Sheriff Ye," said Song. He also instructed Dai Zong to greet the girl.
Song Jiang and Chai Jin were ushered to guest seats on the left Side of the table, and Li Shishi took her place on the right, as hostess, while the bawd brought in the tea things. The girl poured for each of the four men personally. The tea leaves were finer than birds' tongues, the brew was as fragrant as dragon's saliva.
When they had finished and the tea service was removed, they chatted pleasantly.
The bawd entered and said: "His Majesty is waiting in the rear."

"I'm afraid I can't keep you any longer, today," the courtesan said to her guests. "But he's due to visit the Upper Purity Temple soon and won't be able to come here for some time. Once he goes, you gentlemen will be welcome to call again and join me in a few cups of wine."
Song Jiang bid her a respectful farewell and departed with his three companions.
When they had left her door Chai Jin said: "The emperor has two mistresses, Li Shishi and Zhao Yuannu. We've met one, what about the other?"
They went to the building next to the tea-house and raised the door curtain. Yan Qing spoke to Zhao Yuannu's bawd.
"These two gentlemen are wealthy merchants from Shandong. If they could meet your lady, they would present her with a hundred ounces of silver."
"My girl hasn't any luck. She's sick in bed and can't receive company."
"We'll try again another time," said Song Jiang.
The bawd saw them to the door and bid them farewell. Leaving the street, they headed towards Tianhan Bridge to view the massed lanterns display. As they neared the Fanlou Restaurant building they heard the shrilling of pipes and the beat of drums. Lanterns dazzled the eye, people swarmed in and out like ants.
Song Jiang and Chai Jin went upstairs, found a room and sat down. They ordered drinks and side dishes. Sipping their wine, they admired the lanterns gleaming outside in the night. They had downed only a few cups when they heard someone making up lyrics and singing them in the adjoining room:

Though our courage surges to the stare,
Our heroic task is unfulfilled.
With dragon sword grasped firm in hand,
We won't quit till every scoundrel's killed!

Song Jiang knew that voice. He hastily entered. There was Nine Dragons Shi Jin and Mu Hong the Unrestrained, quite drunk and talking wildly.
"You brothers frightened the wits out of me," Song Jiang said sharply. "Pay your bill and get out. If it was some policeman instead of me who heard you, you'd have been in a fine mess. I never expected you two to be so careless. Leave the city without delay. After the formal lantern display tomorrow night, I'm leaving too. That's the best way. We don't want to stir up any trouble."
Shi Jin and Mu Hong had nothing to say. They paid their bill, went down the stairs, and departed from the Eastern Capital.
Song Jiang and his three companions had a few more cups. They were a bit tipsy. Dai Zong paid the bill. Flipping their long sleeves, they left the restaurant. They returned to the inn outside Wanshou Gate and pounded on the door. Li Kui peered at them with sleepy eyes.
"What's the good of letting me come to the Eastern Capital?" he grumbled to Song Jiang. "You only make me stay here and watch the room. While I'm penned up in this friggin place, you fellows are out having a good time."
"It's because you have a bad disposition and are so ugly. I'm afraid if I take you into the city you'll only create a disturbance."
"Don't take me, then! Why make a lot of excuses? When did my looks ever scare anybody's family to death?"
"All right, tomorrow night, the fifteenth, and no more. We'll see the lanterns and leave immediately."
Li Kui laughed happily.
The next day, Lantern Festival Day itself, was bright and clear. Towards evening, huge crowds of celebrants gathered. It was a time of national peace and prosperity, when peasants toiled contentedly in their fields. Song Jiang and Chai Jin, in the guise of vacationing officials, followed by Dai Zong, Li Kui and Yan Qing, went into the city through the Wanshou Gate.
Although there was no curfew that night, each of the gates was guarded by soldiers in full armor, equipped with weapons at the ready. Their bows were strung, their swords were unsheathed, and every post was manned. Five thousand cavalry under the personal command of Marshal Gao Qiu patrolled atop the city walls.
Song Jiang and his four companions jostled through the crowds into the Eastern Capital. He whispered some instructions in Yan Qing's ear, and added: "I'll be waiting in the tea-house."
Yan Qing went to the home of Li Shishi and knocked on the door. The prime-ranking courtesan and her bawd received him.
"Ask your master, the magnate, to please forgive us," they said. "We never know when His Majesty is liable to drop in privately. We must be diligent."
"My master apologizes for disturbing you. Shandong is only a remote province by the sea. It doesn't have anything of value. What it does produce wouldn't be worth presenting to you. All he can do is send you one hundred ounces of gold as a token of his esteem. Perhaps the lady can have ornaments made out of them for her hair. If he comes across something attractive later on, he'll send it with his respects."
"Where is the magnate now?" asked the bawd.
"He's waiting for me at the end of the lane. We're going to see the lanterns."
There was nothing the bawd loved more in the world than wealth. When Yan Qing took out two gold nuggets, gleaming like live coals and put them on the table, she was overjoyed.
"This is Lantern Festival Day," she said, "and my girl and I are celebrating it at home with a few cups of wine. If the magnate wouldn't think our fare too meager, perhaps he'd visit our humble abode for a chat. Do you think he might come?"
"I'm sure he will. I'll pass on your invitation."
Yan Qing went to the tea-house and informed Song Jiang. They all repaired to the home of Li Shishi. Song Jiang told Dai Zong and Li Kui to wait at the front door.
The three entered the large parlor where Li Shishi received them. "We've only just met," she said to Song Jiang. "You shouldn't give such an expensive gift. It really isn't right."
"We have nothing of value in my rustic mountains. I can only offer this trifle as an expression of thanks."
The courtesan invited them into a small adjoining room, and asked them to be seated. Maids served rare fruits, fine food, vintage wine, and tasty delicacies. The crockery was of the best, the table was laid beautifully. Shishi approached them and bowed, wine cup in hand.
"I must have been lucky in my previous incarnation or I wouldn't be able to meet you two gentlemen today. With this simple wine, I pledge to you, my elders." Song Jiang said: "Although I have a bit of property in my mountain area, I have never seen anything so lavish as you have here. Your fame is known throughout the land, lovely and charming lady. An interview with you is more difficult to obtain than reaching Heaven. Yet here I am, actually chatting and drinking with you personally!"
"How extremely kind of you, magnate. You praise me too highly. I am unworthy!"
Both drank, and Shishi directed her personal maid to pour wine in tiny gold cups. Then the courtesan relaxed and gossiped about members of her profession. To all her remarks it was Chai Jin who replied. Yan Qing, who was standing off to one side, offered quips that made everyone laugh.
After several rounds Song Jiang became more loquacious. He rolled up his sleeves and gesticulated as he talked in the free manner of the brigands of Mount Liangshan.
"My brother is always like this after he's had some wine," Chai Jin smiled. "Pray don't laugh at him, lady."
"Drinking is for pleasure," said Shishi. "Why stand on ceremony?"
"One of those two servants at the front door," a young maid said, "the one with the yellow beard who's so weird-looking he scares you, is muttering curses."
"Tell them both to come in," said Song Jiang.
Dai Zong soon entered the side room with Li Kui. When the Black Whirlwind saw Song Jiang and Chai Jin sitting and drinking with Shishi, he glared.
"Who is this fellow?" Shishi asked. "He looks like one of those imps standing before the judge in the temple statuary."
Everyone laughed except Li Kui. He didn't know what she was talking about.
"He's the son of one of our family servants," said Song Jiang.
"It doesn't matter," said the courtesan with a laugh. "I have no refinement."
"The lout is a skilled warrior," Song explained. "He can tote two or three hundred catties and fight forty or fifty men."
Shishi called for large silver flagons and gave Li Kui and Dai Zong three rounds each. Yan Qing was afraid Li Kui would say something coarse, and he directed the two to return to their posts at the front of the house.
"When a real man drinks," said Song Jiang, "he doesn't use small cups." He picked up a large silver flagon and downed several rounds.
In a low voice, Shishi murmured a song by the poet Su Dongpo to the melody of Xijiangyue. His senses heightened by wine, Song Jiang called for brush-pen and paper. He ground the ink thick and black, dipped his pen, and spread the paper. "Though I have no learning," he said to the courtesan, "I'd like to scrawl a few words to express the sadness in my heart. I beg of you to hear me, foremost flower." Taking up his pen, Song Jiang, then and there composed a yuefu poem. It ran as follows:

North and south,
Where under Heaven is there a place for this wild traveller?
My misty mountain stronghold
Is but a base for future status in the imperial capital.
Jade sleeves and swirling incense,
Red brocades and snow-white cuffs...
One smile from you is worth
A thousand ounces of gold.
Fairy maid, your beauty
Is more than I can bear!
Six times six in wild goose formation,
Plus eight times nine,
Waiting only for news
From the Golden Cock.
Our chivalry Heaven-embracing.
Earth-shaking our loyalty,
Yet recognized by none
Within the Four Seas.
Morose and sad at separation,
I drink,
And in a single night
My hair turns white.

When he had finished, he handed the poem to Li Shishi. She read it a few times, but didn't understand. He was about to explain when the courtesan's personal maid entered.
"His Majesty has arrived at the rear door through the tunnel," she announced.
"I won't be able to see you off," Shishi said hastily to her guests. "Please forgive me." She hurried to receive the emperor.
The young maid quickly gathered the cups and utensils, carried away the small table, and swept the floor. Song Jiang and the others concealed themselves in a dark corner of the side room. From it they could see Shishi in the parlor kneeling before the sovereign.
"Your Majesty must be weary from affairs of state."
The emperor's head was covered by a silk gauze kerchief in the Tang style. He wore an imperial dragon robe.
"I've just returned from the Upper Purity Temple," he said. "I directed my son the prince to dispense wine to the populace at Xuande House and my younger brother to attend the fair at the Thousand Paces Esplanade. I had arranged to meet Marshal Yang, but he never showed up, though I waited a long time. So I came here. Approach, beloved, let us talk together."
"If we miss this chance, we may never get another," Song Jiang whispered to his cohorts in the darkness. "Why don't we three go forward and beseech an amnesty? What would be wrong with that?"
"Impossible!" said Chai Jin. "Even if he agreed, he could always reverse himself later."
Meanwhile, Li Kui's wrath was growing. Song Jiang and Chai Jin had sat drinking with the beauty, but he and Dai Zong had been sent to watch the door! Li Kui's hackles rose. His fury reached a boiling point.
Just then, Marshal Yang raised the hanging screen and pushed open the double doors. He was about to Step in when his eyes MI on Li Kui, Standing inside the entry.
"Who are you, knave? How dare you come here?" he barked.
Without a word, Li Kui picked up an armchair and flung it at Yang's head. The startled marshal tumbled backwards, knocking over another two chairs. Dai Zong rushed to intervene, but he was too late. Li Kui ripped pictures off the wall and set fire to them with a candle. Smashing left and right, he spread the blaze. Incense table, chairs, benches—he pulverized them all.
Song Jiang and his companions hurried out when they heard the tumult. They found the Black Whirlwind, stripped to the waist, going on a rampage. By the time they got outside the door, Li Kui was tearing down the street with a cudgel he had grabbed somewhere. Song Jiang decided to leave the city immediately with Chai Jin and Dai Zong, lest the gates be closed before they could escape. He directed Yan Qing to remain behind and look after Li Kui.
The moment the fire broke out in Li Shishi's home, the emperor was off like a streak of smoke. Neighbors who hurried to fight the blaze also rescued Marshal Yang. Of that no more need be said.
The sounds of the yelling and shouting reached Marshal Gao, who was patrolling above the North Gate. He hastened down with his soldiers to give chase. Li Kui, battling madly, ran into Mu Hong and Shi Jin. They were joined by Yan Qing, and the four fought their way to the inner side of the city wall.
Soldiers rushed to close the gate. But from the outside up charged Lu Zhishen with his iron staff, Wu Song with his double swords, and Zhu Tong and Liu Tang, swinging halberds. They hacked a path into the city and saved their four mates.
They got through the gate just about the time Gao and his mounted force were reaching it. Song Jiang, Chai Jin and Dai Zong had vanished. The eight chieftains grew alarmed.
Now it so happened that Wu Yong, the outlaws' military advisor, suspecting Song Jiang would have difficulty, had decided to raid the Eastern Capital. He fixed a time and dispatched a thousand armored cavalry under the five Tiger Chieftains. In the outskirts they met Song Jiang, Chai Jin and Dai Zong, and provided them with horses they had brought for that purpose. Then the other eight arrived and were also given mounts. But there was no sign of Li Kui.
Marshal Gao and men were preparing to charge forth. Five of Song Jiang's commanders—Guan Sheng, Lin Chong, Qin Ming, Huyan Zhuo and Dong Ping, galloped up to the edge of the moat.
"All the gallants of Mount Liangshan are here," they shouted. "Surrender the city and save yourselves from death!"
Gao dared not come out. He hurriedly pulled up the drawbridge and retreated with his soldiers to defensive positions atop the city wall. "You're Li Kui's best friend," Song Jiang said to Yan Qing. "Wait for the swarthy oaf and bring him back. I want to return to the stronghold with our men tonight before the foe can intercept us." Song Jiang and the outlaws departed. Yan Qing, watching beneath the eaves of a house, saw Li Kui emerging from the inn with his luggage on his back. An ax in either hand, he leaped forth from the inn gate with a yell and headed alone to attack the Eastern Capital. Truly, he left the inn roaring like thunder, flourishing axes to split the city gate.

Now in the Ceremonial Hall that day Song Jiang named those who were to go with him to see the illuminations in the Eastern Capital: "Chai Jin and I will go together. The Tattooed Dragon and Mu the Irrepressible will be another party, Monk and Pilgrim a third and Whiskers and the Red-Haired Devil a fourth. Only these four parties. All the rest will stay put and guard the fortress."
Then Iron Ox said: "They say the lights in the capital are something wonderful. I'd enjoy an outing too."
Song Jiang said: "How can you go?" But Iron Ox was hell bent on going and there was no way they could hold him back. Song Jiang said: "Go, then, if you must, but I'm not having you stirring up trouble; you'll have to dress as my servant, and we'll take the Prodigy along as well to keep an eye on you."
Now you will remember, friends, that Song Jiang was a branded criminal. How would he be able to enter the capital? Well, it was like this: when Doctor An came to the company on the mountain he had treated the marks with acid and then used a balm to heal the sores. Red scars appeared, to remove which he used a fine paste of gold and powdered jade which he rubbed on daily and all of them disappeared. This is like what it says in the medical books: "Fine jade to remove scars."
The Tattooed Dragon and Irrepressible were the first that day to set off, dressed as merchants. After them went Monk and Pilgrim in the guise of wandering monks, and then Whiskers and the Red-Haired Devil, also as merchants. It goes without saying that they all had swords in their belts and carried halberds and other weapons concealed about their person.

Song Jiang and Mr. Chai were supposed to be officials on leave. They took the Magic Messenger along too, disguised as a junior army officer, so that in case of need he could get an urgent message back to the stronghold. Iron Ox and the Prodigy, dressed as servants, picked up the luggage and set off down the mountain. The other leaders gave them a send-off at Golden Sands Landing. The Professor repeatedly exhorted Iron Ox: "Usually when you go off somewhere you can't keep out of trouble. This time you're going with the Leader to see the lights in the capital: this is no ordinary occasion, so don't drink on the road and be absolutely on your best behaviour. Whatever happens you mustn't carry on like you usually do. If there is an incident, it could mean the end of our brotherhood and we might never be able to meet again."
Iron Ox said: "All right, keep your hair on, this time I definitely won't cause any trouble."
They said their farewells and set off. After Jizhou the road led them through Tengzhou, Danzhou and Caozhou. When they arrived at the Longevity Gate of the Eastern Capital they sought a lodging for the night and Song Jiang and Mr. Chai held a discussion. It was the eleventh day of the month. Song Jiang said: "I daren't enter the city tomorrow in broad daylight. I must wait till the evening of the fourteenth when everyone will be very excited. That's the time for me to go in."
Mr. Chai said: "I'll go tomorrow with the Prodigy and spy out the land."
"Good idea," said Song Jiang.
So next day Mr. Chai dressed up very smartly, putting on a brand new cap, and clean shoes and socks, and the Prodigy also got himself up specially. Together they left the inn. Every house on the outskirts of the city was in a state of great excitement, full of noise and bustle as they prepared for celebrating the New Year. There was a truly festive atmosphere. They passed through the city gate without being stopped, and strolled along Imperial Avenue enjoying the sights. At the palace's Gate of Eastern Splendour they found the tea houses and taverns packed with people of fashion, all dressed up to the nines, each in a particular colour. They sought out a very small wine shop and occupied an alcove overlooking the street. Leaning on the balustrade and gazing out, they noticed that all the members of the palace staff passing in and out through the gate had bunches of green leaves stuck in the side of their caps. Mr. Chai whispered in the Prodigy's ear, I want you to do this and this. The Prodigy, quick on the uptake as ever, needed no further bidding. He hurried downstairs, and at the door of the tavern ran into an elderly palace attendant, whom he greeted familiarly. "But I've no idea who you are!" the man said.
"My boss says you are old acquaintances," said the Prodigy. "He sent me to invite you to join him."
This attendant's name was in fact Wang, but the Prodigy said: "You're officer Zhang, aren't you?"
"No, my name's Wang," the man replied.
"Wang, that's right," said the Prodigy glibly. "My master said to invite officer Wang. It was a slip of the tongue."
Officer Wang followed the Prodigy upstairs. The Prodigy drew aside the curtain and announced to Mr. Chai: "Officer Wang is here." He made a sign with his hand. Mr. Chai invited the officer in and the two men exchanged courtesies. Officer Wang studied Mr. Chai for a long, long time. He definitely did not recognize him. "I am afraid I have a problem with my eyes," he said. "I cannot tell who you are. Won't you aid my memory? Allow me to ask your name."
"We were acquainted in childhood. But I don't need to tell you that. You must remember it yourself." Mr. Chai called for wine and meat to treat the superintendent. The waiter set out fruit and nuts, while the Prodigy poured wine and pressed it upon the guest. When the latter was quite merry, Mr. Chai asked: "What is the meaning of that green ornament in your cap?"
Officer Wang said: "The Emperor will be celebrating the new year tonight. There are twenty-four companies of us attendants, altogether some five thousand eight hundred men, and each of us has been given a special robe and the green cockade and this little metal badge inscribed with the words 'Celebrating with the People'. We have to be on call here every day. So long as we've got the official badge and the palace robe we can get inside."
"Now I understand," said Mr. Chai.
When they had drunk quite a few more cups, Mr. Chai called the Prodigy over and told him to go and order a bowl of warm wine. In no time the wine arrived. Mr. Chai stood up and offered the cup to Officer Wang, saying: "When you have honoured me by drinking this bowl of wine, I'm quite sure my name will come back to you."
"I really can't remember it. Do please tell me." Wang took the cup and drank it off. Immediately he began to dribble and his legs went weak. He collapsed on the bench. Mr. Chai hurriedly took off his own cap, clothing and shoes, and then removed Wang's robe, and other garments, his shoes and so on, and put them all on, not forgetting the coloured cap and the identifying badge. Then he signalled to the Prodigy and said: "If the waiter starts asking questions, just tell him the palace official is drunk and the other gentleman will be back in a minute."
The Prodigy said: "No need to tell me. I'll take care of it."
Leaving the wine house, Mr. Chai went through the Gate of Eastern Splendour to view the inner courts. What he saw was a veritable paradise:
A lucky cloud envelops the phoenix gate; an auspicious glow pervades the dragon tower. The glazed tiles are laid in happy pairs, coupled jade ornaments hang from the roof ridge. Here is the Eastern Gate, leading to the Imperial Way; here the main palace, encircled by a red wall. On the ceremonial platform horoscopes are being cast, in the Court of the Water Clock the officials take their places. Around the perimeter walls, painted red with ground pepper, green willows sighingly brush the roof supports; along the balustrade that surrounds each hall, crimson flowers gaily salute the passing of the imperial chair. The mind is tricked into thinking itself in fairyland, wandering with the gods in paradise.
No one stopped Mr. Chai as he passed through the forbidden gate, because he was wearing the right clothes. He went first to the Hall of Purple Dawn and then to the Hall of Culture and Ethics, where all the doors were securely locked so he couldn't get in. He turned towards the Hall of Crystal Light and passing through a side door came to a doorway which bore the inscription "Palace of Profound Wisdom". This was the scholars' library. On one side was a vermilion screen with an open door in it. He slipped through and there in front of him was the imperial throne, with the four jewels of the study arranged on tables on either side — brushes with ivory holders, fine paper for memorials, special ink and a superior inkstone — and there were books too massed on the shelves each with an ivory marker. Facing this was a screen decorated with a wonderfully picturesque and detailed landscape. On the other side the screen was pure white and written here in the imperial hand were the names of the four most dangerous bandits;

Song Jiang of Shandong to the east
Wang Qing west of the river Huai
Tian Hu of Hebei in the north
Fang La south of the Yangtze

Mr. Chai thought to himself: "The country really is suffering from our activities, and these names are written here as a perpetual reminder of it." He took out his concealed dagger and cut out the words "Song Jiang of Shandong". He left the room quickly, as he heard someone coming. Passing out through the Gate of Eastern Splendour he returned to the inn. Officer Wang had still not woken up. Mr. Chai replaced the robe, cap, badge and other items, changing back into his own clothes. He told the Prodigy to settle the bill with the waiter and leave the change as a tip. Just before going downstairs he said to the man: "Superintendent Wang and I are old friends. Since he happened to be drunk, I went in and signed the roll for him. He is still drunk, but I live out of town and I must get to the gate before the curfew. The rest of the money is for you in recompense for your trouble. His special clothing and badge are all there."
The innkeeper said: "Don't worry sir. I'll take care of it for you."
Mr. Chai and the Prodigy left the inn and went out through the Gate of Longevity. It was late when Officer Wang awoke. He saw all his clothes were there and the cap with the badge, so he had no idea what had happened. The innkeeper told him what Mr. Chai had said and he went home still half tipsy. Next day someone came and told him: "The words 'Song Jiang of Shandong' have disappeared from the Imperial Library. Today security on the gates is tight as the hoops on a barrel. Everyone going in or out is being interrogated." Now at last he understood what had happened. But naturally he wasn't going to say anything.
Mr. Chai returned to the inn and gave Song Jiang a full account of what he had seen inside the palace. He produced the four characters in the Emperor's handwriting, "Song Jiang of Shandong", for Song Jiang to see. This occasioned many a sigh.
On the evening of the fourteenth the moon rose clear in the east, no trace of cloud. Song Jiang and Mr. Chai dressed as off-duty officials, with the Magic Messenger as an aide de camp and the Prodigy as their servant. They left Iron Ox behind on his own to hold the fort. Mixing with a crowd of revellers, they passed through the Gate of the Mounds and wandered about enjoying all the sights. The night was warm and mild, perfect for the festival. Along the main avenue every house was bedecked with lanterns, competing for splendour. The light they gave made it like day. From windows and terraces lights answered lights, in carriages or on horseback people paraded past. The four heroes strolled on down a street on either side of which were the signs of houses of entertainment. In the midst of these was one with a blue awning and a blind of speckled bamboo. The windows on either side were covered with green gauze, and a pair of inscriptions hung beside them: "The Queen of Song and Dance, the Nonpareil of Romance". After reading this, Song Jiang went into a teashop and asked for some tea. "What entertainer is it who resides opposite?" he asked the waiter.
"That's one of the capital's most superior courtesans. She's called Lily — Li Shishi is her full name."
"Is she the one that's a particularly close friend of the Emperor?" Song Jiang asked.
"Sh! Not so loud. Walls have ears!"
Song Jiang called the Prodigy over and whispered to him: "I'd like to have a tête-à-tête with this woman, but it must be in secret. See if you can think up some pretext to get us in there. I'll sit here and drink tea meanwhile."
The Prodigy went up to Lily Li's door. He drew aside the curtain, pulled up the bamboo blind and went inside. There were a pair of identical lanterns hanging there, and an incense table covered in rhinoceros hide on top of which was placed an antique brass incense burner from Boshan emitting a thin stream of incense. On two of the walls hung four landscapes by famous masters. Under them four chairs covered in rhinoceros hide were ranged in line. No one came out, so he penetrated into the inner courtyard. Here there was a large reception area furnished with three cedar wood couches, delicately carved and spread with red brocade cushions embroidered with blowing blossoms and rushing streams. A fine lantern was suspended from a rich frame and a number of rare antiques were displayed. He gave a slight cough and a young maid emerged from behind a screen. She curtsied to him and asked: "Who are you, sir, and where have you come from?"
"May I trouble you to call your mistress, I have something to tell her." The girl went back inside, and a moment later Ma Li appeared. The Prodigy asked her to be seated and kowtowed to her four times.
"Who are you?" she asked.
"Have you forgotten me?" he said. "Old Zhang's son, Zhang Xian. I left town when I was young and I've just returned."
Now in this world the names Zhang, Li and Wang are the commonest. Ma Li thought about it for a while. She couldn't see him very clearly in the lamplight. Then suddenly she seemed to remember. "Are you young Zhang Xian that used to live under the Peace Bridge?" she cried. "Where have you been? You haven't been here for ages."
"I was out of town, that's why I couldn't visit you," he said. "Now I'm working for a merchant from Shandong. He's got pots of money, I couldn't begin to tell you how much. He's the richest man in two provinces. He's here partly to enjoy the festival and visit relatives, and partly to do some business. But he also is most anxious to be granted an interview with your lady. He isn't asking any special favours, simply to sit at table with her would make him the happiest man in the world. I'm not just saying it for effect, this fellow is really loaded and he's more than willing to part with some of it."
Now the old bawd was of a covetous disposition: she doted on gold, and this speech of the Prodigy's had her drooling. She called Lily to come and meet the Prodigy at once.
Seen under the light of the lamps she was a fabulous creature. The Prodigy kowtowed to her:

In the houses of pleasure she reigns supreme,
Perfection of beauty, the crème de la crème,
Cynosure of all eyes, the Emperor's included.
No wonder a hero can be so deluded.

When the bawd had explained everything to her, Lily said: "Where is this gentleman, then?"
"He's in the teahouse across the road," said the Prodigy.
"You ought to have got him to honour me by having tea with me," she said.
"He wouldn't dare enter without your express permission," said the Prodigy.
"Off with you, I say, and invite him here," said the Ma.
The Prodigy returned to the teahouse and whispered the news. The Magic Messenger took out some money and paid the owner and they followed the Prodigy to Lily's place. They were immediately taken to the main reception room where Lily, with joined hands came forward and said: "Zhang Xian has said such a lot about you, sir. I'm honoured, I'm sure."
Song Jiang replied: "I am but a poor rustic, a fellow of no distinction. To be allowed the sight of such beauty as yours makes me happy for life."
Lily invited him to sit down. Seeing Mr. Chai she asked: "Is this gentleman some sort of relation of yours?"
"This is my cousin, sheriff Ye," said Song Jiang. He signalled the Magic Messenger to pay his respects also.
Song Jiang and Mr. Chai sat on the left, in the place of honour as guests, Lily on the right as hostess. A maid brought tea, which Lily offered with her own hands. Needless to say, the tea was of the most fragrant! When they had finished it the cups were taken away and the conversation was about to take a more intimate turn, when Ma Li came in and announced: "His Majesty is at the back door!"
"I really can't ask you to stay, now," Lily said. "But tomorrow he goes to the Palace of Higher Purity and he won't be coming here. Please call again for a chat and a few cups of wine."
Song Jiang murmured his assent and they left. From her door they strolled along a small street to Via Lactea Bridge to see the turtle mountain. Just as they were passing Birdcage Inn the sound of flutes playing within assailed their ears and a thunder of gongs and drums, while a blaze of lanterns dazzled the eye; people were milling about like ants. They entered the restaurant and having found themselves a pleasant corner to sit down and having ordered wine and some delicacies to eat, began to enjoy themselves, gazing at the lights and drinking. After a few cups they were interrupted by some singing in the next compartment :

Our vaulting spirit spurs us on,
The heroic task is not yet done.
With sword in hand we'll not repose
Till every scoundrel's paid his dues.

Song Jiang quickly went to investigate. It was the Tattooed Dragon and Mu the Unstoppable, who had got themselves dead drunk in the next room and were bawling out this foolishness at the tops of their voices. Song Jiang marched straight in and growled: "You two gave me one hell of a fright! Pay the bill, quick, and get out of here! Lucky it was me who heard you! If it had been the police you'd be in a fine pickle! I'd never have thought you two could be so stupid. You're to leave the city at once, don't waste a moment. And tomorrow, after seeing the lights, you must go back the same night, that's the only way we can be sure you won't get us into trouble."
Sheepishly they called the waiter and paid their bill. Then they slank downstairs and headed out of town. The others went on drinking and after a few more cups began to be quite flushed. The Magic Messenger paid and then they trooped downstairs and headed for the Gate of Longevity. Arriving at the inn they knocked on the door of their room. Iron Ox appeared rubbing his eyes and said: "I wouldn't have minded so much if you hadn't let me come at all, but to bring me along and then keep me cooped up in this room is fucking awful. And you lot have all been off painting the town red!"
"It's your character that's the problem and that ugly mug of yours," Song Jiang said. "I was afraid if we took you into the city you'd provoke some kind of trouble."
"All right, you don't have to take me," said Iron Ox, "But why all these excuses? When did you ever see me walk into someone's house and start killing people?"
"We'll take you tomorrow, for the main night of the Festival," Song Jiang said. "But as soon as we've seen the lights, we'll leave."
Iron Ox was full of glee.
The day of the full moon dawned fine and clear. Towards evening crowds beyond numbering began to gather, to celebrate the festival. There is an old poem which describes the festival:
The day dawns mild, welcome gaps appear in the clouds, early spring is in the capital. Fine carriages compete, riders show off their skills on richly caparisoned horses; the turtle mountain, all agree, is enchanting as Fairyland; and when it grows dark coupled lanterns silently light up the night. The restaurant is strewn with scented iris; look up and you see the sky between the eaves. A faint breeze brings the sound of heavenly music; celebrations are in full swing at the house of pleasure; a host of beautiful women grace it with their presence. Incense is wafted along the street, there is mirth and merriment, stars prick heaven's vault. Gradually the sound of music fades, the revellers return under the bright moon. Dawn seems never to come.
Song Jiang and Mr. Chai adopted their previous disguise as off-duty officials and with the Magic Messenger, Iron Ox and the Prodigy entered the city by the Gate of Longevity. Now although there was no curfew that night, the guard commanders at all the gates were in full armour and wearing uniform caps, with their bows strung and swords unsheathed. Discipline was to be strictly maintained. Marshal Gao himself was patrolling the city with five thousand cavalry. Song Jiang and his companions mingled with the crowds and were swept into the city. The Prodigy was given whispered instructions to do certain things and then meet them at a teahouse.
The Prodigy went and knocked on Lily's door. Ma Li and her protégé the famous courtesan came out to receive him and said: "I trust His Honour will excuse us for yesterday. His Majesty often comes here privately, without warning. We dare not fail in respect towards him."
The Prodigy said: "On the contrary, my master apologizes most humbly for inconveniencing you. Shandong is but a poor place, with nothing special to offer. What little it does produce is really not worthy of you, so my master has sent me to offer a hundred taels of gold, as a small token of his esteem. Later, if he manages to lay hands on something less ordinary, he will send it with his respects."
"Where is your master at this moment?" the old woman asked.
"He's waiting for me at the corner of the street. When I go back we're going to see the lights."
Cash and valuables, that's what this kind of old woman generally likes best in the world. When the Prodigy took out two ingots in the shape of charcoal and placed them in front of her, you can bet your life she was moved! "Seeing as it's the lantern festival," she said, "we were planning a little celebration at home with a few cups of wine. If His Honour would consent to it, he could join us here for a little chat."
"I'm sure he'll say yes if I ask him," said the Prodigy.
Back he went to the teahouse. After he'd passed on the invitation they all went round to Lily's house. Song Jiang told the Magic Messenger and Iron Ox to wait outside. The other three went into the main reception hall, where Lily received them. She thanked Song Jiang courteously, saying: "You and I have only just met, Your Excellency, but you're so generous! It's too much honour, really it is. I didn't ought to accept."
Song Jiang said: "My home is such a wild, uncivilized place, there really isn't anything special I could give you. I just wanted you to have some little thing that would express my feelings. There is really no reason for you to thank me."
She invited them into a little parlour and they all sat down according to the etiquette. The maid brought some rare fruit and served tea, with a particularly choice wine and some delicacies served on gold and silver dishes laid out on a low table. Lily raised the cup and came forward to prostrate herself, saying: "It must be in my stars that I should entertain you two gentlemen here today. Let me offer you this simple wine."

Song Jiang said: "Although in my rustic home I have a few possessions and a modicum of wealth, I have never seen such style as this. Your enchanting reputation has spread far and wide, just to secure an interview with you is an achievement like reaching heaven, to say nothing of receiving such entertainment at your hands."
Lily said: "You flatter me, sir. I am unworthy of it." After they had drunk she told the maid to pour wine into some tiny gold cups. Then she began to converse about affairs of fashion. It was Mr. Chai who answered, while the Prodigy stood to one side and proffered witticisms. After a few rounds, Song Jiang's tongue became loosened, he pulled up his sleeves and he gradually slipped into the ways of Mount Liang. Mr. Chai said with a laugh: "Our friend is like this when he's drunk. Please don't laugh at him."
Lily replied: "Everyone has his own character and it must be respected!"
The maid said: "Those two friends of yours outside — the one with the brown whiskers looks really terrifying, he keeps muttering and growling all the time."
"Send them in," Song Jiang said. Immediately the Magic Messenger came in with Iron Ox behind him. When Iron Ox saw Song Jiang, Mr. Chai and the Prodigy sitting there drinking wine with Lily, he felt pretty sick about it. He glared at them with a most ferocious expression.
"Who is this gentleman?" Lily asked. "He looks just like the spirit who stands before the Judge of Hell in the Temple of the Earth." Everyone laughed except Iron Ox, who did not know what they were talking about.
"He's Young Li, son of one of my servants," Song Jiang replied.
It was her turn to laugh. "It's nothing to me if he shares my family name," she said. "But the immortal Li Bai might be a bit put out!"
Song Jiang said: "This fellow is a great fighter. He can carry a load of several hundred pounds and defeat forty or fifty opponents at once."
Lily had a silver sconce brought and Iron Ox was invited to drink from it three times. Magic Messenger got the same treatment. The Prodigy was terrified Iron Ox would come out with something gross and signalled to them to return to their original place outside the door.
"When a man drinks, why use small cups?" Song Jiang now said. "Let's drink a few rounds from the sconce." Lily recited a poem and Song Jiang was inspired by the wine to call for paper and brush. He ground up a goodly supply of ink, filled his brush, opened out the paper and said to Lily: "My talent is slight and I cannot write a good poem, but I wish to express the sadness in my heart and beg you to give me a hearing." Thereupon he set to with the brush and produced this poem:
North or south, heaven or earth, where will this restless spirit find a home? From the stronghold in the misty marshes of Shandong come I, to seek the pleasures of the capital. Here where silks and satins reign, and it's all sweet perfumes, fine fashions and soft lighting, one smile has more worth for me than a ton of gold. The form is divine but O, when will the heart be softened? Yet my mind returns to that reed-lined shore, those overgrown banks, the bright moon and the sky's cold blue, where the six times six joined to the nine times eight await the golden rooster's call. There you'll find courage enough to take heaven by storm, honour enough to fill the earth brimful, yet none within the four seas knows of it. Now, though, let us leave a thousand griefs behind and idle the night away with wine.
When he had finished this he gave it to Lily, who studied it carefully but couldn't make out the sense. He was waiting for her to demand an explanation so he could tell her all that was hidden within it, when her maid came and announced: "His Majesty has returned by the tunnel and is at the back entrance!"
Lily immediately said: "Please forgive me for not seeing you out," and hurried off to receive the Emperor, while the maid quickly cleared away the cups and plates and so on, removed the table and swept the floor. Song Jiang and the others did not leave, however. They slipped into a dark corner where they were able to watch Lily kneel before the sovereign, welcoming him to her house and inquiring if he was tired.
The Emperor was wearing a Tang headdress of soft gauze and an imperial robe. He said: "I have been at the Palace of Higher Purity today. I left my son to distribute wine at the Hall of Virtue and my younger brother to see to the alms for the people at the Temple of a Thousand Steps. I had arranged to meet Marshal Yang, but grew tired of waiting when he did not appear. I have come here by myself. So approach, my dear, and let us have some conversation."
Song Jiang in his dark corner said: "If we let this opportunity slip, it'll be hard to find such another. Why shouldn't we all three of us speak to him about an amnesty?"
Mr. Chai said: "What's the use? Even if he agrees now, he can always repudiate it later."
They continued to discuss this in their corner. Now Iron Ox, having seen Song Jiang and Mr. Chai drinking with a beautiful woman and then been told to go and wait at the door with the Magic Messenger, was seething with discontent. He had a whole bellyful of anger which had found no outlet. It was at this point that Marshal Yang drew aside the curtain and pushed open the door. He was about to enter when he saw Iron Ox. "Who the devil are you and what the hell are you doing here?" he shouted.
Instead of answering, Iron Ox picked up a chair and thrust it in Marshal Yang's face. Too surprised to defend himself, the Marshal collapsed on the floor, knocking over two more chairs. Magic Messenger rushed to intervene but to no avail. Iron Ox was tearing down pictures and setting fire to them with a candle. He rushed about spreading fire everywhere and at the same time smashing up tables, chairs and lamps. The noise brought Song Jiang and the others rushing out. They saw Iron Ox stripped to the waist going berserk. The four of them made a dash for the door, followed by Iron Ox who snatched up a staff and laid about him with it. Since Iron Ox was obviously out of control Song Jiang could only think to get out of the city as fast as possible, together with Mr. Chai and the Magic Messenger, before the main gate was shut, cutting off their escape. He left only the Prodigy to look after Iron Ox. As soon as the fire broke out in Lily's house, the Emperor had fled like the wind. Friends and neighbours raised the alarm and also rescued Marshal Yang. No more to be said of all that.
The hubbub spread throughout the city. Marshal Gao, on patrol at the northern gate, heard the rumours and led his troops in search of the miscreants. While the Prodigy was doing his best to support Iron Ox, he came across Mu the Unstoppable and the Tattooed Dragon. The four of them joined forces and fought their way with staves and spears to the edge of the city where the guards were hurriedly shutting the gate. Monk with his steel staff and Pilgrim with his two swords were outside. Together with Whiskers and Sergeant Lei with their halberds they charged to rescue the other four. Just as they were all rushing through the gate, Marshal Gao's forces happened to arrive outside the walls. The eight from Mount Liang not seeing Song Jiang, Mr. Chai or the Magic Messenger, feared for their safety.
Now the Professor had guessed something like this might happen and fixed the time for a major attack on the Eastern Capital. He sent five bold commanders and a thousand armoured cavalry. They had reached the outskirts of the city that same evening and were waiting there, and they now met Song Jiang and the other two. They had brought some riderless horses on which the three fugitives were now mounted. Then the others came up and were also given mounts, all but Iron Ox who had gone missing.
Marshal Gao was mustering his troops for a sally. Song Jiang's commanders, who were Scimitar, Leopard's Head, Thunderclap, Twin Rods and Twin Spears, charged towards the city and halted beside the moat to shout: "The company of Mount Liang is here in force! Surrender the city at once, unless you want a massacre!"
Marshal Gao was too scared to attack now. He hurriedly ordered the drawbridge to be raised and deployed all his troops along the walls for defence. Song Jiang gave orders to the Prodigy: "You're the one who gets on best with that black beast. You can wait for him here and bring him along. The rest of the force and I'll return with all speed to the mountain fortress. I hope we'll meet with no further trouble en route." We shall leave Song Jiang and the others as they return, and remain with the Prodigy, who watches from beneath the eaves of someone's house and sees Iron Ox emerge with a great whoop from the inn carrying his luggage and his 2 axes, ready to take on the whole city by himself. Indeed, like a thunderstorm he roared out of the inn, waving the two axes with which he planned to batter down the city gates.

Black Whirlwind Iron Ox has a scheme for catching demons & Pretends to Catch a Spirit; 2 heads are offered to the stronghold on Mount Liang by the Hero

Yan Qing flung his arms around Li Kui's waist. With one twist, he threw him to the ground, head down and feet to the sky. Yan Qing then dragged him up, let go, and strode off along a path. Li Kui followed.
Why did Li Kui go with him? Because Yan Qing was the first among wrestlers. For that reason Song Jiang had dispatched him to control Li Kui. If the Black Whirlwind didn't listen, Yan Qing needed only one swift motion to floor him. Li Kui had had more than one taste of his hands and feet. He was afraid of Yan Qing and had to obey.
They dared not travel the highway. If pursuing government troops caught up, they'd have a hard time resisting. They made a wide detour in the direction of Chenliu County. Li Kui put on his clothes again and concealed his axes beneath them. Since he had no head kerchief, he parted his scorched-brown hair and did it up in two buns in the manner of a Taoist priest. They walked until daylight. Yan Qing had some money, and bought meat and wine in a village tavern. After eating, they continued on.
In the Eastern Capital that morning, confusion reigned. Marshal Gao led troops forth, but they were unable to apprehend the fugitives and had to return. Li Shishi claimed she knew nothing about anything. Marshal Yang also came back and rested. A check revealed that four or five hundred people in the city had been injured. Innumerable others, who had fallen or been knocked down, suffered bruises and contusions. Gao met with Tong Guan, head of the Council of Military Affairs, and they both conferred with the premier about petitioning the emperor. Troops were sent to pursue and catch the outlaws.
*
As to Li Kui and Yan Qing they reached a village called Four Willows. It was already late in the day, and they approached a large manor and knocked on the gates. They were ushered to a thatch-roofed hall, where Squire Di, who owned the manor, received them. He saw the buns of hair on Li Kui's head, but observed that he was not wearing a Taoist gown and was very ugly. Not knowing what to make of him, the squire addressed himself to Yan Qing.
"Where does this reverend come from?"
Yan Qing laughed. "He's a strange person. None of you have ever heard of him. We'd like something to eat, and to spend the night. We'll leave in the morning."
Li Kui didn't speak. The squire kowtowed before him.
"Help me, Reverend," he pleaded.
"What do you want me to do? Tell me frankly."
"There are over a hundred people in this household, including my wife and my twenty-year-old daughter. For the last six months the girl has been possessed by a spirit. She never leaves her room, and doesn't even come out to eat. If anyone tries to go near her, he's showered with bricks and stones. Many of us have been hurt. We've had the magistrate down several times, but he's never been able to catch the spirit."
"Squire, I'm a disciple of Abbot Lou of Qizhou. I know how to ride the clouds and capture demons. If you don't mind spending a bit, I'll nab him for you tonight. I'll need a pig and a sheep, first, for sacrifice purposes."
"We've got all the pigs and sheep you want, to say nothing of wine."
"Pick a couple of fat ones, and slaughter and roast them, and bring them here. I need also a few bottles of good wine, to make my arrangements. Tonight, at the third watch, I'll capture your spirit."
"If you want any written prayers or paper paraphernalia, Reverend, I have some."
"I've got my own magic. I don't need any of that friggin stuff. I'll just go to her room and snatch him."
Yan Qing could barely restrain his laughter. The squire had nothing but praise for Li Kui.
By midnight the roasted animals were laid out in the hall. Black Whirlwind called for a large bowl, and lined up a dozen bottles of heated wine. He lit two candles and ignited good incense in a burner. Then he dragged over a bench and sat down in the middle. But instead of reciting prayers, he pulled out one of his axes, hacked open the pig and sheep, and proceeded to tear off large chunks and eat them.
"Join me, young Prodigy," he said magnanimously.
Yan Qing only smiled coldly, and Li Kui continued gorging until he was full of meat and had consumed five or six bowls of fin wine, to the astonishment of the squire.
"Share this bounty with me," Li Kui said to the squire's vassals. In the twinkling of an eye he handed out the remaining meat. "Bring a bucket of warm water. I want to wash my hands and feet," he directed.
His orders were soon obeyed. After completing his ablutions, he demanded tea from the squire and said to Yan Qing: "Have you eaten yet?"
"I've had plenty," Yan Qing replied.
"We've finished the wine and meat, and tomorrow we must be on our way," Li Kui said to the squire. "We lords are going to sleep now."
"But this is terrible," cried the squire. "When are you going to catch the spirit?"
"You really want me to do that? Then lead me to your daughter's room."
"But that's where the demon is. Bricks and stones come flying out. Who dares to go!"
Li Kui grasped his two axes and directed men to stand with torches at a distance and light his path. He strode up to the house. It was faintly illuminated inside by a lamp. He peered in. A young fellow was holding a girl in his arms and they were talking.
With one kick the Black Whirlwind burst open the door and charged in swinging his axes. The lamp seemed to leap into a thousand slivers of light, shattered by Li Kui's blow. They young man tried to flee. Li Kui yelled, and hacked him down. The girl plunged under the bed and hid. Li Kui cut the man's head off, carried it over to the bed, and rapped on the frame with his ax.
"Come out, quick, woman. Otherwise I'll chop you and this bed to pieces."
"Spare me, I'll come out!"
No sooner had the girl poked her head out than Li Kui grabbed her by the hair and pulled her over beside the corpse. "Who is this fellow I've killed?" he demanded.
"Young Wang, my lover."
"Where did the bricks come from, and the food you ate?"
"I used to give him my gold and silver hairpins, and he would slip over the manor wall late at night and buy things."
"You filthy slut, what use are you!" Li Kui dragged her to the bed and cut her head off. He tied the two heads together by their hair, then placed the bodies side by side.
"I had a full meal. I need some exercise to help digest it." He stripped to the waist and flailed the two bodies with his axes as if he was drumming. Li Kui grinned. "That pair won't come back to life."
He stuck his axes into his girdle, picked up the heads, and returned to the hall. "I've caught two demons," he shouted, flinging down the heads.
The whole manor, astonished, gathered round to stare. They recognized the squire's daughter, but they didn't know who the other head belonged to. Finally, one of the vassals spoke.
"He looks something like Young Wang the bird-catcher from East Village."
"You've got sharp eyes," said Li Kui.
"How did you find out, Reverend?" asked the squire.
"Your daughter was hiding under the bed. I hauled her out and questioned her. She confessed he was her lover, Young Wang. Their food, he used to bring in. After I got all the information, I took action."
The squire wept. "Reverend, you should have spared my daughter."
"Stupid old ox! Your daughter takes a lover and you want me to spare her! Instead of thanking me, you weep and blame me. I'll settle with you tomorrow."
Yan Qing found a room, and he and Li Kui retired.
The squire led a group of people with lanterns and candles into his daughter's room. They saw the dismembered parts of the headless bodies scattered all over the floor. The squire and his wife wept distractedly. They ordered that the bodies be taken to the rear and burned.
Li Kui slept until daybreak. He jumped out of bed and sought the squire.
"Yesterday, I caught the spirit for you. Why don't you show your thanks?"
Squire Di had no choice but to wine and dine him. After Li Kui and Yan Qing finished eating, they left. The squire went back to managing his manor.

On departing from Four Willows Village Li Kui and Yan Qing set out again along the road. This time of the year the grass was withered and the fields denuded, branches had fallen and the hills were empty.
The journey was uneventful. They continued in a wide detour towards the northern end of Liangshan Marsh. They were still seventy or eighty //from the stronghold, not far from the town of Jingmen. The mountain was not yet in sight, and it was growing late. They went up to a large manor, knocked on the gate, and asked for shelter.
"Why don't we find an inn and put up there?" said Yan Qing.
"We're much better off with a leading family like this," Li Kui retorted.
Before the words were out of his mouth, the vassal returned and said: "My master the squire is very distraught. You two had better rest someplace else."
Li Kui barged right in and headed for the thatch-roofed hall. Yan Qing was unable to restrain him.
"Passing travellers ask to spend the night," Black Whirlwind bellowed. "What's so friggin important that it's got your squire all upset! I want to speak to him."
The squire, peering out, saw how fierce Li Kui looked. He sent a man to invite him to a wing of the hall. There, a side room was provided for the two visitors. Later, a meal was served, after which they went to bed.
Not having had any wine, Li Kui couldn't sleep. As he tossed and turned on the earthen kang, he heard the squire and his wife, in the adjoining room, weeping and sobbing. Thoroughly irritated, Li Kui didn't close his eyes a minute.
When at last it was light, he jumped out of bed and strode to the front of the hall. "Who was crying all night and preventing this lord from sleeping?" he demanded.
The squire heard him, He came out and explained: "We have an eighteen-year-old daughter and someone has taken her. That's why we're upset."
"Stupid old ox. All boys and girls must marry when they reach a certain age. What's there to be upset about?"
"We don't agree to the match. He snatched her away by force."
"More funny business! Who is the man?"
"When I tell you you'll fart and pee in your pants with terror. He's the supreme commander of Liangshan Marsh, Song Jiang. One hundred and eight bold fellows are the chieftains there, and they have a considerable army."
"What I want to know is how many of them came here?"

"Two days ago, their leader arrived with a young fellow, both riding horses."
Li Kui called Yan Qing over. "Listen to this old man. It seems our Big Brother says one thing and does another. He's not a good person."
"Big Brother wouldn't commit wrong. I'm sure there's nothing in this."
"Didn't he go to the house of that Li Shishi in the Eastern Capital? Why wouldn't he pull something dirty here?" Li Kui turned to the squire. "You've got food in your manor. We want to eat. I'm Li Kui the Black Whirlwind of Liangshan Marsh. This is Yan Qing the Prodigy. If Song Jiang has taken your daughter, we'll bring her back."
The squire kowtowed his thanks.
The two returned to the mountain fortress. The trip was without incident. They went directly to Loyalty Hall, where Song Jiang received them.
"Where have you been, brothers," he queried. "You must have lost your way many times to be coming back only now."
Li Kui glared. Without a word he took his axes and cut down the apricot-yellow banner inscribed with "Act in Heaven's Behalf and ripped it to shreds. Everyone stared in amazement.
"What are you doing, you swarthy rogue?" Song Jiang shouted. Axes in hand, Li Kui charged across the hall towards Song Jiang. Guan Sheng, Lin Chong, Qin Ming, Huyan Zhuo and Dong Ping hurriedly blocked him, wrenched away his axes, and hustled him to the lower end of the chamber.
"That oaf is acting up again," Song Jiang cried angrily. He turned to Black Whirlwind. "Tell me, what have I done wrong?"
Li Kui was speechless with rage. Yan Qing stepped forward and related what had transpired from the time they left the Eastern Capital to their arrival at the manor near Jingmen.
"Squire Liu told us that two days ago Song Jiang and a young companion rode up to the manor," Yan Qing continued. "When he heard that they were men who acted in Heaven's behalf, he ordered his eighteen-year-old daughter to serve them wine. They ate and drank far into the night, then ran off with the daughter. Brother Li Kui, hearing this story, believed it to be true. I kept telling him: 'Big Brother isn't that kind of a person. Somebody must be impersonating him, and misbehaving in his name.' But Brother Li said: 'I saw him in the Eastern Capital hanging around that hussy Li Shishi like he couldn't bear to part. Of course he's the man.' That's why he's so furious."
"You've got it all wrong about Li Shishi. I didn't realize," Song exclaimed to Li Kui. "Why didn't you say something?"
"I considered you a chivalrous man. Who'd have thought you were such an animal! Imagine doing a thing like that!"
"Listen to me: I came back in the company of three thousand cavalry. If two horsemen dropped out, everyone would have noticed. And if I captured a woman, she'd be here in the stronghold. You can search my house, goon!"
"That's friggin nonsense, brother, and you know it. Every man in the fortress is under your command, and most of them would cover for you. She could be hidden anywhere. I used to respect you for not being a skirt-chaser. Actually, you're crazy about wine and women. Your killing of Yan Poxi was just a little show. The real thing was when you lusted after Li Shishi in the Eastern Capital. Don't try to deny it. Return his daughter to old Squire Liu, and we can still come to terms. If you don't, sooner or later I'll kill you."
"Take it easy. Squire Liu isn't dead yet, and all his vassals are still there. I'll go and confront him. If he identifies me as the man, I'll stick out my neck for your ax. If he says I'm not the culprit, what should your penalty be, disrespectful varlet?"
"If I can't pin this on you, you can have my head."
"Good. All you brothers are witnesses." Song Jiang directed Ironclad Virtue Pei Xuan to write out two orders of execution as pledges for the bet, and each man signed one. Song Jiang handed his pledge to Li Kui. Black Whirlwind gave his to Song Jiang.
"That young fellow the squire spoke of must be Chai Jin," said Li Kui. "It can't be anyone else."
"I'll go too, then," said Chai Jin.
"That you will, never fear. If the squire identifies you, you'll get a taste of my axes, too, lord or no lord!"
"That's all right with me," said Chai Jin. "You go first and we'll follow, so there won't be any funny business."
"Right," said Li Kui. He called to Yan Qing. "We'll go on ahead. If they don't come, it's because they know they're guilty. We'll come back and have this out!"
Yan Qing and Li Kui proceeded to the manor. "Any news, bold fellows?" the squire asked.
"Our Song Jiang is coming here today for you to identify him," said the Black Whirlwind. "I want you and your wife and your vassals to take a good look. If it's him, speak up, don't be afraid. I'll be responsible."
A vassal announced: "A dozen horsemen are at the gates."
"That's them," said Li Kui.
While the others waited outside, Song Jiang and Chai Jin entered. They went directly to the thatch-roofed hall and sat down. Li Kui stood to one side with his axes, ready to strike as soon as the old man recognized the culprit. But Squire Liu walked over to Song Jiang and kowtowed.
"Is this the man who kidnapped your daughter?" the Black Whirlwind queried.
Squire Liu opened wide his weak old eyes and examined Song Jiang carefully. "No."
"What do you say to that?" Song Jiang asked Li Kui. "You two gave him a look and scared him. He doesn't dare speak."
"Call his vassals, then, and ask them.'
Li Kui summoned the vassals. In one voice they all said: "He's not the man."
"Squire Liu," said Song Jiang, "I am Song Jiang of Liangshan Marsh. This brother is Chai Jin. Your daughter was probably kidnapped by an impostor. If you find out where she's gone, let our stronghold know. We'll take care of it for you."
To Li Kui he said: "This is no place for us to talk. When you get back to the fortress I'll have something to say." He and Chaj Jin and their escort left first for the stronghold on the mountain.
"A fine mess, brother," said Yan Qing.
"It's my fault for being too impatient. Since I've forfeited my head, I might as well cut it off and have you present it to Big Brother."
"You've no reason to kill yourself. I have a way out. It's called 'Bearing the Thomstick and Requesting Punishment.' "
"What do you mean by 'Bearing the Thomstick'?"
"You remove your clothes, have your hands tied, carry a thomstick on your bare back, and prostrate yourself before Loyalty Hall. You call out: 'Let Big Brother beat me as he will.' Of course, he won't have the heart. That's 'Bearing the Thomstick and Requesting Punishment.' "
"Not bad, but it's kind of embarrassing. I'd rather cut my head off and get it over with."
"All of us in the stronghold are your brothers. Who would laugh at you?"
Reluctantly, Li Kui returned with Yan Qing to the fortress.
Song Jiang and Chai Jin reached Loyalty Hall first. They were just talking about Li Kui with the other chieftains when they saw him approaching. He was buff naked, and on his back he bore a thomstick. He knelt mutely outside the hall, with lowered head.
"Why are you bearing a thomstick, you swarthy scoundrel?" Song Jiang smiled. "Do you think that way I'll have to let you off?"
"I was wrong. Take this big stick and beat me, brother."
"I bet against your head. Why bring me a thomstick?"
"If you won't forgive, brother, cut my head off. It will be what I deserve."
The chieftains all apologized on Li Kui's behalf. "I'll forgive him on one condition: that he capture the two impersonators and find Squire Liu's daughter and bring her home."
Li Kui jumped to his feet. "I'm off. It'll be as easy as catching turtles in a jug. I only have to put out my hand."
"There are two of them, and they're mounted. You're all alone. How are you going to get near them? Take Yan Qing along."
"I'll be pleased to go, brother, if those are your orders," said Yan Qing.
He went to his quarters and got his bow and a staff as tall as his eyebrows. With Li Kui he went once again to the manor of Squire Liu.
Yan Qing questioned him carefully. "They came when the sun was in the west," said the squire, "and left at the third watch. I don't know where they went. I didn't dare follow. The leader was short, thin, and dark-complected. The other was a big strong fellow, with a short beard and large eyes."
The two chieftains queried further, then said: "Don't worry, squire. We're going to return your daughter to you, come what may. Our Big Brother Song Jiang has ordered us to find her, and we must obey."
They asked for boiled meat and steamed muffins and put these in ration bags which they slung across their shoulders. Leaving the manor, they first searched due north. It was a desolate area, devoid of human habitation. In two days they found not a trace of their quarry.
Next they tried the east. A two-day search proved fruitless, though they ranged as far as Gaotang in Lingzhou Prefecture. Li Kui grew more irritable, and his face was flushed as they turned around and headed west. But in the next two days they again discovered nothing.
That night the two took shelter in an ancient temple at the foot of a hill, and bedded down on the big altar table. Li Kui, too annoyed to sleep, sat up. He heard someone walking by, outside. He jumped down from the table, opened the temple door, and looked. A man with a halberd was staring up the hill behind the temple. Li Kui followed.
Yan Qing, who heard him moving about, took his bow and staff and caught up with Black Whirlwind. "Don't chase him, brother," he said. "I have another way."
It was night, and the moon was hazy. Yan Qing handed his staff to Li Kui. The man was now some distance away, head down, walking rapidly. Yan Qing soon narrowed the gap between them until he was fairly close behind. Fitting an arrow to his bow, he pulled the string tight and let fly, crying. "Bow, don't fail me!" The arrow struck the man in the right leg and brought him down.
Li Kui raced forward, seized the fellow by the collar and hauled him back to the temple. "Where have you hidden Squire Liu's daughter?" he yelled.
"I don't know anything about it, sir," the man replied. "I haven't taken anyone's daughter. I'm only a petty highwayman, doing a very modest business. I wouldn't dare go in for anything big, like snatching a man's daughter."
Black Whirlwind tied the fellow securely and raised his axes menacingly. "If you don't tell the truth I'll cut you into twenty pieces!"
"Let me up and we'll talk this over," the man exclaimed.
"I'll remove the arrow from-you," said Yan Qing. He allowed the man to rise. "Frankly, now, who was it who stole Squire Liu's daughter? Though you're only a highwayman, you must have heard something."
"I'm only guessing, I don't actually know. But about fifteen //northwest of here is a place called Ox Head Mountain, and on it is an old Taoist temple. Recently, two tough characters, one named Wang Jiang and the other Dong Hai, both minor bandits in the greenwood, killed all the priests and acolytes in the temple, and moved in with their gang. There are only six or seven of them. They specialize in robbery and plunder. Wherever they go, the leader calls himself Song Jiang. My guess is that the two chiefs have taken the girl."
"There's reason in what you say," Yan Qing averred. "Don't be afraid of us. I'm Yan Qing the Prodigy of Liangshan Marsh, and this is Black Whirlwind Li Kui. I'll treat your arrow wound, and you lead us to where those two are staying."
"All right," said the man.
Yan Qing returned his halberd and bound his wound. Then, in the light of the hazy moon, supported by Yan Qing and Li Kui, the man conducted them along the road for fifteen //. They came in sight of the mountain. It wasn't very high, and did indeed resemble a reclining ox with its head on the ground.
As the three began climbing, the sky was not yet light. At the top they found an area enclosed by an earthen wall. Within was a moderately sized building of about twenty rooms.
"I'll go in and have a look," said Black Whirlwind.
"Better wait till daylight," Yan Qing advised.
But Li Kui had no patience. He jumped over the wall. Someone shouted. The door of the house opened, and a man with a halberd rushed out and charged Li Kui. Afraid that their rescue operation would be ruined, Yan Qing, holding his staff, also leaped the wall. The wounded highwayman streaked away like a wisp of smoke.
Yan Qing crept up to the bruiser who was fighting with Li Kui and cracked him on the cheekbone with his staff, knocking him into Li Kui's arms. With one whack of his ax on the fellow's back, the Black Whirlwind felled him to the ground. Not another person emerged from the building.
"There must be a rear exit," said Yan Qing. "I'll guard the back door and you watch the front. Don't go blundering in."
Yan Qing hid in the darkness beside the rear gate of the wall. He saw a man open the back door of the house and approach the rear gate with a key in his hand. Yan Qing advanced to meet him. The man spotted Yan Qing and skirted around the house towards the front.
"Stop him," Yan Qing yelled.
Li Kui dashed up and planted his ax in the man's chest. He cut the heads off the two bodies and tied them together. His blood lust aroused, he charged into the building, bowling men over like clay idols. Several of them cowered beside the stove. With one blow of his ax each, the Black Whirlwind dispatched them all.
In a room in the center of the building, sure enough, they found the girl, sobbing on a bed. She had misty hair and a flowery complexion. An alluring beauty.
"Aren't you Squire Liu's daughter?" said Yan Qing. "I am," the girl replied. "About ten days ago two robbers brought me here, and took turns ravishing me every night. I wept constantly and wanted to kill myself, but they watched me very closely. Now you two generals have saved me. You're like my father and mother reborn."
"Where are their two horses?"
"In the east wing."
Yan Qing saddled the animals and led them out. He collected the gold and silver hidden in the house—about five thousand ounces—and told the girl to mount. He wrapped up the money and tied it, along with the two heads, on the other beast.
Li Kui twisted grass into a torch, lit it on a lamp below a window of the building, and set the thatched roof afire from four sides. Then they pushed open the wall gate, escorted the girl down the mountain, and delivered her to the manor.
Her parents were overjoyed. All their cares vanished. They couldn't kowtow and thank the two chieftains enough.
"Don't thank us," said Yan Qing. "Go up to the fortress and thank our Big Brother Song Jiang."
The two refused the wine and food offered. They mounted the horses and hastened back to the stronghold. By the time they traversed the three fortified passes the rising sun was just crimsoning the rim of the mountains. They led the animals, laden with gold and silver and the two heads, directly to Loyalty Hall. Yan Qing reported to Song Jiang what had transpired.
Very pleased, Song Jiang ordered that the heads be buried, the gold and silver placed in the treasury, and the horses cared for with the rest of the cavalry steeds.
A feast was given the next day to congratulate Yan Qing and Li Kui. Squire Liu brought gold and silver to Loyalty Hall and tried to present it to Song Jiang in thanks. But Song Jiang would have none of it. After the wining and dining, he told the squire to take the money back with him to the manor.
Of that we'll say no more. A period of peace settled upon the mountain fortress.

*

Time passed quickly. Soon the willows were gosling yellow, gradually the river waves were a turquoise green. The cheeks of the peaches glowed pink, the faces of the apricots showed a faint smile. On the mountain front and rear, flowers began to sprout, branches started to bud. Life returned to the duckweed on the ponds and the reeds along the shores. It was a time of grain rains and clearing skies, of the mellow, comfortable weather of the third lunar month.
As Song Jiang was quietly seated one day, he saw a group of men being led up from below the pass under armed escort. An outlaw arrived first and reported: "We've captured some fellows who are built like oxen. They have seven or eight handcarts and a number of staves."
The captives—big, hulking men—knelt at the lower end of the hall. "We're from Fengxiang District," they said, "and we're on a pilgrimage to Tai'an Prefecture to burn incense. The twenty-eighth of this month is the anniversary of the birth of the Emperor of Heaven. We're also going to take part in the staves contest. It lasts for three days, and there'll be hundreds of competitors. This year the famous wrestler Ren Yuan of Taiyuan will be there. He's ten feet tall and calls himself the Sky-Supporting Pillar. 'No one can match me,' he boasts. 'I'm the best wrestler in the world.' We hear he's been undefeated in the temple fair contests for the past two years, and has won some valuable prizes. He's put up an announcement, offering to take on all comers. We thought we might see him in action, and also pick up a few pointers on fighting with staves. Pray, great chieftain, favor us with your benevolence."
Song Jiang summoned a junior officer. "Take these men down the mountain at once. They're not to be harmed. From now on, you're not to frighten persons on their way to burn incense in temples or returning. Let them pass freely." The travellers kowtowed and thanked Song Jiang for sparing their lives, and departed.
Yan Qing then approached and said a few brief words. And as a result, all of Tai'an Prefecture was alarmed, and the county of Xiangfu was thrown into turmoil. Truly, two tigers battled in the Temple of the East Sacred Mountain, a pair of dragons fought in Jianing Hall.

When Iron Ox charged out of the inn brandishing his two axes, intending to rush the city wall and batter down the gate, the Prodigy grabbed him by waist and thigh and with a single deft movement threw him on his back. He then dragged him to his feet and set off down a narrow lane. Iron Ox had no alternative but to follow.
But why should this Iron Ox be scared of the Prodigy? Because the Prodigy was the world's greatest exponent of unarmed combat, that's why. It was for this reason that Song Jiang had left him in charge of Iron Ox. If Iron Ox hadn't followed him, the Prodigy would have used unarmed combat on him again. Iron Ox was well aware of the Prodigy's skills and feared them, so he had to do as he was told.
They dared not follow the main road for fear of pursuit. If the government troops caught up they would not be able to hold them off. So they had to make a wide detour. Iron Ox had dressed again and concealed the two axes inside his robe. Because he had no headgear he had parted his light brown hair and tied it in two pigtails.
They walked until daylight. The Prodigy had some money with him, so they bought wine and food at a village inn. Then they were off again.
When day dawned in the Eastern Capital the city was in turmoil. Marshal Gao had led his troops out of the city but failing to find anyone they returned. Lily pretended to know nothing, and Marshal Yang had gone home to recuperate. When the casualties were counted there were found to be four or five hundred wounded and countless numbers injured by trips or falls. Marshal Gao together with President of the Military Council Tong Guan met at the Grand Preceptor's to discuss matters and it was proposed that troops should be mobilized at once for a campaign against the bandits.

Meanwhile Iron Ox and the Prodigy had reached a place called Four Willows. It was getting late, so they approached a large manor and knocked at the gate. They were admitted to the thatched hall. Squire Di, the owner, came out to receive them. When he saw Iron Ox had pigtails, but was not wearing a Taoist robe and moreover had a very uncouth look about him, he could not make out what kind of person he had to do with. "Where does this Taoist come from?" he asked the Prodigy.
"The Master is a most unusual person," the Prodigy answered with a smile. "You don't know him. But don't worry, so long as we get something to eat and lodging for the night, we'll be off first thing in the morning." Iron Ox said nothing. Nevertheless, the Squire prostrated himself before Iron Ox, saying: "Master, I beg you to help me!"
"How do you want me to help? Speak up!" said Iron Ox.
"There are more than a hundred persons in my household, besides my wife and daughter," said the Squire. "I only have the one daughter. She has just turned twenty. Six months ago she suffered an enchantment. Ever since that time she stays in her room and won't come out even for meals. If anyone goes to fetch her she throws bricks and stones at them. Everyone in the household has been injured by her. We've had the priests here time after time, but they haven't been able to subdue her."
"Well, Squire, I am a disciple of the Blessed Sage of Jizhou," said Iron Ox. "I can ride the clouds and mount the mists and I'm an authority on catching demons. Provided you're not stingy, I'll trap this devil for you tonight. All I want right now is a pig and a goat for sacrifice."
"We've got pigs and goats all right," said the Squire. "And plenty of wine too, of course."
"Then choose some good plump beasts for slaughter and cook them up," said Iron Ox. "We'll also need quite a few bottles of good wine. Get it all organized and I'll catch the devil for you in the third watch."
"If you need some volumes of incantations, Father, we have those too," the Squire said.
"My method is quite simple, it doesn't involve any fucking spells," said Iron Ox. "I just walk straight into the room and chuck the devil out."
The Prodigy could scarcely contain his laughter. The Squire took Iron Ox at his word and made lengthy preparations. When the pig and goat were cooked the food was laid out in the hall. Iron Ox called for ten big bowls and ten bottles of well-warmed wine. After the first round he lit two big fat candles and burnt some good incense in a container. Then he grabbed a stool and seated himself in the midst of it all. Wasting no time on prayers or spells, he took out an axe and began carving up the meat, tearing off great chunks and eating them. He invited the Prodigy to partake: "Come on, young feller-me-lad, why don't you join me?"
The Prodigy with a disdainful smile refused. Iron Ox ate his fill and polished off five or six bowls of wine, to the Squire's amazement. Then he called to the retainers: "You lot can come and finish it off." It was only a matter of minutes for him to hand out the remaining meat. Then he said: "Now bring me a bowl of hot water to wash my hands and feet, double quick." As soon as that was done he asked the Squire for tea. To the Prodigy he said: "Well, have you eaten or haven't you?"
"I'm quite full, thank you," the latter replied.
Iron Ox said to the Squire: "I've drunk and eaten my fill, tomorrow we'll be off, now it's time for bed."
"Oh dear!" said the Squire. "When are you going to catch the devil?"
"If you really want me to catch the devil, get someone to take me to your daughter's room."
"But if Your Reverence goes in there and the bricks start flying, no one will dare go in to help!"
Iron Ox picked up his two axes and told the servants they could stand at a safe distance with their torches and light him on his way. He strode up to the door. A lamp was burning faintly inside. Peering in he could make out a youth and a young girl in intimate converse, embracing each other. He kicked down the door and flourished his axes. Flames scattered in all directions and there was a loud crash. He had knocked over the lamp. The youth tried to run for it but Iron Ox let out a roar and felled him. The girl dived under the bed and hid. Iron Ox cut the man's head off with one blow and threw the body on the bed. Then he tapped with his axe on the side of the bed and shouted: "Come out quick! If you don't I'll chop this bed to pieces!"
The girl cried out hurriedly: "If you promise to spare my life I'll come out."
The moment she poked her head out Iron Ox grabbed her by the hair and dragged her over to the dead body. "Who is this bugger I've just killed?" he asked her.
"It's my lover, young Wang," she sobbed.
"Where did you get the bricks and the food from?" he asked.
"I used to give him money, and he climbed in over the wall at night," she said.
"What filthy bitches women are, I don't see the use of them!" he said and pinning her down on the bed he chopped off her head. He tied the two heads together and then piled her corpse on top of her lover's and said: "That's it, that'll do me! No more hunger to appease now." He loosened his top clothing, picked up his axes and surveyed the scene with the two corpses. It looked as if lightning had struck. Iron Ox laughed and said: "Obviously these two were not meant to live." He stuck his axes in his belt, picked up the heads and shouted across to the hall: "I've caught two demons!"
When he threw down the two heads in front of them everyone in the manor had a shock. They recognized one head as belonging to the Squire's daughter, but no one knew the other. Then one of the retainers began to have an inkling: "It looks a bit like young Wang the birdcatcher from Eastside," he said.
Iron Ox said: "You've got good eyes!"
"How do you know he's right, Master?" the Squire asked.
"When I dragged your daughter out from under the bed and questioned her, she said it was her lover young Wang and he was the one who brought the food she had been eating. I investigated thoroughly before I took action."
"But Master, you might have spared my daughter!" said the Squire tearfully.
Iron Ox scolded him saying: "You stupid old fool! Your daughter has a secret lover and you think she should be allowed to live? If you go on crying like that, I shall think you're ungrateful. I'll have something to say to you about this in the morning!"
The Prodigy had found a room and he and Iron Ox retired to bed. The Squire had lamps lit and went to the daughter's room. When he saw the two headless corpses cut into a dozen pieces, he fainted. Later he and his wife, bitterly lamenting, had the bodies taken to the back and went to burn paper offerings.
Iron Ox slept till daylight. Then he leapt up and said to the Squire: "Last night I cast out the devils for you, aren't you going to show your gratitude?" The Squire had to arrange wine and food for them. After eating, Iron Ox and the Prodigy departed. Squire Di set about arranging his affairs. Of him no more.
Iron Ox and the Prodigy left Four Willows and resumed their journey. Because of the season the grass was withered and the land desolate, the leaves had fallen and the hills were bare. Nothing occurred on the journey. Because they had made such a big detour they were approaching Mount Liang from the north. They were still about twenty-five miles away, somewhere near Thorngate. In the evening they came to a big manor and knocked on the gate. The Prodigy said: "We must find an inn to stay."
Iron Ox said: "This is some big landowner's place. It doesn't look much like an inn to me!"
Before he'd finished speaking, a retainer came out and said: "The master has trouble on his hands. Go and spend the night somewhere else."
But Iron Ox walked right in before the Prodigy could stop him. He went straight to the thatched hall and shouted out: "What's so fucking difficult about giving lodging to some passing travellers? You say your master's got trouble on his hands. Well I've got something to say to this man who's in trouble!"
The Squire was observing them from within and when he saw that Iron Ox was getting worked up he quietly sent someone out to receive them and take them to a little side chamber next to the hall. There they were invited to rest while some food was prepared for them. After a longish wait the food was brought and after eating they retired to sleep. Iron Ox had not had much to drink that evening, and he lay tossing and turning on the stove, unable to sleep. He kept hearing the Squire and his wife moaning and groaning in their room. It irritated him so much he simply could not close his eyes. First thing in the morning he jumped out of bed and went to the hall. "What sort of place is this?" he asked. "Someone was crying all night, I didn't sleep a wink."
The Squire was obliged to provide an explanation. "We have a daughter, just eighteen, and she's been abducted. That's why we're so upset."
"That's a strange tale," said Iron Ox. "Who has taken her?"
"If I tell you his name you'll be so scared you'll shit yourself!" said the Squire. "It's Song Jiang, the leader from the Marshes of Mount Liang! And there's a hundred and eight commanders there, not to mention troops!"
"Tell me," said Iron Ox. "How many of them was it came here?"
"He and a young fellow came here a couple of days ago, both of them on horseback ."
Iron Ox called out to the Prodigy: "Hey, young feller-me-lad, do you hear what this old man has to say? Our great leader is a hypocrite, he's not a good person at all!"
"The Leader never acts inconsiderately," said the Prodigy. "This can't be true."
Iron Ox said: "When he was in the Eastern Capital he took himself off to see that courtesan, why shouldn't he get up to something here?" To the Squire he said: "Have you got any food you can give us? I'll tell you the truth. I am the Black Whirlwind from Mount Liang and this fellow is known as the Prodigy. If Song Jiang has taken your daughter, we will go and get her back for you."
The Squire prostrated himself in thanks. When Iron Ox and the Prodigy got back to Mount Liang they went straight to the Ceremonial Hall. Song Jiang asked them: "Where have you two been? You must have lost your way a great many times, to hold you up so long."
Iron Ox refused to answer. He just glared back. Then he went to work with his two axes on one of the apricot yellow banners, cutting the words "To Do Heaven's Will" into little pieces. The company were shocked. Song Jiang asked: "What's the matter with the black beast?" Iron Ox strode up the hall, axes in hand, to confront Song Jiang. The poem says:

In the Marshes of Mount Liang none harbours an ill intent,
But now in the Hall of Heroes there is a malcontent.
Here comes Iron Ox, in either hand an axe.
Say not the universe a righteous spirit lacks.

Then Scimitar, Leopard's Head, Thunderclap, Twin Rods and Twin Spears hastily intervened, disarming him and shoving him down from the tribune. Song Jiang was furious: "The bastard's acting up again! he shouted. "Tell me what I've done to deserve this!"
Iron Ox took a deep breath but refused to speak. The Prodigy stepped forward and said: "Please let me tell you about what happened to us on the journey. When he came out of the inn with his axes in the Eastern Capital, he wanted to go and break down the city gates, but I wrestled him to the ground and took him away. I said, 'The Leader has left. You can't be crazy enough to do anything on your own.' Luckily he listened to me. We didn't dare take the main road. He didn't have any headgear so he tied his hair in two plaits. When we came to a Squire Di's place at Four Willows they took him for a Taoist priest and asked him to cast out devils. He caught the Squire's daughter having it off with her lover and chopped them to pieces. Next we took the main road west into the mountains. He insisted on making a big detour which took us close to Thorngate. It was getting late so we went to ask a Squire Liu to put us up. Our brother's sleep was disturbed because the old couple were crying all night, so next morning he went and asked them what it was all about. The Squire said that a couple of days before Song Jiang from Mount Liang, together with another young chap, had ridden up to the house. The Squire had heard that Song Jiang was an honourable man and he told his daughter, a young girl of eighteen, to come and serve them wine. After drinking half the night, they grabbed the girl and left.When Iron Ox heard this story he believed it all. I told him over and over again that our leader was not that kind of man. I suggested there might be plenty of impostors who would like to take advantage of his fame to get up to wild tricks. But he kept saying that he had seen how you were infatuated with the singer Lily in the Eastern Capital and couldn't leave her alone, and if it wasn't you who could it be? That's what's got him excited."
Song Jiang said: "How was I to know you'd draw such a false conclusion? Why didn't you say something?"
"I always thought you a man of virtue," said Iron Ox. "But you're just an animal. This is a fine thing you've done!"
Song Jiang shouted: "You listen to me! Two or three thousand troops were with me when I came back here. If even two horses had gone astray, someone would have noticed it. If I had abducted a girl, she'd have to be here in the stronghold. Go to my residence and see for yourself."
Iron Ox said: "Brother, that's a load of fucking crap! Everyone here is under your orders. They'll all protect you. You could have hidden her anywhere! I used to think you were pure and virtuous, but now I know you're just crazy for wine and sex! Killing Yan Poxi was just the beginning. This trip to the Eastern Capital to search out that Lily was true to form. Stop pretending and give the girl back to Squire Liu, then we can talk. If you don't give the girl back I shall have to do something. It may be sooner, it may be later, but I shall kill you."
Song Jiang said: "Stop shouting for a moment. This Squire Liu is still alive, the retainers are there, let's go together and confront him. If I lose this argument, I will bare my neck to your axe. If I don't lose it, what punishment do you think you deserve, you disorderly lout?"
"If I can't make it stick, you can take my head!" said Iron Ox.
"Good, let all the company be witnesses to this," said Song Jiang. He ordered Sterling to write out two copies of a document, one for each to sign. They then exchanged copies.
Iron Ox said: "And that young man who was with you, it's got to be Mr. Chai."
"Then I'd better go along too," said Mr. Chai.
"Of course you'll come," said Iron Ox. "And if you lose you'll have a taste of my axe, I don't care if you're the great Mr. Chai or the great Panjandrum!"
Mr. Chai said: "Fine. You go first and wait for us there. If we were to go first, you'd suspect something."
Iron Ox said: "That's settled then," and called to the Prodigy: "We'll go together, like before. If they don't come, because of their guilty conscience, I won't fail to return and settle the account."
Indeed, as the poem says:

The Sage's deeds invite no breath of blame;
The second in virtue finds reproof no shame.
Only the lowest, blinded by his own nature
Provokes men's wrath but won't accept their censure!

So Iron Ox and the Prodigy returned to Squire Liu's. When the Squire came out to meet them he asked: "How is the business getting on?"
Iron Ox said: "I've got Song Jiang to come here for you to identify him. You and your wife and the retainers must look very carefully. If he's the one, just speak the truth. Don't be afraid of him. I shall give you justice."
At this moment a retainer said: "There's a dozen horsemen approaching the manor."
Iron Ox said: "It's them. Lodge the men and horses to one side, only let Song Jiang and Mr. Chai come in."
The two leaders entered the thatched hall and sat down. Iron Ox stood on one side, fingering his axes, ready to act as soon as the Squire said it was them. The Squire came forward and bowed to Song Jiang. "Is this the one who stole your daughter or not?" Iron Ox asked. The old man screwed up his eyes and stared with all his might. Finally, he said: "No."
"Well?" Song Jiang said to Iron Ox.
Iron Ox said: "It's the way you're looking at him, he's scared of you. He daren't say it was you."
"Then call the retainers to come and identify me."
Iron Ox called in the retainers and they all said in unison: "He's not the one."
"Squire Liu," said Song Jiang, "I am Song Jiang of Mount Liang, and this is Mr. Chai. Your daughter was abducted by someone using a false name. If you can find out who it was, report to us on the mountain and I will ensure you have justice." To Iron Ox he said: "I shan't deal with you here. When you return to the mountain you will receive judgement."
Song Jiang, Mr. Chai and their retinue left first. The Prodigy said to Iron Ox: "What can you do now, brother?"
"It's all because of my hasty temper that I messed it up. Since I've been proved wrong, I'd better just kill myself and you can take my dead body to the Leader."
"What do you want to go and kill yourself for? I'll show you a way out. It's called 'Bearing thorns and pleading for punish-ment'."
"What do you mean by 'bearing thorns'?"
"You take off all your clothes and tie yourself with rope. Then with a branch from a thornbush on your back you prostrate yourself before the high table in the Ceremonial Hall and say: 'Leader, please beat me.' Naturally he won't want to do it. That is what's called 'bearing thorns and pleading for punishment'."
"I suppose that's all right, but it's pretty embarrassing. Wouldn't it be better just to cut my head off and have done?"
"Everyone's your friend in the stronghold. They won't laugh at you."
So Iron Ox had no alternative but to return with the Prodigy to the mountain stronghold, "bearing thorns and pleading for punishment".
Song Jiang and Mr. Chai were already sitting in the Ceremonial Hall, telling the others about the affair with Iron Ox, when the latter marched in, stripped naked and bearing a great thorn branch on his back. He knelt with bowed head before the high table and spoke no word. Song Jiang laughed and said: "You black lout, what have you got that thorn bush for? You won't get off just like that!"
Iron Ox said: "I was wrong. Please take a stick and beat me as many times as you like."
Song Jiang said: "We both wagered our necks. What's the point of coming here with the thorns?"
"If you won't pardon me, get a sword and cut off my head, I've no objection."
Everyone else pleaded for Iron Ox. Song Jiang said: "If he wants to be forgiven, he's first got to go and catch those two impostors and find Squire Liu's daughter and return her to him."
Iron Ox leapt to his feet and said: "Easy as falling off a log!"
Song Jiang said: "There's two of them and they've got horses, how can you ever catch up with them on your own? Get the Prodigy to go with you again."
The Prodigy said: "I'd like nothing better." He went back to his room and got his crossbow and a staff of eyebrow height, and the two of them returned to Squire Liu's.
The Prodigy questioned the Squire closely. The latter said: "The sun was just setting when they arrived and they left in the third watch. I've no idea where they were from and I didn't dare follow them. The chief was quite short, with a swarthy complexion. His sidekick was thickset, with short hair and big eyes."
When they'd taken this in, they said: "Don't worry, Squire. One way or another we'll get your daughter back for you. It's our Leader Song Jiang's orders. We've got to find them, we dare not give up." They asked him for some boiled meat and unleavened bread. Each man put his supplies in a bag which he slung over his shoulder and off they went.

First they headed due north, but the land was desolate and devoid of human habitation. After a couple of days they had seen and heard nothing. Then they travelled east and in a couple of days reached the neighbourhood of Gaotang in Lingzhou province. But there was still no news. Iron Ox was burning with impatience as they turned back west and searched for a couple more days with no result. In the evening they came to an old temple in the mountains and rested in the dormitory. Unable to sleep, Iron Ox got up and sat on the floor. He heard someone walking outside the temple. He jumped up and opened the door and saw a man with a halberd walking along a path that skirted the foot of the mountain behind the temple. He followed him. The Prodigy heard. He picked up his crossbow and his staff and chased after Iron Ox. "Friend Li, stop!" he called. "I've got a better idea."
It was a misty moonlit night. The Prodigy handed his staff to Iron Ox. They could see the man plodding along in the distance, his head lowered. The Prodigy crept up on him and fitted a bolt to his crossbow. With a cry of "Fly true, don't let me down!" he released the bolt, which hit the man in the right leg and brought him crashing down. Iron Ox raced to him and grabbed him by the collar. He dragged him back to the temple and demanded: "Where have you taken Squire Liu's daughter, you rapist?"
"Sir, I know nothing about this," the man declared. "I ain't stolen no squire's daughter. I'm just a local highwayman. It's just small stuff what I do, I don't get involved in nothing big and I'd never think to steal someone's daughter!"
Iron Ox tied him up. Then he took out his axe and shouted: "If you don't confess I shall cut you into a dozen pieces!"
"Let me go and I'll talk," the man said.
The Prodigy said: "Look here, let me treat the arrow wound." He released him and then asked: "Who actually did take Squire Liu's daughter? If you're a highwayman round here, you must have heard some rumours."
The man said: "I can make a rough guess, but I can't say if it's right or not. About five miles northwest of here there's this mountain they call Buffalo Head. In the old days there was a Taoist monastery up there. Recently it's been occupied by two robbers. One is called Wang Jiang, the other is Dong Hai. The two of them's outlaws, what people calls denizens of the greenwood. They killed all them Taoist monks and novices. Then they got half a dozen mates and occupied the monastery, as their base for pillage and plunder. Everyone thinks it's Song Jiang, so most likely it's them two as nabbed the girl."
The Prodigy said: "This story has the ring of truth about it. Now don't be afraid when I tell you that I am Yan Qing, known as the Prodigy, from Mount Liang, and this is Iron Ox, alias the Black Whirlwind. I will take care of that arrow wound of yours, and you are going to lead us to the place."
"That's okay by me," the man said.
The Prodigy went and fetched the man's halberd for him and then bandaged his wound. By the pale light of the moon they walked five miles, supporting the wounded man, till they reached the mountain. It was not especially high, but it did indeed look like a buffalo's head. They reached the top before daylight. Here they found a mud wall surrounding a score of huts.
"I'm going over that wall," Iron Ox said.
"Better wait for daylight before you do anything," said the Prodigy.
But Iron Ox was far too impatient to wait. He scaled the wall, and they heard a lot of shouting inside. Doors opened and a man rushed out and attacked Iron Ox with a halberd. The Prodigy began to fear things might go badly and used his staff to pole-vault over the wall. The man with the wounded leg vanished like smoke.
The Prodigy surreptitiously approached Iron Ox's assailant from the side and struck him a blow to the temple which toppled him into Iron Ox's arms. Iron Ox slashed him in the back with his axe and he fell to the ground. No one else came out. "The buggers must be escaping at the back," the Prodigy said. "I'll block the back door and you watch the front. But don't go rushing in there."
The Prodigy went round to the back entrance of the compound and waited there in the dark. Soon a man appeared with a key and opened a gate in the wall. The Prodigy darted towards him. The man, alerted, shot away under the eaves round to the front. "Watch out in front!" the Prodigy shouted. Iron Ox rushed forward and felled the man with a blow which split him in two. He tied the two heads together. His blood was up now. He burst inside the building and began to smash everything up, like a demented spirit. The rest of the gang were cowering beside the stove. He routed them out and killed each one with a blow of his axe. As expected, in an inner room a girl lay on the bed sobbing. She was a real beauty, with clouds of hair and a brilliant complexion:

Beneath the silken skirts a tiny shoe protrudes;
The white breast more than roses a sweet perfume exudes;
But beauty has no power to check a storm of sighs,
Grief beyond measure clouds the clear pools of her eyes.

The Prodigy said: "You must be Squire Liu's daughter, am I right?"
"I was abducted ten days ago by those two devils," she said. "They brought me here and forced me to sleep with them each night in turn. I wished I could die but they watched me all the time. Now you have come to save me, sirs, it is like a rebirth, you are a second mother and father to me."
The Prodigy said: "They have two horses. Do you know where they keep them?"
"They are in the east wing," she said.
The Prodigy saddled the horses and led them out. Then they collected up all the booty that was stored in the house, four or five thousand taels it turned out to be. The Prodigy bade the girl mount and the gold and silver were packed up and together with the robbers' heads loaded onto the other horse. Iron Ox got a straw torch and lit it from the embers of the stove. Then he set all the thatched huts ablaze. They opened the gate and escorted the girl back down the mountain to Squire Liu's. The parents were overjoyed to see their daughter and came to thank the two leaders for ending their troubles. The Prodigy said: "Don't thank us. You'd better come to the mountain fortress and pay your respects to our leader, Song Jiang." Refusing all food and wine, he and Iron Ox mounted the two horses and galloped back to the stronghold.
When they got there the sun was sinking behind the hills. They passed through the third gate and led the horses loaded with gold and silver and the heads of the brigands straight to the Ceremonial Hall where they paid their respects to Song Jiang. The Prodigy recounted all that had happened. Song Jiang was delighted. He ordered the heads to be buried, the gold and silver to be placed in the treasury and the horses to be stabled with the other war horses and fed well. A banquet was organized to honour the Prodigy and Iron Ox next day. Squire Liu also got together some gold and silver and came up the mountain with it. He entered the Ceremonial Hall and prostrated himself before Song Jiang. Song Jiang would not accept the gift. After regaling the Squire with food and wine he sent him back to his estate. Of him no more.
The days slipped by uneventfully on Mount Liang.
The willows are yellowing, gradually the water takes on the colour of a mallard's head. Peaches produce a mass of pink flowers, red buds start to show on the apricot. This side of the mountain is jewelled with flowers, the other side clad in vegetation: new growth is bursting out everywhere. Duckweed spreads over the water, reeds cover the marshes, all signifying rebirth. April, month of the grain rains, starts fine, glorious weather. The mists have just ended, it's going to be a splendid spring.
One day when Song Jiang was seated in the hall a group of captives was brought up from down below. "We've captured this herd of cattle," his troops told him. "And there's seven or eight carts and some herdsmen too."
The men were proud fierce-looking fellows. They knelt before the tribune and said: "We are all from Fengxiang and we're on our way to worship in Tai'an. It's the festival of the Buddha's birthday and we are going to enter the staff-fighting competition. The festival will last three days and there will be hundreds of contests. There's going to be a chap there called Ren Yuan who's a famous wrestler. He's a very big man and they call him Colossus. He boasts that there is no one in the world who can match him in unarmed combat, and says everyone admits he is the greatest. It's said that he has won the contest at the temple two years run-ning and no one wants to take him on so the prize is not likely to be contested, though he's put up a notice challenging all comers. We are going along because of him. We want to worship at the temple, but we'll also be able to get a look at him and perhaps also pick up a few tricks from him. We hope you'll be kind and set us free."
Song Jiang immediately called a soldier and told him: "Escort these gentlemen down the mountain and see that no harm comes to them. In future if you come upon any worshippers on their way to the temple, don't disturb them, let them go peacefully on their way."
They went away most thankfully. The Prodigy now stood up and made a request. He needed few words. On this much hinges: a disturbance was caused in Tai'an and there was big trouble in Xianfu. Indeed,

At the Temple of the Eastern Peak 2 tigers fight it out,

The Prodigy Yan Qing Cleverly Defeats Sky-Supporting Pillar Colossus in fair fight; Iron Ox Li Kui Plays the Magistrate it in a country court in Shouzhang County & lords it

Although the last of the thirty-six Stars of Heavenly Spirits, Yan Qing was more quick-witted, well-informed, and adaptable than the other thirty-five. He addressed Song Jiang.
"Since childhood I have followed Lu Junyi the Magnate and learned from him the art of wrestling. In all the gallant fraternity, I have never met my match. Now there is a good opportunity. It will soon be the twenty-eighth of the third lunar month. I would like to go, alone, to the competition platform and try my skill against the Sky-Supporting Pillar. If I lose, I don't care if I die in the process. If I win, I'll earn a bit of glory for Big Brother. It's sure to stir up plenty of excitement. Maybe you could send some men to support me."
"I hear the fellow is ten feet tall," said Song Jiang, "as solid as steel, and enormously strong. You're short and thin. I know your technique is good, but how will you ever get near him?"
"His height and huskiness don't bother me. I'm only afraid he won't fall for my tricks. 'In wrestling use strength if you've got, use wiles if you've not,' as the old saying goes. I'm not boasting, but I'm very quick to seize an advantage. I won't necessarily lose to that big lout."
Lu Junyi the Magnate said: "This young Prodigy has indeed been good at wrestling since an early age. Let him go if he wants to. After the contest I'll see to it that he gets back."
"When do you want to leave?" Song Jiang asked Yan Qing.
"Today's the twenty-fourth. I'll bid you farewell tomorrow, brother. The journey will take a day or so. I'll reach the temple fair grounds on the twenty-sixth and spend the twenty-seventh inquiring around. Then, on the twenty-eighth, I'll fight him."
The following day, Song Jiang gave Yan Qing a farewell banquet. He was dressed like a rustic, but he wore embroidered clothes under his simple padded robe. Disguised as a Shandong pedlar, he had a drum-rattle tucked in his sash and carried his merchandise on a long shoulder-pole. The chieftains laughed at his appearance.
"Since you're made up as a pedlar," said Song Jiang, "give us a Shandong pedlar's song."
Yan Qing complied, twirling his drum-rattle in one hand, and beating out rhythm with wooden clappers in the other, giving a very creditable imitation. Everyone laughed. They drank till all were pleasantly mellow. Then Yan Qing took leave of the chieftains and went down the mountain. Crossing at the Shore of Golden Sands, he struck out along the road to Tai'an Prefecture.
Towards evening, as he was looking for an inn to spend the night, he heard a voice shouting behind him: "Brother Prodigy, wait for me!"
Yan Qing rested his carrying-pole and looked. Li Kui the Black Whirlwind was hastening after him.
"What do you want?" Yan Qing demanded.
"You stayed with me twice when I went to Jingmen Town. I saw you leave alone and I was worried about you. So I didn't ask Big Brother's permission, but just sneaked off to keep you company."
"I don't need you. Go on back."
"You're a fine one! I come to help you, and you act like that. I'm friggin well going with you!"
Yan Qing couldn't be ungracious in the face of Li Kui's chivalrous concern. "I don't mind your coming along," he said, "but they'll be celebrating the Emperor of Heaven's birthday and the town will be jammed with people from all over. Many of them might recognize you. I'll let you come on three conditions."
"All right."
"On the road we walk one before and one behind, and when we put up at an inn you're not to leave the door. That's one. Two, when we stop at an inn near the fair grounds you're to play sick. Cover your head with your quilt and pretend to snore. Don't make any other sound. Three, the day of the contest when you stand among the watching crowd, you're not to raise any rumpus. Brother, can you agree to that?"
"Easy! I'll do anything you say."
That night, they slept at an inn. They rose the next day before dawn, paid the bill, travelled a distance, and cooked breakfast.
"You go on ahead half a li, brother," said Yan Qing, "and I'll follow."
There were many people on the road going to the temple to burn incense, or returning. Several talked about the redoubtable Ren Yuan. "For two years he hasn't been beaten at the East Sacred Mountain Temple fair," they said. "This is going to be the third year."
Yan Qing listened. He would remember that. In late afternoon, as he neared the temple, he saw other travellers stopping by the roadside and reading something. He rested his load, pushed through the gathering to the front and looked. Stretched across two upright red poles like an ornate street arch was a pink signboard. On it was written: "Sky-Supporting Pillar Ren Yuan of Taiyuan, Wrestler." In smaller script on either side were the words: "Puncher of the fierce tiger on the South Mountain, kicker of the writhing dragon in the North Sea."
Yan Qing raised his carrying-pole and smashed the board to splinters. Without a word he again shouldered his pole and proceeded towards the temple. Several of the watchers, eager to stir up excitement, flew to Ren Yuan and reported that a man had shattered his signboard in challenge.
Yan Qing caught up with Li Kui and they looked for an inn. The temple fair was very lively. A hundred and twenty trades were all displaying their wares, fourteen to fifteen hundred inns were welcoming guests from many different parts, and a goodly number were full at this festival time. Yan Qing and Li Kui finally found a place at the far edge of the fair grounds. The prodigy rested his load, while Black Whirlwind rolled himself up in a quilt on the bed.
"A pedlar from Shandong come to do some business at the fair, are you, brother?" said the inn attendant. "I wonder if you have enough money for the room?"
"You shouldn't underestimate people," said Yan Qing, in the manner of a country bumpkin. "How much can a little room cost? Even if it were a large room, whatever others give, I can pay the same."
"Don't be offended, brother. This is our busiest season. It's better to have a clear understanding, first."
"This is a business trip. It doesn't matter about me. I can sleep anywhere. But I met this relative from my home village on the road, and he's come down with asthma. I've brought him to your inn so that he can rest. Here are five strings of cash, on account. Go to the kitchen and make us something to eat. I'll give you a tip when we leave."
The attendant took the money and went out to prepare the food. Of that no more need be said.
Not long after there was a hubbub at the inn door, and twenty or thirty big fellows entered. "What room is the man in who smashed the signboard as a challenge?" they asked the attendant.
"We don't have any such person."
"Everyone says he's here."
"We've only two rooms for rent. One is empty. The other is occupied by a Shandong pedlar and his sick relation."
"It's the pedlar who smashed the sign."
"Don't make me laugh! He's a slim young fellow. What use would a challenge from him be!"
"Take us to his room and let's have a look at him."
"It's that room down in the corner."
The men walked over, but the door was locked. They peered in through the window. All they could see was the feet of two men, sleeping. They didn't know what to think.
One of them said: "Since he had the courage to smash the sign and challenge the champion, he's surely no ordinary person. He's afraid someone will try to harm him before the match, so he pretends to be sick."
"That's probably it," the others agreed. "But there's no use guessing. We'll see when the time comes."
By dusk at least twenty or thirty such groups had called at the inn to inquire. The attendant's lips were dry and cracked with denials. That evening, when he brought the two guests their food, Li Kui poked his head out of the bedding.
"Aiya!" the attendant yelped. "The challenger!"
"He isn't the challenger. He's sick," said Yan Qing. "I'm the one who's challenging."
"Don't kid me. Ren Yuan could swallow you in a single gulp."
"You needn't smile. I have a trick that will hand you all a good laugh. When I come back from the match, I'll give you a present."
When the two had finished eating, the attendant collected the bowls and dishes and took them to wash in the kitchen. He didn't believe a word of what the Prodigy had told him.
The next morning, while they were having breakfast, Yan Qing said to Li Kui: "Brother, lock the door and sleep."
He mingled with crowds going into the Temple of the East Sacred Mountain. Located on the slopes of Mount Taishan, it was one of the most lavish and magnificent temples in the world. He wandered around a while, and offered four kowtows when he emerged from a thatched pavilion.
"Where can I find Teacher Ren, the wrestler?" he asked one of the worshippers.
"He instructs two or three hundred pupils in that big inn at the foot of the Welcome Benevolence Bridge."
Yan Qing, arriving at the bridge, found twenty or thirty wrestlers sitting on the railing. Ahead were gold-trimmed pennants and banners, embroidered canopies, and man-high backrests. He entered the inn yard. Ren Yuan was sitting in a pavilion in the center. He was indeed as huge and imposing as a temple guardian idol. Seated sideways on a bed with exposed had chest, he was every inch a tiger killer and mover of mountains as he watched his pupils perform.
One of them softly told him that this was the man who had shattered the signboard. Ren Yuan jumped up and fanned out his elbows.
"Anyone who wants to die this year can come and risk his life at my hands," he announced.
Yan Qing lowered his head and hurriedly departed. He could hear the gales of laughter behind him. He returned to Li Kui, and they drank and dined together.
"All this sleep is suffocating me," Black Whirlwind grumbled.
"Only one more night," Yan Qing consoled him. "Tomorrow's the showdown."
They chatted about various things of no interest to us.

Around the third watch the thud of drums sounded. Worshippers in the temple had commenced burning incense in celebration of the Emperor of Heaven's birthday. At the fourth watch, Yan Qing and Li Kui rose and ordered the attendant to fetch hot water so that they could wash their faces. They combed their hair smooth, removed their padded gowns, wrapped their legs in knee-length bindings, and put on silk trousers, hemp sandals, and a clean shirt each, binding this round the waist with a sash.
"We're leaving our luggage here," they said to the attendant. "Look after it for us."
"Nothing will be missing. Come back soon a winner!"
Staying at the inn were twenty or thirty pilgrims who had come to burn incense. "Think it over, young fellow," they urged Yan Qing. "Why throw your life away?"
"When everyone is cheering my victory, you can collect some gifts for me," the Prodigy replied.
The pilgrims departed for the temple.
"I might as well bring my two axes," said Li Kui.
"You can't do that," said Yan Qing. "If anyone recognizes you it will defeat our main purpose."
They mingled with the crowds and found an inconspicuous place for themselves on one of the temple porches. The grounds were jammed with worshippers. Huge as it was, the Temple of the East Sacred Mountain was soon filled to overflowing. Even the ridges of the roofs were lined with spectators.
Facing Jianing Hall a shed had been erected, and in it were gold and silver trophies and prizes of silks and satins. At the door of the hall five beautiful horses were hitched, all with fine saddles and bridles.
The prefect directed that no more worshippers be allowed to enter the temple, and settled down to watch the wrestling match in honor of Buddha. An old referee, holding a bundle of bamboo rods, mounted the platform outside the hall and worshipped the god. Then he called this year's wrestlers to come forth and contend.
Before the words were out of his mouth a tide of humanity surged forward. Preceded by a dozen staff-bearing guards and four embroidered pennants, Ren Yuan approached seated on a litter. In the van and to the rear were twenty or thirty stalwarts with tattooed arms. Surrounded by a jostling crowd, the procession reached the platform. The referee invited Ren Yuan to step down, and greeted him with a few warm words of welcome.
"I have won the championship at the temple for the last two years and earned a few unmerited prizes," said Ren Yuan. "This year I must fight stripped to the waist."
While he was speaking a man came with a bucket of water. Ren Yuan's disciples were standing around the platform in a dense circle. Their master opened his sash, removed his head kerchief, draped his padded Sichuan silk tunic over his shoulders, and loudly and respectfully hailed the Emperor of Heaven. He drank two mouthfuls of the holy water and discarded the tunic. Admiring cheers went up from thousands of throats.
How was Ren Yuan attired? A topknot done up in red thread crowned his head. He wore a jade green silk tunic fastened at the waist over a shirt with triple rows of jade buttons and trimmed with gold ruffles. His knee-length pants were plated with bronze and had a bronze crotch protector. Iron plates and rings encircled the calves of his legs. His wrists were firmly taped. Kicking shoes shod his feet. This, then, was the Sky-Supporting Pillar, who could lift the seas on earth and conquer the demons below.
"You've been the unrivalled champion here at the temple for the last two years, Teacher," said the referee. "This is the third year. Is there anything you would be willing to say to the assembled worshippers?"
"From four hundred prefectures and regions, from over seven thousand counties, good people come to burn incense in honor of the Buddha. All bring gifts which I have so unworthily won as prizes during the last two years. This year, after making my devotions, I am returning to my country home, and shall not be coming to this mountain again. From where the sun rises in the east to where it sets in the west, beneath the sky where sails the sun and moon, from the land of the barbarians in the south to the remote regions of Yan in the north, is there a man who dares to contend with me for prizes?"
Before Ren Yuan's voice had died away, Yan Qing raised himself up on the shoulders of the men on either side of him and shouted: "Yes, there is!" He flew to the platform across the backs of the throng. The crowd shouted.
"What is your name, young fellow?" the referee asked. "Where is your home? Where have you come from, now?"
"I'm Zhang the pedlar, from Shandong, and I've come especially to challenge him."
"Your end is near, young fellow, don't you realize that? Have you a sponsor?"
"I'm my own sponsor. No one has to be compensated for my life if I die!"
"Strip down and let's have a look at you."
Yan Qing whipped off his head kerchief. His gleaming hair was tied up in a topknot. He took off his straw sandals and squatted by the side of the platform and, unwound his leggings. Jumping up, he removed his shirt and struck a pose.
The turbulent spectators shouted their approval. They were astounded. Ren Yuan, at the sight of Yan Qing's finely muscled body, felt a thrill of fear.
On the Moon Terrace outside the hall sat the prefect, keeping order. Surrounding him, at his beck and call, were seventy or eighty pairs of black-clad police. Yan Qing came down from the platform and approached the terrace. The prefect was favorably impressed by his jade-smooth physique.
"Where are you from, young man?" he asked. "What brings you here?"
"My name is Zhang. I'm a first son, and I hail from Laizhou Prefecture in Shandong. I heard that Ren Yuan has challenged all wrestlers, and I made the trip specially to contend."
"The horse with full equipage over there is my prize. Suppose I give them to Ren Yuan. The trophies in the shed I propose to let you and him share, half and half. I'll also raise you up and let you serve at my side."
"Prefect, I don't care about the prizes. All I want is to dump him and give everyone a laugh, and hear the plaudits of the crowd."
"He's as huge as a temple guardian idol. I doubt if you'll be able to get near him."
"I'll willingly die in the attempt." Yan Qing again mounted the combat platform and faced Ren Yuan.
The referee asked Yan Qing to sign a waiver, then pulled out a list of rules, which he read. "You understand?" he said to the Prodigy. "No dirty tricks."
Yan Qing laughed coldly. "He's loaded with protective gear. I'm wearing only these thin silk pants. How could I do anything?"
The prefect summoned the referee. "That's a splendid young man. It's a pity," he said softly. "Tell him you'll call it a draw, with no need to contend."
Returning to the platform, the referee said to Yan Qing: "I'll let you go back to your village alive, young fellow. I'll declare this contest a draw."
"You're taking too much for granted! How do you know whether I'd win or lose?"
The area was jammed with spectators. Thousands of worshippers lined either side in dense rows like the scales on a fish. People were sitting on every inch of space atop the esplanades and on the roofs, all avidly awaiting the match.
Ren Yuan seethed with hatred. He longed to throw Yan Qing into the clouds so that he would be smashed in the fall.
"Since you're both determined to go ahead," said the referee, "we shall proceed with this wrestling match in honor of the Emperor of Heaven. Be careful and pay attention to the rules."
By this time the early morning mist had dissipated and the sun was beginning to rise. Holding his bundle of bamboo rods, the referee gave final instructions.
"Commence!" he shouted.
It's important to be clear in describing this wrestling-match, with its various moves. Telling it is slow, but things happened as quickly as a meteorite flashing across the sky.
At first Yan Qing only crouched on the right, while Ren Yuan stood on the left like a door god. Yan Qing didn't stir, and the space between them remained empty. Ren Yuan edged around to the right, but Yan Qing only watched the ground on three sides of his rival.
"If that's all he's going to do," mused the champion, "I won't have to move a hand. With one kick, I'll boot him off the platform."
Turning his huge body again and again, Ren grew confused, and his feet stumbled. The Prodigy darted forward, grasped Ren's shoulder with his right hand, his crotch with his left, shoved his shoulder under Ren's chest, and lifted. Five times he spun with his hapless foe, who was dangling, feet in the air, to the edge of the platform.
"Down you go," he yelled, and tossed Ren, head first, to the ground.
This gambit is called the Pirouetting Pigeon. The crowd cheered wildly. Ren Yuan's disciples, seeing their master thrown, knocked over the shed and seized the trophies. Loud quarrels and fist fights broke out among the crowd. Twenty or thirty of Ren's wrestling pupils clambered onto the platform. The prefect hadn't a chance in the world of keeping order.
No one expected that this scene would incense a mighty figure. Li Kui the Black Whirlwind, his strange eyes widening in a glare, watched angrily from the side, bristling like a tiger. He had no weapon, so he pulled up a pine sapling as easily as plucking a scallion and snapped it in two. With one segment in each hand, Li Kui commenced flailing. Some of the spectators recognized him, and called out his name. This brought policemen, who were outside, pouring into the temple.
"Don't let the Black Whirlwind of Liangshan Marsh get away!" they shouted.
When the prefect heard this, he scooted out of the rear of the hall so fast the three souls in his head and the seven spirits beneath his feet vanished With him. Some people crowded around the platform, but most of the worshippers hurried from the temple.
Ren Yuan was lying in a daze at the foot of the platform, barely breathing, when Li Kui reached him. Black Whirlwind pried up a stone slab and pounded Ren Yuan to a pulp. He and Yan Qing battled to the temple gate, where they were met by a hail of arrows. Climbing to the roof of a temple building, they hurled tiles at their assailants.
A clamor arose at the gate, and a body of men fought their way forward. Their leader wore a wide-brimmed hat of white felt and a white silk gown, and carried a dagger at his waist. In his hands was a halberd. It was Lu Junyi, the Jade Unicorn of the Northern Capital. Behind him were Shi Jin, Mu Hong, Lu Zhishen, Wu Song, Xie Zhen and Xie Bao, with a thousand men. Forcing open the gate, they surged in to the rescue.
Yan Qing and Li Kui leaped down from the roof and joined them, and all left together. Li Kui returned to the inn for his axes, and went on a killing rampage. By the time prefectural government troops arrived at the scene, the outlaws were far gone. The soldiers knew that the men of Liangshan Marsh were difficult adversaries, and were afraid to give chase.
Lu Junyi ordered that Li Kui be collected and the return journey commenced. But during a half day's march, they saw no sign of him on the road. Lu laughed.
"That trouble-maker. Someone will have to find him and bring him back to the mountain."
"I'll do it," Mu Hong volunteered.
"Fine," said Lu.

Meanwhile, Li Kui, axes in hand, proceeded to the county town of Shouzhang. The court had just adjourned for the noon recess when he walked up to the gate of government headquarters.
"The lord Black Whirlwind of Liangshan Marsh is here!" he shouted.
The staff of the county office was paralyzed with fright. Theirs was the closest town to the outlaw stronghold, and mothers had only to say "Black Whirlwind Li Kui" to scare crying children into silence. And now, here he was, in person. A terrifying situation!
Li Kui went in and sat down on the magistrate's official chair. "A few of you had better come out and talk," he called. "Otherwise, I'll set fire to the place."
People in the corridor held a hasty conference. They decided they'd have to comply. "He might really do it," they said. Two of their number were selected and sent into the hall.
They kowtowed four times and, still on their knees, spoke. "Since you've come, chieftain, you must have some instructions."
"I don't want to disturb your county. I was passing by and thought I'd stop a while and fool around. Call your magistrate. I want to see him."
"When he heard you'd come, he left through the back door. We don't know where he's gone."
Li Kui didn't believe them. He wandered through the rear chambers, looking for the magistrate, and came upon the clothing wardrobe. He twisted open the lock, took out the official hat, affixed the corner attachments, and put it on. Next, he slipped into the green robe of office, tied the belt, exchanged his hemp sandals for elegant boots, took up the elmwood tablet, and walked back into the hall.
"All you officers," he called, "come in here and see this!" They had no choice but to obey. "How does this outfit look on me?"
"Very appropriate."
"Now, I want you to summon court for me. If you don't, I'll level this town to the ground."
The officers were afraid of him. They called a number of functionaries, who beat three rolls on the big drums with bone and ivory sticks, then all advanced and hailed Li Kui respectfully.
Black Whirlwind laughed heartily. "Now, let two litigants argue their case."
"No litigant would dare to appear before the chieftain."
"Then a couple of you can act the parts. I won't hurt you. It's just for fun."
The functionaries conferred, and picked two jail keepers to play the roles. Local people crowded the gate of the county office to watch. The two litigants knelt at the front of the hall.
"Pity me, magistrate," said the plaintiff. "That man struck me."
"He cursed me, first," retorted the defendant. "That's why I hit him."
"Who is the one who was hit?" Li Kui queried.
"I, sir," said the plaintiff.
"And who is the one who hit him?"
"He swore at me," said the defendant, "so I clouted him."
"The man who did the hitting is a good fellow," said Li Kui. "Let him go. The other is a spiritless lout. Why did he allow himself to be struck? Put a cangue around his neck and parade him before the populace in the street outside the office."
Li Kui rose, fastened the green official gown, tucked the elmwood tablet in his belt, grasped his big axes, and went out to supervise the affixing of the cangue around the neck of the plaintiff. Only after the man was put on exhibition at the county office gate, did Black Whirlwind stride on. He was still wearing the magistrate's splendid clothes and boots. The people who had been watching at the gate couldn't restrain their mirth.
He wandered around the town for a while, and then he heard pupils chanting their lessons. He raised the door curtain of the schoolroom and went in. The terrified teacher leaped out of the window and fled. Pupils wept, screamed, ran, or hid. Chuckling, Li Kui departed. Just outside the door he ran into Mu Hong.
"Everyone has been worried stiff about you, and here you are playing the fool! Come back to the mountain at once!"
Mu Hong dragged Li Kui off without any ceremony. Black Whirlwind was compelled to leave Shouzhang County and return to Liangshan Marsh. Crossing the Shore of Golden Sands, the two arrived at the fortress. Everyone laughed at the sight of Li Kui's attire. Song Jiang was holding a celebration for Yan Qing in Loyalty Hall when Black Whirlwind, enveloped in a green magistrate's robe, discarded his axes, swaggered in, and kowtowed before him, elmwood tablet in hand. As he began his prostrations, he trod on the gown, ripping it, and fell sprawling. The assembled chieftains roared with laughter.
"You've got a nerve, sneaking down the mountain without my permission," cried Song Jiang. "For that, you deserve to die! Every place you go, you make trouble. I'm saying this in front of all our brothers—I won't forgive you the next time!"
Li Kui sang out a respectful acknowledgment, and withdrew.
The succeeding period on Mount Liangshan was uneventful. The men practiced daily with their weapons, the infantry and cavalry maneuvered, the naval forces polished their skills. In each of the forts they busily manufactured more war machines, clothing, armor, blades, bows and arrows, banners and pennants. Of that we'll say no more.

Meanwhile, Tai'an Prefecture had sent a report to the imperial court in the Eastern Capital. The Council for Reports to the Throne had been receiving reports from the various prefectures and counties, and they all were complaints about the depredations of Song Jiang and his forces. The minister decided to present them together.
The day the imperial audiences were to be held, at the sound of the Jingyang Bell all the high officials gathered in the Hall of the Water Clock to await the arrival of the emperor at the morning court. It was a month since the Taoist Sovereign had last conducted such a session.
At three raps of the rod in the imperial ante-chamber, the civil and military officials formed in two bodies at the foot of the golden stairs. The holy ruler appeared. All kowtowed, and the chief of ceremonies called: "If anyone has a petition, let him come forward. If there are none, this court will adjourn."
The Minister of the Council for Reports to the Throne advanced and said: "Our council has received a great many reports from the various prefectures and counties complaining about Song Jiang and his robber chieftains. These brigands openly attack towns and cities, pillage treasuries and granaries, kill soldiers and civilians. They are insatiable, but wherever they go no one seems able to defeat them. If they are not destroyed soon, they will cause tremendous damage. We pray that Your Majesty take appropriate measures."
"Last year at the first Lunar Festival, they raided this capital," said the emperor. "This year they're causing disturbances everywhere, not just in prefectures and shires near their lair. I ordered the Council of Military Affairs to send troops against them, but have not yet received any reports."
Cui Qing, the Inspector General, stepped forward and said: "We hear that in Liangshan Marsh they have a banner which reads 'Act in Heaven's Behalf.' It tends to delude the common people. Because the people sympathize with them, it is not feasible to send troops among them. Moreover, Tartar Liao armies are attacking our borders, and our outposts are not able to cope with them all. It would be very inconvenient for us to divert soldiers at this time to a punitive expedition against the bandits. In my humble opinion, those deperadoes in the mountains, lawbreakers all, have gone into hiding and are committing wicked acts because they have no other way out. If a royal amnesty could be issued, and a high minister, bearing a dispensation of imperial wine and food, could go to Liangshan Marsh and speak kind words and offer the amnesty on condition that they fight against the Liao, both the public and private interests would be served. We pray that Your Majesty take appropriate measures."

"There's reason in what you say," replied the emperor. "It's my approval." He designated Marshal Chen Zongshan as emissary, and directed him to proceed to Mount Liang with the symbolic imperial wine and an amnesty for all. Court was adjourned, and Marshal Chen took the royal decree and returned home to prepare for the journey. And because Marshal Chen went with the amnesty, thousands of weapon blades and armored cavalry covered the mountain, and vast armadas of fighting ships crowded the waterways. Their thunderous clashes flushed out the demons and angered the King of Hell. Truly, fragrant imperial wine turned to stomach-burning gall, a royal pardon led to a declaration of war.

Now although the Prodigy was the last one of the thirty-six, he was in no way inferior in ability and spirit, in the breadth of his experience and knowledge or in his physical strength and brilliance to the other thirty-five. This is how he addressed Song Jiang that day: "Since my earliest days I studied unarmed combat with Mr. Lu, the Unicorn. Among the rivers and lakes I have yet to find anyone who can match me. Here is a wonderful opportunity. It is not long till the festival of the Buddha's birthday. I want to go and join that contest. I can go alone, I don't need anyone to come with me. I shall enter the ring with him and see if I can give him a fall. If I lose and get killed I shall have no regrets. If on the other hand I win, it can perhaps contribute a little glory to your cause. In the event that I win there will certainly be rioting, so then maybe you can send someone to help me out."
Song Jiang said: "My dear friend, I have heard that the man is gigantic, they say he's built like a doorgod and has enormous strength. As for you, you're so small and lightly built, how can you hope to touch him, whatever your skill?"
The Prodigy said: "His size and strength are no problem. My only worry is that he may cheat. As the proverb says: 'In wrestling the strong man uses his strength, the weaker man uses his brains.' I am not trying to boast, but my approach is flexible, I can adapt to circumstances. I'm not likely to lose to some clumsy great oaf."
The Unicorn said: "This protégé of mine was always a brilliant wrestler from his earliest days. Let him do what he wants. Tell him he can go. When the time comes I will go myself to rescue him and bring him back."
"When do you want to go?" Song Jiang asked.
"Today is the twenty-fourth," the Prodigy replied. "Tomorrow I shall bid you farewell and go down the mountain. If I stop for one night on the way I shall arrive at the temple on the twenty-sixth. That will give me the twenty-seventh to look around, and on the twenty-eighth I shall fight him."
Nothing particular happened that day. The following day Song Jiang gave a farewell party for the Prodigy. When he appeared in simple country garb, with just one patched old robe for best wear packed away in his bundle, and got up as a Shandong trader with a rattle in his belt and his wares slung on a long carrying-pole, it raised quite a laugh among the company. Song Jiang said: "Since you're dressed as a trader, you'd better sing us a Shandong trader's song." So, whirling the rattle in one hand and knocking out the rhythm with the bamboo clappers in the other, the Prodigy gave them a rendering of the Happy Trader's Air and produced such an exact impression of someone from Shandong that everyone had to laugh again. When they'd drunk themselves merry the Prodigy bade farewell to the other leaders and went down the mountain. He crossed at Golden Sands Landing and took the road to Tai'an.
It was getting late and he was about to look for somewhere to stay when he heard a shout from behind: "Ho there, young feller-me-lad, wait for me." He paused and put down his carrying-pole. It was Iron Ox. "What have you come for?" he asked.
"You kept me company on two trips to Thorngate," Iron Ox replied. "When I saw you going off all on your own I felt uneasy, so I slipped away without telling the Leader. I've come to give you a hand."
"I don't need you for this," said the Prodigy. "Go back right away."
Iron Ox flared up immediately: "You really are incredible! With the best of intentions I come to help you and you take it amiss. But I'm going with you anyway!"
The Prodigy thought for a moment. He did not want to give offence, so he said to Iron Ox: "You can come, I suppose. But remember it's the Buddha's birthday, there will be visitors there from far and wide and there are sure to be many who recognize you. You can only go with me if you promise to obey me in three things."
"I promise," said Iron Ox.
"We must go separately on the road and when we get to an inn you are to stay put, you're not to go out again, that's the first thing. The second is that when we're staying at the inn you're to pretend to be ill and cover your face completely, pretend to snore. You're not to speak. The third thing, when you join the crowd at the temple to watch the fight, you must make no disturbance. Can you manage all this?"
"No problem. I'll do everything you say."
They found an inn for the night, were up at dawn and after paying for their lodging breakfasted together before setting out. The Prodigy said: "You go first and I'll follow on about a mile behind you."
On the road there was an endless stream of worshippers. They were all talking about the famous wrestler and his skill, how for the last two years he had been unrivalled at Mount Tai and how this was like to be his third year as champion. The Prodigy kept his own counsel. In the afternoon he came upon a group of bystanders standing stock still, their faces all turned in one direction. The Prodigy put down his carrying pole and elbowed his way through the crowd to see what was going on. He saw something just like a local billboard, two red uprights supporting a white notice which read: "Ren Yuan the Colossus, Champion of Taiyuan." Beside this were two rows of smaller characters: "The strength in his fists affrights the tiger of the Southern Peak, the power of his kick shatters the dragon of the Northern Seas." Having read this, the Prodigy reached for his carrying-pole and demolished the sign with it. Without uttering a word, he picked up his load again and headed for the temple. Among the onlookers there was no shortage of busybodies who flew to report to Colossus that this year there was a challenger.
The Prodigy met up with Iron Ox, who was there ahead of him, and together they went to find an inn. Naturally it was immensely busy at the temple and its environs. In addition to the stalls of hundreds of different trades there were fourteen or fifteen hundred inns filled with worshippers from all over. With the approach of the festival there was scarcely room anywhere, most of the inns being completely full. They had to go right to the edge of town to find a room. After putting down his load the Prodigy took out a quilt and told Iron Ox to lie down and sleep. The waiter came and said: "A Shandong trader, are you? I suppose you've come here for the festival. Can you really afford to pay the price of this room?"
The Prodigy replied, putting on a country accent: "Don't 'ee underestimate people, friend. A tiny place like this, 'tis not reasonable to be charging the price of a big room. But I reckon there's nowhere else to go and I'll have to pay thee what thou asks."
The innkeeper said: "No offence intended, but this is the high season, see. It's best to make things clear at the outset."
The Prodigy said: "I only came here to trade, there's nowt special about it for me. I couldn't find anywhere to stay and I happened upon this countryman of mine on the road and he's fallen ill, that's why I have to ask for a room. I'll give thee an advance of five strings of cash and I'll trouble thee to cook us up something to eat, if thou wilt. Before we leave I'll reward thee well." The innkeeper took the money and went off to prepare the food. Of this no more.
Soon after a hubbub arose at the door of the inn. Twenty or thirty big fellows marched in and asked the landlord: "Which room is he in, the fellow who destroyed the notice and announced his challenge?"
"He's not in my place," said the innkeeper.
"Everyone says he's here," they said.
"I've only got the two rooms. One of them is empty and a trader from Shandong with a sick friend has taken the other."
"That's the one who made the challenge," they said.
The innkeeper said: "Don't make me laugh! That chap is just a weedy little fellow, what could he do?"
"Take us to the room so we can have a look," they said.
"He's in that room," the innkeeper said.
They went to see, but found the door tight shut. They tried peering through the window and were able to make out two men fast asleep on the bed. They couldn't work it out. Then one of them said: "Since he tore up the challenge he must be a worthy opponent. It can't be the little fellow, it must be the other one and he doesn't want people to size him up so he's pretending to be ill."
"That'll be it," said the others. "Anyway, there's no need to guess, we'll know in due course."
By dusk as many as twenty or thirty groups had arrived at the inn to make inquiries and the innkeeper, I can tell you, was hoarse with trying to explain. That evening when he took food in to them he got quite a shock because Iron Ox stuck his head out from under the bedcovers: "Blimey!" he exclaimed. "So this is the bloke wot's going to fight!"
"He's not the one who's going to fight," said the Prodigy. "He's sick. I'm the one who's come here to fight."
"No kidding!" said the innkeeper. "Colossus would have the likes of you for breakfast!"
"'Twere best not to mock me. I know a trick or two, and I shall certainly give everyone something to laugh about. There'll be summat in it for thee too when I come back."
The innkeeper watched them eat and then cleared away the dishes. He went back to the kitchen to wash up, still unbelieving.
Next day when they had breakfasted, the Prodigy said to Iron Ox, "Bolt the door and have a good lie in," while he himself mingled with the crowd and went to take a look at the Temple of the Eastern Peak, which was of course the finest in the world:
This temple is on Mount Tai, the Eastern Peak, which towers over the world: of the five sacred peaks this is the most venerable, the chief power among ten thousand gods. So remote is the summit you imagine the air you breathe there must be ambrosial; the pine-clad peak is ever swathed in cloud and mist. The temple's tiered terraces reach heavenward like the golden bird spreading its wings to fly away; its halls and pavilions rise like the jade hare sitting up ready to bolt. You'll see carved beams and painted pillars, jade tiles and vermilion eaves. From afar the sacred images shine with jewels like ancient imperial regalia; from close to their robes resemble the dress of the first emperors. Here is the Supreme Arbiter of the Nine Heavens, in red silk robes set off by his Immortal's cap; the Lord of the Bright Spirit, too, in his yellow ochre cassock with the jade sash slanting across his shoulder. To the left of the main altar is a chapel dedicated to the ladies; on the right one associated with officials. Three thousand generals in bronze armour to guard the imperial carriage are impressively represented in the hall with closed doors; a hundred thousand ironclad troops protecting their lord line the two corridors. See the pagoda of the Five Peaks, adjoining the quarters of the heir apparent; see the Hall of Peace and Humanity beside the imperial residence. Over there the Hill of the Tombs, where the Judge hands out the seventy-two sentences; and there Temple of the White Mule, where the Earth God regulates the twenty-four powers. You won't miss the Iron-faced Marshal in charge of the fiery pit, with his supernatural powers that never wane; or the general who holds in his hand the five ways of life and death, who manifests himself eternally. Imperial incense is always burning, heavenly messengers hurry about their business delivering divine edicts; at the time for sacrifice, young and old are filled with the desire to gain merit. In the Hall of Peace and Prosperity the incense swirls; at Southern Gate auspicious airs eddy about. Ten thousand pay homage to the Jade Lord: people come from far and wide express their faith in the Benevolent Divinity.
The Prodigy strolled around for a time. At a thatched shrine he prostrated himself four times in homage to the Buddha, and then asked the other worshippers: "Where can I find Instructor Ren Yuan, the famous wrestler?"
One loquacious fellow said: "He's at that big inn beside Benevolence Bridge. He'll be there with two or three hundred students of his." Thither the Prodigy now directed his steps. He found a few dozen students of the pugilistic art sitting on a rail of the bridge. Before them were planted a multitude of banners and streamers and tall embroidered backrests and cushions. He slipped into the inn and saw Colossus sitting in the central court. He was indeed built like a giant and had the ferocious look of a doorgod. He was seated nonchalantly on a bed and his shirt was open to the waist. The whole impression was of someone with the ferocity of the legendary Tigerkiller or the strength of the Mountainmover. He was watching some students working out. There were some there who recognized the Prodigy as the one who had thrown down the challenge and they whispered as much in Colossus's ear. He sprang to his feet and began gesticulating: "This year there is someone who wants to die," he growled. "He's handing me his life on a plate."
The Prodigy lowered his gaze and got out fast. He heard laughter behind him. He returned to his own inn and arranged some food and wine to share with Iron Ox. Iron Ox said: "I'm sick of all this sleeping!"
"Only one more evening. Tomorrow's the day that will sort out the men from the boys!"
They chatted on. Nothing worthy of record was said. Around midnight, drums and gongs began to beat as the worshippers in the temple saluted the Buddha's birthday. About one o'clock the Prodigy and Iron Ox rose and asked the innkeeper for hot water. They washed their faces and combed their hair with care, took off their padded robes, bound their legs and fastened on knee guards and put on silk trousers and hemp shoes. Each attached a clean shirt to his belt. Having breakfasted they called the innkeeper and said: "Keep an eye on our things for us."
The innkeeper replied: "They'll be quite safe. I wish you luck and a speedy return."
There were twenty or thirty worshippers staying at the same inn. They said to the Prodigy: "Young man, why not pour yourself a cup of wine instead of going there to throw away your life?"
The Prodigy said: "If you go along to cheer for me, you can all share something of the victory."
The crowd went on ahead and after they had left Iron Ox said: "I'd better take my two axes along."
"Absolutely not!" said the Prodigy. "It would give people the wrong idea and ruin everything."
Tagging onto a group of people they went to the temple and found themselves a place to wait quietly. The worshippers were really packed in there that day, standing shoulder to shoulder, so that the vast Temple of the Eastern Peak was filled to overflowing. There were even spectators sitting astride the rooftops. Next to the Hall of Secret Scriptures a stand had been put up to hold the prizes, gold and silver vessels and rolls of embroidered silk. Five thoroughbreds were tethered outside, complete with saddles and bridles.
Eventually the worshippers were ordered to stop moving about. The old man who was to referee this year's festival contest mounted the stage, holding two bamboo sticks. After worshipping the Buddha, he invited the contestants to prepare themselves. Before he finished speaking, there was a surge in the crowd and a score of guards with staves marched forward two by two behind four embroidered banners. After them came Colossus, borne on a litter, surrounded by twenty or thirty toughs with tattooed arms. They mounted the stage and the referee invited Colossus to step out while he spoke a few warm words of welcome.
Colossus replied: "Two years running I have come here to Mount Tai and taken first place. These few prizes I got virtually for nothing. This year it seems I shall at least have to strip for action."
As he finished speaking someone came with a bowl of water. Colossus's disciples were sitting beside the stage surrounding it in a dense circle. He first removed his sash and then his headband. He unbuttoned his padded Sichuan robe and shouted out an invocation to the Buddha. He received two mouthfuls of holy water.
Finally he took the padded robe right off and a gasp of admiration went up from a thousand throats.
The master of ceremonies said: "Instructor, you have been uncontested champion here for two years now. This will be the third. Have you a few words for the edification of the public?"
Colossus said: "All you good people have come here from a hundred different provinces, a thousand districts, to celebrate the festival of the Buddha's birthday. You all contribute to the prize, which I have been fortunate enough to win the last two years. When I leave this year I shall not return to the mountain again. Now is there anyone in the universe, from the east where the sun rises to where it goes down in the west, from the lands of the southern barbarians to the northern limits of the civilized world, who dares challenge me for this title?"
Scarcely had he finished speaking when the Prodigy, pressing down on the shoulders of those around him, cried out: "Yes, there is!" He flew to the stage over the backs of the crowd. A murmur spread through the spectators. The master of ceremonies asked: "What is your name, sir, and what your place of origin? Where have you sprung from?"
"I am a trader from Shandong," the Prodigy replied. "And I am here expressly to fight him for the title."
The master of ceremonies said: "My good sir, death is staring you in the face, are you aware of that? Do you have a sponsor?"
"I am my own sponsor," the Prodigy replied. "If I die, no one will demand compensation."
"Then you'd better strip and let us see you," said the master of ceremonies.
The Prodigy removed his cap. His hair was tied in two smooth pigtails. He took off his hemp sandals and bared his legs. Squatting at the side of the stage he unfastened his gaiters and knee guards. He stood up, removed his cotton shirt and struck a pose. Throughout the temple there was a movement like a storm at sea or a river in flood as the crowd burst into prolonged applause. They were dumbstruck. Even Colossus, seeing his opponent's tattooes and his lithe, muscular body felt a tremor of apprehension. Outside the door of the hall the magistrate sat to keep order, surrounded by some eighty guards in black uniforms. He sent someone to call the Prodigy down from the stage to be presented to him. Seeing the beauty of his physique, like a marble pillar inlaid with jade, he rejoiced. "Where are you from, young man?" he asked. "What brought you here?"
The Prodigy said: "My name is Zhang, and I'm the first in my family. I come from Laizhou in Shandong. I heard that Colossus was challenging all comers so I came to fight him."
The magistrate said: "You see that horse over there, complete with saddle and bridle? That is the prize I am giving. Let me give it to Colossus. The other valuable items on the stand I will order to be shared out between the two of you. I am willing to appoint you to my personal staff."
The Prodigy said: "Your Excellency, the prize is not important. All I want is to give him a fall and provide some entertainment for the public and hear their applause."
The magistrate said: "He's such a big man, built like a doorgod, you wouldn't even be able to touch him!"
The Prodigy said: "I'm not afraid to die." He went back onto the stage, impatient to begin the contest. The master of ceremonies asked him first to sign a contract. Then he took out the rules of the contest and read them out. "Do you understand?" he said to the Prodigy. "There must be no cheating."
The Prodigy said with a smile of contempt: "He is fully prepared and equipped. I have nothing but these silk shorts. How can I cheat against him?"
The magistrate now called the master of ceremonies over and said: "This fellow is very young. I feel sorry for him. Go and declare it a draw."
The master of ceremonies returned to the stage and said to the Prodigy: "Young man, save your life and leave this place. I will declare the match a draw."
The Prodigy said: "What makes you so sure I'm going to lose?"
The crowd were all assembled by now: thousands of worshippers had taken up positions on two sides, like fish scale tiles lining the roofs of halls and corridors. They were horrified to think they might be cheated of the spectacle. And Colossus was full of confidence. He couldn't wait to boot the Prodigy off the face of the earth, to grind him to dust.
"Very well," said the master of ceremonies. "Since you both want to fight, let this year's contest in honour of the Lord Buddha proceed. Make sure you abide by the rules."
Now the stage was empty but for the three men. The morning mists had cleared and the early sun was growing warm. The master of ceremonies took up his bamboo sticks and after a final word to both men cried out: "Commence!"
The two contestants moved this way and that. I shall do my best to describe it clearly to you, but what's long in the telling happens in a flash; like shooting stars or a lightning bolt, blink and you've missed it. The Prodigy crouched a little on the right. while Colossus took up an attacking stance on the left. The Prodigy did not give an inch. For the start each man occupied one half of the stage.
When he saw that the Prodigy ceded no ground, Colossus thought to take him on the right, but the Prodigy merely circled round. Colossus said to himself, "The bugger's trying to sneak in behind me. I won't even have to raise a sweat. One kick will be enough to boot him right off the stage." He tried to close in, feinting with his left foot. The Prodigy cried out "No you don't!", and when Colossus lunged he slipped past his left shoulder. Annoyed, Colossus turned round and made another grab for his opponent, who sprang aside and slipped under his right shoulder. It was difficult for the big man to change direction and after three turns his movements were growing clumsy. The Prodigy now rushed in and caught him with his right hand, placing his left hand in his opponent's crotch and shoving one shoulder under his chest to upend him. He whirled around four or five times till he'd swung him to the edge of the stage and then with a cry of "Down you go!" hurled him head first from the ring. This catch by the way is well known — it's called "The Pigeon's Swing".
Simultaneously ten thousand spectators burst into applause. When Colossus's disciples saw their master overthrown they threw down the stand and smashed up all the prizes. Amid the melee some of the disciples rushed onto the stage. In vain did the magistrate try to prevent them. However, someone on the sidelines was beginning to boil over. Iron Ox it was, who when he saw what was happening advanced glaring ferociously and bristling like a tiger. Having no other weapon to hand, he snapped off some pinewood palings, easy as someone pulling chives, and with one in each hand entered the fray.
Now among the worshippers there was someone who recognised Iron Ox and when he spoke out the name the police guards outside the temple all rushed in shouting: "Don't let him get away! It's the Black Whirlwind from Mount Liang!"

When the magistrate heard this name, his three souls seemed to rise through the top of his head while his seven spirits sank through the soles of his feet! He decamped as fast as his legs would carry him. People all around were pushing and shoving as the worshippers tried to save themselves. Iron Ox came upon Colossus lying beside the stage still groggy from the fall and scarcely breathing. He picked up a stone and smashed his skull in. When the two from Mount Liang had fought their way out of the temple, they met a hail of crossbow bolts outside. The best they could do was climb onto the roof where they started ripping off tiles and hurling them.

Before long an even greater tumult arose in front of the temple. A group of men were attacking. Their leader wore a white Fanyang hat and a white robe; he had a sword at his belt and wielded a halberd. It was none other than that hero from the Northern Capital, the Unicorn. Behind him were seven more, the Tattooed Dragon, Mu the Unstoppable, Lu Zhishen the Flowery Monk, Pilgrim Wu Song, Snake and Scorpion, with a thousand men. They charged into the temple. The Prodigy and Iron Ox jumped down off their roof and joined them. Iron Ox rushed back to the inn and got his two axes and came out fighting. By the time the garrison troops arrived the heroes were far away. The troops knew what a tough proposition the Mount Liang forces were and dared not pursue them.

The Unicorn now ordered the others to collect Iron Ox and head for home. But when they had marched half a day, Iron Ox was missing again. "No doubt he's gone to look for more trouble somewhere," said the Unicorn with a laugh. "We shall have to send someone to fetch him back."

"I'll go and fetch him," said Mu the Unstoppable.

"Right," said the Unicorn.

Now we shall leave the Unicorn leading his forces back to Mount Liang and follow Iron Ox who with his two axes in hand had got as far as the township of Shouzhang. Here the local court had been in session and had just adjourned. Iron Ox went straight in, shouting: "Your old friend the Black Whirlwind is here!"

The inhabitants were petrified — too scared even to run away. You see, this place Shouzhang was very close to Mount Liang and the words Black Whirlwind of Mount Liang were commonly used to frighten children with. Now that the gentleman was here in person, naturally they were terrified! Iron Ox went in and seated himself in the magistrate's chair. "Send two people in to talk to me," Iron Ox shouted, "otherwise I will burn the place down!"

Outside in the corridor everyone discussed what to do: "We can send people in to talk to him. But how can we make him go away?"

Two of the officials went in and prostrated themselves four times. Still kneeling, they said: "Esteemed chief, what is your command?"

Iron Ox said: "I have not come to harm the people of this place. I was just passing by, on a pleasure trip. Please ask your magistrate to come here, I want to talk to him."

They went out. When they returned they said: "When he saw you coming His Excellency opened the back door and left. We don't know where he has gone."

Iron Ox did not believe them. He went round to the back to look. "You can see for yourself," they said. "There are his headdress and his robes in that cupboard."

Iron Ox twisted off the lock. He took out the magistrate's cap with its attachments and put it on. He also donned the magistrate's robe and the official belt. He found the black shoes and exchanged them for his own hemp sandals. Then, after picking up the wooden tablet he walked into the courtroom and shouted: "Come here, you lot, I want you!"

There was nothing for it — everyone had to obey.

Iron Ox said: "What do you think of my dress?"

"It suits you very well," they all said.

"You clerks and attendants are going to organize a court session for me, so get on with it," he said. "If you don't do as I say, I shall raze this place to the ground."

They were scared to death, so they had no alternative but to get together the necessary officials, bring out the maces, sound the drum three times and announce the court session. All this provoked loud guffaws from Iron Ox. "You must get two people to plead a case," he said. One of the clerks said: "Great chief, Your Honour, no one would dare to!"

"If there's no one who wants to bring in a case, two of you must invent a case yourselves," he said. "I won't do them any harm, it's just for a laugh."

The officials held a discussion, and two prison officers were chosen to make up a case of assault. The public were let in to watch. The plaintiff and the accused knelt before the bench. The former said: "Have pity on me Your Honour, he hit me." The other said: "He insulted me, that's why I hit him."

"Which one was it that was hit?" Iron Ox asked.

"Me, Your Honour," said the plaintiff.

"And which one did the hitting?"

"He insulted me first, so I hit him," said the accused.

Iron Ox said: "This one who did the hitting is a good fellow. Release him at once! The other's too feeble! Why did he let himself be hit? Put a cangue on him and parade him in front of the courthouse." He stood up and fastened his robe, stuck the tablet in his belt and took up his axes. He watched them put the cangue on the plaintiff and ordered him to be taken out. Then he strutted out of the courtroom without changing the ceremonial shoes. The people watching at the door could scarcely contain their laughter.

As he was pacing about before the government office, the sound of children reciting their lesson in the schoolroom caught his attention. He drew aside the curtain and went in. The terrified teacher leapt out of the window and ran off. Children cried, children shouted, or ran about, or hid. Iron Ox nearly laughed his head off. As he came out again he ran into Mu the Unstoppable, who said: "Everyone's worried to death about you, and you're just acting the fool here! Get back up the mountain, quickly!"

Much against his will, Iron Ox was dragged away. His pranks in Shouzhang at an end, he returned to the Marshes of Mount Liang as the poem tells.

Among the bumpkins he plays the fool,
He never learnt to behave, alas.
His tour of inspection takes in the school,
He makes fun of the law, he breaks up the class.

The two of them crossed at Golden Sands Landing and went up to the stronghold. Everyone laughed when they saw how Iron Ox was dressed. When he entered the Ceremonial Hall Song Jiang was engaged in celebrating the Prodigy's victory. Iron Ox swaggered into the room in his magistrate's garb and holding his two axes. He halted before the dais, clutching the wooden tablet and prostrated himself before Song Jiang. The second time he stood up he tripped on the robe and fell over and everyone laughed.

"You animal, you've got a nerve!" Song Jiang shouted. "You went off down the mountain all by yourself without even telling me. That's a capital offence in itself. Everywhere you go you cause trouble. I was just telling our comrades that I won't pardon you again.!"

Iron Ox mumbled something and withdrew.

For a time life went on peacefully on Mount Liang and nothing happened worthy of relating. On the mountain the army had exercises each day, to maintain the troops in readiness, and the waterborne troops practised with their boats. More arms were manufactured in all the camps: in addition to clothing and armour, more spears, swords, bows and crossbows with their ammunition, more flags and banners etcetera.

Meanwhile a full report of the events in Tai'an had been sent to the capital. When this reached the council they had already received similar reports from all over the place, all telling of Song Jiang's insurgency and the trouble it was causing in numerous districts. At this time the Emperor had not dealt with any business for a month.

The morning court had been summoned and all the officials civil and military were arrayed in their ranks before the imperial steps. The master of ceremonies shouted out: "If there are matters to report, stand forth and declare them; if not, take leave and depart." The minister responsible for receiving reports stepped forward and said: "Your Majesty's Council of Ministers is continually receiving reports from many districts saying that Song Jiang and his band of robbers have been openly entering cities and plundering the stores, robbing the treasury and killing government troops. They are insatiable and wherever they go no one can resist them. If they are not apprehended soon it will become a major problem."

The Emperor said: "Last year these bandits disturbed the capital during the lunar festival. Now they are continuing their depredations over a wide area, not just in the districts that are close to their lair. More than once we have ordered members of the War Council to send the army against them, but no one has yet reported back."

Cui Qing, the inspector general, now came forward and said: "I have heard that they have a big banner on Mount Liang which says, 'To Do Heaven's Will'. This is a trick to impress the people, but so long as they have the people's support we cannot send troops against them. Moreover the Liao Tartars are attacking our borders and we do not have enough troops to cover all fronts. It would be highly inconvenient at this moment to start a campaign against the Mount Liang bandits. In my humble opinion, it is because they have no alternative that these desperadoes in the mountains have put themselves outside the law, have taken to the greenwood and are committing these wicked acts. If Your Majesty were to proclaim an amnesty and provide a gift of imperial wine and other valuables, and send some high-ranking official as ambassador to them, to speak diplomatically and offer them the amnesty in exchange for their fighting against the Tartars, it would answer all our needs. I beg your Majesty to consider my proposal."

The Emperor said, "What you say is very true, it accords with my own wishes." He named Grand Marshal Chen as the ambassador who was to carry the edict and the imperial wine, and this was to have important consequences. The incense and the wine would become an irritant, the edict an incitement to war.

As Marshal Chen was preparing for his journey, several people came and said: "Your mission will serve the government and remove a burden from the populace. Both the army and the people will benefit. The men of Liangshan Marsh place loyalty to the throne above all. They await only the emperor's amnesty. Speak sweet words, Marshal, and reassure them. Your clean name will be renowned for ten thousand generations."

Just then the majordomo of the premier's chancellery arrived. "The premier would like to speak to you, Marshal," he said.

Chen mounted his sedan-chair and went directly to the chancellery on New Song Gate Avenue. The majordomo led him to the study in the inner sanctum, where the premier received him. Chen sat down politely to one side. They had some tea, then Premier Cai spoke.

"I hear the emperor is sending you to Mount Liangshan with an amnesty. That's why I've asked you for a talk. You mustn't relax our imperial discipline when you get there, or violate our national laws. Remember what the Analects of Confucius say: 'When on a mission, wherever you go, abuse not the sovereign's command, and be a worthy emissary.' "

"This I know. Please give me your instructions, Premier."

"I've directed my majordomo to accompany you. He's well acquainted with the law. If you run into any snags, he'll be able to remind you."

"I'm deeply grateful for your consideration," said Chen. He took his leave of the premier, left the chancellery with the majordomo, got into his sedan-chair, and returned home.

He had just settled down to rest, when his gate-keeper entered and announced: "Marshal Gao is dismounting at the gate." Chen hastened out to welcome him, and invited him to be seated in the hall. After an exchange of pleasantries, Gao came to the point.

"If I had been present when the imperial court was considering an amnesty for Song Jiang, I would have opposed it. Those brigands have insulted the court time and again, and their crimes reach the sky! Pardoning them and letting them come into the capital is sure to provoke disaster. I wanted to submit my own petition, but the royal decree had already been announced. Well, we'll see what happens. If those bandits still have no conscience and stall on the amnesty, return to the capital quickly, Marshal. I'll petition the emperor to muster a large army, which I'll lead personally, and wipe them out, root and branch! That's my fondest wish. I have a captain under my command who's a clever and competent speaker. Give him one question, and he'll answer you ten. He can go with you and lend you a hand."

"I'm grateful for Your Excellency's concern."

Marshal Gao rose, and Chen escorted him to the gate of the residency. There, Gao climbed on his horse and departed.

The next day Premier Cai's Majordomo Zhang and Marshal Gao's Captain Li arrived at Chen's headquarters. Marshal Chen's horses were already saddled and bridled and his soldiers mustered. Ten generals placed ten bottles of imperial wine into hampers decorated with dragons and phoenixes, and these were carried by bearers on shoulder-poles and preceded by imperial yellow banners.

Marshal Chen mounted. Accompanied by a trusted entourage of five or six, plus Zhang and Li, also on horseback, and with the emperor's decree carried in the lead, he led the procession through the New Song Gate. The officials who were seeing them off returned to the city.

The party wound its way to Jizhou. Prefect Zhang Shuye met them and invited them into the prefecture, where a feast had been laid. He inquired about the amnesty, and Marshal Chen told him the story.

"In my humble opinion, it's the best solution," said the prefect. "There's just one thing: you must speak to them pleasantly and reassure them with kind words. Nothing else matters so long as you accomplish the main objective. Your good name will be famed to all posterity. Several of those outlaws are very hotheaded. If you say one word that triggers them off, the whole deal may be spoiled."

"Nothing can go wrong with us two along," said Majordomo Zhang and Captain Li. "You talk only of caution and affability, Prefect. What about our imperial discipline? Those worthless fellows must be constantly chastened. If you let them get too cocky they'll set a bad example to others."

"Who are these two?" the prefect queried.

"This is Premier Cai's majordomo, and this is a captain under Marshal Gao."

"It would be better if they didn't go."

"They're trusted confidants. If I don't take them, the premier and the marshal will get suspicious."

"I'm only trying to help. I'm afraid your journey will be futile."

"With us two along," the majordomo interjected, "though there be ten thousand fathoms of water, not a drop will escape!"

The prefect was afraid to say any more. After feasting his guests, he escorted them to the hostel for officials, to rest.

The next day the prefecture sent a man to inform Mount Liangshan of the mission. Song Jiang had been conferring daily with his chieftains in Loyalty Hall on the military situation. Spies had already reported to him that an amnesty was being offered and, although he had not yet seen any proof of this, he was overjoyed. Now, the messenger arrived from Jizhou and said: "Marshal Chen, an emissary from the royal court, has reached our prefecture. He brings ten bottles of imperial wine and a vermilion decree of amnesty. Prepare to welcome him."

Song Jiang was delighted. He rewarded the messenger with wine and clothing material and ten ounces of silver, and sent him back.

"We're going to be pardoned and become government officials," he said to the chieftain. "Our hardships have not been in vain. At last we will attain our just rewards."

"To my mind the amnesty won't go through," said Wu Yong. "Even if it does, they consider us with contempt. Better wait till the scoundrels come at us with a big army and we give them a good drubbing. We'll slaughter their men and down their horses till we terrify them even in their dreams. That's the time to accept an amnesty. Then we can do it with dignity.'

"You shouldn't talk like that," said Song Jiang. "It goes against our principle of 'loyalty.' "

"High court officials coming here," mused Lin Chong. "They're up to something, and it's not necessarily good."

"There's sure to be some threat in the decree, to frighten us," said Guan Sheng.

"These fellows must be Marshal Gao's men." said Xu Ning.

"Stop being so sceptical, all of you," Song Jiang ordered. "Get ready to welcome them."

He instructed Song Qing and Cao Zheng to prepare a feast, and Chai Jin to supervise all arrangements, "in proper style." He directed that a dwelling be provided for Marshal Chen, with silk and satin furnishings, and colored decorations hung throughout. He sent Pei Xuan, Xiao Rang, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng down the mountain and twenty //along the road to welcome the arrivals. The chieftains of the naval forces were to moor large boats by the shore to ferry them across.

"Don't make a move without my orders," Wu Yong warned the chieftains.

Xiao Rang and his three companions, with another five or six carrying wine and tidbits, all completely unarmed, advanced twenty //as a welcoming party.

During that stage of Marshal Chen's journey, Majordomo Zhang and Captain Li did not ride, but walked ahead of the horses. Two or three hundred government troops followed. These included a dozen military officers from Jizhou, riding in ranks to the fore. Next came the imperial wine bearers, and then the mounted purveyor of the Vermilion decree, which was in a casket strapped to his back. Fifty or sixty jail-keepers from the prefecture tagged along, hoping to pick up a little graft from the outlaws.

The procession was greeted by the welcoming party, who prostrated themselves, then knelt by the roadside.

"Your Song Jiang thinks pretty highly of himself," said Majordomo Zhang. "The emperor has sent an amnesty. Why isn't he here to receive it? This is an insult! You're all criminals who deserve to die. An imperial amnesty would be wasted on you. Marshal, let's go back."

The four brigands again prostrated themselves. "Our stronghold has not seen the amnesty yet," they explained. "We don't know if it is true or not. Song Jiang and all the chieftains are waiting to welcome you on the Shore of Golden Sands. Pray don't be angry, Marshal. The main thing is to carry this matter through for the sake of our country. Please forgive us."

"Even if we don't carry it through, I see no danger of you robbers flying up to Heaven," sneered Captain Li.

"What kind of talks is that," Lu Fang and Guo Sheng muttered. "They're only trifling with us!"

Xiao Rang and Pei Xuan continued to plead with the emissaries. The wine and tidbits they offered were refused. But the government expedition went with them to the river, where three warships were waiting. On one the horses were loaded; on the second, Pei Xuan and his party; on the third, the marshal and his entourage. The amnesty and the imperial wine were placed in the bow of this last craft. It was commanded by the Devil Incarnate Ruan the Seventh.

Seated on the prow of his vessel, Ruan gave directions to his twenty-some-odd naval oarsmen, each armed with a dagger at his waist. When Marshal Chen first came on board he was very lofty and aloof as he took a seat in the center. Ruan called to his sailors to row, and the men on both sides sang as they bent to their oars.

"Donkeys!" swore Captain Li. "His Excellency is present. Absolutely no sense of discretion!"

The sailors ignored him, and went on singing. Li threatened them with a rattan cane, but they stared at him fearlessly.

"If we feel like singing, what's it to you!" several of them said. "Wretched rebellious bandits, how dare you talk back to me!" Li fumed. He flailed wildly with his cane. Sailors on both sides promptly leaped into the water.
"You beat my oarsmen and force them overboard," Ruan the Seventh called from the bow. "How is this boat going to move?"
Two swift craft were seen to approach from upstream. Ruan had previously partially flooded the hold of his boat. Now, as the two vessels closed in behind him, he pulled out the plug and yelled: "We're leaking!"
Water poured into the hold. As Ruan cried for help, it was already over a foot deep. The two craft pulled alongside, and Marshal Chen was hastily assisted over to one of them. All efforts were concentrated on getting away. No one had time to think about the imperial wine or the emperor's amnesty. The two light boats rowed on swiftly ahead.
Ruan ordered his men to bail out the hold and mop it dry. "Bring me a bottle of that imperial wine," he called. "I want to see what it tastes like."
A sailor fetched a bottle, opened the sealed cap, and handed it to Ruan. Its fragrance tickled his nose.
"It may be poisoned," he said, "but I'll take the risk and try it!" He put the bottle to his lips and kept swallowing till he drained it dry.
"A pleasant bouquet," he said. "But one bottle is hardly enough. Bring me another!" He drank that one, too. Now that his throat was moistened, he finished off two more. Suddenly, he realized that he had created a problem.
"What am I going to do?" he said.
"There's a cask of liquor in the bow," one of the men suggested.
"Fetch me a bailing scoop and I'll give you fellows a share," said Ruan.
What he did was to distribute the remaining six bottles of imperial wine among the sailors, and when they had consumed them, filled the ten empty bottles with cheap rustic liquor from the cask. Resealing the caps, he put the bottles back in the royal hampers decorated with dragons and phoenixes. Then the men plied their oars mightily and sent their craft skimming along.
They reached the Shore of Golden Sands just as the others were disembarking. Song Jiang was waiting to welcome the royal emissary with incense and flowers and colored lanterns. Gongs crashed, drums pounded, and the fortress band made joyful music. The imperial wine was placed on a table which was carried by four men. The emperor's amnesty was similarly transported on another table. As Marshal Chen stepped ashore, Song Jiang kowtowed before him.
"I'm a former petty functionary whose face is marked with the criminal's tattoo, and my wicked deeds obscure the sky. Though Your Excellency has demeaned himself to come here, I cannot entertain you properly. I humbly crave your pardon."
"The marshal is a high official of the imperial court," said Captain Li. "He brings you men an amnesty. This is no small affair. How could you dispatch a leaky boat commanded by an ignorant rustic? You nearly endangered His Excellency's life!"
"We have plenty of good boats. We'd never dare send a leaky craft for His Excellency."
"Are you trying to deny it?" demanded Majordomo Zhang. "The hem of the marshal's robe is soaking wet!"
Song Jiang's five Tiger Cavalry chieftains pressed close behind to left and right, his eight Cavalry Picket commanders ranged themselves fore and aft. The insolence of Zhang and Li enraged them, and they would gladly have slain them were it not for the restraining presence of Song Jiang.
Only after Song Jiang's repeated entreaties did Marshal Chen get into the sedan-chair provided. Horses were brought for Majordomo Zhang and Captain Li. The two continued to behave with disgusting arrogance. Song Jiang persuaded them to mount and the procession, with much shrilling of pipes and beating of drums, proceeded upward through the three passes. Song Jiang and over a hundred chieftains followed.
All dismounted on reaching Loyalty Hall, and the marshal was invited in. The imperial wine and the amnesty were placed in the center at the upper end of the building. The marshal, the majordomo and the captain stood on the left side. Xiao Rang and Pei Xuan stood on the right. Song Jiang called the roll of chieftains. One hundred and seven men—only Li Kui was missing.
It was the fourth lunar month, and they were wearing light battle robes of lined silk as they knelt in the hall to hear the reading of the amnesty. Marshal Chen took the document from its casket and handed it to Xiao Rang. Pei Xuan officiated. At his call, the chieftains kowtowed. Xiao Rang unrolled the decree and read it out in a loud voice:

Edict: The country is governed by both civil and military means. The earliest emperors used both ceremony and punitive wars to preserve our territory. Matters may go smoothly or with difficulty. People may be clever or stupid. As I carry on the rule of my ancestors over this great empire, on which the sun and the moon always shine brilliantly, stretching so vast under the heavens, there is none who does not give me homage.
Recently, Song Jiang and his gang have been roistering over the wooded hills and pillaging the shires. Originally, I was going to suppress them with soldiers, but I feared this would cause harm to the people. I have therefore sent Marshal Chen forward with my amnesty. On receipt of it the bandits must turn over all their money, grain, weapons, horses and boats to my officials, destroy their lair, and be led into the capital. I will then pardon their crimes. If they lack conscience and oppose this decree I shall dispatch troops and wipe them out, young and old. Let this amnesty be proclaimed so that all may know.
In the early summer, fourth month of the third year of the reign of Xuan Ho.
Amnesty hereby proclaimed.

Xiao Rang finished reading. Anger darkened the countenance of Song Jiang and his men. Suddenly, Li Kui the Black Whirlwind leaped down from an overhead beam. He snatched the amnesty from Xiao Rang's hands and tore it to shreds. Then he grabbed Marshal Chen and commenced pummeling him with his fist.
Song Jiang and Lu Junyi threw their arms around Li Kui, and finally managed to separate him from the marshal.
"Who is this varlet," shouted Captain Li. "How dare he behave like this!"
Black Whirlwind was just looking for someone to hit, and he turned his attentions to Li. Punching him, he demanded: "Whose words are those, written in that amnesty?"
"It's an imperial decree from the emperor," said Majordomo Zhang.
"Your emperor doesn't understand anything about us bold fellows here! Pardoning us—what crust! Your emperor's name is Song. So's my Big Brother's. Your Song is an emperor. Why shouldn't my Song be an emperor too! Don't you come stirring up this Black Whirlwind, or I'll kill every one of you amnesty-writing officials!"
The others pulled him away from the emissaries and hustled him out of the hall.
"Don't take it to heart, Marshal," Song Jiang urged. "Not the slightest rudeness will be allowed. Bring the imperial wine and let everyone savor the emperor's kindness."
A golden goblet inlaid with jade was produced. Pei Xuan first poured wine from an imperial bottle into a silver testing bowl. It was cheap rustic liquor. The contents of the other nine bottles were similarly examined. All were of the same crude brew.
Shocked, most of the chieftains stalked out of the hall. Lu Zhishen brandished his iron staff and swore.
"Mother-rapers! This is going too far! Trying to give us watered liquor for imperial wine!"
Red-Haired Demon Liu Tang rushed forward with his halberd. Advancing together came Pilgrim Wu Song with his swords, plus Mu Hong the Unrestrained and Nine Dragons Shi Jin. The six commanders of the naval forces walked out, cursing.
Plainly, the situation was tense. Song Jiang blocked off his men with his body and ordered a sedan-chair and horses for the marshal and his escorts. They were to be escorted down the mountain immediately, and no one was to harm them. Most of the chieftains were in a towering rage. Song Jiang and Lu Junyi were compelled to mount their own steeds and see the marshal through the three passes personally. Kowtowing, Song Jiang begged forgiveness.
"It's not that we don't wish to surrender," he said. "The fact is that the framers of the amnesty don't realize how complicated our situation is here. If only the decree contained a few comforting words, we would gladly die ten thousand deaths to serve our country! Please explain that, Marshal, when you report to the throne."
The emissaries were hastily ferried across. Farting and pissing in terror, they fled back to Jizhou.
Song Jiang returned to Loyalty Hall and summoned the chieftains to a feast. "Although the court decree wasn't very intelligent, you shouldn't have behaved so impetuously," he said.
"Don't delude yourself, brother," said Wu Yong. "There will be an amnesty some day. But why reproach the brothers for getting angry? The court's attitude was too contemptuous. Forget about all that for now. Order full equipment for the cavalry, weapons for the infantry, and a refurbishment of our naval vessels. Sooner or later the government is going to send a big punitive army against us. We've got to slaughter their soldiers and down their horses in one or two battles, so that they're bereft of their armor and fear us in their dreams. That will be the time to talk about amnesty again."
"Absolutely right," said the chieftains. The feasting ended, and they retired to their respective quarters.

Meanwhile, Marshal Chen reached Jizhou. He told Zhang Shuye what had transpired in the mountain stronghold.
"Perhaps you said something you shouldn't?" suggested the prefect.
"I didn't dare open my mouth!"
"In that case, it was just a waste of effort. In fact, it made matters worse. Hurry back and report to the throne, Marshal. You mustn't delay."
Marshal Chen, Majordomo Zhang, Captain Li and the entourage returned to the Eastern Capital that night. Chen related to the prime minister in detail how the bandits of Liangshan Marsh had ripped up the decree. Cai was furious.
"How dare those petty robbers be so rude! We'll teach them to insult the great Song Dynasty!"
Chen wept. "If I hadn't been protected by your emanations, Premier, my shattered bones would be lying in the bandit fortress right now! Fortunately, I escaped with my life and was able to see your beneficent countenance again!"
The premier summoned the Chancellor of Military Affairs Tong Guan, and Marshal Gao and Marshal Yang to a military conference. They soon reported to the White Tiger Inner Sanctum. When they were seated, Cai sent for the majordomo and the captain, who told how the imperial decree was torn to shreds in the Mount Liangshan stronghold.
"Why should such scoundrels be amnestied!" cried Marshal Yang. "Which official recommended such a thing?"
"If I had been present, I surely would have opposed it," said Gao. "I never would have agreed!"
"Thieving rats and marauding dogs, contemptible rabble," fumed Tong. "I have no talent, but just let me lead an expedition personally, set a time limit, and I'll wipe them off the earth!"
"We'll petition the throne tomorrow," said the others. The meeting disbanded.

*

At the morning court the next day, high officials waited on the imperial stairs. Three times the rods rapped in the imperial hall, and officials divided into civil and military sections. Three times they called: "Long live the emperor," and made their obeisances. Premier Cai stepped forward and reported the outcome of the amnesty mission. The emperor was very angry.
"Who was it who proposed that I issue an amnesty?" he demanded.
"The Inspector General Cui Qing," someone replied.
The emperor ordered Cui to report to the Ministry of Justice and ask for punishment. He turned to the premier. "Those bandits have wreaking havoc for a long time. Who can we send to annihilate them?"
"We cannot succeed without a large force. In my humble estimation, the Chancellor of Military Affairs should lead the expedition personally. He can attain victory within an allotted time."
The emperor summoned Tong Guan and asked: "Are you willing to lead troops and seize the brigands of Liangshan Marsh?"
Kneeling, Tong replied, "As the ancients put it: 'The filial son must do his utmost, the loyal minister must stake his life.' I'm ready to give my all to eradicate this canker in our hearts." Marshal Gao Qiu and Marshal Yang Jian pledged their support. The emperor then issued a decree directing that gold seals and military tallies be issued to Tong Guan, that he be raised to the rank of Grand General, and that troops be drawn from various sources and placed under his command for use against the bandits of Mount Liangshan. A date was fixed for him to set forth. And because Tong Guan marched with his army, thousands of cavalry filled the mountains and valleys, and innumerable fighting ships rode the green waters. Truly, only 3000 equestrians, bold as tigers, rolled up countless soldiers, courageous as leopards.

Now when Marshal Chen, furnished with the imperial edict, returned to his office and started to make his preparations, there were many who came to express their approval: "This business you are undertaking, Marshal, will greatly benefit the country and will calm the fears of the people. That lot in the Marshes of Mount Liang are loyal and honourable and this imperial amnesty is what they are hoping for. You must speak diplomatically and do all you can to allay any fears they may have."
At the same time an official of the Grand Preceptor's office arrived to say: "The Grand Preceptor would like a word with you, Marshal."
The Marshal mounted a sedan chair and was taken to the Grand Preceptor's palace in Newgate Street. The official showed him to the library, where he found the Grand Preceptor sitting in a side chamber. When they had taken tea, the Grand Preceptor said: "I hear the Emperor is sending you to the Marshes of Mount Liang with an amnesty. I sent for you because I have something I want to say to you: when you go there you must not betray the court's principles or make an agreement which contravenes the law. You know what it says in the Analects of Confucius: 'He who acts with restraint, wherever he is sent, and upholds the sovereign's honour, he is the one who can be called a faithful ambassador.'"
Marshal Chen replied: "I am certainly mindful of this. I am most grateful to Your Excellency for the advice."
The Grand Preceptor said: "I am going to send my chamberlain with you. He is an expert on the law and if you meet with some problem he will be able to advise you."
"This is most generous, Your Excellency. I am truly grateful," the Marshal said. He took leave of the Grand Preceptor and returned in the sedan to his residence, accompanied by the chamberlain. He had just gone to bed when the doorkeeper came and announced that Marshal Gao had arrived. He hurriedly went out to receive him and invite him in. There was some talk of the weather. Eventually Marshal Gao said: "This pardon that has just been announced for Song Jiang, if I had been involved I would certainly have put a stop to it. That villain has dishonoured the Emperor and committed infamous crimes and if now they want to give him a free pardon and bring him here to the capital, we are certainly going to regret it. I would have made a counter-proposal, but the Emperor has spoken, so we will just have to wait and see the outcome. If the villains remain obdurate and continue to show contempt for the law you must return at once. We won't report it to the Emperor but raise an army which I shall lead myself, to weed out the evil. Yes, that is what I shall do. Now, I have an officer on my staff who has a quick wit and a ready tongue. He will be invaluable to you in assessing the situation."
Marshal Chen said: "I am most grateful for your concern."
Grand Marshal Gao rose. Chen escorted him out. He mounted and left. Next day the Grand Preceptor's man, Chamberlain Zhang and the Grand Marshal's man, Colonel Li both turned up. Marshal Chen had his horse saddled, paraded his men, picked up the ten bottles of imperial wine which he had them pack in a box bearing the imperial insignia and load up, with a yellow banner to go before. He mounted and together with five or six personal attendants, plus the chamberlain and the colonel, all on horseback, with the imperial edict borne at the head, led his party out through the New Gate. Some minor officials who had come to see them off returned to the city.
They had an agreeable journey to Jizhou. Here Governor Zhang received them and invited them to a banquet in his residence. He asked about the amnesty. Marshal Chen explained everything. The Governor said: "In my humble opinion this amnesty is an excellent idea. There is just one thing. When you get there, you will have to be very diplomatic: you will need to choose your words with the greatest care in order to allay their fears. Whatever happens we want the mission to succeed. There are one or two real hotheads among their number. If a single word offends their sensibility, the whole enterprise will come to nothing."
Chamberlain Zhang and Colonel Li said: "We are both going with the Marshal, so there won't be any mistakes. You should not keep urging caution and flattery, Your Excellency. It is an insult to the Emperor's authority. Inferiors should be kept in their place. If you allow them too much latitude, it can create a precedent."
The Governor said: "Who are these two?"
Marshal Chen said: "This one is a confidential assistant of the Grand Preceptor, and the other is one of Marshal Gao's aides."
The Governor said: "Then you'd better tell them to stay out of it!"
"They are confidential members of the staff of the Grand Preceptor and the Grand Marshal. It will look bad if I don't take them with me."
"I am saying it for your own good. I fear your mission will not succeed."
Chamberlain Zhang said: "If we are present, nothing can go wrong."
The Governor dared not say more. He organized a banquet for them and invited them to sleep in his residence. Next day a messenger was sent to inform the company on Mount Liang.
Song Jiang was holding the daily meeting in the Ceremonial Hall to discuss military matters, when one of his spies reported what was going on. Though this news was unconfirmed, Song Jiang was gratified. Later that day one of his men brought in the messenger from Jizhou who said: "They have sent a Marshal Chen from the court with ten bottles of imperial wine and an imperial edict proclaiming a general amnesty for you. He is in Jizhou right now, so be prepared to receive him."
In great excitement Song Jiang had wine and food brought out, together with two bolts of best silk and ten taels of fine silver, and sent the messenger back. He then addressed the company: "We have been granted an amnesty. We are to serve our country. Not in vain have we suffered so many privations. Now we are about to reap the reward!"
The Professor was less sanguine. "In my humble opinion," he said, "this amnesty will come to nothing. Even if there is an amnesty, they still look on us as bandits. When they bring their big army here our best plan is to give them a real shock — kill the whole lot, man and beast. Let them see us in their nightmares! Then we can talk of an amnesty, because there will be some basis for respect."
Song Jiang said: "If we followed your advice we would have to forget about honour."
Leopard's Head said: "When I was at court I came across so many lying bastards. You can't expect anything good from them."
Scimitar said: "I guarantee the proclamation will include some threats, intended to frighten us."
Spearsman said: "This envoy is bound to be one of Marshal Gao's people."
Song Jiang said: "Don't be so suspicious. Just get on with preparing for their reception."

Song Jiang told his brother Iron Fan and Knife to prepare a banquet and put Mr. Chai in charge of the arrangements. He wanted everything to be perfect. A tent was prepared for the Marshal, festooned with five-colour silk and other hanging decora-tions. Sterling, Magic Hand, the Little Duke and the Halberdier were ordered down the mountain to wait for them about six or seven miles away. The Waterside leaders prepared some big boats at the crossing. The Professor said to them: "You must follow my orders exactly, otherwise things could go wrong."

So Magic Hand and the three others, plus five or six men, all totally unarmed, took wine and nuts to a spot some miles from the stronghold to receive the delegation. For that day's journey Marshal Chen and his party were on foot, leading their horses, with two or three hundred of their men behind them and a dozen horsemen from the Jizhou garrison leading the way. The imperial wine was transported on poles and the box with the imperial edict was carried by a rider. There were also fifty or sixty guards from the Jizhou prison service, who were hoping to gain a portion of fame and fortune from this visit to the Marshes of Mount Liang. When he saw the reception committee of Magic Hand, Sterling, the Little Duke and the Halberdier, who were waiting in an attitude of humility by the roadside, the Chamberlain said: "Who does this Song Jiang think he is? We are bearing the imperial edict with the pardon, why doesn't he come out to meet us him-self? It's an insult! How can we present the Emperor's pardon to a bunch of common thieves like this? We should turn back, Marshal!"

The four from Mount Liang maintaining their humble posture excused themselves: "Because the stronghold had received no official notification from the Emperor we did not know if it was really true. Song Jiang and the other leaders are awaiting you at Golden Sands Landing. We beg you not to be angry with us, Your Excellency. Our only wish is to serve our country with honour and make amends for our crimes."

Colonel Li said disdainfully, "Whether or not this business goes forward, I don't see you lot flying up to heaven!" As the poem says:

The courtiers, 'twas ever so, abound in sneers:
No time, they say, for small men's mean affairs.
Now like sweet rain imperial grace descends;
Too bad this amnesty won't meet its ends.

The Little Duke and the Halberdier felt insulted: "What kind of language is that! They're treating us with contempt!" Nevertheless Magic Hand and Sterling invited the delegation to partake of the wine and nuts, which they refused to do. All proceeded therefore to the waterside, where the three Mount Liang war vessels were waiting. The horses were embarked in one, Sterling and his helpers went in another, while the Marshal was invited to board the third with all his retinue. The imperial edict and the imperial wine were placed in the prow.

This boat was commanded by Ruan the Seventh who was seated in the bows. Twenty sailors had been selected to row, each equipped with a sword. When the Marshal came on board he sat with his nose in the air, as if disdaining all around him, Ruan the Seventh gave a signal to his men. As they started rowing, the two ranks of sailors burst into song.

"You oafs," Colonel Li scolded. "There's an important person on board. Have you no respect?"

The sailors paid no attention but just went on singing. The Colonel took a cane and lashed out at them. They were unimpressed. One or two more outspoken ones said: "What's it to you, if we want to sing?"

"Do you answer me back, you dogs?" the Colonel said. He attacked them furiously with his cane and they all dived into the water. Ruan the Seventh sitting in the bows said: "If you beat my sailors like that and drive them overboard, how do you expect this boat to move?" At this moment two fast skiffs appeared. Ruan the Seventh had previously allowed two of the holds to fill with water. As the skiffs approached from behind, he pulled up the rudder and shouted: "We're sinking!" With water bubbling out of the hold, everyone began shouting for help. There was now a foot of water in the bottom. The two light skiffs drew near and everyone urged the Marshal to go aboard one of them. So busy were they rowing to safety that they forgot all about the imperial wine and the imperial edict. As the skiffs sped off, Ruan the Seventh ordered his sailors to bail out the hold and mop up the water. Then he said: "Bring me a bottle of that imperial wine. I'm going to see what it tastes like!"

One of the hands went and fetched a bottle. He broke the seal and handed it to Ruan the Seventh who sniffed it: it was wonderfully fragrant. "It might be poisoned, of course," he said. "That wouldn't do me much good. I'd better try just a little." Not bothering with bowls, ladles or jugs he took a sip. Then he scoffed the lot. When one bottle was gone, he said: "That's not bad at all!" One bottle obviously wasn't going to do the job so he had them bring another, which he finished likewise. He was getting a taste for it and he drank four bottles. "Now what are we going to do?" he said.

The sailors said: "There's a bucket of ordinary wine stowed in the bows."

"Bring me the bailer," he said. "I'll let you all have a taste of this." The remaining six bottles of imperial wine were shared among the hands. Then the bottles were refilled with ordinary country wine, the original seals put back on and the wine replaced in the containers with the imperial insignia. The boat positively flew to Golden Sands Landing, where they all went ashore.

Song Jiang and the other leaders were all there to receive the delegation with incense, candles and lanterns and a fanfare of gongs and drums. Every musical instrument in the stronghold was playing when the imperial wine was laid out on tables, each table to be carried by four men. The imperial edict was also carried on a table. When Marshal Chen stepped ashore Song Jiang greeted him by prostrating himself, hand to forehead. "I have committed many errors and have given Your Excellency the trouble of coming here. I must beg you to pardon my inadequate welcome."

Colonel Li said: "The Marshal is an important official of the court. He is bringing you the Emperor's amnesty. This is not an everyday affair. How could you send these leaking boats manned by such ignorant country bumpkins? It came near to costing the Marshal his life!"

"Our boats are all sound. Of course I wouldn't send a leaking boat to fetch His Excellency!" Song Jiang said.

The Chamberlain said: "His Excellency's clothes are still wet. How can you tell such lies?"

Five imposing leaders stood at Song Jiang's shoulder, never leaving his side, and there were eight horsemen surrounding him. When they saw the Colonel and the Chamberlain gesticulating wildly in front of the Leader and stamping their feet, obviously engaged in fierce argument, they were tempted to kill them. Only their respect for Song Jiang made them hold back.

Song Jiang invited the Marshal to get into a sedan chair and proceed to the fortress for the reading of the edict. He was obliged to repeat the invitation four or five times. Two horses were brought for Colonel Li and the Chamberlain. This wretched pair had got quite above themselves and behaved with total lack of courtesy. But Song Jiang gave the word and the party set off up the mountain accompanied by vigorous music, and rode through the three gates. Song Jiang and the others, over a hundred, followed behind. On reaching the Ceremonial Hall they all dismounted. The imperial wine and the box with the edict were placed opposite, while the Marshal with Colonel Li and the Chamberlain stood on the left, Magic Hand and Sterling on the right. Song Jiang called the roll of the leaders, one hundred and seven — Iron Ox was the only one missing. It was the fourth month and everyone was wearing uniforms padded with silk, as they knelt in the hall to hear the edict read. The Marshal took the edict out of its box and gave it to Magic Hand. Sterling saluted. The others all bowed their heads. Magic Hand opened the edict and read out in a loud voice:

Hear this: the civil arts establish peace, the military arts create stability. The Five Rulers based their rule firmly on the rites and music; the Three Sage Kings used military means to bring about stability. Events can be favourable or unfavourable, men can be wise or foolish. I inherited this great task of government from my ancestors, and there is none under the light of sun and moon, none in the universe, who does not owe me homage. Recently Song Jiang and others have gathered together in the mountain fastnesses to plunder and rampage. Originally I thought to use military force to punish them, but I fear this might cause hardship among my people. I am therefore sending Marshal Chen to proclaim an amnesty. On receipt of this, they are to render up immediately all money and supplies, military equipment, horses and boats and demolish their hideout, in order to expiate their crimes. If they remain obdurate and oppose this decree, I shall send an army against them that will spare no one, young or old. You have been warned.

When Magic Hand finished his reading everyone, from Song Jiang on down, looked furious. Suddenly Iron Ox leapt down from the rafters, snatched the proclamation from Magic Hand, tore it into a thousand pieces and made a grab for the Marshal. Then he began to use his fists. Song Jiang and the Unicorn seized him by the waist and held him back. Just as he managed to break free, Colonel Li said: "Who the devil is this? How dare he behave so insolently?" Iron Ox, thwarted in his attempts to hit someone, turned on him violently and began to beat him up, shouting: "All that stuff in the proclamation, who said it?"

The Chamberlain stammered: "Th-th-that is the Emperor's edict."

Iron Ox said: "That emperor of yours obviously doesn't know us. If he wants to give us a pardon, he'd better make us feel good! Your emperor's family name is Song. Our Leader is also called Song. You made yours emperor, but ours refused to be an emperor. And here's someone you oughtn't to come and provoke because come what may I'm going to kill all those officials of yours who wrote that edict."

Everyone now tried to smooth things over and Iron Ox was pushed off the stage. Song Jiang said: "Please don't be worried, Marshal. There's nothing wrong in the slightest, I assure you. Just bring out the imperial wine and we'll all feel honoured."

Accordingly a gold hammer encrusted with jewels was produced, and Sterling was told to fetch a bottle of imperial wine and decant it into a great silver sconce. When this was done it became evident that it was simple country wine. The other nine bottles were broached and poured into the sconce and it was all the same insipid country brew. When the company saw this, they were amazed and then one by one they left the hall. Monk wielding his steel staff began to abuse the delegation at the top of his voice: "You filthy mother-fucking scum. You think you can get away with anything! You switched the imperial wine for this piss and you think you can fool us with it!"

The Red-Haired Devil was also charging about waving his halberd, Pilgrim had drawn his two swords, Mu the Unstoppable and the Tattooed Dragon rushed forward together. The six waterside leaders departed down the mountain cursing.

Song Jiang saw things were bad but he stood firm and ordered the porters to carry the Marshal back down the mountain and allow no harm to come to him. By now most of the leaders, greater and lesser, were baying for blood, and Song Jiang and the Unicorn themselves were obliged to mount and ride with the Marshal and his edict-bearing party to protect them as they rode down through the gates. Again he apologized: "Don't think that we have no intention of submitting. The problem is that whoever it was drafted the document did not know us and was not familiar with our ways on Mount Liang. If only the language were more conciliatory, we would do anything to make amends, we would willingly face ten thousand deaths. When you return to the court, please say that some polite words are all it needs."

He hurriedly saw them across the ferry. The members of the retinue were shitting themselves in terror. They positively flew back to Jizhou.

When Song Jiang returned to the Ceremonial Hall he organized a feast for the leaders. He said: "The wording was pretty stupid, I admit, but you were all too hasty."

The Professor said: "Don't go on deluding yourself, brother. There will be an amnesty some day, for sure, but why blame your comrades now for being angry? The court is really treating us with too much contempt. But enough of talking. It's time for you to give some orders: have the cavalry saddle their horses, the footsoldiers prepare their weapons, the water-borne troops check their boats. Before long we're going to have a big army at our gates. We must give them a complete thrashing in a couple of battles and wipe their force out; let them see us in their nightmares! Then it will be time for talks."

Everyone said: "The military adviser is absolutely correct."

It was daylight when the meeting broke up and they all returned to their quarters.

Meanwhile the Marshal had returned to Jizhou and told the Governor what had transpired when the edict was read on Mount Liang. The Governor said: "I'll wager it's because you used the wrong language."

"I didn't even dare open my mouth," said the Marshal.

"In any case you've wasted your time," said the Governor. "The mission has failed and you'd better return to the capital as fast as you can and report to the court. There's no time to lose."

So the Marshal and his two companions, with their men, has-tened back to the capital. When he saw the Grand Preceptor he told how the bandits of Mount Liang had torn up the amnesty and responded with insults. The Grand Preceptor was incensed. "That bunch of brigands, how dare they behave so outrageously! How can the great Song Empire permit the insolence of this rabble!"

"But for the protection of your great name I should have had to leave my bones on Mount Liang," the Marshal lamented. "I am lucky to have escaped with my life and to be able to report back to Your Excellency!"

The Grand Preceptor sent word for President of the Military Council Tong Guan and Marshals Gao and Yang, to come at once to his office to discuss the grave military situation. In a little while they were ushered into the chamber of the war council in the White Tiger Pavilion. When all were seated, the Grand Preceptor had Chamberlain Zhang and Colonel Li describe the tearing up of the amnesty on Mount Liang and the insults.

Marshal Yang said: "Whoever suggested offering an amnesty to this rabble? What official thought this one up?"

Marshal Gao said: "If I had been present that day I would have stopped it. How could this business have been undertaken?"

Marshal Tong said: "We are we worrying our heads over a pack of thieving rats and mad dogs. I know I've no special talent, but I'm ready to lead an army out and I guarantee that within a fixed time limit I will have swept the marshes clear!"

The others said: "Tomorrow propose it to the Emperor." With that the meeting broke up.

At the next day's morning court, after the courtiers had made their obeisance and ministers completed the ceremonies, the Grand Preceptor came forward and reported this matter to the Emperor. The Emperor was very angry. "Which of you advised us that day to proclaim an amnesty?" he asked.

A minister replied: "It was the suggestion of Your Majesty's chief of staff Cui Jing, Sire."

The Emperor ordered the offending minister to report to the Ministry of Justice for sentencing. Turning to the Grand Preceptor, he asked: "These scoundrels have been causing trouble for too long, whom shall we send to arrest them?"

"We must use a considerable army or we will not be able to catch them out," said the Grand Preceptor. "In my humble opinion the chief of the Military Council should go himself, with a strong enough force to make a clean sweep. He can get it all done within the given time."

The Emperor summoned Tong Guan and asked: "Are you prepared to head the campaign against the outlaws in the Marshes of Mount Liang?"

Tong Guan knelt and declared: "Sire, there is an old saying, 'For the sake of filial piety you must give all your strength, for the sake of honour you must sacrifice your life.' I am prepared to work like a horse in order to remove this internal threat." Marshals Gao and Yang both gave their backing. The Emperor had the order promulgated, funds allotted and the commission written out appointing Marshal Tong as commander-in-chief with power to raise troops throughout the empire and select an auspicious day to embark on the campaign to eradicate the bandits in the Marshes of Mount Liang. And indeed, we can say:

Proudly, like a great general, he enters the fray;
He returns hanging his head like a beaten child!

The Professor Wu Yong Lay Out 4-Dipper Positions & 5-Pennant Arches & unfurls the standard of the Dipper; Song Jiang Sets Troops in 9 Segments Within an Octagon & attacks in the 8 Trigrams formation

Tong Guan proceeded to the Council of Military Affairs to muster troops and issue tallies. He ordered each of the eight military districts under the jurisdiction of the Eastern Capital to dispatch ten thousand men, headed by the district commander. The capital guards were to provide twenty thousand soldiers to protect the main body. Tong turned the running of the Council of Military Affairs over to his deputy. From the imperial garrison he selected two good generals to lead the forces on his left and right flanks.

Within ten days preparations were completed. Marshal Gao designated an official who would be responsible for quartermaster supply. Tong Guan, who maintained overall command, directed the officers of his three armies to get ready. He had weapons issued from the armory, and selected an auspicious day for departure. Marshals Gao and Yang gave him a farewell banquet. The imperial court directed the Council of Administration to dispense money among the soldiers.

Tong Guan ordered his commanders to set forth with the troops the following day. He bid farewell to the emperor, vaulted into the saddle, and left the city. Five li beyond the gate he found Marshals Gao and Yang waiting for him with a large body of officials. Tong dismounted, and Gao handed him a ceremonial cup of wine.

"Military Affairs Chancellor," said Marshal Gao, "you will undoubtedly distinguish yourself for the throne and return victorious. But you mustn't underestimate the bandits who conceal themselves in the marsh. First, store up a good supply of grain and fodder and build strong stockades, then you can lure them down from the mountain. Send suitable persons to scout out what they are up to before advancing. Capture every one of them alive. Don't let the imperial court down. I hope you will consider what I say."

"The words from your vast learning will remain engraved on my heart. I will not forget."

The two men drank. Marshal Yang came forward with ceremonial flagon and addressed Tong.

"The chancellor has read books on military lore and is deeply versed in strategy. Ordinarily, he would catch the bandits as easily as turning over his hand. Unfortunately, they operate in a marsh, and have the terrain in their favor. I trust, Chancellor, that you have a good plan."

"I will strike when the opportunity presents. I have my own methods," said Tong.

The two officials drank to him, and said: "Here, outside the capital's gate, we pledge you this: We shall look forward eagerly to news of your victory." They bid one another farewell and got on their horses.

Gao, Yang, and the other dignitaries returned to the city. The numerous minor officials who were also seeing Tong Guan off gradually dwindled away.

The three armies marched, every man bristling with martial spirit. They kept well-formed ranks. Discipline was strict. Leading the expedition was a vanguard of four divisions, commanded by a general. The rear unit was also comprised of four divisions, under another general. Covering the left and right of the eight divisions were flanking units headed by more generals. In addition to the main body commanded by Tong Guan directly, the twenty thousand infantry and cavalry guarding the flanks were all crack members of the imperial garrison. Holding his baton, Chancellor Tong supervised the march. The weapons advanced like a turbulent river, men and horses seemed to sail with the wind.

After fifty li they made camp. The next day they resumed the march along the winding road. In less than two days they reached the boundaries of Jizhou Prefecture. Zhang Shuye, the prefect, emerged from the city to greet them. The armies camped outside the walls.

Tong Guan, with a troop of light cavalry, rode in and dismounted before prefectural headquarters. Zhang invited him into the main hall. The prefect kowtowed and was raised to his feet. He stood courteously before the Chancellor of Military Affairs.

"Those swamp bandits kill good citizens and rob travelling merchants. They're committed many a wicked crime," said Tong Guan. "Time and again we've tried to catch them, but we've never done so, and they've been allowed to spread. I come at the head of a hundred commanders and a hundred thousand troops. I shall eradicate the mountain stronghold, capture the brigands, and restore peace to the populace."

"The bandits operate in the marsh, Chancellor," said Zhang. "Although they're only mountain outlaws, there are some intelligent and courageous men among them. Don't let yourself be governed by anger. Devise careful plans, and you will succeed."

"It's timid, weak officials like you, leery of weapons and scared of death, who harm the nation and allow such brigandage to exist!" Tong shouted in a rage. "I'm here, now! You've nothing to fear!"

Zhang dared say no more. He lavishly wined and dined his guest, and Tong Guan left the city. The following day, at the head of his huge force, Chancellor Tong neared Liangshan Marsh.

Song Jiang had been informed by his spies of the coming attack some days before. With Wu Yong he worked out an airtight strategy, and they awaited the arrival of the big army. They instructed the outlaw chieftains to obey orders and allow no slip-ups.

Tong Guan had designated Duan Pengju, district commander of Suizhou Prefecture, as leader of the vanguard, with Chen Zhu, district commander of Zhengzhou, as his deputy. District Commander Wu Bingyi of Chenzhou was named leader of the combined rear; his deputy was Li Ming, district commander of Xuzhou. Han Tianlin, district commander of Tangzhou, and Wang Yi, district commander of Dengzhou, were put in charge of the left patrol; district commander Ma Wanli of Ruzhou and Zhou Xin, district commander of Songzhou, led the right patrol. Generals Feng Mei and Bi Sheng commanded the flanks of the central army. Tong Guan, the commander-in-chief, in full armor, exercised personal control over all operations.

Three times the battle drums thundered, and the army resumed its march. Before it had gone ten li, an enemy patrol was seen approaching in a rising cloud of dust. Thirty or so outlaw riders, the bells on their horses jingling, drew near. Black kerchiefs bound their heads, and they wore green battle robes. Their steeds were decked in red tassels and dozens of copper bells. Plumes protruding from the animals' hindquarters. The men carried long thin lances banded with silver, and light bows and arrows.

The standard of the leader bore the inscription: Patrol Commander Zhang Qin the Featherless Arrow. To his left was Gong Wang, to his right Ding Desun. About a hundred paces from Tong Guan's advance unit, the patrol reined in and turned back. The two commanders of the vanguard were unable to act, since they had no orders. They reported to the central command. Tong Guan rode forward personally. Before he had finished his inspection, Zhang Qin again advanced. Tong Guan was about to send men after him when one of his aides issued a warning.

"He has stones in an embroidered bag behind his saddle. When he throws, he never misses. Better let him alone."

Featherless Arrow rode out three times. Tong Guan made no move. Zhang Qin and his patrol went away.

Again the government army marched. Before it had gone five li gongs sounded behind the hills and around the bend came five hundred outlaw infantry. They were led by Black Whirlwind Li Kui, Fan Rui the Demon King Who Roils the World, Xiang Chong the Eight-Armed Nezha, and Li Gun the Flying Divinity. At the foot of the slope the brigands spread out in a straight line, round shields neatly in place.
Tong Guan at the head of his army waved his fly-whisk baton, and his soldiers surged rapidly forward. Li Kui and Fan Rui divided their infantry unit into two, both of which withdrew around the bend, all carrying their shields reversed. The government troops pursued them through a gap in the hills.
Reaching the other side they found a broad level plain, and there they began setting up their battle positions. In the distance Li Kui and Fan Rui scaled a height and disappeared into a forest.
Tong Guan's men erected a tall wooden command platform. Two military experts climbed to the top. In response to Tong's orders they directed soldiers to left and right, high and low, moving them into four positions shaped like hollow scoops.
No sooner was this done than cannon boomed on the rear of the mountain, and out flew a body of brigand cavalry. The government vanguard, already in position, waited to meet the foe. Ordering an aide to hold his horse, Tong Guan climbed to the top of the command platform. He saw a column of horsemen surging from the east side of the mountain. The foremost troop carried red flags, the second had striped ones, the third bore blue flags, the fourth also carried flags that were striped.
Another cavalry unit was sweeping around the west side of the mountain. The first troop carried striped flags: the second, white: the third, also striped; and the fourth, black. Behind each of the flag bearers streamed massed pennants of yellow.
Hurriedly the government generals repaired to the center of the army and established defensive formations. They could see the raiders clearly now, advancing from the south. Bearing flags of flaming red the lead riders were dressed in red gowns and armor; their roan-colored horses were festooned with red tassels.
The red standard in the lead was embroidered above in gold thread with the six-starred Southern Dipper, and below in cinnabar with the emblem of a bird. On it was written: Vanguard General Qin Ming the Thunderbolt, and Qin suddenly emerged from the sea of red banners. On his left was deputy commander Shan Tinggui the Water General, on his right deputy commander Wei Dingguo the Fire General. Twirling their weapons astride their roan steeds they halted at the edge of the battlefield.
To their east were riders bearing blue flags. They wore blue gowns and armor, and blue tassels decorated their blue-grey horses. The blue standard in the lead was embroidered above in gold thread with the four-starred Eastern Dipper, and below in blue thread with a dragon. On it was written The Big Halberd Guan Sheng, General of the Left Army, and from the sea of blue banners Guan suddenly emerged. Beside him were his deputy commanders. On his left was Ugly Son-in-Law Xuan Zan, on his right Hao Siwen the Wild Dog. The three, weapons in hand, astride their blue-grey mounts, halted at the edge of the battlefield.
To the west appeared a troop of horsemen bearing white banners and wearing white gowns and armor, and riding white horses with white tassels, The white standard in the lead was embroidered above in gold thread with the five-starred Western Dipper, and below with a white tiger. On it was written Panther Head Lin Chong, General of the Right Army, and from the massed white banners Lin surged forth, flanked by his deputy commanders. On his left was Huang Xin Suppressor of the Three Mountains, on his right Sun Li the Sickly General. Twirling their weapons astride their white steeds they reined in at the battlefield.
Behind came cavalry with black banners. The gowns and armor of the men were black, as were the horses and their tassels. On the black standard in the lead the seven-starred North Dipper was embroidered above in gold thread, with the symbol for the Seven Northern Constellations below. It bore the words: Two Rods Huyan Zhuo, General of the Combined Rear, and Huyan suddenly emerged from amid the sea of black banners. With him were his deputy commanders. Ever-Victorious General Han Tao was on his left, the Eyes of Heaven General Peng Qi was on his right. Weapons in hand they halted their black steeds at the edge of the field of battle.
From the shadows of an arch of pennants to the southeast a troop rode forth carrying blue banners and wearing red armor. Embroidered on the standard in the lead in gold thread was the wind symbol above and a flying dragon below. Written on it were the words: General Two Spears Dong Ping, and Dong emerged with his deputy commanders from amid the banners. On his left was Ou Peng Golden-Winged Hawk, on his right Fiery-Eyed Lion Deng Fei. They reined in at the battlefield, weapons in hand.
A troop with red banners and white armor emerged from the shadows of an arch of pennants to the southwest. Embroidered on the lead standard in gold thread was the earth-symbol, and below that a winged bear. It bore the words: Urgent Vanguard Suo Chao, General of the Cavalry, and Suo rode forth from the banners, accompanied by his deputy commanders. On his left was Elegant Tiger Yan Shun, on his right Ma Lin the Elfin Flutist. Weapons in hand, the three halted their chargers at the battlefield.
Through an arch of pennants to the northeast came a body of horsemen with black banners and blue armor. On the lead standard embroidered in gold thread was the symbol for mountain, and below that a flying panther. On it was inscribed: Cavalry General Nine Dragons Shi Jin, and Shi emerged from the sea of banners with his deputy commanders. On his left was Gorge-Leaping Tiger Chen Da, on his right White-Spotted Snake Yang Chun. Weapons in hand, they halted at the battlefield astride their chargers.
From the northwest, through an arch of pennants came a cavalry unit with white banners and black armor. The symbol for Heaven was embroidered in gold thread on the upper half of the lead standard; below it was a flying tiger. Cavalry General Yang Zhi the Blue-Faced Brute read the standard, and Yang emerged from amid the banners, accompanied by his deputies. Yang Lin the Elegant Panther was on his left. On his right was Zhou Tong the Little King. The three reined in their chargers at the edge of the field of battle, holding their weapons.
The outlaw forces were thus laid out in a huge iron octagon, cavalry grouped with cavalry, infantry with infantry, all bristling with weapons, banners in neat rows—a formidable array! In the center were flags of apricot yellow, interspersed with sixty-four long banners, each bearing the octagon diagram.
At the four points of the compass the octagon was broken by four arches. Cavalry massed at the southern end, and in the shadows of the arch of pennants were two commanders, in ordinary dress astride yellow-brown horses. The first was Beautiful Beard Zhu Tong, the second was Lei Heng the Winged Tiger. All the riders in the troop carried yellow banners, wore yellow robes and yellow bronze armor, and sat yellow-brown steeds decked with yellow tassels.
The interior position was also open at four corners. Shi En the Golden-Eyed Tiger Cub commanded the eastern opening, the western entry was under Zheng Tianshou the Fair-Faced Gentleman, Song Wan the Guardian of the Clouds held the southern, and Xue Yong the Sick Tiger the northern.
In the center of the yellow pennants was an apricot-yellow banner reading: Act in Heaven's Behalf. From the pole to which this was attached ran four woolen cords, and these were grasped by four tall stalwarts to hold the pole firm. Also guarding the banner was a man on horseback, Yu Baosi the Spirit of the Dangerous Road.
Behind these was an artillery platform under the command of cannoneer Ling Zhen the Heaven-Shaking Thunder. He was assisted by well over twenty men who surrounded the platform. To their rear was a section of outlaws armed with hooked poles and nooses for snaring the enemy.
Next was another massing of banners and pennants, seven each on four sides, a total of twenty-eight, embroidered with twenty-eight different constellations. In the center of these was a wool-napped, gosling-yellow flag bordered with pearls, with golden bells hanging from its lower edge and topped with plumes, indicating the headquarters of the highest commander.
Guarding this flag was Jiao Ting the Merciless, assisted by Kong Ming the Comet and Kong Liang the Flaming Star, both mounted and both in ordinary dress. In ranks to their front and rear were twenty-four brigands in iron armor and armed with wolf-toothed cudgels.
Next were embroidered generals' flags, with twelve men on each side carrying square-bladed decorated halberds. The embroidered flag on the left read: Lu Fang the Little Duke. The embroidered flag on the right was inscribed: Guo Sheng the Second Rengui. Both commanders were mounted.
Between the rows of halberdiers were infantry armed with steel pitchforks. They were led by the brothers Xie Zhen the Two-Headed Snake and Xie Bao the Twin-Tailed Scorpion, both of whom were in ordinary dress, and guarded the central army. Next, on finely saddled steeds, were two civil officers in charge of rewards and punishments. One was Xiao Rang the Master Hand, who looked after documents on Mount Liangshan. The other was Ironclad Virtue Pei Xuan, who was the chief secretary of the stronghold.
These were followed by twenty-four security guards dressed in purple and armed with wide-bladed sabres. They were led by two executioners wearing silks and satins, who stood between the rows. The first was Iron Arm Cai Fu. The second was his brother Cai Qing, known as the Single Blossom. They stood to the fore, with sword carriers to their left and right.
Behind, in two rows, were twenty-four brigands with gold and silver lances. Each row was under a mounted commander. The twelve in the left row bore gold lances, and their commander, also bearing a lance of gold, was Xu Ning the Metal Lancer. The twelve in the right row all bore silver lances, including their mounted commander Hua Rong the Lesser Li Guang. Both leaders had a gallant yet dangerous air. Their Lancers all wore black gauze turbans with ornaments of jade leaves and gold flowers tucked under in front of the ear. The twelve gold lancers in the left row wore green, the twelve silver lancers in the right row wore purple.
Still further back were pairs in silk clothes and colorful hats, groups in pink gowns and embroidered tunics. On either side were tents of jade green, vermilion panoplies and black umbrellas, yellow axes and white whisks, floating greens and flashing purples, then two lines of twenty-four ax-halberdiers, and twenty-four in pairs bearing rods. Between these, in a single line, were three umbrellas embroidered in gold thread and three fine horses in brocaded trappings.
Two heroic figures stood before the middle steed. The man on the left, of noble visage, was that incomparable chieftain Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller. He held a gosling-yellow flag inscribed with the word Order, and was responsible for the swift transmission of all military information and troop movement directives.
The man on the right was strikingly unusual in appearance. He was that dashing chieftain so skilled at secret activities, Yan Qing the Prodigy. Slung across his back was a powerful bow and sharp-tipped arrows. He held an eyebrow-high staff and was responsible for the security of the central army.
On the far right side of the army, seated on a handsomely equipped mount beneath a blue silk canopy embroidered in gold thread was that famed Taoist of high virtue Gongsun Sheng the Dragon in the Clouds. A true reverend, he could summon the wind and call the rain, order about demons and work magic. Attached to his back were two excellent swords, and the reins in his hands were of silk.
On the far left, astride a richly caparisoned steed beneath a blue silk canopy embroidered in gold thread, was that agile-minded, ever-victorious righteous general Wu Yong the Wizard, a remarkable strategist and tactician. He held a feathered fan. A set of bronze chains hung from his waist.
In the exact center, seated on the White Jade Lion That Glows in the Night, under a bright red canopy embroidered with gold thread, was the loyal and virtuous commander-in-chief Song Jiang, originally a citizen of Yuncheng, a county seat in Jizhou Prefecture in the province of Shandong. Known as the Timely Rain and Defender of Justice, he was in full armor and carried a sword of the finest Kunwu steel. Astride his gold-saddled white horse, he observed the battlefield and directed the central army.
Behind him, on battle chargers, were thirty-five lieutenant-generals in symmetrical ranks, armed with halberds, swords, bows and arrows. Next were twenty-four trumpeters and a complete military band. Beyond the battlefield, commandoes crouched in ambush on either side.
Leading the flanking forces on the left of the central army Mu Hong the Unrestrained, seconded by his younger brother Mu Chun the Slightly Restrained, had fifteen hundred men under his command. An equal number were led by Liu Tang the Red-Haired Demon on the right, aided by Tao Zongwang the Nine-Tailed Tortoise.
In the rear position was a female contingent, all on horseback, consisting of Ten Feet of Steel in the middle, Gu Dasao the Tigress on the left, and Sun the Witch on the right. Also covering the rear were their husbands Wang Ying the Stumpy Tiger, with Sun Xin the Junior General to his left, and Zhang Qing the Vegetable Gardener to his right.
Infantry and cavalry together, the outlaw forces totalled two thousand. But their manner of deployment was not to be underestimated. From his command platform Chancellor Tong Guan looked over their nine segments within an octagon, the brigands' bold cavalry, their heroic infantry, and his soul flew from him in fright, and his heart dropped.
"I couldn't understand why government troops were defeated each time they sought to capture these bandits," he cried. "Who knew they were so formidable!"
He watched for a long time, and heard the steady beat of the gongs and war drums of Song Jiang's army. Tong Guan came down from the platform, mounted his horse and rode to the front.
"Who dares to go fiercely forth and challenge combat?" he asked his generals.
A bold vanguard commander vaulted into the saddle and bowed to Tong Guan. "I will be glad to," he said. "Please give the order."
The speaker was Chen Zhu, district commander of Zhengzhou Prefecture. He wore a white robe and silver armor. His horse was bluish-white and decked with brown tassels. Chen, who wielded a long-handled sword, was deputy leader of the vanguard.
Tong Guan directed that three rolls be beaten on the golden drums, and that the red flag of the vanguard be broken out on the command platform. Chen Zhu galloped forward from the arch of pennants. Both armies set up a cry. Chen reined in, holding his blade horizontal.
"Wicked bandits, rebellious traitors," he shouted, "the emperor's soldiers are here! Surrender, or your bones and flesh will be ground to mud! Regrets will be too late!"
From the southern end of the outlaws' position, vanguard commander Qin Ming the Thunderbolt raced his steed to the field of combat. Without a word, he rode directly at Chen Zhu, brandishing his cudgel. The horses met, weapons waved, the cudgel struck, the blade slashed. Four arms contended, eight hoofs churned the turf.
Back and forth, they fought for more than 20 rounds. Qin Ming feinted and let Chen Zhu move in. Chen's sword sliced the empty air. Thunderbolt raised his cudgel and brought it down with full force, smashing his opponent's helmet and cranium with a single blow. Chen Zhu fell dead beneath his steed. Shan Tinggui and Wei Dingguo, Qin Ming's deputy commanders, rode out quickly, seized the mount of the fallen foe, and escorted Qin Ming back to the outlaw lines.
Beneath the southeastern arch of pennants, General 2 Spears Dong Ping watched Qin Ming win the first contest. "This has taken the wind out of the sails of the government army," he thought. "What'd be a better time than now to dash over and capture Tong Guan!"
With a thunderous roar, a spear in either hand, he smote his steed and charged across the field. Tong Guan turned his horse and rode in amid his central army. At that same moment, Suo Chao the Urgent Vanguard beneath the southwest arch of pennants uttered a shout. "Let's nab Tong Guan! What're we waiting for!"
He galloped across the field, waving his big axe. Since both ends were already in motion, Qin Ming ordered his entire troop of red-bannered cavalry to charge and take Tong Guan. Truly, all of the chancellor's misdeeds came home to roost. They pursued him like black eagles chasing a purple swallow, like savage tigers after an innocent lamb.

The Men of Mount Liang Lay Ambush on All Sides; Song Jiang Twice Vanquishes Chancellor Marshal Tong Guan

Three units of Song Jiang's vanguard raced across the field. They ploughed into Tong Guan's army with swords and axes and inflicted a crushing defeat. Badly mauled, the government forces scattered, abandoning arms and equipment, yelling in fright. More than ten thousand soldiers were cut down. The rest fled thirty li before they halted and made camp.
Wu Yong had the trumpeters blow assembly. His order was transmitted: "Stop the pursuit and slaughter. We only want to give them a sample!" The outlaws returned to their stronghold, where they reported their exploits and claimed rewards.
Tong Guan was very disturbed over the losses his army had sustained, and he summoned his generals for a conference. Feng Mei and Bi Sheng reassured him.
"Don't worry, Chancellor," they said. "The bandits, when they learned we were coming, were able to lay out their battle positions ahead of time. Our forces were unfamiliar with the situation here, and the brigands were able to trick us. With the mountain as their base, they can move troops around and create diversions. We've had a temporary set-back because of the terrain. We'll reorganize and rest for three days to let our men regain their morale and give our horses a breather. Then we'll stretch our entire army into a long line, all on foot, and advance. We'll be like a mountain snake: If the head is attacked, the tail will come to the rescue; if the tail is attacked, the head will come to the rescue; if the middle is attacked, both head and tail will support it. Each section will be part of a continuous whole. This next battle we're sure to win."
"An excellent plan," said Tong Guan. "Just what I was thinking, myself."
He issued appropriate orders. The soldiers were re-grouped and given further training.
At the fifth watch on the third day the government troops rose and ate a hearty breakfast. The horses were equipped with leather armor, the men wore iron plate. Swords and axes, bows and arrows, all were readied. Truly, weapons flowed in a rapid stream, infantry and cavalry sped like the wind.
Generals Feng Mei and Bi Sheng led the government army, militant and imposing, in a rapid march on Liangshan Marsh. The eight columns divided into a left and right. Three hundred armored cavalry rode as advance scouts. After a while they returned and reported to Tong Guan: "We haven't seen a single enemy soldier on the field where we fought the other day."
Suspicious, the chancellor summoned his generals and demanded: "Shall we withdraw?"
"Don't even consider it," Feng Mei urged. "Just keep pushing on. In our long snake deployment what have we to fear?"
Forward wound the government expedition until it came to the edge of the marsh. Not an adversary was in sight. They saw only a body of water and misty reeds. On the summit of the mountain stronghold in the distance an apricot-yellow flag unfurled, but there was no other movement.
A small boat glided out of the reeds along the opposite shore. Its lone occupant, in a conical hat and coir cape, sat sideways with his back to the government troops, fishing.
"Where are the robbers?" the soldiers hailed him.
He did not respond. Tong Guan ordered his archers to shoot. Two mounted men rode down to the edge of the river, fitted arrows to their bows, and let fly. The first arrow pinged off the conical hat and dropped into the water. The second clanged against the coir cape and also landed in the river.
The marksmen were two of Tong Guan's best archers. Startled, they wheeled their steeds around and trotted back. They bowed from the saddle and reported: "Both arrows scored a hit, but they didn't penetrate! We don't know what he's wearing!"
Tong Guan dispatched three hundred crack archers of the mounted vanguard. They spread out along the river bank and shot their feathered shafts, together. The fisherman remained unperturbed. Though most of the arrows fell short, several reached the boat. But those which struck the conical hat or coir cape bounced off harmlessly.
Since the target couldn't be killed by arrows, Tong Guan sent soldiers who could swim to capture him. Forty or fifty divested themselves of their armor and clothing and plunged into the river.
From the noise to the stern of his boat, the fisherman knew they were coming. Calmly he set down his tackle and picked up the oar which was lying beside him. As each swimmer drew near, he cracked him with the oar—on the temple, the crown, or the forehead—driving him beneath the waves. The others hastily returned to the bank and sought their clothes and armor.
Tong Guan was furious. He ordered five hundred more soldiers to the river and demanded that they capture the fisherman; whoever retreated would be cut in two! The soldiers stripped on the shore and jumped in, shouting. The fisherman turned the craft around and pointed at Tong Guan on the bank.
"Thieving minister, disrupter of the nation, animal who ravages the people! So you've come here to die! Don't you know you're as good as dead!"
Enraged, Tong Guan bellowed for his cavalry archers to shoot. The fisherman laughed.
"They'll never get here in time!" He flicked off his coir cape and conical hat and dove deep.
The five hundred soldiers by then had reached the boat. Suddenly, there were wild yells among them, as they began to sink. For the fisherman was White Streak in the Waves Zhang Shun. Under his hat and cape had been a bronze helmet and bronze armor. Encased like a turtle in its shell, he had been impervious to arrows. Now with his dagger he was killing soldiers, one after another, and the river was red with blood. Those who could, fled for their lives, while Tong Guan goggled from the shore in stupefaction.
"That yellow flag on top of the mountain seems to be moving," an officer beside him said, pointing.
The chancellor peered. Neither he nor his generals could fathom the significance. Feng Mei had a suggestion.
"How about dividing three hundred armored cavalry into two troops and sending them around both sides of the mountain to have a look at the rear?"
But as the horsemen neared the mountain, a cannon thundered from the reeds, spreading a pall of smoke. The cavalry quickly returned. "They're lying in ambush there!" they reported.
Tong Guan was stunned. Feng Mei and Bi Sheng ordered their men to stay out. Several hundred thousand soldiers waited, weapons in hand. Mounted messengers galloped to every section of the army, shouting: "Whoever runs will be executed!"
While the chancellor and his generals watched from their saddles, drums pounded on the rear of the mountain. Fierce shouts shook the heavens, and a large detachment came racing forward, all carrying yellow banners, with two valorous leaders at their head.
Riding golden brown horses were the heroic Zhu Tong the Beautiful Beard and his deputy commander Lei Heng the Winged Tiger. With them were five thousand men, mounted and on foot, eager to destroy the government soldiers. At Tong Guan's order Feng Mei and Bi Sheng rode forward to meet the foe. They drew rein at the field of combat, weapons at the ready, and swore.
"Surrender, you lawless bandits! What are you waiting for!"
Lei Heng laughed and shouted back: "Death is staring you in the face, dolts, and you don't even know it! How dare you venture to do battle with us!"
Bi Sheng was very angry. He clapped his steed and charged Lei Heng with levelled lance. The Winged Tiger spurred his mount. The horses met, the weapons clashed. Over twenty rounds the contenders fought with neither besting the other.
Feng Mei, seeing that Bi Sheng couldn't win, smote his mount and rode to join the fray, waving his sword. Zhu Tong uttered a cry and galloped, brandishing his blade, to intercept Feng Mei. Four horses, two sets of battlers, fought splendidly on the field of combat. Tong Guan kept exclaiming in admiration.
Just as the contest was reaching its climax Zhu Tong and Lei Heng executed a feint, turned their mounts, and rode towards their original position. Feng Mei and Bi Sheng, reluctant to let them go, gave chase. The outlaw force, shouting, withdrew in the direction of the rear of the mountain. Tong Guan led his army in hot pursuit past the foot of the mountain.

On the summit, trumpets blared. The government troops looked up. From before and behind, cannon balls whistled overhead. Tong Guan realized that enemy forces were hiding in ambush. He ordered a halt.
An apricot-yellow banner unfurled on the mountain top, embroidered with the words: Act in Heaven's Behalf. Skirting the side of the slope Tong Guan saw amid a phalanx of colored pennants and banners on the heights the figure of Song Jiang, world-renowned hero from Yuncheng County in Shandong and Defender of Justice. Behind him were his generals Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng, Hua Rong and Xu Ning, plus his Gold and Silver Lancers.
Angrily Tong Guan ordered a contingent to go up and seize Song Jiang. Two columns prepared to ascend the slope. The sound of beating drums and hearty laughter floated down. Tong Guan's rage grew, and he ground his teeth.
"That robber dares to toy with me," he grated. "I'll capture him myself!"
"Chancellor, you must have a plan," Feng Mei said. "Don't go into danger personally. Call back our army and we'll investigate further. After that we can advance."
"Nonsense! We've already come this far. Why should we withdraw! We've been ordered to engage the bandits as quickly as possible. Now, we've seen them. We can't retreat!"
Before the words were out of his mouth, shouts were heard from the rear army, and a scout reported: "Due west, from behind the mountain, a strong force has emerged and split our rear army in two!"
Tong Guan, startled, hurried to the rescue with Feng Mei and Bi Sheng. At that moment behind the mountain on the east side drums sounded and out rushed another contingent. Half carried red banners, half carried blue. Five thousand infantry and cavalry, they were headed by two generals.
Qin Ming the Thunderbolt commanded the red banners, Guan Sheng the Big Halberd led the blues.
The two galloped up on their horses and shouted: "Tong Guan surrender your head!"
Enraged, the chancellor sent Feng Mei against Guan Sheng and Bi Sheng against Qin Ming. Angry shouts in his rear army intensified, but Tong Guan had the trumpets call assembly. He ordered his rear to fall back, and not be impatient for combat.
Zhu Tong and Lei Heng, leading a force of yellow banners, again attacked, this time in a pincers movement. The government troops were thrown into confusion. Feng Mei and Bi Sheng protected Tong Guan, and he fled for his life. An outlaw force, five thousand strong, cut in at an angle and intercepted them. Half of this unit bore white banners, the other half black. Commanding the blacks was Two Rods Huyan Zhuo, commanding the whites was Panther Head Lin Chong.
The two shouted from their horses: "Treacherous Tong Guan, where do you think you're going? Stand and be killed!" They charged in directly among the government soldiers.
Duan Pengju, district commander of Suizhou, took on Huyan Zhuo. Ma Wanli, district commander of Ruzhou, contended with Lin Chong. Ma commenced to weaken after only several rounds. As he turned to flee, Lin Chong uttered a roar. Hopelessly flurried, Ma was pierced by Lin's thrust. He fell dead beneath his horse.
Duan Pengju lost his appetite for battle at the sight of his companion's body. He parried Huyan's rods, wheeled his mount around, and galloped away.
Huyan gave chase, and the two armies clashed in a general melee. Tong Guan scrambled to get back to his own forces. Wild shouts rose in the forward ranks. From behind the mountain a contingent of brigand infantry came running, and ploughed into the very center of the government army. It was led by a monk and a pilgrim, who yelled: "Don't let Tong Guan escape!"
The monk never read the scriptures but specialized in slaughter. He was Lu Zhishen, otherwise known as the Tattooed Monk. The pilgrim had killed the tiger on Jingyang Ridge. He was Wu Song, the boldest hero in the marsh-girt stronghold. Lu with his Buddhist staff, and Wu with his pair of swords, slashed into the government position.
The outlaw infantry charge shattered the imperial army into segments. Both advance and retreat were impossible. Tong Guan could only, with Feng Mei and Bi Sheng, break through the encirclement and hack a bloody path to the rear of the mountain. Just as they were catching their breath, they again heard the thunder of cannon and the pounding of drums. Another contingent of outlaw infantry, headed by two commanders, stopped them once more.
Xie Zhen and Xie Bao, each with a five-tined pitchfork, led their infantry in a headlong attack. Tong Guan and his men could not be checked. They broke through the barrier. But assailed from five sides by outlay forces on horse and on foot the government army was fragmented. Tong Guan fled, protected by Feng Mei and Bi Sheng.
The Xie brothers, with their pitchforks, rushed towards the mounted generals. Tong Guan clapped his horse and galloped off at an angle. Feng Mei and Bi Sheng, hurrying to cover his rear, met the district commanders of Tangzhou and Dengzhou—Han Tianlin and Wang Yi, and the four, together, fought their way out.
They hadn't gone very far, and were just catching their breaths, when they saw before them a cloud of dust and heard fierce yells. Out of a leafy green glade flew a mounted troop, headed by two commanders, and obstructed their road. General Two Spears Dong Ping and Urgent Vanguard Suo Chao charged directly at Tong Guan without a word.
Wang Yi, with levelled lance, tried to intercept them, but Suo Chao raised his ax and cut him from his steed. Han Tianlin, attempting a rescue, was pierced through by Dong Ping's spears. Feng Mei and Bi Sheng again galloped off with Tong Guan, striving desperately to save him. Drums beat on all sides. They had no idea from which direction the enemy was coming.
Tong Guan hauled his mount to the top of a bluff and looked. Four contingents of Liangshan Marsh cavalry, two auxiliaries and two units of infantry had surrounded the government troops and were sweeping through them like giant baskets and scoops, scattering them like clouds before the wind. The soldiers were running, panic-stricken, east and west.
A troop appeared at the foot of the slope. Tong Guan recognized the banners of district commanders Wu Bingyi of Chenzhou and Li Ming of Xuzhou. Their soldiers, beaten and bedraggled, carrying broken weapons, had come around Mount Linlang, seeking a place to hide. When Tong Guan hailed them, they turned their horses and started up the slope eagerly. But from the side of the mountain there were shouts, and a troop of cavalry charged forth. They bore two identifying banners and were led by Yang Zhi and Shi Jin. These two commanders, waving their blades, barred the way of the government officers.
Li Ming with levelled lance advanced on Yang Zhi. Wu rode against Shi Jin with crescent-bladed halberd. The two pairs fought up and down the slope and round and round, each man exerting his utmost skill. Tong Guan, reined in on the bluff, didn't know which to watch.
The four battled for over thirty rounds. Wu thrust at his opponent's heart. Shi Jin twisted, and the halberd slipped by his ribs, horse and rider following the impetus of the lunge. Shi Jin swung his blade, and a bloody head, still encased in its golden helmet, dropped to the ground. Wu's body collapsed beside it.
Li Ming decided he'd better go. But a terrible roar from Yang Zhi scared the soul out of him and set him to trembling so violently that his lance slipped from his nerveless fingers. Yang Zhi chopped with his sword. Li Ming dodged and the blade struck his horse's loins. As its rear quarters sank Li leaped from the saddle. He cast aside his lance and ran. But Yang Zhi with a swift slash cut him down. Poor Li Ming, half his life an army officer, and now it was all gone like a dream.
The two district commanders lay dead on the slope. Yang Zhi and Shi Jin pursued the demoralized government troops, cutting heads like melons.
Tong Guan, with Feng Mei and Bi Sheng on the bluff, dared not go down. At a loss he asked his two generals: "How can we break out of here?"
"Calm yourself, Chancellor," said Feng Mei. "I see an encampment of ours due south. As long as their flag still flies, we can be saved. Commander Bi will remain to protect you, and I will carve open a path and bring them to your rescue."
"The day is growing late," said the chancellor. "Watch for a suitable moment and dash over and return soon."
Grasping his long-handled sword, Feng Mei rode quickly down the slope, and galloped full tilt along the road south. He found the unit under district commander Zhou Xin of Songzhou. They were in a tight formation and were resisting staunchly. Feng Mei was led into the position.
"Where is the chancellor?" Zhou Xin asked.
"On that slope, ahead. He's waiting for your unit to rescue him. There's no time to waste! Get started immediately!"
Zhou Xin ordered his infantry and cavalry to coordinate closely. No one was to fall behind. Body and mind, all were to combine their efforts. With the two commanders leading the shouting troops, the detachment hastened towards the slope.
Before they had gone the length of an arrow-shot a unit cut in from the side. Feng Mei rode forward to engage them, waving his sword. But then he recognized Duan Pengju, district commander of Suizhou. The three joined forces and continued to the foot of the slope. Bi Sheng came down to meet them, and escorted them to the bluff.
They conferred with Tong Guan, who queried: "Shall we fight out of here tonight, or wait until morning?"
"We four will defend you to the death, Chancellor," Feng Mei assured him. "If we break through the encirclement tonight we'll be able to escape the bandits."
As darkness began to fall they heard yells without end on every side and the disorderly beating of drums. Around the second watch the moon was bright. With Feng Mei in the lead and all grouped around Tong Guan in a protective phalanx they made a concerted rush down the slope.
At once, voices shouted: "Don't let Tong Guan get away!"
The officers fought in a due southerly direction. By the fourth watch, after a confused battle, they finally broke through. Tong Guan, on horseback, pressed his fingers to his forehead and reverently thanked the gods of Heaven and Earth.
"How fortunate that we could escape this calamity!" He and his party pushed out of the area and hastened towards Jizhou. Just as they were congratulating themselves they saw on the slope of a mountain ahead a procession of countless torches. Behind them shouts rose once more.
In the light of the flaming brands they could see two bold fellows armed with halberds, walking in advance of a heroic general on a white horse. The rider, who carried a steel-tipped lance, was none other than Lu Junyi the Jade Unicorn, also known as Lu the Magnate. The halberdiers preceding him were Yang Xiong the Pallid and Shi Xiu the Rash. Their force of over three thousand, brimming with militant spirit, now intercepted the government unit.
Lu shouted: "Tong Guan dismount and be bound! What are you waiting for?"
"Enemy soldiers are before and behind us," the chancellor said to his cohorts. "What are we going to do?"
"I'll defend you with my life, Chancellor," said Feng Mei. "We officers will protect you and wrest a way to Jizhou! I'll fight that robber personally!"
Striking his mount, he cantered towards Lu, brandishing his sword. The horses met and the men battled. After only a few rounds Lu parried the big sword with his lance, closed in quickly, and grasped Feng around the waist, simultaneously lifting him from the saddle and kicking his steed away. Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu rushed to Lu's support, while outlaw troops dragged off the prisoner.
Bi Sheng, Zhou Xin and Duan Pengju, desperately defending Tong Guan, hurled their soldiers against the brigades preventing their passage, fighting as they advanced. Lu the Magnate gave chase. Tong Guan's beaten army scurried like a bereaved family's dog, darted like fish which escaped the net.
By dawn they had shaken off their pursuers. Jizhou was in sight when, from around the bend of a mountain ahead, a body of infantry shot out. They wore iron breastplates and pink silk turbans, and were led by four commanders.
Who were they? Li Kui with his two axes, Bao Xu holding a sword, and Xiang Chong and Li Gun each wielding spiked shields. They rolled down the slope like a ball of fire, slaughtering government soldiers left and right.
Tong Guan and his officers fled, fighting as they ran. Li Kui carved into the imperial cavalry and cut the legs of Duan Pengju's steed from under it. Raising his axes, with one blow he cracked Duan's skull, with another he sliced his throat. Duan was finished.
When the remnant government troops finally neared Jizhou they were in a sorry state, their helmets over one ear, their neck guards halfway up their cheeks. Men and horses were exhausted. They stopped at a stream to drink and water the animals. A cannon suddenly boomed, and arrows flew at them like a swarm of hornets. Hastily, the soldiers scrambled back up the bank. A troop of cavalry trotted out of a grove, headed by three heroes.
They were Featherless Arrow Zhang Qin, plus Gong Wang and Ding Desun, commanding well over three hundred horsemen. Little bronze bells tinkled on the bridles of the steeds, and they were bedecked with plumes and red tassels. The riders carried light bows and arrows, embroidered pennants and decorated spears. Led by their three commanders, they charged.
They were not a large force, and Zhou Xin rode forward to meet them, while Bi Sheng covered Tong Guan's hasty departure. Zhang Qin grasped Zhou's extended lance with his left hand. His right hand pulled back in a throwing position.
"Take that!" he cried, and a stone struck Zhou on the bridge of his nose, knocking him from his saddle.
Gong Wang and Ding Desun galloped up, and pierced Zhou's throat with their pitchforks. Like grass blighted by frost, like blossoms pelted in the rain, he expired beneath his horse's legs.
The fleeing Tong Guan and Bi Sheng dared not enter Jizhou, but led their remnant force instead through the night in the direction of the Eastern Capital. En route they picked up other escaping soldiers, and together made camp.
Song Jiang, a benevolent and virtuous man, who sought only to shun wickedness and become law-abiding again, had no desire to pursue and slaughter. Afraid his officers would be reluctant to abandon the chase, he immediately dispatched Dai Zong with an order to all his chieftains to gather their commands and return to the mountain stronghold and claim Everywhere trumpets sounded assembly. Commanders in the saddle rhythmically beat their weapons against their metal stirrups, and the infantry sang songs of victory as the outlaw troops, unit by unit, entered Liangshan Marsh and marched into the Water-Girt Fortress.
Seated with Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng in Loyalty Hall, Song directed Pei Xuan to distribute the individual awards. Feng Mei, who had been captured by Lu the Magnate and delivered, bound, to the stronghold, knelt outside the hall. Song Jiang personally untied him, led him into the hall and invited him to be seated. He apologized for having inconvenienced him, and poured him wine to calm his fears. All of the chieftains had gathered, and that day there was general feasting and the dispensing of rewards to the troops.
After two days, Feng Mei was furnished with a saddled horse and preparations were made to escort him down the mountain. He was overjoyed. Song Jiang again apologized.
"Please forgive us for venturing to display our prowess on the battlefield, General," he said. "Our only desire is to obey the emperor and serve our country. Because we've been outlawed we've been compelled to behave in this manner. When you arrive at the imperial court, please explain for us. If we can some day bask again in the light of royal favor, we will never forget your great kindness, living or dead."
Feng Mei kowtowed and thanked Song Jiang for having spared him. Song Jiang supplied an escort which saw him out of the brigands' territory. Feng Mei went back to the capital. Of that we'll say no more.
Again in Loyalty Hall, Song Jiang conferred with Wu Yong and the other chieftains. All of the ambushes deployed during the battle had been planned by Wu Yong. So devastating had been the slaughter that Tong Guan was chilled with fear. Even his dreams were terror-ridden. He had lost two-thirds of his army.
"Once Tong Guan reaches the capital and reports to the emperor he's sure to raise another expedition," Wu Yong predicted. "We must send a man to learn what's going on. Then we can make suitable preparations."
"I agree completely," said Song Jiang. "But which of our brothers should it be?
"Let me go," said someone among those seated in the hall.
The others all looked and they said, "He'd be ideal. He's capable of big things." And because this person went, hundreds of war-craft were constructed outside the walls of Jizhou and on Mount Liang, a huge store of grain was added. Truly, battle chargers perished at the foot of the blue cliffs, boats cutting the waves sank in the weedy green waters.

Three divisions of Song Jiang's vanguard pursued the enemy that day with swords and axes, committing great slaughter. Marshal Tong Guan's forces suffered a grave defeat, a total rout; one of those occasions when drums and gongs are abandoned, pikes and halberds thrown away, a disaster of such dimensions that sons lose fathers, fathers can't find their sons, and brothers call each other's names in vain. Ten thousand government troops fell that day, and the survivors fled over ten miles before they dared pause and make camp.
The Professor had the gong sounded to recall Mount Liang's troops, saying: "No need to finish them off right now. That's enough for a token of what we can do."
The Mount Liang troops returned safely to the mountain stronghold and everyone was rewarded for his efforts.
Meanwhile the Marshal, having lost the battle and many men and horses besides, pitched camp and set up defences as quickly as possible to allow his army to recuperate. His mood was grim as he summoned all his commanders to discuss the situation. Two of his commanders, Feng Mei and Bi Sheng, said: "Do not be downhearted, sir. The rebels knew in advance that we were coming and they were able to set up their positions first. When we got here we did not have good intelligence and we fell into their trap. Bandits like these draw their strength from the mountains and the ability to deploy superior numbers. If they lose the topographical advantage their strength will prove illusory. We must regroup and prepare. Let us do nothing for three days, in order to revive our spirits and rest the horses. After three days we can draw up our troops in the snake formation, using our infantry to lead the attack. This formation is like a big mountain snake: if you strike at the head the tail responds, if you strike at the tail the head responds. And if you strike in the centre both head and tail respond — all are tightly linked. A method like this is certain to bring results."
The Marshal said: "It's a good plan. It has my approval."
Orders were given out and all units of the army drilled in what they had to do. On the third day they breakfasted at dawn. When officers and men had all eaten their fill, the horses were padded out in leather, the troops donned armour and equipped themselves with swords and axes, and bows were strung — as the poet says, there were "weapons thirsting for blood, men and horses swift as the wind." With Generals Feng Mei and Bi Sheng in the lead, this huge host descended on the Marshes of Mount Liang. The army was divided into eight columns, right and left. A squadron of armoured cavalry went ahead to reconnoitre. When they reported back to the Marshal and the main army, they said: "In the spot where the battle was fought the other day we saw no one."
The Marshal was disturbed by what he heard. He visited the two generals of the vanguard and said: "Do you think we should turn back?"
Feng Mei replied: "You must think only of advancing sir, not of turning back. With our snake formation, what is there to fear?"
So the army proceeded and when they were well into the marshes there was still not a single enemy in sight, nothing but water as far as the eye could see and reedbeds and mist rising over the water. Far off on the other bank they could see the mountain with a yellow flag fluttering on its summit. But there was absolutely no sign of movement. The Marshal and his two commanders reined in their horses in front of the troops. In the distance near the opposite shore they could see a small boat among a forest of reeds. In the boat was a man wearing a blue coolie hat and a green coat of woven bamboo. He was all alone, leaning on the gunwale of the boat and fishing. The Marshal's men reached the shore and shouted to the man: "Where are the bandits?" But there was no answer.
The Marshal called for expert archers. Two horsemen stole towards the shore and halted at the water's edge. They fitted arrows to their bows, aimed at the fisherman's back and let fly. The first arrow pinged off the fisherman's hat and fell into the water. The other archer's arrow clattered off the fisherman's coat and also fell into the water. These two were the Marshal's top archers and it gave them quite a surprise. They turned their horses and rode back. Bending respectfully in the saddle they reported to the Marshal: "We hit him with two arrows but they bounced off. He is wearing some kind of protection."
The Marshal ordered up three hundred crack archers from the mounted scouts and lined them up along the shore to fire a salvo. A cloud of arrows sped towards the fisherman but he was quite unperturbed: many fell in the water and others stuck in the boat, but all those which hit the coat or hat dropped harmlessly into the water. Seeing that arrows could not kill the man, the Marshal directed some of his men who could swim to undress and swim to the boat to capture him. Soon forty or fifty of them were in the water. The fisherman heard the splashing behind his boat. Quite unhurriedly he put down his fishing rod and picked up the sweep. He struck them with this as they approached the boat, catching them on the temple or the back of the head or the top of the skull and driving them under. Some of them eventually managed by swimming underwater to return to the bank and went back to find their clothes.
Marshal Tong Guan was furious. He ordered five hundred men into the water. He was determined to catch that fisherman. He warned them that anyone who returned would be put to the sword. So five hundred disrobed and leapt into the water with a loud shout. The fisherman turned his boat round to face the shore and pointing at the Marshal shouted: "You blight on the land, you savage beast, oppressor of the people, this is where you are due to meet your end! You aren't afraid to die?"
Incensed, the Marshal ordered his archers to shoot again.
The fisherman only laughed. "Watch out, because our troops are at hand!" he said. He shook his finger at them and then stripped off his hat and coat and dived into the water. When the five hundred swimmers reached the boat confused cries were heard and they began to disappear beneath the water. For this fisherman was White Eel. The hat he wore had a covering of woven bamboo leaves, but underneath it was made of bronze. The coat too had a sheet of tempered bronze underneath, and it fitted him like a tortoise its shell. Small wonder then that the arrows failed to penetrate. White Eel now dived to the bottom, took out his knife, and set about stabbing the enemy one by one. As they went down the blood came bubbling up. Some managed to swim away and escape. The Marshal watched open-mouthed on the bank. Someone standing beside him said: "Look, the yellow banner on the mountain is moving!"
Marshal Tong Guan took a good look, but he couldn't make out what it meant. Nor could anyone else make any sense of it. Feng Mei said: "Let us divide the three hundred armoured scouts into two sections and send them each a different way round the mountain on reconnaissance, to find out what is going on."
Just as they were approaching the mountain, a thunderous, earth-shattering explosion was heard in the reed-beds and a cloud of smoke came billowing out. The scouts came back from either side to report that it was an ambush, to the Marshal's consternation. Generals Feng and Bi both sent men to tell the troops not to panic. Tens of thousands of government troops with drawn swords now advanced to shouts of "Anyone who retreats will be executed!"

The Marshal watched while, to a thunderous roll of drums on the mountain and bloodcurdling cries from the enemy, a body of horsemen galloped out, all waving yellow pennants, two valiant commanders in the lead. These two, both riding dun horses, were Whiskers and Sergeant Lei. They were leading five thousand cavalry in an attack on the government forces.
The Marshal ordered his two commanders to fight them. The two levelled their lances and charged into battle shouting: "You shameless renegadoes, you'd better surrender, what are you waiting for?"
Sergeant Lei greeted this with derision. "You've come here to die, you oafs, don't you know that? What makes you think you're a match for me?" he shouted.
Bi Sheng angrily slapped his horse, levelled his lance and charged. Sergeant Lei did likewise. The horses met, the weapons rose and fell, the battle raged for over twenty bouts and still there was no victor. Feng Mei seeing his colleague go so long without victory, slapped his horse, whirled his sword and galloped to join in. Whiskers saw and with a shout slapped his horse, twirled his weapon, and galloped to oppose him. Four horses, two pairs of riders, fought it out in front of the armies, while Marshal Tong Guan looked on and applauded.
Eventually the fight strayed some way down a gully. Whiskers and Sergeant Lei broke off, turned their horses and galloped back to their ranks. Feng Mei and Bi Sheng were having none of that and galloped after them. Their opponents set up a cry and fled towards the mountain. The Marshal threw his troops forward, in an all-out attempt to catch them.
A bugle spoke now on the summit and when they looked up they saw missiles flying towards them. Realizing it was an ambush, the Marshal called off the pursuit.
At this point the yellow flag with the four words on it "To Do Heaven's Will" was broken out on the summit. This heralded the appearance up there, amid a forest of duel colour pennants, of that famous Shandong hero, Guardian of Righteousness Song Jiang. Behind him were the military adviser, Professor Wu Yong, Taoist Gongsun, Colonel Hua and the Spearsman, accompanied by a good many troopers with silver spears and gold spears. Livid with rage, the Marshal ordered men up the mountain to capture Song Jiang. Dividing into two columns his troops attempted to scale the heights. There was a thunder of gongs and drums followed by the sound of the heroes laughing. This added fuel to the fire, and Marshal Tong Guan grinding his teeth shouted out: "How dare these bandits laugh at me! I shall capture them by myself!"
General Feng Mei warned him: "Marshal, it's a trap. You mustn't put yourself at risk. Withdraw the troops and give us time to find out what is going on before we launch an attack."
"Balls!" shouted the Marshal. "Now we are here there can be no turning back. We must join battle and fight them night and day. Now I have seen them I won't countenance a withdrawal."
Before he finished speaking a cry went up from the rear: "An enemy force is attacking west of the mountain and they've cut our lines in two," came the report. The horrified Marshal with Feng Mei and Bi Sheng galloped back to rescue the rearguard. But now drums sounded on the east and another cavalry troop galloped out. Half had red pennants, the other half blue pennants. Led by two tall commanders five thousand horsemen charged behind red and blue banners maintaining perfect order. The red leader was Thunderclap and the blue leader Scimitar. As they came on they shouted: "Marshal Tong Guan, we're going to have your head!"
Outraged, the Marshal sent Feng Mei to take on Scimitar while Bi Sheng engaged Thunderclap.
Hearing the panic-stricken cries of the rearguard, the Marshal now had the gongs sound the retreat, ordering his forces to end all attempts at pursuit of the enemy, break off and withdraw.
When Whiskers and Sergeant Lei led the yellow pennant troops in a charge, pressing home their attack on two sides, the Marshal's troops were thrown into utter confusion. Feng Mei and Bi Sheng flanking their commander fled for their lives. As they were fleeing another body of fierce troops came charging in from one side and began to trade blows. Of these troops one half had white pennants and the other half black pennants. Amongst the black and the white pennants were two tall leaders with five thousand troops who blocked the way. Twin Rods was the leader of the black company, Leopard's Head the leader of the white company. They both suddenly shouted out: "Marshal Tong Guan, you evil counsellor, where do you think you can go to? Come and be killed!" And they charged straight into the enemy.
One of the Marshal's commanders engaged Twin Rods and another took on Leopard's Head. Before the second of these had had more than a few bouts with Leopard's Head he realized he was not up to it and tried to escape. With a roar Leopard's Head redoubled his efforts and caught him with a spear thrust which flung him dead from his horse. The other government commander, when he saw what had happened to his colleague, had no heart to continue the fight. He blocked his opponent's two rods and abruptly turned his horse and fled. Twin Rods pursued him furiously.
With the two armies locked in confused combat Marshal Tong Guan ordered his men to fight their way out again. Then a great shout went up from the leading division as a crowd of infantry shot out from behind the mountain and attacked the centre of his force. They were led from the front by a monk and a pilgrim, who came on shouting: "Don't let Marshal Tong Guan get away!" The monk was one whose thoughts dwelt not at all on repentance but rather on killing, one whose nickname was the Flowery Monk, in other words Lu Zhishen. The pilgrim was that killer of the tiger on Jingyang Pass, one of the boldest brethren of Mount Liang, Pilgrim Wu Song.
Under the onslaught from these two, the Marshal's main army scattered in all directions. For those in front there was no way forward, for those in the rear there was no retreat, Marshal Tong Guan was obliged with Feng Mei and Bi Sheng to carve a path through the encircling troops and flee past the mountain. As they were trying to get their breath back there was a thunder of gunfire and a tremendous burst of drums and gongs and two fierce leaders appeared with a body of infantry to block their way. It was Snake and Scorpion, each wielding a five-tined fork and with a company of footsoldiers. Rather than face them, the Marshal's troops attempted to circle round them, but the enemy attacked from every side, scattering them like chaff. Feng and Bi had just managed to get the Marshal away from this when Snake and Scorpion popped up in the path of the horses, threatening them with their forks. The Marshal hastily slapped his horse and galloped off to one side, with Feng and Bi after him.
Two other government generals, Han and Wang with a superhuman effort managed to break out of the centre. They made some headway, but had still not got their breath back when they heard bloodcurdling yells ahead of them and out from the greenwood burst another body of troops, with two leaders, who stood blocking their path: Twin Spears and Hasty. Without a word these two charged the Marshal and his party. General Wang levelled his lance and rode to meet them. Hasty's axe rose and fell and Wang fell dead from his horse. Han who had ridden to Wang's assistance was killed by a thrust from Twin Spears.
Feng and Bi risking their own lives to defend the Marshal fled with him. The clamour of drums and gongs was all around them and it was impossible to know whence the next attack was coming. When the Marshal stopped his horse on a knoll to look about him, the enemy were everywhere, four troops of cavalry, supported by two divisions of infantry on either flank, in a formation like a wicker basket or winnowing sieve. And the main army of Mount Liang was advancing fast.
Marshal Tong Guan's forces were like clouds driven by the wind. But as he watched, a body of horsemen appeared on the hillside and he recognised the standards of two of his own commanders, Generals Wu and Li. Their lances were splintered and their halberds shattered. These were the remnants of defeated troops who had sought refuge here on Gemstone Mountain. After cheers and greetings, they started to send troops up the mountain but there were more shouts and a troop of cavalry galloped out and two well-known flags were unfurled. Led by two intrepid commanders these charged the government troops. Who were the commanders? Who else but the Blue-Faced Beast and the Tattooed Dragon! They sped to cut off the two government generals. Li levelled his lance and rode to meet the Blue-Faced Beast, while Wu with his halberd took on the Tattooed Dragon. The two fighting couples drifted this way and that over the mountainside, circling and turning, each man applying every ounce of his strength and skill.
The Marshal reined in his horse to watch. After some thirty bouts Wu struck with his halberd at Tattooed Dragon's chest. The latter dodged and the weapon whistled past his ribs. As Wu and his horse shot forward Tattooed Dragon's sword caught him and the next thing his helmet was rolling at his horse's feet, the bloody head still inside it. That put paid to Wu. When Li strove to turn his horse and flee, the Blue-Faced Beast gave a bloodcurdling yell which struck such fear into Li's heart that he lost all control over his weapon. When the Blue-Faced Beast struck downward at his head, he swayed aside and the sword lodged in his horse's haunches. The horse staggered, throwing its rider, who lost his spear altogether. He tried to run off but Blue-Faced Beast was too quick for him and aimed a second blow which found its target. Thus did the wretched Li, a general of universal renown, discover how wealth and fame are but an illusion.
So now two of the government generals lay dead there on the mountainside. Blue-Faced Beast and the Tattooed Dragon pursued the defeated army and it was like splitting melons or cutting gourds.
Marshal Tong Guan, Feng Mei and Bi Sheng were watching from further up the mountain. They dared not come down; no course now seemed open to them. "We're never going to get out of this," they thought. But then Feng Mei said to the Marshal: "We may be saved, sir! I have just spotted a large body of government troops taking up defensive positions due south of here. Their flags are still flying. They can rescue us. If General Bi stays here to guard you, I will fight my way through and fetch them. We'll get you out, I promise!"
The Marshal said: "It's getting dark. Wait for the best moment and then go and return with all possible speed."
Feng Mei heaving his weapon charged off down the mountain and carved out a passage southward. When he reached them, he found that the government troops were those of General Zhou; they had closed ranks and were putting up a stiff resistance. When General Zhou saw Feng Mei approaching, he asked: "Where is the Marshal?"
"Up there on the mountain," Feng Mei replied. "He's waiting for you to come to the rescue. There's no time to waste. You must move at once."
General Zhou gave the order for cavalry and infantry to cover each other and to advance with single-minded determination, maintaining their proper formation. The two generals led from the front and the troops raised a cheer as they charged up the slope. Before they had travelled a bowshot they perceived an apparent threat from some troops on their flank. Feng Mei rode to meet them whirling his sword, but found them to be troops belonging to the government commander who had fled from Twin Rods, General Duan. The three generals now combined their armies and continued to advance to the foot of the mountain where Bi came to meet them. When they reached Marshal Tong Guan they held a conference. "Should we try to break out tonight? Or would it be better to wait for dawn?"
Feng Mei said: "We four will give our lives to protect the Marshal. Our only chance is to break out tonight."
As night began to fall, there was a hubbub of ceaseless shouts all around, punctuated by the sound of gongs and drums. About the second watch when the moon rose, they made a desperate charge down the mountain, Feng Mei leading and the whole government force clustered around the Marshal in the middle. Assailed from all sides by shouts of "Don't let Marshal Tong Guan get away!" they attempted desperately to force their way southward. The battle raged till the early hours, when finally they broke through in the centre. The Marshal pressed a hand to his forehead and gave thanks to the spirits of heaven and earth, saying: "Heaven be praised, we have come through!" Then he urged his horse forward, heading for Jizhou.
But while they were still rejoicing at their escape, they saw a mass of torches, countless numbers, on a hillside ahead of them, and there was shouting behind them as well. Lit by the torches were two tall heroes twirling halberds, followed by another on a white horse and bearing a steel-tipped lance. Who was this? It was none other than the Unicorn, and the two with halberds who preceded him were Morbid and Madcap. The torchlight revealed that they were leading a force of over three thousand. There they stood, full of spirit and energy, blocking the way ahead. The Unicorn shouted out: "Marshal Tong Guan, get off your horse and let us tie you up, what are you waiting for?"
The Marshal said to his companions: "An ambush in front, pursuit behind, whatever can we do?"
Feng Mei said: "I am prepared to sacrifice my life in your service sir. The rest of you stay here and guard the Marshal, while I make for Jizhou. I will fight these bastards by myself!"
Slapping his horse and whirling his sword he charged the Unicorn. The two horses converged and before they had fought twenty bouts the Unicorn knocked his opponent's sword aside with a blow from his lance, came in close and seized him by the midriff. Kicking his horse away he made him prisoner. Morbid and Madcap hurried forward to help and with their troops dragged Feng Mei off unceremoniously. The other government generals, valiantly defending the Marshal, charged the forces that were blocking their path and fought their way out. They made off with the Unicorn in pursuit. The defeated army scattered like abandoned dogs or fish that have escaped the net.
By daybreak Marshal Tong Guan and his remaining commanders had managed to shake off the pursuit and were approaching Jizhou. Suddenly from behind a hill in front a company of footsoldiers appeared. They all had armour and red turbans and there were four leaders. First was Iron Ox with his two axes, then Pluto with a big sword and Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost with their shields and javelins, and they came rolling forward like a hot coal over the face of the earth, scattering the terrified government troops before them. The Marshal and his commanders, fighting a desperate rearguard action, managed to escape.
Iron Ox continued to scythe his way through the government ranks with his axes. He took a swing at the legs of General Duan's horse, knocked him off and split his skull. For good measure he chopped the head off, and that was the end of it, so far as General Duan was concerned! By the time the government troops were nearing Jizhou they were in a parlous state. Their helmets were battered down over their ears, and neckpieces twisted round to the front. None of the three divisions had any fight left in them. The men were exhausted, the horses spent. When they reached the banks of a stream they all went down to drink. Then gunfire sounded on the opposite bank and arrows began to fly like locusts. As they scrambled back up the bank a troop of horsemen swept out of a wood. It was Hotshot with Stripes and Scarface and three hundred cavalry. These troops had horses decked with bronze bells, pheasant's feathers and red tassels, light bows with short arrows, embroidered pennants and decorated lances. Their commanders led the charge.
General Zhou saw that the attacking force was small and rode to encounter them, while Bi Sheng tried to get the Marshal away. General Zhou loosed his horse's reins and levelled his spear. But Hotshot grasped the spear with his left hand and with his right groped in his saddlebag like someone hunting for treasure. Then he let out a cry. "Pow!" — his stone caught General Zhou square on the nose and knocked him from his horse. Stripes and Scarface rushed to lend a hand and stabbed their pitchforks into his throat. Like a plant burnt by the frost, like flowers shaken from the trees by rain, General Zhou's life came to an abrupt end.
The Marshal and Bi Sheng had managed to get away. They dared not try to enter Jizhou, but with the shattered remnants of their army marched all that night towards the capital. On the way they collected some of their own fleeing troops.
Now Song Jiang was both humane and intelligent, and wanted only to avoid evil and be reconciled to the court. He would not countenance indiscriminate persecution and slaughter. He feared however that the other leaders would not agree and would be determined to pursue the Marshal, so he hurriedly sent Magic Messenger with orders for all the leaders to recall their men and return to the mountain stronghold so they could claim their rewards.
Everywhere gongs rang out recalling the troops. The mounted leaders rode with jingling stirrups, the marching men sang their songs of victory; in their various companies they made their way back to the Marshes of Mount Liang, returning one by one to the Place of Many Meanderings. Song Jiang, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun reached the stronghold and went to take their places in the Ceremonial Hall. Sterling was ordered to calculate everyone's reward. The Unicorn brought in his captive, General Feng Mei, who knelt before the dais. Song Jiang himself untied his bonds and invited him to be seated. With his own hands he offered him the cup, doing his best to put him at his ease. The other leaders all took their places and many animals were slaughtered that day to feast the armies.
Feng Mei was entertained for two days, before a horse was saddled and he was escorted down the mountain. He greatly enjoyed himself. Song Jiang made him a speech in which he said: "If we have given you offence, General, please forgive us. We have no evil intention. Our dearest wish is to be reconciled to the court and use our strength in the service of our country. Unjust and unprincipled men have stood in our way. I hope that when you return to the capital you will put in a good word for us. If I have the good fortune to meet you again some day, I shall certainly not have forgotten your noble character." When Feng Mei in turn had expressed his gratitude for the sparing of his life, he mounted and rode down the mountain. Song Jiang had him escorted as far as the outskirts of the capital. Of this no more.
Song Jiang returned to the Ceremonial Hall to discuss things with the Professor and the other leaders. Now this method they had employed of the multiple ambushes had all been planned and organized by the Professor. They had succeeded in striking fear to the heart of Marshal Tong Guan and shattering his confidence. The horror of it in fact would revisit the Marshal in his sleep. He had lost two thirds of his army. The Professor now said: "When Marshal Tong Guan gets back to the capital he will report to the officials. It is inconceivable that they will not send another army. Someone must go to the capital to gather intelligence and report back, so we can be prepared."
Song Jiang said: "I am in complete agreement with what the Professor says. Which of you is willing to go?"
"I'd like to go!" It was someone from quite far down in the ranking who volunteered. But everyone agreed: "If he goes, the mission is sure to be a success!" And indeed, if this person had not gone things would have been different. As a result of his mission, a new plan is to be drawn up, another government army defeated. Or to put it another way,

Armies will clash and horses perish among blue hills,
The boat tossed on the billows will sink beneath green waters.

10 border general Commandants converge on Mount Liang & Confer on Taking Mount Liang Marsh; Song Jiang Defeats Marshal Gao the Ball the 1st Time

The volunteer was Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller. Song Jiang said: "We depend entirely on you to find out all about their military preparations. But you'd better have someone to help."
"I'll be glad to go along," said Li Kui.
Song Jiang laughed. "You, Black Whirlwind who never stirs up trouble!"
"I won't make any trouble this time."
Song Jiang shouted at him to get out, then asked: "Which of you brothers will go?"
"How about me?" queried Liu Tang the Red-Haired Demon.
"Good," said Song Jiang. He was very pleased.
That day the two men packed some belongings and went down the mountain.
Meanwhile, Tong Guan and Bi Sheng neared the Eastern Capital with forty thousand men, all that was left of their beaten army. They ordered their commanders to lead the various units back to their camps. Tong Guan and Bi Sheng entered the capital with only the imperial guards. The chancellor removed his armor and went to call on Marshal Gao.
The two exchanged courtesies, and Tong was invited to be seated in a quiet alcove of the rear hall. He related in detail the defeats he suffered in two major encounters, the killing of his eight top commanders, his heavy losses in troops and horses, the capture of Feng Mei, and his own general dismay.
"Don't let it upset you, Chancellor," said Gao. "All you have to do is give the emperor a false report. Who would dare petition against you! I'll go with you to the prime minister. We'll work something out."
Tong and Gao mounted their horses and rode to the premier's mansion. An aide announced: "Chancellor Tong has returned." Prime Minister Cai Jing guessed that he had been defeated, and when told that Gao Qiu was calling with him, directed that they be ushered into his study. Tong kowtowed before the premier, his tears falling like rain.
"Don't take it so hard," said Cai. "I've heard you've had heavy losses."
"In that bandit marsh it's impossible to advance without boats," said Gao. "The chancellor had only cavalry and foot soldiers. That's why he lost the initiative and fell for the bandits' ruse."
Tong told about his defeat, and the premier said: "You lost an enormous number of troops, expended vast amounts of money and grain, and had eight column commanders annihilated. How dare I report this to the emperor?"
Tong Guan again kowtowed. "Cover up for me, Premier, I beg you! Save my life!"
"Tomorrow, at the royal audience, I will say only: 'The weather was extremely hot, our soldiers were not accustomed to it. So they discontinued the action and withdrew.' If he grows angry and says: 'This canker in our hearts must be eliminated, otherwise, the results will be calamitous.' how should I reply?" queried the premier.
"I don't mean to boast," said Gao. "But if you allow me to lead an expedition, I'll pacify those bandits in one engagement!"
"Since you're willing to go yourself, Marshal, naturally that's fine. I'll propose you tomorrow for commander-in-chief."
"There's just one thing. Besides an imperial decree mustering an army, I need boats. They should either be allocated from military and civilian craft, or I should be authorized to buy lumber at the official price and build my own ships of battle. Only by advancing simultaneously on land and on water, on boats and on horseback, will we be able to win the day."
"That won't be any problem," said Cai.
The keeper of the gate came in and said: "Feng Mei has returned."
Tong Guan was delighted. The premier directed that he enter. He asked the general what had happened.

Feng Mei kowtowed. “Song Jiang released as many as possible of those he captured and took the rest up the mountain. Not only didn’t he kill us, but he gave us travel expenses and allowed us to return home. It is for that reason that I am able to see you noble countenance again.”
“It’s a bandit trick and an insult to our government.” said Gao. “We shouldn’t muster local troops, but go as far afield as Shandong and Hebei to select able men who’ll go with me.”
“Since we’re all agreed,” said Cai, “we’ll meet again tomorrow and petition the emperor.”
Tong and Gao returned to their respective headquarters.
They met again in the Waiting Chamber the following day at three strokes after the fifth watch. When the drums sounded, officials assembled in the imperial courtyard according to rank. All kowtowed, then arose and stood below the Jade Staircase in two groups—one civil, the other military.
The chief of ceremonies, holding his staff of office, called: “If anyone has a petition, let him come forward. If there are none, this court will adjourn.”
Prime Minister Cai stepped forth and addressed the emperor. “We dispatched Tong Guan, Chancellor of Military Affairs, with a large army in a punitive expedition against the bandits of Liangshan Marsh. But the weather turned very hot and our forces had not yet adapted to it. Moreover, the bandit territory is all water and bogs. It’s impossible to move without boats. Our infantry and cavalry were unable to advance. And so the expedition was called off and our forces returned to their camps, where they are waiting now for your imperial orders.”
“How can they go again, since the weather is so hot?” cried the emperor.
“Tong Guan Will report to the Military Procurate for punishment. We propose appointing a new commander and sending out another expedition. We request your royal decree.”
“Those brigands are indeed a canker in our heart. They must be exterminated. But who will undertake this task for me?”
Gao Qiu stepped forward. “Though I have no talents, I would gladly strain like a beast of burden to wipe out the bandits. I beg for your imperial command.”
“Since you are willing to share my difficulties, I order you to muster an army.”
“Liangshan Marsh is over eight hundred //in circumference. Without fighting ships it is impossible to advance. I request permission, therefore, to cut timber in the neighborhood of the marsh and have carpenters build boats. Either that, or grant me funds with which to buy civilian boats and convert them to military use.”
“I authorize you to do whatever is necessary and possible. Only avoid causing harm to the people.”
“I would never dare! Please don’t set too strict a time limit, and I will endeavor to succeed.”
The emperor called for silken robes and golden armor, and presented them to Marshal Gao Qiu. He also selected an auspicious day for the expedition to commence.
When the imperial audiences ended, Tong Guan and Gao Qiu saw the prime minister back to his mansion. Cai directed the Council of Administration to transmit the royal decree for the mustering of a new expeditionary army.
“There are ten commandants who distinguished themselves in expeditions against neighboring states like the Guifang, the Tangut, the Golden Tartars, or the Great Liao,” said Gao. “They’re excellent military men. I’d like you to appoint them my generals.”
Premier Cai agreed. He issued a directive ordering the ten commandants to report at Jizhou with ten thousand crack troops each. All of the leaders had formerly been robbers in the greenwood. Later, they were amnestied, and rose rapidly to become high officials. Skilful and courageous, they won something of a reputation for themselves. Now, they received directives ordering them to Jizhou within a prescribed time, each heading a column of ten thousand, on pain of military discipline if they were late.
In the Jiankang district of Jinling was a naval unit. Its commanding officer was a man named Dragon Dream Liu, because his mother, when she conceived him, had dreamed that a black dragon had entered her womb. He grew up to be an excellent swimmer. Liu won distinction in a campaign against bandits on the Xiajiang River in Sichuan and was raised to the rank of admiral. He had fifteen thousand sailors under his command, and five hundred rowed vessels. His responsibility was the area south of the river.
Gao wanted this naval unit and its boats, and he ordered their immediate transfer. He also sent a trusted confidant, an infantry colonel named Niu Pangxi, to search up and down the river and along all its tributaries for more boats. Niu was to bring any craft he found to Jizhou where they were to be turned over for Gao’s use.
There were many generals in Gao’s headquarters. Two of the most able of these were brothers—Dang Shiying and Dang Shixiong, both field commanders and both extremely brave. From the imperial guards, Gao drew another fifteen thousand crack troops, bringing his total force up to a hundred and thirty thousand. He had grain delivered to the various columns, so that it could be issued to the troops during their march. Daily, he had armor and clothing put in order, and pennants and banners manufactured. But he still was not ready.
Meanwhile, Dai Zong and Liu Tang spent a few days in the Eastern Capital collecting information. Then they hastened back through the night to the mountain fortress and rendered a detailed report. When Song Jiang heard that Marshal Gao was personally going to lead an expedition against him, and that he had gathered a hundred and thirty thousand troops from all over, and that ten commandants would be serving as generals, he was shocked and frightened. He went into conference with Wu Yong.
“Have no fear, brother,” said the military advisor. “Didn’t Zhuge Liang defeat Cao Cao’s army of a hundred thousand in ancient times with only three thousand men? I’ve heard of those ten commandants. They’ve served the imperial court well. Of course they appeared very heroic when there was no one around who could match them. But today, against our band of fine brothers—veritable wolves and tigers every one—they’re out of date. You’ve nothing to worry about. Before the ten columns arrive, I’ll give them a scare!”
“How will you do that?”
“They’re to meet in Jizhou. I’ll send two quick killers to wait in the outskirts. When the troops draw near, they’ll slaughter a few.”
“Who do you have in mind?”
“Featherless Arrow Zhang Qin and General Two Spears Dong Ping.”
Song Jiang gave the two named chieftains a thousand men each. He ordered them to patrol the outskirts of Jizhou, and intercept and kill approaching government troops. He also directed his naval commanders to prepare to seize enemy boats. Assignments were given, as well, to other chieftains. No need to say what these were; you’ll learn later on.
Although more than twenty days had passed Gao was still in the capital. The emperor sent a message urging him to march. Gao ordered his Imperial Guards force to leave the city first, and he directed some thirty-odd singers and dancers, girls and boys from the entertainment quarter, to go along for their amusement.
On the date of the Guards’ departure, Gao pledged before the flag, took his leave of the emperor, and got ready to set forth. A month had gone by, and it was now typical early autumn weather. Government officials, large and small, were waiting at the pavilion ten //beyond the city gate to see them off. Marshal Gao, in full armor, rode a battle charger with a golden saddle. Preceding him were five auxiliary mounts with equipage encrusted with jade. To his left and right were the brothers Dang Shiying and Dang Shixiong. Behind came generals of the Imperial Guards, masters of arms, generals of defense, generals of militia, and other high-ranking officers. The army which followed marched in neat ranks.
At the pavilion Gao dismounted and bid the assembled officials farewell. The ceremonial wine-drinking send-off completed, he again climbed into the saddle and proceeded towards Jizhou. He allowed his soldiers to pillage freely en route, much to the detriment of the local population.
One after another the ten columns neared Jizhou. Commandant Wang Wente, at the head of his column, was more than forty //from his destination after a forced march. He was still driving hard when they reached a place called Phoenix Tail Slope. At the foot of the slope was a large grove. Wang’s advance unit was just skirting this when they heard the crash of a gong.
From between the rear of the grove and the base of the hill a troop of cavalry trotted out and blocked the road. Its leader wore a helmet and armor and carried a bow and arrows. Attached to the sheath and quiver of these weapons were two small yellow pennants. One was inscribed: Heroic General Two Spears. The other read: Gallant Duke of Ten Thousand Households. In each hand he grasped a steel-tipped spear. It was none other than Dong Ping, the boldest assault leader in Liangshan Marsh, known as Dong the Brash.
He reined in his steed athwart the road and shouted: “Where are you from? Come down from your mounts and be tied. What are you waiting for?”
Wang checked his horse and laughed. “Even jars and jugs have two ears. You must have heard of us ten commandants. We’ve won scores of commendations, we’re famous. I’m Wang Wente, the foremost among us.”
Dong Ping laughed. “You’re a rustic lout who couldn’t kill anyone but his mother’s lover!”
Commandant Wang was furious. “Rebellious bandit! How dare you insult me!”
He clapped his horse, levelled his lance and charged. Dong Ping, both spears horizontal, met him head on. They fought for thirty rounds, with neither emerging the victor.
Wang realized he couldn’t defeat Dong Ping. “Rest a while,” he shouted. He rode back to his position. Wang instructed his column not to remain and give battle but to break through.
With the commandant in the lead, the column smashed open the road block and, yelling, fought their way free. Dong Ping and his men followed in close pursuit. As the column passed the grove, another cavalry troop appeared suddenly before them. In the lead was Featherless Arrow Zhang Qin.
“Halt!” he shouted.
He flung a stone at Wang Wente’s head. Wang tried to dodge, but it struck him on the helmet. Bending low over his saddle, Wang fled. The two chieftains gave chase. They had nearly caught up, when another unit cut in ahead at an angle. Wang recognized the column led by Commandant Yang Wen, hurrying to his rescue. Dong Ping and Zhang Qin dared not come any closer. They withdrew.
The two columns entered Jizhou, where they were received by the prefect Zhang Shuye. A few days later word came that Marshal Gao and his army were approaching. The ten commandants went out to meet him, and escorted him into the city. The prefectural office was converted temporarily into an army headquarters, and all rested.
Marshal Gao ordered the ten columns to camp in the outskirts of Jizhou. When Dragon Dream Liu arrived with his naval forces they would all set forth together. The columns did as directed, felling timber on the nearby hills and confiscating doors and windows of the villagers to build shelters and make beds for themselves. They caused severe losses to the local people.
Gao remained in his headquarters in the city, grabbing more recruits for his expedition. Anyone who had no silver for bribes was put in the foremost assault ranks. But if a man was able to spread a bit of money around he stayed in the central army and received frequent commendations for “valor.” There was a great deal of this kind of corruption.
Dragon Dream Liu and his flotilla arrived after only a day or two, and Liu reported to Gao. The marshal summoned the ten commandants to join them in a strategy conference. Wang Huan had a proposal.
“Let the infantry and cavalry go ahead and lure out the bandits, then send in the naval forces to destroy their lair. They won’t be able to fight on two fronts, and we’ll capture them all.”
Gao agreed. He ordered Wang Huan and Xu Jing to lead the vanguard, Wang Wente and Mei Zhan to bring up the rear, Zhang Kai and Yang Wen to command the left flank, Han Cunbao and Li Congji to command the right, Xiang Yuanzhen and Jing Zhong to be ready as reinforcements for front and rear. Dang Shixiong with three thousand crack troops joined the flotilla to aid Dragon Dream Liu and observe the battle.
Each unit now had its orders. After three days of preparation, they invited Gao to review them. The marshal came out of the city and personally inspected the columns, one by one. He then directed them, plus the naval forces, to set out for Liangshan Marsh.
Dong Ping and Zhang Qin returned to the fortress and gave a detailed report. Song Jiang and his chieftains led the outlaw army down the mountain. Before they had gone very far, they came within sight of the foe. The adversary forces halted within arrow shot of each another and set up their battle positions.
Commandant Wang Huan rode forward from the government vanguard, carrying a long lance.
“Unrighteous bandits, desperate rustics,” he shouted, “do you recognize General Wang Huan?”
The embroidered banners on the opposite side parted and Song Jiang rode forth. “Commandant Wang,” he called respectfully, “you’re of a venerable age. You shouldn’t be going into combat for the state. Your opponent might make a slip and put an end to your blameless life. Go back. Send a younger man to fight.”
Wang was furious. “The mark of the criminal is on your face, petty functionary! Dare you oppose Heaven’s soldiers!”
“Don’t insist, Commandant. These bold fellows of mine who ‘act on Heaven’s behalf’ wouldn’t necessarily lose to you.”
Wang Huan’s reply was to level his lance and charge. From behind Song Jiang a warrior rode out, his own lance horizontal, the bells on his steed’s bridle jingling. It was Panther Head Lin Chong, and he galloped to engage his adversary.
The horses met, the soldiers yelled. Marshal Gao reined in his steed and watched from the front lines. The men on both sides shouted and cheered. Cavalrymen rose in their stirrups and infantrymen pushed back their helmets to get a better view. The contestants displayed their utmost skill. Nearly eighty rounds they fought, with neither emerging the victor. Trumpets sounded and the combatants separated and returned to their positions. Commandant Jing Zhong went to the forward army and bowed from the saddle to Marshal Gao. “I’d like to have a go at the bandits. I request your permission.”
Gao ordered Jing to proceed. Bridle bells behind Song Jiang again jingled and Huyan Zhuo rode out to meet the challenger. Jing, wielding a long-handled blade, was astride a melon-yellow steed. The contenders met and fought twenty rounds. Huyan executed a feint, parried the big blade, and brought his steel rods with full force down on Jing’s head, spattering his brain matter. Eyes bulging, Jing fell to the ground, dead. Gao had lost 1 of his commandants. He urgently dispatched another—Xiang Yuanzhen. Xiang flew to the front with levelled lance. “Bandits,” he cried, “who dares do battle with me?” General 2 Spears Dong Ping surged to the front and engaged the enemy. Before they had fought ten rounds Xiang whirled his mount around and rode off, trailing his lance. Dong Ping clapped his horse and chased after him. Instead of entering his position, Xiang, apparently flurried, skirted its edge and continued to flee, with Dong Ping in hot pursuit. Xiang socketed his lance, grasped his bow with his left hand, fitted an arrow with his right, and stretched the string to its full. Suddenly, he twisted around and shot. At the twang of the bow, Dong Ping threw up a warding hand, but the arrow struck him in the right arm. He dropped his lance and galloped back. Xiang, now the pursuer, readied another arrow. Huyan Zhuo and Lin Chong hastened out and escorted Dong to the safety of the position. Marshal Gao ordered a mass attack just as Song Jiang was directing that Dong Ping be returned to fortress. The rear guard was unable to hold, and the outlaws scattered. Gao chased them as far as the water’s edge. There he dispatched scouts to make contact with the government naval forces. These, meanwhile, under Dragon Dream Liu and Dang Shixiong, were winding deep into the marsh. Mist and reeds obscured the creeks and rivulets. The masts of the government flotilla were strung out over a distance of ten //. Cannon sounded from the mountain slope and from every side small boats converged. The soldiers on the government craft, who were rather frightened to begin with, completely panicked when they saw the small craft swarming out from the depths of the reeds and cutting the government vessels off from each other. Most of them abandoned ship and fled. The bold fellows of Mount Liang were quick to take advantage of the confusion. Beating drums and gongs, they propelled their small boats forward. Dragon Dream Liu and Dang Shixiong hastily turned their vessel around. But the shallow channel they had navigated earlier had been jammed with logs and brushwood by the outlaws, snagging oars and blocking passage. More soldiers leaped into the water. Dragon Dream Liu divested himself of his armor, crawled up the bank, and struck out along a path. Dang Shixiong, unwilling to leave the vessel, ordered the sailors to row into a tributary. Before they had gone two //, they saw ahead three small boats, commanded by the three Ruan brothers, each of whom grasped a spear. As the boats neared the government craft, the remaining government soldiers jumped into the water. Dang stood alone on the prow with a long lance, facing Ruan the Second. As the boats of Ruan the Fifth and Ruan the Seventh pressed closer, Ruan the Second dived into the water. Dang realized his danger. He, too, jumped, abandoning his lance. Suddenly, Zhang Heng the boat hand shot up from beneath. He grabbed Dang by the hair and around the waist, and tossed him dripping into the reeds. A dozen or so brigands who had been hiding there tied Dang securely and took him off to the fortress. Gao saw that his entire flotilla was in disarray and that his men were fleeing towards the mountains. His boats, all bearing the flag of Dragon Dream Liu, had been rounded up and captured. Gao’s water approach had failed. He ordered his troops back to Jizhou. New measures would have to be considered. It was late in the day when they started their march. All around cannon suddenly thundered and Song Jiang’s forces attacked from several sides. Marshal Gao could only groan in dismay. Truly, happiness has not yet arrived when trouble returns; illness has just receded when misery descends again. A marshal became a man who had lost his way, 10 columns of militant soldiers turned into a defeated rabble. And as a result, army-men could not return to their camps, naval forces fled to a dream world.

After the forces of Mount Liang have inflicted two defeats on Marshal Tong Guan, Song Jiang and the Professor discuss matters and decide that they should send someone to the capital to find out exactly how things stand. When they receive the report, they will prepare for battle.
Hardly had they reached this decision when Dai Zong, the Magic Messenger spoke up: “I would like to go,” he said.
Song Jiang said: “No one is better than you at getting intelligence. But it would still be best if you had someone to go with you and assist you.”
Iron Ox said: “I’ll go along and lend him a hand.”
Song Jiang found this humorous. “You’re the one who never causes any trouble of course,” he said.
“Well this time I promise not to, if you let me go,” said Iron Ox.
But Song Jiang just told him he must withdraw his offer and asked again: “Which of you is prepared to go?”
The Red-Haired Devil said: “Why don’t I go?”
Song Jiang was satisfied with this arrangement. The two of them packed their things the same day and set off down the mountain.
We shall not follow the Magic Messenger and the Red-Haired Devil on their mission to gather intelligence in the Eastern Capital, but describe how Marshal Tong Guan and his lieutenant, Bi Sheng, had rounded up some forty thousand of their defeated troops along the road and as they approached the capital had ordered the regional commanders to take their troops back to barracks, so that only the imperial guard entered the city. Marshal Tong Guan took off his armour and uniform and went straight to Marshal Gao’s palace to discuss matters. After a formal greeting he was invited into a secluded chamber at the back. He recounted how two armies had been lost and eight divisions captured with most of their troops, and how Feng Mei had been taken alive and all the rest of the sorry tale.
“Don’t you worry,” Marshal Gao said, “we will have to conceal all this from the Emperor, of course. Nobody would be fool enough to tell him! You and I must go and talk to the Grand Preceptor and come up with a new strategy.”
So they mounted and rode over to the Grand Preceptor’s palace. The latter had heard that Marshal Tong Guan was back and guessed he had not been victorious. When Marshals Tong Guan and Gao were announced he had them shown into the library for the interview. Marshal Tong Guan prostrated himself, shedding many a tear. “Don’t worry about it,” the Grand Preceptor said. “I already know about your defeat.”
Marshal Gao said: “The bandits live among the marshes. They cannot be attacked without boats. The General faced them with only cavalry and infantry. That is the reason he could not prevail and fell into their trap.”
Marshal Tong Guan described how he had been bamboozled, and the Grand Preceptor said: “You have lost a lot of troops and wasted money and supplies. Eight armies were destroyed. I don’t see how we can tell the Emperor all this.”
Marshal Tong Guan humbly said: “I beg you to help me by concealing it. My life depends on it!”
“Then tomorrow you must say to His Majesty that the weather was too hot and the troops could not endure the conditions, so you temporarily called a halt to the campaign. But the question is, what are we all going to say if His Majesty is angered and says ‘An internal threat like this, if not thoroughly eradicated is likely to return to plague us’?”
Marshal Gao said: “I don’t want to boast, but if you can procure me the troops I will go myself and settle the affair once and for all.”
“If you are willing to go that is certainly the best solution. I can guarantee to get you appointed tomorrow.”
Gao also said: “There’s just one thing. There will have to be an imperial decree authorizing the levy of troops and the building of boats. We must either commandeer existing public and private boats or use public funds to buy timber and other materials to construct boats for the purpose. Unless we attack by land and water simultaneously, with both cavalry and waterborne troops, I can’t get the job done within the required time.”
“That is no problem.”
While this discussion was going on, the doorman came in and said: “Feng Mei has returned.”
Marshal Tong Guan was very pleased. Marshal Gao, Gao the Ball, had him shown in and asked him to give an account of himself. Feng Mei prostrated himself and then told how all those who had been captured and taken up the mountain had been released by Song Jiang completely unharmed, and even given travelling expenses to return to their homes. That, he explained, was why he was now able to present himself.
“It’s a cunning trick,” Gao the Ball said. “They are trying to fool the people. For the next expedition we will not use local troops. I will get well trained and experienced troops from Shandong and Hebei.”

"That's settled then," said the Grand Preceptor. "We will meet again tomorrow and lay the plan before His Majesty."
They all went home. Next day before dawn they gathered in the ante-chamber. At the beat of the dawn drum they took their places in the courtyard according to precedence. After doing obeisance, military and civil officials lined up separately below the steps. The Grand Preceptor stepped forward and addressed the Emperor. "Last time Marshal Tong Guan, President of the military council, was appointed to lead a big army against the rebels in the Marshes of Mount Liang. But there has been a heat wave and his troops could not endure the conditions. Furthermore the bandits have made their home in the marshes and the campaign cannot be conducted without boats since cavalry and infantry alone cannot get at them. He has therefore called a temporary halt to the campaign, and his men have all returned to barracks to rest, pending further instructions from Your Majesty."
The Emperor declared: "How unfortunate if this hot weather means the campaign cannot be renewed!"
"Let Tong Guan be stripped of his command," the Grand Preceptor said. "And we will appoint another commander in his place. If Your Majesty will give the authorization."
"These robbers are a grave threat to our security. They must be extirpated. Who will bring us this relief?"
Gao the Ball stepped forward and said: "I have little talent, but I am prepared to work like a slave to eradicate the rebels, if I have Your Majesty's authority for it."
"If you are willing to undertake this, I give you a free hand to pick your troops."
Gao had a further request: "The Marshes of Mount Liang are a hundred leagues in circumference. Without boats we cannot get in there. I beg you to authorize me to obtain timber in the region of Mount Liang and undertake the building of boats or to use government money to buy boats from the people for use in the campaign."
The Emperor said: "You have my authority to take whatever is needed. But have great care not to harm the people!"
Gao the Ball said: "I would not dream of it! I only request you to extend the time limit, so that I may finish this business successfully."
The Emperor sent an embroidered robe and a suit of gold armour which he presented to Gao, instructing him to select an auspicious day for starting.
After that morning's audience, when Marshals Tong Guan and Gao had seen the Grand Preceptor back to his palace, the secretariat was ordered to release the imperial requisition for levying troops.
Gao the Ball said: "We have ten border commanders who have done the country good service in fighting barbarians or Tartars of one tribe or the other. They are very experienced in battle, and I'd like to enlist their services as commanders." The Grand Preceptor agreed to the request and had ten official letters of appointment written out, ordering each of the ten commanders to raise an army of ten thousand crack troops and assemble at Jizhou. It was to be made clear to them that the matter was of the utmost importance and all were expected without fail to raise the ten thousand troops and set off within the given time.
Now these ten border generals were all well trained and experienced soldiers, in addition to the fact that they were former outlaws who had been pardoned and had risen to fairly high rank. They were quick-witted and genuinely brave, their reputation was solidly based. The secretariat set the date of their departure and made ten copies of the order, requiring all ten armies to have reached Jizhou by a certain date. Delays would be punishable by military law.
There was also in the south a commander of waterborne forces, an outstanding leader, known as Dragondream Liu. His mother had dreamt that a black dragon entered her womb just before the onset of birth pangs. When he grew up he became an expert sailor. He had already had considerable success in suppressing pirates in the river gorges of Sichuan and had been promoted to brigadier general. He had a force of fifteen thousand marines and five hundred boats at a base in the south. Marshal Gao wanted this naval force to join his command immediately. He also sent one of his trusted advisers called Niu Bangxi, an infantry commander, to search along the river and waterways for boats and commandeer and assemble them at Jizhou for the use of his forces.
On his staff Gao had many officers, but two of them were particularly able, two brothers, Dang the elder and Dang the younger. They had reached the rank of colonel and each was a match for ten thousand ordinary men. From the barracks of the imperial guard Gao selected fifteen thousand men, and of ordinary troops a hundred and thirty thousand. He sent out an advance guard to provide supplies along all the roads. He spent many more days preparing armour and having banners made, before he was ready to set off.
Meanwhile the Magic Messenger and the Red-Haired Devil had spent a number of days in the capital gathering intelligence. Having amassed a deal of information, they hurried back to the mountain stronghold to report. Song Jiang was disturbed by the news that Marshal Gao himself was in command and had mustered tens of thousands of troops under the ten border commanders and he called in the Professor to discuss matters. The Professor said: "Nothing to worry about, brother. I know all about those ten commanders. They have done the court good service, but they have never faced any real opposition, that is how they gained their reputation. Whereas what we have here is a brave company of men, bold as wolves and tigers. So those ten are history — there's nothing to fear from them! Before they and their ten divisions even get here we're going to give them a bloody nose."
How are you going to do that?" Song Jiang asked.
"They will all converge on Jizhou," said the Professor. "We will send out a skirmishing party under two of our commanders to position themselves near Jizhou. When the enemy approach they will mount a lightning attack. This will serve up a warning to Marshal Gao."
"Who shall we send?" asked Song Jiang.
"Hotshot and Twin Spears."
Song Jiang gave the order for each of these two leaders to take a thousand men to patrol Jizhou and intercept the enemy divisions before they got there. He also ordered the waterborne commanders to be prepared to seize any boats at their moorings. Thus the leaders of the mountain stronghold made their dispositions in advance, and we need say no more of them, for all shall be known in its time.
Back in the capital Gao the Ball was taking his time. When he had tarried twenty days or more the Emperor issued an edict urging him to set off. Gao gave the imperial guard their marching orders first. He also had thirty or more singers and dancing girls selected to go along for the army's entertainment. In due course he made his sacrifice before the flag, paid his respects to the Emperor and was ready to set off. A month had elapsed since the start of preparations and it was autumn. The officials were waiting at the three-mile pavilion to give them a send-off. Marshal Gao was wearing uniform and riding a charger with a gilt saddle. Five horses with embossed saddles and jade ornaments went before, on either side of him were the two Dang brothers and following behind were all the high-ranking officers of the palace guard. It was an impressive turnout. But the poem says:

Their evil plotting's just not decent;
Their thirst for war breaks every precept.
Brute force is never swayed by meekness;
Those with power think virtue weakness.

So Marshal Gao and his army rode out of the city. When they came to the three-mile pavilion he dismounted to bid farewell to the officials. They drank a stirrup cup, then mounted and set off towards Jizhou. He gave his men great license along the way and they plundered the villages and harassed the people unashamedly.
The ten border divisions also headed to Jizhou one after another. One of the Generals called Wang Wende with an army from the north travelled non-stop. One day when he was still a dozen miles or so away, urging his men along at breakneck pace, he came to a spot called Peacock's Tail Heights, where there was a great forest under the hill. His leading troops were skirting this forest when they heard the sound of gongs and a troop of cavalry rode out of a wood at the foot of the hill, blocking their advance. The leader was dressed in helmet and armour and was equipped with bow and arrows. In the quiver were stuck two small flags. On one of them was written in gold characters: "Twin Spears, the bold warrior" and on the other "Dong Ping, unsurpassed in gallantry" and in either hand he held a steel spear. Among the Mount Liang leaders Twin Spears was the always first to join the fray and for this reason was known as Breakneck Dong. As he reined in his horse and stood blocking the road he shouted: "What troops are you? Dismount at once and allow us to tie you up. What are you waiting for?"
Wang Wende made his horse curvet and said with a derisive laugh: "Even jars and pitchers have ears. Have you never heard of the mighty deeds of us ten border generals? Does the world famous name of the mighty Wang Wende mean nothing to you?"
Twin Spears riposted with a sneer: "You pompous oaf, all you're fit for is killing your mother's lover!"
Enraged by this, Wang shouted back: "Renegade scum, how dare you insult me!" He slapped his horse, levelled his lance and charged Twin Spears. The latter came to meet him with his two spears at the ready. They fought thirty bouts and neither had the advantage. Concluding that he could not get the better of Twin Spears, Wang shouted: "Let us take a break and continue the fight later." Each rode back to his own ranks. Wang told those on his side not to think of standing and fighting but to get out quick. With Wang leading, the troops beat a tumultuous retreat, Twin Spears in pursuit. Just past the wood they came upon another body of men. The leader of these was Hotshot. "Halt!" he shouted. A stone from his hand flew towards the head of Wang, who hurriedly ducked. The stone hit his helmet. Crouching low in the saddle he galloped off. His pursuers were evidently gaining on him, when another troop charged out from one side. This turned out to be another of the border commanders, Yang Wen, coming to his aid. Twin Spears and Hotshot gave up the pursuit and turned back.
The two border forces entered Jizhou together to rest. The magistrate received them both. After a few days scouts reported that Marshal Gao's forces were approaching, and all ten border generals rode out to meet him. After greeting him they escorted him back into the city. He made his headquarters temporarily in the government offices and retired to rest. He ordered the border generals to take up positions outside the city and await the arrival of Dragondream Liu with his marines so they could all attack together. Each of the ten divisions set up camp and cut down timber at the foot of the mountain; they ransacked people's houses to build their shelters and did much harm to the local inhabitants. Marshal Gao's headquarters in the city ordered a general conscription; those who had no money were destined for the front line, those who could pay earned a sinecure at headquarters. This abuse of power knew no bounds. A couple of days after the Marshal's arrival, Dragondream also arrived with his boats. When the latter had paid his respects, Gao sent for the ten border generals so that together they could work out a plan. Wang Wende said: "You should first send out a patrol to entice the bandits out to fight. Then we can send the boats in to attack their lair. If we split their forces like this we can capture the whole lot!"
Gao the Ball approved this proposal. He assigned the various border generals to the vanguard, the left and right flanks, the reserves. Dang the younger was to take three thousand troops to lend Dragondream's marines a hand on the boats and oversee operations there. When everyone had their orders, three days passed in preparations, after which Marshal Gao was invited to review the troops. He rode out of the city and personally inspected them. Then he gave the order for the army to march and the waterborne force to set sail, all converging on the Marshes of Mount Liang.
By now Hotshot and Twin Spears had returned to the stronghold and given a detailed report. Song Jiang and the others led their troops down from the mountain. They had not gone far before they saw the government troops approaching. The leading ranks fired at the enemy and both sides took up defensive positions. Then Wang Huan of the government vanguard rode forward wielding a long spear. "You shameless bandits," he shouted, "you disgrace to your country, don't you know me? I am Wang Huan!"
In the opposing ranks the pennants parted and Song Jiang himself rode forth and greeted Wang Huan: "General Wang, you are not a young man any longer! You are too old to be fighting for your country and bearing arms against the enemy. I fear you will meet with some mishap and lose your life in vain! Go home and get someone younger to come out and fight!"
Wang indignantly berated him: "You, a paltry civilian, how can you oppose a general of the imperial army?"
Song Jiang replied: "Don't brag, General Wang! We band of brothers are here to do heaven's will, there is no way we can lose to you!"
Wang's response to this was to level his lance and charge, whereupon with a jingling of harness bells a leader behind Song Jiang pressed forward. This turned out to be Leopard's Head. The two horses met, and both sides cheered them on. Marshal Gao himself rode to the front and reined in his horse to watch. Then all that was heard was the shouts and cheers of the two armies, while cavalrymen stood up in their stirrups to watch and infantrymen took off their helmets to see better. The two opponents showed off all kinds of moves with the spear.
Wang's great fight with Leopard's Head went on for some seventy or eighty bouts, and still neither could gain an advantage. Gongs were sounded on both sides and they separated and returned to their own ranks. Then another government general rode out. Bending respectfully in the saddle he petitioned Marshal Gao. "I would like to have it out with these bandits in single combat, do I have your consent?" Gao told him to go ahead. With a jingling of harness bells Twin Rods rode out from Song Jiang's ranks to take him on. The government general wielded a great blade on a long pole and rode a bay charger. The weapons clashed and they fought some twenty bouts. Twin Rods feinted. He blocked the other's blade and raising his rod in one fluent movement brought it down square on his opponent's head so that the brains spurted out and the eyeballs burst. He died on the spot.
Having lost one of his border generals, Marshal Gao hastily sent out another, who galloped forward and cried: "Do you dare take me on, you rebel scum?" Twin Spears rode out from behind Song Jiang and accepted his challenge. Before they had fought ten bouts, the border general suddenly put up his spear and fled. Twin Spears slapped his horse and gave chase. His opponent did not return to his own ranks but headed off past their position into no man's land. Twin Spears galloped after him. The other rested his spear and took his bow in his left hand. Fitting an arrow to the string with his right hand, he bent the bow, twisted in the saddle and let fly. Twin Spears heard the snap of the bowstring and raised his arm to shield himself. The arrow hit him in the right shoulder. He dropped his spear, turned his horse and fled. His opponent put up his bow and arrows and gave chase. When Twin Rods and Leopard's Head saw this they both galloped to the rescue and brought Twin Spears back. Marshal Gao now threw his whole army into the attack. Song Jiang first gave orders for Twin Spears to be taken back to safety in the mountain stronghold. Then his army, unable to withstand the onslaught, broke up and scattered in all directions. Marshal Gao pursued them as far as the waterside. There he allotted some of his force to go and support the waterborne attack.
By this time Dragondream and Dang the younger, after embarking their forces, had piloted their boats deep into the Marshes of Mount Liang. Here they found nothing but endless beds of reeds and bulrushes, choking up the many-branching waterways. With constant poling they managed to advance a few miles by water. Then suddenly a signal gun went off on the mountainside and a swarm of little boats appeared from every direction. For the soldiers on the government boats, already cowed by the vast extent of those desolate reed beds, the sight of all these small boats coming at them from hiding-places in the reeds, not in the least awed by their great flotilla, was just too much. Instead of those in front and behind coming to each other's aid, most of the crews jumped overboard.
When the Mount Liang leaders saw panic in the enemy ranks, they urged their boats forward to the beat of the drums and fell on them. Dragondream and Dang hurriedly tried to retreat, but by now the way they came was blocked: the Mount Liang forces had used small craft to bring timber and debris from trees cut on the slopes of the mountain to clog the channels, making it impossible to ply the oars. The soldiers all leapt into the water. Dragondream removed his uniform and armour and clambered out onto the bank. He chose a small path and fled. Dang was reluctant to leave the boat and went on urging the sailors to row for their lives down a quieter channel. But after half a mile they found three boats blocking the way. The three Ruan brothers were in these boats, each armed with a spear. As the boats closed on each other, the government crews dived into the water. Dang was left alone standing in the prow, spear in hand. He joined battle with Ruan the Second. Ruan the Second dived overboard and disappeared, but immediately Ruan the Fifth and Ruan the Seventh replaced him. Realizing he stood no chance, Dang threw away his spear and also jumped overboard. Then from the depths Pilot emerged, grabbed him by the hair with one hand, the other arm encircling his waist, and dragged him dripping out onto the reed bed. A dozen lads in hiding there used hooks to subdue him and tie him up and he was carried off live to the waterside camp. When Gao the Ball saw all this confusion on the water, the crews either fleeing towards the mountain or bound and captive on the boats, and the whole flotilla under Dragondream's flag captured, it was clear to him that the battle on water was lost, and he hurriedly ordered his leaders to recall their troops and return to Jizhou to work out another plan. By now it was already getting dark. All around guns were going off incessantly. They didn't even know where the attacks were coming from next. Gao could only curse his luck. Indeed, he was as one who losing his way in the dark encounters a ghostly archer on the fight at the Red Cliff is assailed by a fateful wind.

The Red-Haired Devil Liu Tang Burns the Ships of War; Song Jiang Defeats Marshal Gao the 2nd Time

Although the artillery were only signal cannon firing blanks, and no outlaws were lying in ambush, Marshal Gao was frightened. He had no belly for further battle. He scurried back to Jizhou with his troops that same night. His infantry casualties were not high, but he had lost more than half his naval effectives, and not a single war ship returned.
Dragon Dream Liu managed to get back, after considerable difficulty. Sailors who were able to swim, had escaped. Those who could not, had all drowned.
His military prestige damaged, his energies depleted, Gao could only encamp in the city and wait for Niu Pangxi to arrive with fresh boats. He sent a dispatch to Niu urging speed: Niu was to seize any craft he could lay his hands on, bring it to Jizhou, and fit it out for the next expedition.
At the fortress Song Jiang returned first with Dong Ping. Doctor An Daoquan removed the arrow and dressed the wound with Golden Spear Ointment, and directed Dong to rest. Wu Yong and the other chieftains arrived next. Zhang Heng, head of the naval forces, brought Dang Shixiong to Loyalty Hall and claimed his reward. Song Jiang ordered that the prisoner be taken to the rear of the fortress and held under house arrest. The captured boats were to be distributed among the various chieftains commanding the water defenses.
In Jizhou Marshal Gao summoned his generals into council to discuss strategy against Mount Liangshan. Commandant Xu Jing spoke.
"I started wandering as a child," he said. "When I grew up and was giving exhibitions of arms and peddling medicines I made friends with a man. He's a skilled strategist and tactician, and has the talent of Sun Wu and Wu Qi—those ancient theoreticians of war—and the wisdom of Zhuge Liang. His name is Wen Huanzhang. He teaches school in the village of Anren on the outskirts of the Eastern Capital. If we could get him to be our chief of staff he could defeat Wu Yong's crafty schemes."
Gao at once sent a top-ranking general, with gifts of silks and a saddle horse, to invite the village teacher to come to Jizhou as quickly as possible and advise on military affairs. Only three or four days after the general departed, a report came from outside the city: "Song Jiang has arrived with his army. He challenges us to fight."
Marshal Gao was furious. He mustered the troops in the city and sallied forth. He also directed the commandants of the various forts to go out and give battle.
When Song Jiang saw Gao and his army approaching, he hastily drew back fifteen li to a broad, level plain. Gao closed in pursuit. Song Jiang's forces set up positions at the edge of a mountain slope. From a troop bearing red banners a fierce-looking commander burst forward. On his banner were the words: Two Rods Huyan Zhuo. He reined in his steed and halted at the edge of the battlefield, his lance held athwart.
"That's the fellow who commanded the emperor's chain-linked cavalry and sold out to the enemy," snarled Gao. He sent Commandant Han Cunbao, who wielded a crescent-bladed halberd, forth to meet him.
Without a word, the two clashed, one hacking with his halberd, the other thrusting with his lance, neither slackening for a moment. For more than fifty rounds they fought. Then Huyan executed a feint, broke away, struck his horse, and rode down the slope. Han, on racing steed, quickly followed.
Eight hoofs churned the turf like iron bowls. The chase continued for six or seven li, until the contestants were far from all the others. Han began closing the distance between them. Suddenly, Huyan turned his mount around, put up his lance and, brandishing his two rods, galloped to meet his pursuer. They battled for a dozen rounds. Again Huyan parried the crescent-bladed halberd and rode away.
"He can't get near me with his lance," thought Han Cunbao, "and can't beat me with his rods. I can take that thief alive! What am I waiting for!"
Han rapidly gave chase. But as he rounded a bend between two mountains, the path forked. Which direction had Huyan taken? He urged his steed up the slope and looked. He saw Huyan Zhuo riding off along a stream.
"Where do you think you're going, wretched robber!" bawled Han. "Dismount and be bound, and I'll spare your life!"
Huyan halted and cursed Han fulsomely. Han rode in a wide circuit so that he came up behind Two Rods and cut off his retreat. On one side was the mountain, on the other side the stream. Their field of combat was the narrow space between, and it was there they met. The horses had little room to maneuver.
"Surrender now," called Huyan. "Why wait?"
"You're beaten already, and you want me to surrender!"
"I've lured you here because I want to capture you alive! That's your only hope for survival!"
"It's I who am going to capture you alive!"
The rage of the two men again flared. Han rained stabs against Huyan's chest and abdomen with his long halberd. Parrying left and right, Huyan countered with a whirlwind of thrusts from his lance.
For thirty more rounds they fought. As Han thrust at Huyan's ribs, Huyan lunged for Han's heart. Both dodged, and the weapons each went harmlessly by. But Huyan clapped the shaft of Han's halberd under his arm, and Han seized Huyan's lance with his hand. Both pulled and tugged with all their might from their saddles. The rear legs of Han's steed were in the stream. Huyan and his horse were dragged into the water.
The men struggled and wrenched, the horses kicked up spray till both combatants were drenched. Huyan abandoned his lance and, with Han's halberd still clamped under one arm, reached for his rods. At that moment, Han dropped Huyan's lance and grabbed his arms. Locked in combat, the two tumbled into the water. Their horses spurted up the bank and galloped towards the mountains.

Weaponless, the men wrestled in the stream. Their helmets fell off, their armor hung in pieces. In the deep water they traded kicks and punches, moving gradually back to the shallow edge of the stream.
While the battle was raging, a troop of cavalry arrived at the bank, headed by Featherless Arrow Zhang Qin. They seized Han Cunbao and sent men to recover the horses. Hearing the neighs of the cavalry steeds, the animals returned themselves. The armor and weapons were retrieved from the stream and given to Huyan Zhuo. He mounted, dripping wet. Han was also put on a horse, his hands tied behind his back, and all rode quickly for the gap.
Ahead, they saw coming towards them another body of cavalry, searching for Han Cunbao. Both troops halted. In the fore of the government forces were two commandants—Mei Zhan and Zhang Kai. When these observed the bound and dripping Han mounted on a steed, Mei Zhan grew very angry. Brandishing a three-pronged two-edged blade, he charged at Zhang Qin.
Before they had fought three rounds, Zhang Qin broke and galloped away. Mei Zhan followed. Zhang Qin unlimbered his ape-like arms, twisted his wolf-like waist, and let fly with a stone. It struck Mei Zhan on the temple, drawing fresh blood. The commandant dropped his sword and covered his face with his hands. Zhang Qin wheeled his mount around. Zhang Kai fitted an arrow to his bow, pulled it to the full, and sped the feathered shaft. Zhang Qin yanked up his horse's head, so that it took the arrow in the eye. As the beast fell to the ground its rider leaped clear and prepared to fight on foot.
But Zhang Qin's only real military skill lay in throwing stones. With the lance he was slow. Zhang Kai, after rescuing Mei Zhan, came after Zhang Qin. The lance of the man on horseback darted like a thing bewitched. Zhang Qin defended himself as best he could, and when he could withstand no more, dashed for cover amid his own troop. Zhang Kai pursued, slaughtering horsemen left and right until he reached the site of Han Cunbao.
He was about to ride back with Han when he heard a clamor of wild yells. Two more cavalry troops were tearing through the mountain gap. One was led by Qin Ming the Thunderbolt, the other was headed by Big Halberd Guan Sheng, both chieftains riding fast and fierce. Zhang Kai, protecting Mei Zhan, departed hastily, abandoning their men. The cavalry cut in and again captured Han. Zhang Qin grabbed a riderless horse and mounted, but Huyan was exhausted and could only follow in the wake of the attackers. The impetus of the assault carried the men of Mount Liangshan to the fore of the government soldiers, and they harried them all the way back to Jizhou. There they ended the chase. They returned to the fortress with Han Cunbao that same night.
When Song Jiang, seated in Loyalty Hall with the other chieftains, saw the prisoner, he ordered his men to stand back and untied him personally. He invited Han to be seated at the head of the hall and treated him solicitously. Han was grateful beyond words. Song Jiang then asked Dang Shixiong to join them, and afforded Dang the same courteous treatment.
"You two generals may feel completely at ease," he said. "We have no evil intentions. We've come here only because corrupt officials have forced us to do so. If the emperor grants us amnesty we'll be happy to serve the government."
"But didn't Marshal Chen bring you an amnesty?" said Han. "Why didn't you take that opportunity to return to the path of righteousness?"
"Although it was an imperial amnesty, its terms were not clear. What's more, the emissaries had substituted a cheap rural brew for the imperial wine. My brothers were unconvinced. And that Majordomo Zhang and Captain Li dared to threaten and insult us!"
"Because no good person was in charge, a matter of importance to the state was delayed," Han said regretfully.
Song Jiang feasted his guests. The next day he presented them with saddled horses and saw them off to the mouth of the valley. The two spoke highly of him all the way to Jinzhou. By the time they neared the city it was late. They did not enter until the following morning.
They went to Marshal Gao and told him how Song Jiang had released them. Gao grew very angry.
"It's a bandit trick to soften our army's resolve! How can you two have the effrontery to see me? Guards, take them out and kill them!"
Wang Huan and the other officials dropped to their knees and pleaded: "It's not their fault. The scheme is Song Jiang's and Wu Yong's. If you execute Han and Dang, the bandits will laugh at us."
Gao finally let himself be persuaded. He rescinded his order, but he stripped both men of their ranks and directed them to report to the Military Procurate in the Eastern Capital for punishment. The two left under escort for the capital city.
Han Cunbao was the nephew of Han Zhongyan, a former premier. Many officials in the court had obtained their positions through him. One of these was Zheng Juzhong, originally a royal tutor, and now a censor in the court. Han Cunbao had great respect for him and told him about his problem. Zheng got into his sedan-chair and took Han to consult with Minister Yu Shen.
"We'll have to appeal to the prime minister," said Yu, "then we can petition the emperor."
He and Han went together to Premier Cai Jing and reported: "Song Jiang has no evil intentions. He's waiting only for an amnesty from the emperor."
"He destroyed the previous decree. Men so lacking in courtesy cannot be amnestied, they can only be wiped out or arrested."
"That was because the emissaries did not state the emperor's noble purpose and express his concern. They spoke harshly instead of kindly. For that reason the mission failed."
Only then did the premier consent to help.
The following morning when the Taoist Emperor opened court, Cai Jing again proposed offering an amnesty to Song Jiang and his men if they surrendered.
"Marshal Gao has asked Wen Huanzhang of Anren Village to be chief of staff, and Wen has already reported to the court for duty," said the emperor. "We shall send him as our emissary. If the brigands consent to submit, we will forgive their previous crimes. If not, we shall set a time limit within which we shall expect Marshal Gao to either exterminate them or bring them back to the capital as prisoners."
Cai Jing drafted the appropriate decree and, at the same time, invited Wen to dine with him in his mansion. Wen was a famous scholar, well known to most of the high ministers in the imperial court. Each of them drank to him in greeting. After the banquet Wen returned to his quarters and packed for his journey. He bid farewell to the emperor and set out the same day.
Meanwhile, in Jizhou Gao fretted impatiently. The gatekeeper entered and announced: "Niu Bangxi is here." Gao directed that he come in. Niu bowed respectfully and Gao asked: "What about the boats?"
"We confiscated along the way over fifteen hundred, large and small. They're all waiting below the lock."
Very pleased, the marshal rewarded Niu. He ordered that the craft be congregated in a wide bay and grouped in threes. Each group was to be decked with planks and chained together at the stern, so as to carry the maximum number of infantry. The cavalry would escort them along the banks.
By the time the dispersement of troops was settled and the soldiers had become adapt at boarding the craft half a month had gone by. Mount Liangshan already knew all about it.
Wu Yong instructed Liu Tang to strengthen defenses along the water courses. He told the naval chieftains to prepare small boats, nail iron plate to their prows, and fill their holds with brushwood sprinkled with sulphur and saltpetre. These would wait in the inlets.
He also ordered artillery expert Ling Zhen to place signal cannon on all the surrounding heights. Pennants were to be tied to tree-tops in the thickets along the river and gongs and drums and fireworks were to be readied there to create the impression that well-manned military encampments were at hand. Gongsun Sheng was asked to perform magic and raise the wind. The main forces would fight as three armies on the land.
Wu Yong's plan for the men of Mount Liangshan was completed.
In Jizhou, Marshal Gao hastened the departure of his contingents. His naval craft he placed under the leadership of Niu Bangxi, who again collaborated with Dragon Dream Liu and Dang Shiying as the three top commanders. Gao donned his armor, the drums thundered thrice and the boats in the bay set sail, while on land the cavalry swung into a trot. The craft sped forward like arrows, the horses seemed to fly, as the government troops pushed into Liangshan Marsh.
Gongs and drums beating, the naval vessels glided on, winding ever deeper into the marsh in an endless succession of masts. But not a single outlaw boat did they meet. As they neared the Shore of Golden Sands, they saw two fishing craft in a cove of lotus flowers. There were only two men on each, and they were clapping their hands and laughing uproariously.
Dragon Dream Liu, on the leading government vessel, ordered his archers to shoot. The fishermen dived into the river and swam underwater. Liu urged his flotilla on, and they gradually drew closer to the Shore of Golden Sands. A line of shady willows fringed the bank. Two brown oxen were tied to one of the trees, and three or four herd boys lay dozing on the grassy sward. In the distance a lad seated on the back of another ox was softly playing a flute.
Liu directed his assault squad to land first. The sleeping boys jumped up and, laughing merrily, disappeared into the willow grove. Six or seven hundred soldiers of the advance unit started clambering up the bank. A cannon boomed within the willows. On either side, war drums beat. A contingent in red armor, led by Qin Ming the Thunderbolt, burst into view on the left. On the right suddenly appeared a contingent in black armor, headed by Two Rods Huyan Zhuo. The two units, each comprised of five hundred men, swarmed towards the bank. By the time Dragon Dream Liu yelled for his troops to return to the boats he had already lost more than half.
Niu, hearing the agonized yells of the advance force, ordered his rear boats to pull back. But a string of cannon shots sounded on a hilltop and the reeds commenced to rustle. Gongsun Sheng, his long hair streaming down, his sword in hand, stood upon an astrological diagram on the summit, raising the wind. It moaned through the trees, gathering momentum, and pelted the soldiers with sand and stones and whipped up giant waves. Dark clouds enshrouded the earth, completely blocking out the sun. It was a wild, raging gale.
Dragon Dream Liu also hastily directed his vessels to retreat. From the criss-crossing inlets in the reeds and water lilies a number of small craft sped out and dispersed themselves amid the government flotilla. A drum sounded; and on each little boat torches were lit. This was in accordance with the plan Wu Yong had given to Liu Tang, whereby the naval chieftains would load the craft with dry reeds and brushwood sprinkled with oil, sulphur and saltpetre. In an instant, great flames were leaping skyward, and the small boats closed in on the larger vessels. Soon, from one end to the other, the entire government flotilla was ablaze.
Liu removed his helmet and armor and jumped into the water. Not daring to go near the shore, he headed for where the river was wide and deep, hoping thus to escape. A small craft, piloted by only one man, shot out of the reeds to intercept him. Liu flipped over and swam underwater. Someone seized him around the waist and hauled him to the boat, where he was dragged aboard. The man on the boat was Tong Wei the Dragon from the Cave. The one who had grabbed him was Li Jun the Turbulent River Dragon.
Meanwhile, Niu Bangxi, seeing all the government vessels in flames, also stripped off his armor and prepared to leap into the river. Suddenly, a man appeared on the prow holding a grappling hook. With this he snagged Niu and pulled him into the water backwards. The man was Zhang Heng the Boat Flame.
Corpses littered the waterways of Liangshan Marsh, their blood encrimsoning the waves. There were bashed and battered skulls without number. Dang Shiying, who was fleeing in a small craft, was killed by swarms of arrows from the reeds on both sides. Many of the soldiers could swim, and these escaped with their lives. Those who could not, died of drowning. Prisoners were escorted under guard to the fortress. Li Jun and Zhang Heng wee about to do the same with their captives Dragon Dream Liu and Niu Bangxi, but they were afraid Song Jiang would only let them go again. After talking it over, they killed the two by the roadside, cut off their heads and brought these to the mountain instead.
Meanwhile, Marshal Gao, leading his army as reinforcements to the water's edge, heard the continuous boom of cannon and the steady beat of drums. He guessed that the fighting was on the river, and he hastened forward, surveying both the banks and the nearby hills. He saw soldiers emerging from the water and crawling up the banks and running. Gao recognized one of the officers and asked him what had happened. The mail told how all the boats had been burned. He said he didn't know where the others were.
Gao's heart chilled with alarm. The yelling continued, and black smoke filled the sky. The marshal hastily led his troops back along the road they had come. Drums suddenly thundered on the hills ahead. A troop of horsemen burst forth and blocked their path. In the lead was Suo Chao the Urgent Vanguard, wielding a mountain-splitting battle-ax as he cantered towards them. At Gao's direction, Wang Huan, the commandant who was riding beside him, trotted out with levelled lance.
Before the two had fought five rounds, Suo Chao wheeled his mount and withdrew. Marshal Gao and his contingent pursued. But when they rounded the foot of a hill, Suo Chao had vanished. At that moment, they were attacked from behind by a troop led by Panther Head Lin Chong.
They suffered some casualties. They travelled another six or seven //; and a troop under Yang Zhi the Blue-Faced Brute caught up and inflicted further losses. After another eight or nine //Zhu Tong the Beautiful Beard harassed their rear, imposing still more casualties.
These were tactics devised by Wu Yong—not preventing retreat, but persistently raiding from behind. The battered government troops had no heart for battle. They wanted only to flee, and were incapable of protecting their rear.
Panic-stricken, Gao flew back to Jizhou. By the time he reached the city it was nearly midnight. Just then he saw flames rising from the fort in the outskirts and heard shouts of alarm. Shi Xiu and Yang Xiong plus five hundred foot soldiers lying in ambush had, with only a few torches, set the city ablaze, then slipped away.
Gao's soul leaped from his body in fright, and he hurriedly sent men to inquire. Only when they returned and reported: "They're gone," did he relax. A count of his troops showed he had lost more than half.
As Gao sat deep in gloom, a scout from a far outpost entered and reported: "An imperial emissary is arriving." Gao rode forth with his army and commandants to greet him. Wen Huanzhang, the emissary, told him of the proposed amnesty. When all the officers had been presented, they returned to headquarters in the city to confer. Gao ordered that a copy of the document be made.
The marshal had already suffered two heavy defeats and lost all his boats. If he delivered the amnesty now, he'd be ashamed to face people on his return to the capital. For several days he vacillated, unable to come to any decision.
It so happened that in Jizhou there was an old functionary named Wang Jin, a cruel, crafty fellow who was popularly known as "Cut Your Heart Out" Wang. He had been given to headquarters by Zhang Shuye, the prefect of Jizhou. Having read a copy of the amnesty, and learning that Gao was in a dilemma, Wang presented himself before the marshal.
"Your Excellency needn't worry about the amnesty," he said. "I have a way to cope with that. The Hanlin scholar who has drafted the document is surely on good terms with Your Excellency, since he has left the rear door open."
Gao was mystified. "What do you mean?"
"The most important part of the document is the line in the middle that reads: 'Obliterate Song Jiang, Lu Junyi and the other chieftains' crimes; we grant them amnesty.' This sentence is not clear. Have the copyist break it up into two sentences: 'Obliterate Song Jiang,' and 'Lu Junyi and the other chieftains' crimes, we grant them amnesty.' Then lure Song Jiang into the city, seize him as their leader, and execute him. Disband and scatter his followers. Since ancient times it has been said: 'A snake without a head cannot crawl, a bird without wings cannot fly.' Without Song Jiang, what good are the others! How does this strike Your Excellency?"
Gao was delighted. He immediately appointed Wang his chief advisor and told Chief of Staff Wen Huanzhang of the plan.
"An imperial emissary can act only in a righteous manner," Wen protested. "We cannot indulge in such deception! If any of Song Jiang's followers should learn of this and expose us, it would be extremely awkward!"
"Nonsense," cried Gao. " 'The essence of military tactics is deception.' From the earliest days this has been the rule. There's no need to be so proper."
"This is a decree from the emperor, and so will be believed by everyone throughout the land. The words of the emperor are precious as jade. They cannot be tampered with. If we were to do what you say, and later it should be found out, we'd have no credibility in the future."
"We'll deal with the present, and worry about the future some other time," said the marshal.
He dispatched a messenger to Mount Liangshan directing Song Jiang and his entire complement to come to the walls of Jizhou to hear an imperial decree granting them amnesty.
After having again defeated Marshal Gao in battle Song Jiang instructed his junior officers to collect the remains of the burned boats and use them for firewood. Those that had been unscathed were to be turned over to the water defense positions. Captured enemy generals should be allowed to go back, at intervals, to Jizhou.
Song Jiang and his chieftains were conferring in Loyalty Hall when an officer entered and reported: "A messenger has come from Jizhou Prefecture. He says: 'The imperial court his sent an emissary with a decree granting amnesty and conferring official posts. I have been dispatched to announce this good news.' "
On hearing these joyous tidings from on high, Song Jiang smiled all over his face. He summoned the messenger into the hall.
"The royal court has granted an amnesty," the man said. "I have been sent by Marshal Gao to invite all of you chieftains to the walls of Jizhou for a ceremonial reading of the decree. We have no other intention. Please discard any doubts."
Song Jiang said he would discuss the matter with his generals. He rewarded the messenger with silver and satins and directed him to return to Jizhou. Then he ordered his chieftains to prepare to go and hear the reading of the imperial document.
"Don't be so hasty, brother," urged Lu Junyi. "Marshal Gao is probably up to something. You can't just rush into this!"
"If you men are always so suspicious, how will we ever return to the path of righteousness?" Song Jiang countered. "For better or worse, let's go."
Wu Yong smiled. "We've beaten that rogue Gao so badly his gall's chilled and heart's shattered. No matter how elaborate a scheme he may have, it won't work. Besides, we're all gallant warriors. There's no need to worry. Just go along with brother Song Jiang down the mountain. I'll send Black Whirlwind Li Kui on ahead first with Fan Rui, Bao Xu, Xiang Chong and Li Gun and a thousand infantry to be in ambush on the east road to Jizhou. I'll also send sister Ten Feet of Steel with Gu Dasao, Sun the Witch, Stumpy Tiger Wang, Sun Xin and Zhang Qing and a thousand cavalry to he in ambush on the west road to Jizhou. If they hear a series of cannon shots, they'll charge to our rescue at the North Gate." After Wu Yong's arrangements were carried out, the chieftains descended the slope. Only the naval commanders remained to guard the fortress. And so, Marshal Gao, refusing to heed the advice of Chief of Staff Wen, lured the heroes from their stronghold.
Who would have thought that this would convert the outskirts of Jizhou and the fringes of Mount Liang Marsh to battlefields. The resulting melee was like wolves among a pack of dogs, tigers amid a flock of sheep. Truly, that single imperial decree stirred up the passions of the entire band of warriors.

It is clear to Marshal Gao that his waterborne forces are in trouble and he is already preparing to retreat, when shots are heard on all sides. He hurriedly calls in his troops and sets out on the road back.
In fact the Mount Liang leaders had only fired the signal guns. There were no troops in ambush. Nevertheless, it frightened Gao out of his wits and he and his men withdrew into the city as fast as their legs would carry them. When the infantry were counted it was found that they had not lost many, but the greater part of the waterborne force had been destroyed and not one of the boats returned. Dragondream himself had managed to get back. Of his sailors, those who could swim escaped with their lives; those who couldn't drowned.
Marshal Gao was demoralized, his confidence shattered. He quartered his troops inside the city and waited for Niu, the infantry commander, to arrive with the commandeered boats. He even sent some one with a letter telling him to get a move on and instructing him to seize boats of any kind, any-thing that could float, and bring them to Jizhou to join the campaign.
Song Jiang had taken the wounded Twin Spears up the mountain from the waterside camp. The arrow was drawn and Doctor An was asked to treat him. Doctor An applied an ointment to the wound and kept the patient in the stronghold to convalesce. The Professor brought the other leaders up the mountain. The Pilot brought in Dang the younger and claimed his reward. Song Jiang had Dang placed under house arrest in the camp at the rear, and all the captured boats were incorporated into their own forces, divided equally among the leaders.
Returning to Marshal Gao in Jizhou, he called a meeting of all his generals to devise a new plan for the capture of Mount Liang. One of the border generals, Xu Jing, said: "In my youth I was a frequenter of the rivers and lakes. One time when I was peddling medicines I made the acquaintance of a certain person who is a master of strategy and an expert in military methods. He has the tactical genius of Sunzi and the cunning of Zhuge Liang. His name is Wen Huanzhang and at the moment he is serving as a simple instructor in a village outside the capital. If we can prevail upon this man to join our counsels, we will have the means to counter the Professor's tricks."
Accordingly the Marshal sent an officer to ride post haste to the capital with a gift of embroidered silk and a horse to locate this genius in his village retreat and invite him to join them in the capacity of adviser. The Marshal wanted him to report without delay to Jizhou and take part in their military planning. Three or four days after the officer left, it was reported that Song Jiang's forces were challenging them outside the city walls. A wrathful Gao ordered his own troops out of the city to oppose them and commanded all the border generals to join him.
When Song Jiang's army saw Marshal Gao's forces approaching, they quickly retreated two or three miles to an open plain. Gao followed. Song Jiang took up a position on the side of a hill. From among the red pennants a warrior rode forth. His standard proclaimed him to be "Twin Rods Huyan Zhuo". He pulled his horse up and with lance at the ready waited in front of the army. "That's the bugger who turned traitor when he was commanding the linked cavalry," Gao said. He ordered General Han Cunbao to fight him.
Han's weapon was the square halberd. The two wasted no words but there before the armies joined battle, one thrusting with the halberd, the other countering with his lance. After more than fifty bouts, Twin Rods feinted and broke off. He slapped his horse and galloped away towards the mountain. Eager for glory, Han galloped after him. Eight horse's hooves battered the ground with a sound like upturned cups. In a couple of miles they reached a deserted area and with Han gaining on him Twin Rods turned his horse, abandoned his lance and rode at his opponent whirling his rods. After another dozen bouts, Twin Rods parried and galloped off again. Han was thinking to himself that the other had failed to touch him with his spear, and now was unable to defeat him with the rods, so he would be a fool if he didn't follow up his advantage and capture his enemy alive! He galloped after him. After passing through a narrow opening in the hills, Han was confronted by two roads and could not tell which his adversary had taken. He reined in his horse and scanned the hillside. He saw Twin Rods in the process of skirting a stream. He shouted: "Where do you think you're going, you vile rebel! Dismount and surrender, if you hope to save your life!"

Twin Rods held his ground and returned the insults. Han advanced in a flanking movement to cut off Twin Rods' retreat. The two met on the banks of the stream. On one side was the mountain, on the other water, with only a narrow path between, not wide enough even for the two horses to turn round. Twin Rods shouted: "Come on, surrender, what are you waiting for?"
Han shouted back: "You are my prisoner! What makes you think I'm going to surrender to you?"
Twin Rods said: "I lured you here because I wanted to take you alive. Your life hangs by a thread!"
Han said: "I'm the one who's going to take you alive!"
The exchange grew increasingly heated, till Han started to strike out with the halberd at the other's ribs, the blows coming fast as rain. Twin Rods likewise thrust this way and that with his lance as swiftly as one straining to catch the wind. They fought another thirty bouts. With the battle at its height, Han aimed a blow at the pit of Twin Rods' stomach just as the latter thrust at Han's chest. Both moved aside so that the weapons whistled past their ribs. Twin Rods grasped the stock of the halberd and Han clutched at the haft of the spear.
So there they sat on their horses pulling and tugging, pushing and shoving. The hind quarters of Han's horse slipped into the stream, pulling Twin Rods, horse and rider, after. They continued to wrestle for a while in the water. The horses were totally immersed, the men soaking wet. Twin Rods relinquished his spear to the other and wrenched away his halberd. As he reached for his rods Han threw away the spear and tried to seize Twin Rods by the shoulders. Another tug-of-war ensued and they both fell off into the water. The two horses struggled out onto the bank and bolted over the hillside. The two riders had lost all their weapons in the water, their helmets sank, their armour and clothing were in tatters. All they could do was to fight on with their bare hands. There they stood in the water trading blows. They dragged each other into the shallows. They were still at it when a troop of cavalry appeared on the bank. It was Hotshot and his men, who set to work at once and made Han prisoner and sent someone to find the runaway horses. In fact the horses didn't have to be found because when they heard the whinnying of the others and the shouts of the men they cantered back to join the company. The arms were fished out of the stream and handed to Twin Rods, who remounted, still dripping wet, while Han's hands were tied behind his back and he was loaded on a horse.
They were riding back with their prisoner to the valley mouth when they encountered another troop of horsemen, government troops sent out to look for Han. The two groups faced each other off. There were two government commanders, border generals Mei Zhan and Zhang Kai. When Mei saw his comrade Han sitting bound and dripping on the horse he flew into a rage. Whirling his three-pointed two-bladed weapon, he set on Hotshot. The horses met, but before they had completed three bouts Hotshot galloped away, with Mei in pursuit. Turning easily in the saddle, with his supple arms and flexible waist, Hotshot launched a stone which caught Mei on the temple. The blood spurted out. Mei dropped his weapon and put both hands to his head. Hotshot quickly turned his horse but as he did so Zhang Kai fitted an arrow to his bow, bent it and aimed at the head of Hotshot's horse. It pierced the horse's eye and the horse fell. Hotshot sprang to one side, grasped his spear and proceeded to attack on foot. Unfortunately Hotshot was really skilled only at throwing stones, he was not at all quick with the spear. Zhang Kai first made sure of Mei's safety and then came after Hotshot. What he could do with the spear on horseback was magical and the best Hotshot could manage was to parry. Finding the attack too fierce for him, the latter trailed his spear and took refuge among the ranks of his men, while Zhang Kai charged about all over the place putting fifty or sixty to the sword, causing mayhem and rescuing Han Cunbao in the process.
Zhang Kai was about to turn back with his two comrades, the wounded Mei Zhan and Han, whom he had just rescued, when there was more shouting and two more columns of troops appeared in the defile. One lot were Thunderclap's men, the others Scimitar's. While Zhang was covering Mei's escape the two Mount Liang contingents charged in and grabbed Han for the second time. Hotshot seized another horse, and together with Twin Rods vigorously harried the retreating enemy all the way till they were directly in front of the government position. The government army then took the opportunity of retreating into Jizhou. The Mount Liang contingent did not pursue them, but took their prisoner Han that same evening up to the mountain stronghold.
Han was taken with hands bound before Song Jiang as he sat with the others in the Ceremonial Hall. Ordering the escort to stand back, Song Jiang untied the bonds himself and invited Han to take a seat. Han expressed deep gratitude and the other prisoner, Dang the younger, was brought out to see him. Song Jiang said: "Please have no fears. We mean you both no harm. It is only because of cheating ministers and corrupt officials that we must live like this. If the Emperor will only grant us an amnesty we will strive with all our hearts in the service of our country."
Han said: "Previously when Marshal Tong Guan brought you the Emperor's pardon why did you not take the opportunity then to renounce your criminal activity and return to the straight path?"
Song Jiang replied: "The official document contained ambigui-ties. It was also couched in opprobrious terms and the imperial wine was switched. That is why my comrades were not happy with it. There were two hangers-on, Colonel Li and Chamberlain Zhang, who did their best to intimidate us and shame us."
"Then it was all because no honest men were involved that affairs of state miscarried!" Han commented.
Song Jiang feasted them that evening and on the following day had horses saddled and escorted them through the pass. As they rode back the two government commanders discussed Song Jiang's many virtues. It was already late when they reached Jizhou. They entered the city next morning and reported to Marshal Gao. They told him how Song Jiang had released them. Gao was furious. "It's trickery," he shouted. "They want to undermine the morale of my troops. I don't know how you have the nerve to present yourselves before me! Guards, take them out and execute them!"
All the other generals fell to their knees and said: "They are not responsible for it. It's Song Jiang and the Professor who have made this plan. If you execute them the bandits will only laugh at you."
Bending to the general entreaty, Gao spared their lives but stripped them of their commands and sent them back to the capital for the Grand Preceptor's sentencing. They left at once.
Now in fact this Han Cunbao was the nephew of Han Zhong-yan, who had once been chief minister. Many court officials had come under his tutelage. One in particular was a professor called Zheng Juzhong, who had been promoted by him to court censor. Han Cunbao related all that had happened to the professor, who immediately called for a sedan and took him to consult state secretary Yu Shen. The latter said: "We must ask the Grand Preceptor first and then report it to His Majesty."
When they were received by the Grand Preceptor, they said: "Song Jiang really means no harm, all he wants is a royal pardon."
"Previously they received the offer of an amnesty with insults. Such disgraceful behaviour cannot be pardoned, they must be made an example of."
"Unfortunately those who were sent with the pardon previously did not follow the Emperor's instructions and made no effort to speak diplomatically. Instead of flattery they used insulting language, that is why the offer was not accepted."
The Grand Preceptor allowed himself to be convinced. At next day's morning court when the Emperor ascended the throne, he proposed the drawing up of a new amnesty proposal to bring peace. The Emperor said: "Marshal Gao has just sent someone to request the services of Wen Huanzhang as military adviser. He is to report there almost immediately. Let us make him our envoy. If they are willing to submit, their crimes will be remitted in full. If they remain obdurate have Marshal Gao apprehend them within the stipulated time and bring them here."
The Grand Preceptor drafted the necessary document and arranged a banquet for Wen. Wen was in fact quite renowned and had many friends among the high-up officials at court. Plenty of wine and food were laid on for his reception. When the party broke up he got ready for the journey:

For years in the village a hidden recluse,
He's suddenly summoned to serve the nation.
To put his traditional knowledge to use
He needs no great man's recommendation.

We shall say no more of Wen's departure from the capital bearing the Emperor's commission but return to Gao the Ball and his troubles in Jizhou.
A doorman announced: "Niu Bangxi is here!"
Gao had him admitted and when he had prostrated himself asked: "How about the boats?"
Niu said: "On the way here we commandeered more than fifteen hundred boats. They are moored at the barrier."
The Marshal was pleased with Niu's work and rewarded him. He gave orders for the boats to be let into the main channel, linked in rows of three and covered with a wooden deck. Iron rings were to be fixed to the stern. Each was to carry a full complement of infantry, while the cavalry were stationed along the bank to guard them.
By the time the Marshal's troops were all settled on board and fully conversant with their duties a month had gone by and all was known to Mount Liang. The Professor had a plan which he expounded to the Red-Haired Devil, putting him in overall command of the operation on the water. All the waterside leaders were to prepare small boats. To the prow of each boat would be affixed an iron spike, while dry reeds and firewood were piled on the decks, primed with saltpetre and other incendiary materials. The boats were to be moored in the small inlets. Thunderer, the artillery chief, was to be stationed on a mountain lookout for the firing of signals and signal flags would be placed among the trees and reed beds of the waterside. Trumpets, drums and stocks of explosives were positioned, men and horses deployed and a false camp set up. Taoist Gongsun was to work his spells and summon a wind. Three divisions of cavalry would be deployed on land to lend support. All this was in the Professor's plan.
Back in Jizhou Marshal Gao urged on his troops. The water-borne forces were under the command of Niu Bangxi, with Dragondream Liu and Dang the elder. Gao the Ball put on his armour, ordered the usual three beats of the drum and the boats sailed from the harbour as the land forces mounted and rode off. The boats sped swift as arrows, the horses galloped like the wind, all towards Mount Liang. We will tell first of the attack by water. Propelled unceasingly forward by their crews, to the sound of drums and gongs, the flotilla swept deep into the territory of Mount Liang. There they found not an enemy boat in sight. However, as they approached Golden Sands Landing, they saw two fishing boats among the water lilies, with just two men to each boat. They were clapping their hands and laughing. Dragondream in the lead boat ordered his men to fire a salvo of arrows. The fishermen dived overboard and disappeared. Dragondream urged his boats on. Cautiously they approached the landing. The spot was shaded by some graceful willows, to which two buffalo were tethered. Three or four shepherd boys lay sleeping on the sward. Some way off there was another shepherd boy, riding backwards on a buffalo and playing the flute.
Dragondream ordered his vanguard ashore. As they charged up the bank the shepherd boys leapt to their feet laughing and vanished among the trees. As the first four or five hundred men advanced a report sounded among the trees and on every side drums and gongs began to beat. A troop of horsemen in red armour charged out on the left, led by Thunderclap; a troop of horsemen in black armour charged out on the right, led by Twin Rods, five hundred men to each force. They blocked the route back to the water. Dragondream hurriedly ordered his men back to the boats but he had lost most of them. Niu heard the cries up ahead and ordered the following boats back. Then a string of explosions was heard up on the mountain and there was a rush of wind among the reeds. This was due to Taoist Gongsun, creating his magic wind up on the peak, his hair floating in the wind and sword held high as he trod out the pattern of the Dipper. First the wind roared through the trees, then stones and sand began to fly, a wave of white veiled the sky and a black cloud cloaked the earth. The sun appeared as a red disk that gave no light and the wind howled. Dragondream yelled to his men to row for dear life, but now from a little channel among the reeds and water lilies small boats appeared and cut right through the government flotilla. Drums and gongs were beating, torches flared up. In a second there was a huge conflagration. Flames leapt in all directions, engulfing the government boats. All of them were ablaze:
Black smoke hangs over green water, red flames dance on the waves. Wind rips up the water lily leaves and sends them flying through the sky; the force of the flames consumes a forest of stalks in the reed beds. Spirits howl, and ghosts weep; the sun is veiled and sheds no light. Cliffs tremble, mountains tumble; a wave of angry sound roars through the air. Boats capsize, oars are still. No longer do the bright ensigns flutter at the stem; no longer do swords and halberds flash brightly from decks and turrets. Corpses float beside dead fish, hot blood bubbles through the billows. A thousand flames leap skyward; a million fires skim the surface of the water.
Dragondream seeing flames everywhere and all his boats ablaze, stripped off his helmet and armour and dived into the water. He dared not approach the bank but swam towards the deepest, broadest channel, hoping to escape that way. Then from among the reeds a boat appeared, poled by one man, and came towards him. Dragondream dived under the water. But there another was waiting, who seized him by the waist and dragged him out onto the boat. It was Cave Dragon in the boat, and the one who seized him was the White-Water Dragon.
Meanwhile Niu, seeing government boats on fire everywhere, also shed his arms and armour and was about to jump overboard when someone boarded his boat at the bow with a grappling iron. The grappling iron latched onto him violently and dragged him down into the water. This was the Pilot at work.
The number of those who lost their lives in the Marshes of Mount Liang, of whom nothing remained but corpses, headless or with smashed skulls, floating everywhere, their blood swirling through the water, was beyond telling. Only Dang the elder, rowing a small boat, managed to get away. Arrows and crossbow bolts streamed from either bank killing those who struggled in the water. Some who could swim escaped, all those who couldn't were drowned. Many were captured alive and taken up to the main camp. The White-Water Dragon held Dragondream and the Pilot held Niu. They would have taken them up to the stronghold, only they were afraid Song Jiang would release them, so they finished them both off by the roadside, cut off the heads and sent those up instead.
By now Marshal Gao had brought his army to the waterside in support. From a string of loud reports, and the incessant beating of the drums, they deduced that a battle was raging on the water. The urged their horses forward to a point between the mountainside and the water where they could observe. They saw soldiers everywhere scrambling out onto the bank and running for their lives. When Gao realized they were his own troops and asked what had happened, he was told that the flotilla had been set on fire and it was not known what had become of it. This did nothing to allay his fears. The shouts were incessant, black smoke filled the air, so they tried to turn back the way they had come. With a roll of drums a troop of cavalry galloped out and stood in their way. This charge was led by Hasty, whirling his mountain-splitter of an axe. At Gao's side General Wang Huan levelled his lance and joined battle with Hasty. Before they completed five bouts Hasty turned his horse and galloped off.
Marshal Gao led his forces in pursuit. Entering a defile they lost sight of Hasty. As they rode forward Leopard's Head came up behind them and attacked. After two or three miles the Blue-Faced Beast launched another attack from the rear. A few miles more and Whiskers attacked. This harassment was what the Professor had planned. His forces would make no attempt to stand and face the enemy but harry his rearguard instead. The demoralized government troops had no heart for the fight and only wanted to get away, so they did nothing to protect their rear. Hard pressed all the way, Gao the Ball retreated into Jizhou. By the time he got there it was the middle of the night. Then he heard of fires burning in the camps outside the city walls and much commotion. It was Morbid and Madcap with their five hundred infantry lying in wait who had started several fires and slipped away undetected. Gao was frightened out of his wits. He could not rest until he had sent out someone to reconnoitre. When a roll was called it was found he had lost the greater part of his troops.
As Gao the Ball was gloomily pondering the situation, one of his men reported the arrival of an imperial envoy. Gao rode out to receive him, accompanied by a body of troops and his remaining generals. The business of the imperial amnesty was explained. When all had met the imperial emissary and military adviser, Wen Huanzhang, they rode into the city to confer in the government office. Marshal Gao asked for a copy of the edict, which he studied carefully. To withhold the amnesty would be dangerous: he had lost two battles to the bandits and all the boats he commandeered were burnt. But if he presented it, he would be returning to the capital in disgrace. He was in a quandary. Several days passed without his reaching any decision.
Now it happened that in Jizhou there was an old official called Wang, a mean bastard whom everyone called "Vicious" Wang. He served as an official in the commissariat. Having seen the edict and heard that Gao could not make up his mind what to do, he came forward to offer a clever solution. "There's no cause for concern, Your Excellency," he said. "The wording of the document suggests a way out. The official who drafted it has been kind to you because he has left an open door."
Marshal Gao was surprised. "Why do you say that?" he asked.
Vicious Wang said: "The crux of the edict is in this sentence: 'With regard to the bandits in the Marshes of Mount Liang and the punishment they deserve for their crimes an exception being made, for Song Jiang, for Lu Junyi, known as the Unicorn, and for all the rest full pardon is granted, absolving them from the consequences of their wrongdoings.' It's all in the punctuation. Suppose when we read it out we take away the comma after 'an exception being made' and place it after 'crimes', it sounds as if the pardon is for 'Lu Junyi, known as the Unicorn and all the rest', but not for Song Jiang. You can then lure them into the city and nab just the leader, Song Jiang. After that, their whole organization will disintegrate. As the saying goes, 'A headless snake can't move, a wingless bird can't fly'. Once Song Jiang is eliminated, what can the rest of them do? I would like to know what Your Excellency thinks of this?"
Gao the Ball was pleased. He promoted Wang to head of department and summoned Wen, the new military adviser, to tell him of this scheme. But Wen rebuked him: "An imperial envoy can only enter into open and honest negotiations, he cannot be involved in an act of treachery. If Song Jiang has some experienced men under him who recognize the trick, it could misfire, with the most unfortunate results."
Gao said: "Nonsense. In the old manuals of strategy it says 'In military affairs guile is essential'. We can't afford to be too honest."
"However it may be in military affairs, in this case we are dealing with the words of the Emperor. Everyone must be able to trust them. It has always been said that the Emperor's word is sacred. That is what we mean by "the Emperor's jade speech", something which cannot be altered or amended. If we do as you suggest and it gets out, we will lose all credibility."
Gao said: "One's got to be realistic." He refused to listen to his military adviser and sent someone off to Mount Liang to tell Song Jiang and all the band to come down to Jizhou to hear the amnesty proclaimed.
Meanwhile Song Jiang, having defeated Marshal Gao yet again, ordered the damaged boats to be broken up for firewood and the ones which had escaped unscathed to be pressed into service at the waterside camp. As for the prisoners they had taken, they were all set free and allowed to return to the city.
Now while Song Jiang was holding a meeting with all the leaders in the Ceremonial Hall, it was announced that someone had come from Jizhou to tell them there was an envoy from the court bearing the good news that they were to be pardoned, and rewarded with high office and titles of nobility. Song Jiang's delight knew no bounds. He invited the messenger into the hall. The man said: "The court has proclaimed an amnesty. Marshal Gao sent me to invite you all to a ceremony in Jizhou for the reading of the imperial edict. Be assured of his good intentions and know that you have nothing to fear."
After discussing it with the Professor, Song Jiang had silver brought and rolls of silk to reward the messenger and sent him back down to Jizhou. Then he gave orders for all the leaders great and small to prepare to attend the reading of the imperial edict. But the Unicorn said: "Do not be too hasty brother. I fear this is some trick of Marshal Gao's. Maybe you should not go."
Song Jiang said: "If you're always so suspicious how are we ever going to get back into favour? For better or worse we simply have to go along and see."
The Professor brushed aside these fears: "We've just made mincemeat of Gao the Ball. Whatever schemes he may have, he's in no position to carry them out right now. Consequently, it's quite safe for us all to accompany the Leader down the mountain. But I'll send Iron Ox on ahead with Demon King, Pluto, Eight-Armed Ogre, Winged Ghost, a thousand infantry, have them take up a position on the eastern approach to the town, Steel-Bright with Auntie Gu, the Ogress, Short-Arse, Blackface, the Gardener, and a thousand men will take up a position on the west. If they hear a series of explosions they're to proceed at once to the north gate." When the Professor had finished making these dispositions, they all went down the mountain, leaving only the waterborne leaders to guard the camp. Now all because of Gao's deception, inviting these heroes down from their mountain under false pretences against the advice of his military adviser, Jizhou was to become a battlefield. A solemn edict from the sovereign's hand was about to arouse the fury of every single member of that band of heroes.

White Eel Zhang Shun Drills Holes through the Paddle-Wheel Boats & sinks the government fleet; Song Jiang Defeats Marshal Gao the 3rd Time

Marshal Gao, seated in his headquarters in Jizhou, summoned Wang Huan and his other commandants into conference. He ordered them to strike camp and move with their contingents into the city. All were to remain on the alert and fully armed. No flags were to be displayed on the city walls, except above the North Gate, where an imperial yellow banner would be unfurled bearing the words: The Emperor's Edict. Gao, the emissary and the high officials then mounted the wall and awaited the arrival of Song Jiang.
From the mountain fortress Zhang Qin the Featherless Arrow set forth with an advance cavalry unit of five hundred, made a circuit of the city, and headed north. Then the Marvellous Traveller Dai Zong arrived and scouted on foot. This was reported to Marshal Gao, and he went personally to the ramparts of the outer wall, accompanied by a retinue of over a hundred. Flags were set up. An incense table was placed in the foreground.
Song Jiang's army could be seen approaching far to the north. First came trumpeters and drummers and many flagbearers, then the chieftains—in scoop and circle and "V" formations. On horseback, the foremost of these—Song Jiang, Lu Junyi the Magnate, Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng, bowed from their saddles and hailed Marshal Gao.
On Gao's instructions an officer shouted from the wall-top: "The imperial court has deigned to pardon your crimes and has sent a special decree. Why do you come in armor?"
Song Jiang sent Dai Zong to the foot of the wall with the reply: "We have not yet heard the gracious statement and don't know what it contains. We therefore dare not come unprotected. If Marshal Gao will summon all the residents of the city and let them hear the decree with us together, we will then remove our armor."
Gao issued the appropriate order and, before long, all the citizens of Jizhou were assembled. Only then did Song Jiang and his chieftains advance. To a flourish of drums and trumpets, they dismounted. At a second flourish, they approached the city wall on foot. Behind, junior officers, leading the chieftains' horses, halted an arrow-shot away and assembled in neat ranks. At a third flourish, the chieftains stood with hands respectfully clasped and prepared to hear the decree. From atop the wall, the emissary read:

Edict: Each man's character is unique, a state has only one essential morality. People who behave well are proper citizens, those who do evil are rebels. For the latter, no good fate lies in store. We can only pity them. We bear that for a long time a band has congregated on Mount Liangshan, unresponsive to kindly exhortations to restore goodness to their hearts. We dispatch our emissary with this decree: Obliterate Song Jiang... Lu Junyi and the other chieftains' crimes, we grant them amnesty. Let the leaders report to the capital to give thanks, let their followers return home. Reject not the imperial decision. Let the emperor's benevolence expunge wickedness and restore righteousness to your hearts. Oppose not Heaven's will to replace the old with the new. Let this decree be proclaimed for all to know.

When the words "Obliterate Song Jiang" were read out, Wu Yong said to Hua Rong: "Did you hear that?"
The moment the reading was completed, Hua Rong shouted: "Since you won't amnesty our Big Brother, why should we surrender!" He notched an arrow to his bow, pulled it to the full, and yelled at the emissary: "Take a look at Hua Rong's magic arrow!"
The feathered shaft struck the emissary between the eyes. Government officers tried urgently to save him, while the gallant outlaws below cried: "Down with them!" and loosed a volley of arrows at the men atop the city wall. Marshal Gao hurriedly took cover.
All four gates of the city opened, spewing out Jizhou troops. Drums pounded in the midst of Song Jiang's coterie. The outlaws mounted then-horses and withdrew. The municipal forces pursued them five or six li; then started back. Behind them cannon thundered and Li Kui came charging from the east with brigand infantry, while from the west Ten Feet of Steel led her cavalry in an attack. Both arms of the pincers closed in together.
Fearing an ambush, the government troops quickly withdrew into the city. Song Jiang and his unit then turned around and charged, so that the local Jizhou contingents were being attacked from three sides. Thrown into great confusion, they were slaughtered by the score as they fled towards the city. Song Jiang and his men did not pursue for long, but returned to Liangshan Marsh.
Gao wrote a report to the emperor stating that Song Jiang's bandits had killed the emissary and refused to submit to the royal decree. He sent in addition a personal letter to Prime Minister Cai, Chancellor Tong and Marshal Yang urging them to confer, and requesting the prime minister to petition the throne for immediate reinforcements for use against the brigands, and the right to requisition fodder along the way.
On receipt of Gao's letter, the premier obtained an audience with the emperor and told him what had transpired. The sovereign's face clouded.
"Those bandits have insulted the throne! They've rebelled against us repeatedly!" He ordered each of his armies to provide reinforcements, and to take their orders from Marshal Gao.
Marshal Yang, who already knew of the consecutive defeats, selected two generals from the Imperial Divisions. He also directed that five hundred crack infantry from each of the four camps at Dragon Fierce, Winged Tiger, Sun Lift, and Loyal Righteousness be mustered, totalling two thousand men, to go with the generals in aid of Gao against the brigands.
Who were these two generals? The first was Qiu Yue, Chief Drill Instructor of the Imperial Guards and Commander of the Left Echelon Protecting the Royal Person. The second was the Deputy Chief Drill Instructor of the Imperial Guards and Commander of the Right Echelon Protecting the Royal Person, Cavalry General Zhou Ang. Both men had been decorated many times for valor, were famed for their skill with arms, and enjoyed high prestige in the capital. Moreover, they were completely trusted by Marshal Gao.
Marshal Yang ordered them to depart immediately, and they went to take their leave of the prime minister. "Be prudent and win distinction soon, and we surely will raise you to more important posts," Cai said. The two generals thanked him.
From the four camps they chose, one by one, tall, stalwart men who were narrow of waist and broad of shoulder, superb specimens from the provinces of Shandong and Hebei who could climb mountains and swim rivers. Then they took their leave of Marshal Yang and various high officials, and announced they were departing the next day. The marshal presented them each with five excellent horses for their personal use in battle. He promised them a big send-off. The generals thanked him and went to their respective commands to prepare.
The following morning the troops, geared up for the march, assembled in front of Imperial Divisions headquarters. Qiu Yue and Zhou Ang divided them into four contingents. The thousand soldiers from Dragon Fierce and Winged Tiger, plus more than two thousand cavalry, were under Qiu Yue. Zhou Ang commanded the thousand from Sun Lift and Loyal Righteousness, in addition to another two thousand some-odd cavalry. Still another thousand foot soldiers were split into two follow-up support units.
By the time the sun was brightening the troops were formed in ranks. Marshal Yang examined them personally from the tower above the city gate. The junior officers looked imposing, the soldiers bold, as they stood behind their embroidered banners. And when, from amid the troops of cavalry, General Qiu Yue suddenly rode proudly forth to lead the column on the left, the capital's citizenry broke into cheers.
The men of Sun Lift and Loyal Righteousness stood also in smart formation, each contingent behind its embroidered banner. General Zhou Ang cantered forward from the midst of his assembled horsemen, stern and fierce, to lead his right column to the edge of the city.
There, he and Qiu Yue dismounted, bowed to Marshal Yang and bid farewell to the officials. Leaving the Eastern Capital, they set out with their troops for Jizhou.
In the city of Jizhou, Marshal Gao and Chief of Staff Wen conferred. They decided that, while waiting for the reinforcements to arrive, they would dispatch men to the surrounding hills to fell timber. They would obtain boat builders from nearby counties, set up a shipyard outside Jizhou, and construct vessels of war. They would also enlist bold fellows to serve as sailors.
It happened that a man named Ye Chun, a boat builder from Sizhou Prefecture, was living in one of the inns. On his way to Shandong he had passed Liangshan Marsh and had been waylaid and robbed by some of the petty bandits. Unable to afford the journey home, he now hung around the city. When he heard that Gao was felling timber for war craft to invade the marsh, he sketched a couple of vessels and went to call on him.
After courtesies had been exchanged, Ye said: "Why did the last naval expedition fail? Because your boats were simply confiscated from here and there, and used wind and oar power, neither of which are reliable. What's more, they were small, low-lying and narrow, so that it was difficult for their crews to use weapons.
"According to my plan, if you want to defeat the bandits you must build a few hundred big warships. The largest of these should be the type known as the Big Paddle-Wheeler. It has twelve paddle-wheels on each side and holds several hundred men. Twelve men turn each of the wheels. A bamboo screen along the gunwales wards off arrows. On deck will be towers for archers, and to these winches and pulleys will be attached.
"One rap on a bamboo segment in the ramparts of the bridge will be the signal to advance. All twenty-four paddle-wheels will immediately begin to rotate, and the boat will fly forward. The outlaws have no craft that can stop it. And when all our archers fire together, they'll never be able to block our arrows.
"The second type of vessel you need is known as the Small Paddle-Wheeler. It has a total of twelve wheels and holds a hundred or more men. A long spike protrudes from both its prow and its stern. It also has archer towers on each side and is also protected by a bamboo screen. This craft can be used in the narrower waterways of the marsh to prevent those rogues from laying ambushes. If you accept my plan, the bandits of Mount Liangshan will soon be subdued."
As Gao listened and examined the sketches, he was very pleased. He called for wine and food and clothing and rewarded Ye Chun. Gao put him in charge of the boat building project.
Gao pushed the men day and night, setting time limits within which to deliver the timber to Jizhou. Each county had to supply materials needed for the vessels' construction. Any man who was two days late in fulfilling his duties received forty strokes. If he was three days late, he got double. If he exceeded five days, he was executed according to military law. The pressure never let up. Many ordinary citizens were killed, and the people bemoaned their lot. A jingle going around ran like this:

A frog in a well can't see the whole sky,
Gao has taken advice from a jerk.
Paddle-wheelers won't win him victory,
A waste of money and exhausting work.

Sailors to be added to the fleet kept arriving in Jizhou, and Gao assigned them to the commandants of his various camps for training. Then one day the city gate-keeper announced: "Qiu Yue and Zhou Ang, the generals sent by the imperial court, are here." Gao directed his commandants to go outside the wall to greet them. When the two were ushered into his presence, Gao received them with food and wine. He entertained them and instructed an officer to reward their troops. The generals requested Gao's order to sally forth and do battle.
"Wait a few days, gentlemen, till the paddle-wheelers are ready," said Gao. "Then we can proceed on land and water together. With our combined naval and cavalry operation, we'll suppress the bandits in a single battle!"
"It will be child's play," boasted the generals. "Rest assured, Marshal? we surely will return to the capital victorious!"
"If you match your words with deeds, I shall petition the emperor to have you both promoted to important posts."
The feasting ended, the generals mounted their horses in front of Gao's headquarters and returned to their commands. They settled their troops in encampments and awaited orders.
When Song Jiang and his chieftains hurried back to Mount Liangshan after their rebellious outcry and murderous battle at the walls of Jizhou, Song Jiang was anxious. "Twice they've come with amnesties, and both times we injured the emissary," he said to Wu Yong. "That makes our crimes more serious than ever. What are we going to do? The court will surely dispatch an army to punish us."
He sent a scout down to find out what was happening and report back as soon as possible. In a few days the man returned with the details. Song Jiang and Wu Yong conferred in Loyalty Hall. They knew now that Gao had raised a navy, and that he had put Ye Chun in charge of building a fleet of hundreds of paddle-wheelers, large and small. Also that the Eastern Capital had dispatched reinforcements under Qiu Yue and Zhou Ang, both courageous generals.
"How can we stop ships that size when they come flying across the water?" said Song Jiang.
Wu Yong laughed. "What is there to be afraid of? All we need is a few naval chieftains. We have powerful warrior leaders to fight them on land. Anyhow, it will take them several weeks to build those big vessels. We've forty or fifty days yet. Send a couple of brothers down to get into their shipyard and stir them up a bit. Meanwhile, we'll gradually be thinking of a way to cope."
"Excellent. I'll tell Flea on a Drum Shi Qian and Golden Dog Duan Jingzhu to go."
"Better ask Zhang Qing and Sun Xin to disguise themselves as timber haulers and mix with the others and get into the yard also. And tell their wives Gu Dasao and Sun the Witch to dress up like the women food servers and go in with them. Flea on a Drum and Golden Dog can be their support."
Each of the pairs was summoned to the hall and instructed what to do. All were inordinately pleased and went separately down the mountains to carry out their missions.
Marshal Gao continued driving the boat builders day and night and conscripting people into his labor force. The entire area east of Jizhou was one vast shipyard. The several thousand artisans building the hundreds of large craft complained bitterly about conditions. But the rough soldiers threatened them with their swords, and forced them to work without rest.
Flea on a Drum and Golden Dog reached the shipyard first. "Since the other four will be setting fire to this place, you and I won't be making much of a show here," Flea said to Dog. "Let's just lay low till that happens. Then I'll wait outside the city gate. Troops are sure to be sent out. I can slip in when they open the gate, climb up to the wall tower, and set it to the torch. You, meanwhile, can be kindling a nice blaze in the fodder depot west of the city. They won't know where to rush first. We'll give them a good scare."
The two concealed incendiary powders on their persons, and separated to find safe resting places.
Zhang Qing and Sun Xin, on nearing Jizhou, saw four or five hundred men hauling lumber to the shipyard. They joined them and also laid their shoulders to the ropes. At the entrance to the yard over two hundred soldiers, each with a dagger at his waist, belabored the straining porters with sticks to greater speed.
Inside there was much confused activity. They whole area was enclosed by a large palisade and contained two or three hundred thatch-roofed work-sheds. Thousands of artisans were busily engaged. In one section men were sawing planks, in another carpenters were nailing them to the hulls, in a third others were caulking the cracks. Laborers without number were bustling about. Zhang and Sun drifted into dark corners of the kitchen-shed and kept out of sight.
Their wives, Sun the Witch and Gu Dasao, wearing soiled clothes and each carrying a jug of cooked rice, entered with other women noisily delivering food. Gradually, day waned and a bright moon rose. But most of the artisans went on working at their never-ending tasks.
Around the second watch Sun and Zhang set fire to the left side of the yard, while their wives started a blaze on the right. The thatched roofs burst quickly into flames. Yelling in alarm, the artisans and laborers knocked down the palisade and fled into the night.
Marshal Gao, who was sleeping, was aroused by a man hastening in and reporting: "The shipyard is on fire!" Gao got up quickly and ordered his army to the rescue. Qiu Yue and Zhou Ang, leading a contingent of municipal troops, hurried from the city to quench the blaze. Shortly thereafter flames began to dance on the wall tower. Gao mounted his horse and led troops personally up the wall. As they were fighting the fire another report came in: "The fodder depot to the west is in flames! The blaze has turned the sky as bright as day!"
Qiu and Zhou, by then rushing with their forces to the fodder depot, heard suddenly the thunder of drums and a chorus of murderous yells. Featherless Arrow Zhang Qin and five hundred cavalry, who had been hiding there in ambush, now dashed out, with Zhang heading directly for the two generals.
"Mount Liangshan's whole complement of heroes are here!" Featherless Arrow shouted.
Qiu Yue, angered, clapped his horse and waved his sword, and galloped towards Zhang Qin, who met his charge with levelled lance. Less than three rounds they fought, and Featherless Arrow turned and left. Eager to win glory, Qiu pursued. "Halt, bandit!" he cried.
Zhang socketed his lance and quietly drew a stone from his embroidered pouch. Twisting around, he waited till Qiu drew near, then let fly with a shout: "Here!"
The stone struck Qiu in the face, knocking him from his horse. Zhou Ang and several standard bearers tore pell-mell to the rescue. While Zhou engaged Featherless Arrow, the others got Qiu back into his saddle. Zhou and Zhang fought only a few rounds, when Zhang departed. Zhou did not pursue, and Zhang again returned. He saw approaching the four contingents under Wang Huan, Xu Jing, Yang Wen and Li Congji. Zhang waved his hand as a signal and led off his five hundred cavalry.
Fearing an ambush, the government troops did not give chase. They reassembled and went back to fighting the fires. The sky was already light by the time they extinguished the three blazes. Gao dispatched an officer to learn the state of Qiu's wound. The stone had hit him in the mouth, dislodging four of his teeth and lacerating his nose and lips. The marshal directed a doctor to treat him.
Qiu's injury intensified Gao's antipathy for the men of Liangshan Marsh. He hated them to the marrow of his bones. He sent an order to Ye Chun to hasten the construction of the boats, and instructed his commandants to set up camps around the perimeter of the yard and stay constantly on the alert.
Zhang Qing, Sun Xin and their wives were delighted. Flea on a Drum and Golden Dog returned. All six were met by cohorts who had come down to escort them back to the mountain fortress. On arriving in Loyalty Hall they told how they had set the fires. Song Jiang was very pleased. He gave a feast in their honor and handsomely rewarded them. Thereafter, he sent spies down frequently.
By the time the boats were built it was winter. But that year was warm. Marshal Gao was glad. He felt Heaven was helping him. He urged his naval officers to familiarize themselves with the use of the vessels, which were being launched one after another. Sailors, conscripted from all the surrounding areas, now numbered over ten thousand. One half was put to learning to propel the craft, the other half practised archery. In less than twenty days the necessary preparations were completed. Ye Chun invited Gao to inspect the fleet.
On the appointed day Gao arrived with his generals and commandants. More than three hundred paddle-wheelers lay in their moorings. A dozen or so were selected and decked with pennants, to the crash of gongs and the beat of drums. At a knock on the bamboo segment, the wheels on both sides of the vessels began to churn, and they skimmed forward at truly flying speed. Gao's heart warmed with joy.
"The bandits will never be able to stop boats as fast as these," he exulted. "We're sure to win!"
He rewarded Ye Chun with money and silks. He also paid the artisans travelling expenses and let them go home.
The next day Marshal Gao directed that fruits and animals and paper replicas of gold and silver ingots be prepared for a sacrifice to the Water Spirit. The generals formed ranks and invited Gao to light the incense. Qiu Yue, whose wounds had healed, was consumed by hatred. He longed only for a chance to capture Zhang Qin alive and wreak his vengeance. With Zhou Ang and the commandants he mounted and rode behind Gao to where the boats were moored. There, all dismounted and Gao conducted the sacrifice. After the incense was lit and the ceremonies completed, the paper money was burned and the generals offered their congratulations.
Gao directed that the singers and dancers who had been brought from the capital come on board and entertain, while the sailors practised propelling the large craft flying across the waters. The sound of music and revelry continued until well after dark. That night all slept on board.
The next day, and the day after there was more feasting and drinking. Still, the vessels did not sail. Suddenly a scout arrived and reported: "The Mount Liangshan bandits have written a poem and posted it in front of the City God Temple in Jizhou. Here is a copy." The poem ran as follows:

We'll capture Yang Jian and old Gao Qiu,
And mop up the prefectures on the Central Plain.
Even if your paddle-wheelers number ten thousand,
You won't leave Liangshan Marsh alive again!

Gao was furious. He wanted to set forth at once. "If I don't kill all those bandit rebels, I won't come back!" he raged.
"Cool your wrath, Marshal," Chief to Staff Wen urged. "I think they're actually afraid. That's why they bluster. It doesn't matter. Wait a few days. Decide exactly how you're going to use your troops on land and on water, then start. There's still time. Though it's already winter, the weather is warm. It's a blessing from Heaven, a sign of your prestige."
This kind of talk pleased Gao, and he went into the city to discuss troop movements. Zhou Ang and Wang Huan would lead a large army to follow along on land and give support to the navy. Xiang Yuanzhen and Zhang Kai would go with a force of ten thousand and block the large road in front of Mount Liangshan. The marsh had always been a place of mist and reeds and wild inlets. The road had been built, on Song Jiang's orders, only recently. Gao wanted to get his men in there first, and cut the connection with the mountain fortress. His Chief of Staff Wen, his other generals, his Chief Advisor Wang Jin, the boat builder Ye Chun, his standard bearers, his senior and junior officers, would all travel with Gao in the armada.
Wen objected. "You should supervise the cavalry advance on land, Marshal. Don't go with the fleet. It's too dangerous."
"There's nothing to worry about, retorted Gao. "The last two times not only didn't we capture any of the bandit leaders, but we took heavy casualties and lost many of our boats. This time we've got excellent craft. If I don't assume personal command how are we going to nab those rebels! We're going to fight them to the death! You need say no more."
The chief of staff dared not pursue the subject. He followed the marshal on board. Gao designated thirty large paddle-wheelers, with Qiu Yue, Xu Jing and Mei Zhan in command, as the van. Fifty small paddle-wheelers under Yang Wen, Chief Advisor Wang Jin and Ye Chun the boat builder, would go first to clear the way. A big red pennant on the lead craft bore the inscription in words of gold: We roil the seas, stir the rivers and churn up white waves to pacify the country and suppress the torrent-causing demons.
On a vessel in the central section of the fleet were Gao, Wen, and the boy singers and girl dancers. Green standards, generals' flags, pennants of yellow and white, and canopies of red and black broke out on all the boats, and arms were displayed in the central section. Vessels under Wang Wente and Li Congji brought up the rear.
It was the middle of the eleventh lunar month. The cavalry was given the order to march. Qiu Yue, Xu Jing and Mei Zhan, on the lead craft in the van of the armada, set sail. Like flying clouds and rolling mist, the government forces advanced on Liangshan Marsh.
The three generals in the van urged on their vessels, dispatching the small paddle-wheelers to both sides of the river to block the inlets, while the large paddle-wheelers proceeded full speed ahead. Eyes bulging, necks straining, the officers stared before them, as the craft wound swiftly deeper into the marsh.
Song Jiang and Wu Yong, who had been informed in detail about the enemy movements, had made careful preparations, and awaited the arrival of the government boats.
Gao's fleet could see in the distance a few small vessels approaching, each carrying fourteen or fifteen men dressed in armor. A captain sat in the middle of each craft, and on each was a white banner reading: The Three Ruan Heroes of Liangshan Marsh. Ruan the Second was on the boat in the center, Ruan the Fifth to his left, and Ruan the Seventh to his right. What appeared in the distance to be shining armor was actually only gold and silver paper.

The three vanguard generals shouted for the lead craft to open fire, and cannon balls, musket shots and rockets spewed forth. The three brothers and their crews waited fearlessly till the paddle-wheeler drew close enough to bring them within range, then, with a shout, dived into the river and swam away under water. Qiu Yue and his cohorts captured only three empty boats.
Before the fleet had proceeded another three li; three more skiffs were seen swiftly approaching. On the first were a dozen or so men, their bodies daubed with pigments of black, yellow and red. Their long hair hung unbound, and they whistled as they came. On the other two craft were six or seven men, and these were streaked red and yellow. Meng Kang the Jade Flagpole commanded the central vessel. Tong Wei the Dragon from the Cave commanded the boat to the left. Tong Meng the River Churning Clam captained the craft to the right.
Qiu Yue ordered his lead vessel to fire. With a shout, the painted figures dived into the river. Again the government forces took possession of only three abandoned vessels.
After proceeding another three or more li the van of the armada saw three medium-sized boats, propelled by eight men on each plying four oars. A dozen brigands, grouped around a captain who was seated in the prow of one of the vessels unfurled a red banner reading: Naval Chieftain Li Jun the Turbulent River Dragon.
On the craft to the left sat a captain holding an iron spear. Here, a green banner read: Naval Chieftain Zhang Heng the Boat Flame.
A bold figure stood on the craft to the right. Stripped to the waist and barefoot, he had several iron chisels tucked into his belt. In his hand was a bronze hammer. A black banner inscribed in silver read: Chieftain Zhang Shun the White Streak in the Waves.
"Thanks for delivering your boats to the marsh!" Zhang called.
The three vanguard generals shouted for their archers to shoot. Simultaneously with the twanging of the bowstrings, the men on the three craft somersaulted into the river.
It was early winter. None of the soldier and sailor conscripts on the government vessels cared to enter the icy water. While they hesitated, a volley of shots sounded from the signal cannon on the heights. Hundreds of little craft sped out from reeds on all sides like swarms of locusts. On each of these were four or five men and an unspecified cargo. The big paddle-wheelers tried unsuccessfully to ram them.
Obstructions, shoved in beneath the water, suddenly stopped the paddle-wheels from turning. Arrows shot from the archery towers were warded off by the men on the little craft with board shields.
They closed in on the big ships, caught their tillers with grappling hooks, hacked at the sailors at the wheels. Fifty or sixty brigands were already clambering up the lead ship. The frantic officers wanted to withdraw, but their retreat was cut off.
As the van vessels fought a confused battle, wild yells rose in the rear of the armada. Marshal Gao and Chief of Staff Wen, hearing the panic from their position in the center of the fleet, hurriedly sought to go ashore. A clamor of trumpets and drums shook the reeds. The soldiers on Gao's ship yelled: "We're leaking!" and jumped into the river.
Before and behind, all the paddle-wheelers were shipping water. Gao could see them sinking. while the little craft engulfed them like ants.
The government vessels were brand-new. How could they leak? Zhang Shun and a team of expert sailors had swum underwater with hammers and chisels and knocked holes in the bottoms, so that they were leaking like sieves.
Gao mounted the tiller deck in the stern and yelled for help to the boat behind. A figure spurted out of the river and leaped on the tiller deck. "I'll save you, Marshal," the man exclaimed. Gao stared. He had never seen him before.
The man strode forward. With one hand he grabbed Gao's head kerchief, with the other he grasped his belt. "Down you go," cried the swimmer. He tossed the marshal into the river with a splash. How the mighty had fallen!
Two little craft came flying over, and Gao was hauled on board one. His captor was White Streak in the Waves Zhang Shun. In the water Zhang could take a man as easily as catching a turtle in a jar. He had only to extend his hand.
When the fleet was thrown into confusion, Qiu Yue, on the lead vessel, was anxious to escape. Suddenly, a naval officer emerged from among the outlaw sailors who had boarded the ship. Before Qiu could defend himself, the man bounded up to him and hacked him down with one sweep of his blade. The swordsman was Yang Lin the Elegant Panther. Xu Jing and Mei Zhan saw Qiu Yue die, and rushed to fight Yang Lin.
Four more lesser chieftains advanced on the generals: Zheng Tianshou the Fair- Faced Gentleman, Xue Yong the Sick Tiger, Li Zhong the Tiger-Fighting General, and Cao Zheng the Demon Carver. All came charging up from the rear.
It was too much. Xu Jing jumped overboard. To his surprise, someone was waiting for him beneath the waves, and he was taken.
Mei Zhan was stabbed in the thigh by Xue Yong, and fell into the hold. Eight chieftains were leading the outlaw naval forces. Three of these were still on their first boat. Li Yun the Black-Eyed Tiger, Tang Long the Golden-Coin Spotted Leopard, and Du Xing the Demon Face. Even if those government commandants had three heads and six arms apiece, they could never have got away. Song Jiang was in control of the Liangshan Marsh naval contingents. Lu Junyi the Magnate commanded the outlaw warriors on land.
At the time of the complete victory on the waterways, Lu was leading his army in an advance along the main road in front of Mount Liangshan. They ran into the government forces under Zhou Ang and Wang Huan.
Zhou Ang rode to the fore and shouted: "Rebellious bandit, do you recognize me?"
"You worthless officer," Lu yelled back. "Your death is before your eyes and you still don't know it!" He levelled his lance and galloped towards his foe.
Zhou Ang gave his mount full rein and raced to meet him, brandishing his battle-ax. They clashed on the road before the mountain.
Less than twenty rounds they fought, with neither the victor, when cries arose from the rear of the government troops. Outlaw forces, which had been lying in ambush in the forests on both sides of the road, had come charging out and were assailing the soldiers from all directions. Led by Guan Sheng and Qin Ming in the southeast, and by Lin Chong and Huyan Zhuo in the northeast, the brigand heroes closed in rapidly.
Commandants Xiang Yuanzhen and Zhang Kai couldn't stop them. They fought their way free and ran for their lives. Zhou Ang and Wang Huan dared not remain and give battle. Trailing their weapons, they turned their steeds and followed after the fleeing generals to the safety of Jizhou City. There, they quartered their troops and awaited further news.
After winning the naval engagement and capturing Gao Qiu, Song Jiang directed Dai Zong to transmit his urgent order: none of the prisoners were to be harmed. Chief of Staff Wen and the other officials still on the big paddle-wheelers, plus the singing boys and dancing girls and the rest of their company, were removed from the vessels. Then, trumpet calls signalled the outlaw forces to retire to the fortress with their captives.
Song Jiang, Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng were in Loyalty Hall when Zhang Shun brought in the dripping Gao Qiu. Song Jiang hurried forward to meet him. He had fresh clothes of silks and satins brought for Gao to change into. Then he escorted the marshal to the interior of the hall and begged him to be seated in the central place of honor.
Dropping to his knees and murmuring that he deserved to die for his crimes, Song Jiang kowtowed. Gao hastily returned the courtesy. Song Jiang directed Wu Yong and Gongsun to help the marshal to his feet, and once again beseeched him to be seated. He instructed Yan Qing to transmit the order: "Whosoever, after today, kills any person shall be severely punished according to our military law."
One by one, the outlaw chieftains brought in their prisoners. Tong Wei and Tong Meng with Xu Jing; Li Jun and Zhang Heng with Wang Wente; Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu with Yang Wen; the three Ruan brothers with Li Congji; Zheng Tianshou, Xue Yong, Li Zhong and Cao Zheng with Mei Zhan; Yang Lin with the head of Qiu Yue; Li Yun, Tang Long and Du Xing with the heads of Ye Chun and Wang Jin; Xie Zhen and Xie Bao with Chief of Staff Wen, plus the singing boys and dancing girls and the entire theatrical company. Only four had escaped: Zhou Ang, Wang Huan, Xiang Yuanzhen and Zhang Kai.
Song Jiang directed that fresh clothes be provided to all, and that they be permitted to clean up a bit. He then invited everyone into the hall, and asked them be seated according to rank. He directed that the captured soldiers be allowed to return to Jizhou. For the singing boys and dancing girls and their company he provided a good boat, and told them to go back on their own.
Song Jiang ordered that cows and horses be slaughtered and that a feast be laid. To the strains of joyous music he rewarded his troops and, summoning his chieftains, presented them to Marshal Gao. He repeatedly toasted his guest, while Wu Yong and Gongsun kept their cups filled and Lu Junyi the Magnate and the others stood in attendance.
"I'm only a petty functionary with the tattoo of a criminal upon my face. I would never dare oppose our holy emperor," Song Jiang exclaimed. "I was forced to come here because of my many heavy offenses. Although I was twice approached with the emperor's benevolent forgiveness, the missions were perverted and corrupt. It's a long complicated story. Rescue me, Marshal, from the depths of the pit and let me see the sun again! Your kindness will be engraved upon my bones! I will pay for it with my very life!"
Gao looked around at the assembled gallants. Bold and heroic, intelligent and imposing, each and every one was handsomely dressed. Although they were no longer on the battle field, he was still half afraid of them, and he said: "Rest assured, Song Jiang. When I return to the court I will petition the emperor for a full amnesty. You will be pardoned and rewarded with an important post. Your warriors, high and low, will also enjoy the emperor's favor and become respectable officials."
Overjoyed, Song Jiang bowed and thanked the marshal. In the banquet that followed, although elegant dishes were lacking, there were mountains of meat and seas of wine. All of the chieftains, by turns, respectfully toasted their eminent guest of honor.
Gao's tongue was loosened by drunkenness, and he boasted: "I've been a wrestler since childhood. I'm the world's best."
Lu Junyi, also drunk, was irritated by Gao's bragging. He pointed at Yan Qing and said: "This young brother also knows how to wrestle. He won the East Sacred Mountain competitions three times."
Gao lumbered to his feet, took off his robe, and demanded that Yan wrestle with him. Because Song Jiang had been treating Gao respectfully as a marshal of the imperial court, the chieftains had tolerated his vainglorious talk. Now they saw his challenge to Yan Qing as a good chance to shut his mouth. They stood up.
"Good, good," they said. "Let's have the match." They swarmed noisily out of the hall.
Song Jiang was also in his cups. His mind was fuzzy. When the two contenders removed their outer garments and walked to the broad open porch, he ordered that a soft rug be put down.
The two struck poses, then Gao lunged. But Yan Qing's hands were swifter. He grabbed Gao and, with one twist, threw him so hard on his back that Gao lay stunned for several minutes, unable to rise. This grip is known as the life-saver. Song Jiang and Lu Junyi hurriedly raised Gao to his feet and helped him put on his clothes.
"You're a little drunk, Marshal," they said, smiling. "How can you wrestle in this condition? Please don't be offended."
Badly shaken, Gao returned to the banquet. He drank until far into the night, when he was assisted to quarters in the rear of the hall.
The next day, Song Jiang gave another banquet to soothe Gao after his shock of the previous night. The marshal announced he wished to leave.
"I have no intention of detaining Your Excellency," Song Jiang assured him. "May Heaven strike me dead if I'm deceiving you!"
"If, mighty warrior, you permit me to return to the capital, I and my whole family will be your guarantors before the throne. An amnesty will surely be granted and you will be given an important position. If I go back on my word, may I have no cover under Heaven and no hiding place on Earth and may I die pierced by spears and arrows!"
Song Jiang kowtowed in thanks.
"You may keep my generals here as hostage if you don't believe me.
"There's no need. How could I doubt a high noble like you? I'll have mounts prepared for them and send them back to their camps."
"We're grateful for your considerate treatment. And now I must go."
Song Jiang and his chieftains begged Gao to remain a bit longer. The next day they again feasted and talked until late, but on the third day the marshal insisted that he must leave. Song Jiang gave him a final farewell banquet.
"Send one of your more intelligent men along," Gao suggested. "He can accompany me when I petition the emperor and relate your circumstances here on Mount Liangshan. Then an imperial decree can be issued quickly."
Song Jiang wanted nothing more than an amnesty. After conferring with Wu Yong, he selected Xiao Rang the Master Hand for the mission. "Better send Yue Ho the Iron Throat, too," Wu Yong recommended. "Let them both go."
"Although you trust me, warrior," said Marshal Gao, "I'd like to leave Chief of Staff Wen here as a token of my word." Song Jiang was very pleased. On the fourth day, he, Wu Yong, and about twenty equestrians accompanied Gao and his commandants down the mountain and saw them off all the way to the Shore of Golden Sands, a distance of over 20 li. They bid the marshal farewell and returned to the fortress. From then on they watched for an emissary and listened for good tidings. News of Gao's return preceded him, and Zhou Ang, Wang Huan, Xiang Yuanzhen, Zhang Kai, and Prefect Zhang Shuye came out of the city to greet him. After entering Jizhou, the marshal remained for several days. He instructed the local commandants to lead their troops back to camp to rest and await orders. Then, with General Zhou Ang, plus senior and junior officers, he set out for the Eastern Capital with his army accompanied by Xiao Rang and Yue Ho. Prefect Zhang Shuye returned to Jizhou, where he maintained strict security precautions. And because Gao took with him two representatives from Mount Liang Marsh, gallant men met their sovereign in the ornate palace, bravos were entertained by high officials and lofty nobles. Their courage was sung at lavish banquets, they were conspicuous heroes amid the fiercest of generals.

Marshal Gao, who has made Jizhou his headquarters, has called the border generals in for talks. With their armies they have been ordered to strike camp and repair to the city. They are ordered to remain within the city fully armed and ready for action. All officers from the camps are to man the walls in a state of full alert. No ordinary banners are flown from the city walls. A yellow flag only is flown over the north gate, displaying the two words: "Imperial edict". In the company of the imperial envoy and all the officials, Gao the Ball awaits the arrival of Song Jiang.
What they did that day on Mount Liang was to send out Hotshot with five hundred cavalry. When this party reached Jizhou they made a complete circuit of the city walls and then withdrew to the north. A little later the Magic Messenger came to reconnoitre on foot. Marshal Gao was told of it and went himself to the lookout platform next to the parapet, accompanied by his staff of a hundred or more, a ceremonial umbrella and an altar for burning incense. Away to the north Song Jiang's army was seen approach-ing. First came trumpets and drums, with flags and banners on all sides, and then the leaders in various formations — the rice scoop, the big circle and the V of a flight of geese. At their head rode Song Jiang, with the Unicorn, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun, who all bowed very low to Marshal Gao and saluted him. Marshal Gao immediately sent someone up onto the walls to declare: "The Emperor has pardoned your offence and issued an amnesty, so why do you come here armed?"
Song Jiang ordered the Magic Messenger to approach the foot of the wall and answer: "We have none of us yet received this great favour; nor do we know the contents of the edict. We cannot take the risk of disarming. We trust you will understand our position. Please summon the people of the city and let us all hear the edict together. Then we will gladly lay down our arms."
Gao ordered the populace to assemble on the city walls to hear the edict read. Soon they were all there, a great crowd milling about. Outside the city Song Jiang and his companions saw this multitude lining the walls and rode forward. At the first beat of the drum they dismounted. At the second beat they strode towards the city, while orderlies behind them took charge of the horses. They waited respectfully a bowshot from the walls. At the third beat of the drum they joined their hands together in sign of obedience and the reading commenced. Here is what the herald read out:
Hear ye! By his deeds shall every man be known. For the governance of the nation there is but one right way: the doer of good is accounted a loyal citizen; the wrongdoer is a traitor. We have long known of the gang in the Marshes of Mount Liang: how they transgress all rule and decline to reform. Today we send our envoy to publish our decree: With regard to the bandits in the Marshes of Mount Liang and the punishment they deserve for their crimes, an exception being made for Song Jiang, for Lu Junyi, known as the Unicorn, and for all the rest full pardon is granted, absolving them from the consequences of their wrongdoings. Let the leaders come to the court to show their gratitude. Let the followers return home to their own communities. The stain of corruption is quick to spread, alas! Therefore eschew evil and return to the path of righteousness. Cease your disturbances and turn over a new leaf. This is our will, let all who hear take heed.
When they heard the herald pause after the bit about an exception being made for Song Jiang, the Professor caught Colonel Hua's eye and said: "Did you hear that?" As soon as the reading was finished, Colonel Hua gave a great shout: "If you do not pardon our Leader, how can the rest of us surrender?" He set an arrow to his bow, drew the string and shouting to the official who had read the edict, "See the might of Hua Rong's arrow!" shot him through the centre of the forehead. People rushed to assist him. All the Mount Liang leaders shouted "Get them!" and a hail of arrows fell on the city. Gao the Ball was forced to keep ducking.
Troops emerged on every side. Drums sounded among Song Jiang's band and they all mounted and galloped off. The troops from the city pursued them for a mile or two. Then a signal shot was heard from the rear and Iron Ox's infantry charged from the east, Steelbright's cavalry from the west. With these two forces converging on them, the government troops turned tail, fearful of being trapped in the middle. Song Jiang's troops now turned about and charged as well. As the forces of the ambush pressed home their advantage the government troops were thrown into confusion and fled. Many were killed. But Song Jiang called a halt and instead of pressing home his advantage withdrew to Mount Liang.
Marshal Gao reported to the Emperor from Jizhou : "Song Jiang and his bandits have shot Your Majesty's herald and rejected your amnesty." At the same time he wrote secretly to the Grand Preceptor, and Marshals Tong and Yang for advice, urging the Grand Preceptor to petition the Emperor to provide logistical support along the route and send troops by forced marches to back up the operation against the bandits.
The Grand Preceptor, on receiving Gao's confidential letter, went straight to the Emperor and told him. The Emperor's displeasure was evident. "These lawless rebels have insulted us and committed heinous offences! " He issued instructions for all forces to place themselves at Marshal Gao's disposal. When Marshal Yang heard that there had been yet another defeat, he appointed two more intrepid commanders from the imperial guard and told them each to select from the four regiments — Dragon, Flying Tiger, His Majesty's and Loyal Hearts — five hundred seasoned troops, making two thousand in all, to reinforce Marshal Gao in his efforts to subdue the bandits.
Who were these two commanders then? One was a chief instructor of the imperial guard by name Qiu Yue; the other was assistant instructor of the imperial guard and equerry Zhou Ang. These two commanders had done the Emperor good service and were widely known. They had a profound knowledge of tactics and were strict disciplinarians. They were also close friends of Marshal Gao.
When Marshal Yang had told these two of their appointment and set a deadline for their departure, they went to take leave of the Grand Preceptor, who said: "If you perform your task with prudence and meet with success, you can be sure of promotion!"
They thanked him and left. In choosing the troops from the four regiments, they took only the strongest and fittest, narrow-waisted and broad-shouldered natives of Shandong and Hebei, well adapted to climbing mountains and travelling by water. Then they bade farewell to the members of the Military Council and went for a last word with Marshal Yang. "We are leaving tomorrow," they told him. Marshal Yang gave them each five good horses to use in their campaign. They thanked him and returned to their barracks to make final preparations.
Next morning the troops had saddled the horses and the army paraded in front of the imperial barracks. The colonels formed their troops into four divisions. A thousand men from Dragon regiment and from Flying Tiger, together with another two thousand cavalry, were commanded by Chief Instructor Qiu. A thousand from His Majesty's and Loyal Hearts with another two thousand cavalry were under Assistant Instructor Zhou. There were a thousand infantry, divided equally between the two commands. Punctually at dawn everyone formed up their troops to march out of town. Marshal Yang personally reviewed the troops from the city gate tower. It goes without saying that the general's subordinate officers and orderlies made a brave show. Marching under two banners and surrounded by a posse of chargers, Instructor Qiu's guard pressed about him. As he proudly led the army of the left hand forth the people of the capital broke into spontaneous applause. Then it was the turn of the army of the right hand, equally well disciplined. Preceded by two embroidered banners and surrounded by his cavalry commanders Assistant Instructor Zhou rode out. When they reached the edge of the city, he and Instructor Qiu dismounted, saluted Marshal Yang and bade farewell to the Military Council.
Back in Jizhou Marshal Gao had been discussing things with the magistrate: "When these reinforcements arrive we must first send people to the nearby forests to cut down trees for timber. All the boat builders in the region must be drafted and boat yards set up outside the city to build warships. We must enlist courageous sailors and officers."
Now in one of the Jizhou inns there was a guest called Ye Chun. He was from the south and he was a master boat builder. On his way through Shandong he had passed through the Marshes of Mount Liang and been robbed of all his money by a small band under a minor chieftain. Unable to return home, he had been drifting among the rivers and lakes.
When this Ye Chun heard that Marshal Gao was planning to cut timber and build boats, to gain the upper hand in the campaign against the bandits, he drew up some designs for boats and asked to see the Marshal. After greeting the latter respectfully, he said: "Do you know why you failed before, Your Honour, when you sent in your boats? It was because you had taken the boats from anywhere and everywhere. Some were propelled by sail, some by poles, some by oars, none of them were exactly right for the job. What is more, they had narrow keels, they weren't adapted for fighting. I'd like to show you a plan. If you want to get the better of those bandits you must first build a hundred or so big boats. The biggest is the kind we call a Leviathan. You have twenty-four rotating paddles along the two sides. They will take several hundred men. You use a dozen sailors to turn each paddle. There are bamboo screens along each side for protection against arrows. An archery tower is built on the deck. To start the attack you strike the side of the battlemented turret and the twenty-four paddles all turn together and the boat simply flies! Nothing is going to stop a boat like this! If it encounters enemy boats the hidden crossbowmen open fire. Nothing is safe from them! The second kind of boat, which we call a mini-Leviathan, only has half the number of paddles. It can take around a hundred men. Attached to the bow is a spike and along the sides are turrets for crossbows, as before, protected by matting. These boats can enter the small channels in the Marshes and prevent the enemy from hiding there. If you follow this plan you'll subdue the bandits in no time. It's a cinch!"

Marshal Gao took a look at the plans. He was well pleased with them. He had wine, food and clothing brought as a present for Ye Chun and put him in charge of boat building. The work pushed ahead every day: trees were cut down for the timber, a date was set by which it was all to be delivered to Jizhou. Every district and village was involved in the effort to provide boat building materials. Forty strokes of the cane was the punishment for missing a deadline by two days. One more stroke was given for every additional day after the third. Execution under martial law followed after five days. Everywhere the people were goaded on, under threat of death. Many perished. The people groaned.

For a frog in a well the view's not wide;
They're taking the idiot Gao for a ride.
These paddle boats are bound to fail:
The expense and labour is to no avail!

While Ye Chun gets on with the building of his paddle boats and such, we can consider the conscripted sailors, who were now pouring into Jizhou. Marshal Gao divided them equally among his commanders and sent them off for training. And that was that.

But now a doorman entered and said: "They've sent two new commanders from the court, Instructor Qiu and Assistant Instructor Zhou." Gao sent all his commanders out to meet them outside the city. When they arrived at the government offices to pay their respects to the Marshal, he ordered wine and food. After some flattering words, supplies were sent out to their troops while the Marshal entertained them. They asked him to give the order for them to go out and do battle, but he said: "Rest for a few days until our new boats are ready. Then we will mount a combined attack by land and water, with boats and cavalry, so we can settle all the bandits in one fell swoop."

"Don't worry, Marshal," the two said. "We view this business with the bandits as child's play. We shall certainly return victor-ious."

Gao said: "If your results match your words, I shall report it to the Emperor and you will certainly be promoted to high office."

When the party broke up they rode back to their respective camps and set about drilling their troops.

While Gao was urging on the boat building, eager to start the campaign, Song Jiang and the others, who had rushed back to the mountain after calling off the siege of Jizhou, were discussing things with the Professor. He said: "Twice an amnesty has been offered and twice we have attacked the Emperor's envoy. Our offence is doubly grievous and they are bound to send more troops." He sent scouts down to find out what was going on and report back as quickly as possible. In just a few days they returned with a full report: "Marshal Gao has just established a naval force, and appointed one Ye Chun to build boats, over a hundred paddle boats, large and small. And the Eastern Capital is sending two new commanders from His Majesty's personal guard to assist in the campaign. They are called Qiu and Zhou, and they're both brave soldiers. They've each been given a lot of troops and they're heading this way."

Song Jiang said to the Professor: "Big boats like those are very fast, how can we destroy them?"

"What's the problem?" said the Professor, grinning confidently. "All we need is a few of our waterborne leaders, that's all. When we take them on ashore we'll have to put up a good fight. All the same, I reckon these big boats will be some time in the building, and won't be ready for a while. We've still got about six weeks' grace. Let's send one or two of our comrades to those boat yards to tease them a bit, then in our own good time we'll deliver the knock-out blow."

Song Jiang said: "I like the idea! We'll send out the Flea and Yellow Dog."

The Professor said: "Better send the Gardener and Blackface along too. They can dress as woodcutters and mix with the crowd and get into the boatyard. And Auntie Gu and Sister Sun can pretend to be women taking food for the workers and mix with a crowd of women to get in. They can all lend the Flea and Yellow Dog a hand. The Gardener can take some back-up troops, just in case."

Everyone was called into the hall to receive their orders. All were excited. They went down the mountain separately and set about their business.

Now Marshal Gao was urging on the boat building from morning to night and from dawn to dusk people were being drafted for forced labour. All along Jizhou's east side were boat yards, busy with the construction of the hundred paddle boats. There was even a gaggle of foreign troops who went about with drawn swords, terrorizing the workers night and day, so great was the urgency of the work.

When the Flea and Yellow Dog reached the boatyard, they decided: "Evidently the Gardener and Blackface and their wives are going to start fires in the boatyard, so when we get there we won't show our hand at first. We'll lie low until the fires start. Then if I station myself near the city gate, I can take advantage of the moment when troops rush out to fight the fires in order to slip inside and start a fire in the tower. You can go to the west of the city and start a fire in the grain store. They'll have to keep rushing from one side to another. That'll put the wind up them!"

This was their plan. They secreted on their persons the materials for starting fires, and then went separate ways to find suitable hiding places.

When the Gardener and Blackface reached the town they saw a group of several hundred people dragging logs into the boat yard. By mingling with them and helping to drag the logs, they got inside. At the gate there were two hundred or so soldiers, armed with swords and truncheons, who beat the workers to make them work harder at pulling the logs and delivering them inside. The whole place was surrounded by a fence. Scattered about inside were several hundred thatched huts. They saw thousands of artisans. The carpenters were all at work in one place, the boat builders in another and the caulkers in a third. With so many artisans and workers milling about, it was impossible to know how many there were. After sneaking inside, the two heroes went and hid near the perimeter fence. Sister Sun and Auntie Gu, dressed in threadbare clothing and carrying rice pots, tagged onto a crowd of women victuallers who entered in a noisy throng. It was getting late and the moon had come out. All the workers were struggling to complete their tasks. It would soon be nine o'clock. The Gardener and Blackface started a fire on the left of the boat yard; Sister Sun and Auntie Gu started their fire on the right. The thatched huts began to burn fiercely. The boat yard workers cried out in panic. They tore up the fence and dashed out in all directions.

Marshal Gao was asleep when someone began shouting: "There's a fire at the boat yard!" He hurriedly dressed and despatched officers to fight the fire. Instructors Qiu and Zhou went with their troops to lend a hand. Before long another fire started in the gate tower. When Marshal Gao heard he called for his horse and took some of his men over to fight this fire. Then it was reported: "There's another fire over in the western grain store!" The flames illuminated the scene as brightly as daylight. When the two instructors took their men to fight the fire in the western store they heard the beat of a drum and a hair-raising battle cry. It was Hotshot and his five hundred cavalry who had been lying in wait there. When he sighted the two instructors, Hotshot charged. As the forces met, Hotshot shouted out: "The whole army of Mount Liang is here!"

Chief Instructor Qiu, enraged, slapped his horse and brandished his sword and charged to meet him. Hotshot did likewise, wielding his long lance, but after no more then three encounters he slapped his horse and galloped away. The Instructor wanted to follow up his advantage. He shouted, "Stay, you rebellious villain!"

Hotshot rested his lance and deftly took a large stone from his belt. Twisting in the saddle, he waited till the Instructor was quite near and then, with a cry of "Pow!" hurled his stone, catching the Instructor full in the face and toppling him from his horse. Assistant Instructor Zhou saw this and charged to the rescue with several of his junior commanders. While the Assistant Instructor fought off Hotshot, his men loaded the Chief Instructor onto a horse and left. After several bouts with the Assistant Instructor, Hotshot turned his horse and fled. His opponent did not give chase. Hotshot turned again, but seeing himself threatened by three of the border generals and their troops, he gave a signal to his five hundred cavalry and pulled back the same way he had come. Fearing an ambush the government troops did not pursue them, but reassembled and returned to the city, where they concentrated on putting out the fires. By the time all three fires were out day had dawned.

Marshal Gao asked for a report on the Chief Instructor's condition. The stone had hit him right on the mouth, knocking out four teeth. His nose and lips were split. Marshal Gao ordered a doctor for him. With this serious wounding of the Chief Instructor, Gao's anger with Mount Liang entered into the very marrow of his bones. He sent for the boat builder Ye Chun to impress upon him the need to move on fast with the work, and had the fence around the boat yard closely guarded by his officers day and night. Of this no more.

Now the Gardener and Blackface and their wives were well pleased with the results. The Flea and Yellow Dog also started homeward. A party came out to meet all six with horses to take them back to Mount Liang. Everyone went to the Ceremonial Hall to hear about the arson attack. Song Jiang was delighted and ordered a banquet in honour of the six. From now on he continued to send scouts out from time to time to keep an eye on the situation.

It was winter by the time the boats were nearly finished. But the weather was especially warm that year, and Marshal Gao was pleased because he felt heaven to be on his side. When Ye Chun's boats were ready, Marshal Gao ordered the sailors aboard for training. One by one the big and small paddle boats and the other boats were launched. Of sailors and others brought into the city from the four corners of the earth there were more than ten thousand. Half of these were sent aboard to learn how to propel the paddles, while the other half practised with the crossbow. After some twenty days, when he was satisfied with the level of training, Ye Chun asked the Marshal to inspect the boats. There is a poem which says:

In warfare the secret has always been speed;
A dilatory general will seldom succeed.
Marshal Gao is a slacker, in tactics unskilled:
These boats are his downfall, they're too slow to build.

The Marshal took all his officers and staff along to see the boats. There they were, more than three hundred of them, spread out on the water. From a dozen or so picked vessels, festooned with banners, came the beat of gongs and drums. Then after a loud bang, as someone struck the side of the tower, the paddles suddenly began to turn and the boats shot forward swift as the wind or a lightning flash.

Marshal Gao felt a surge of excitement. How could the bandits stop boats that could fly like this? The war was as good as won! He brought out money and ingots to reward Ye Chun. As for the rest, the artisans, he gave them their travel expenses and packed them off home. Next day he ordered an offering to be prepared of black oxen and white horses, together with pigs and sheep and fruit and nuts. Paper gold and silver were also needed to bribe the water spirits. When all this was ready, the commanders entreated Marshal Gao to burn incense.

The Chief Instructor's mouth had healed but the iron had entered his soul and he was longing for the day when he would take Hotshot alive and exact his revenge. So now with the Assistant Instructor and all the other officers he mounted and followed Marshal Gao down to the boats. Here they all dismounted and assisted the Marshal in his sacrifice to the river gods. After the ceremony with the incense, they burnt the paper offerings. Everyone applauded and the Marshal called for the troupe of performers they had brought with them from the capital. They were brought on board to play and sing during the ensuing banquet. While the troops practised working the paddles at speed, the sound of music, song and dance spread far and wide over the water. The festivities went on till the small hours.

Everyone slept on board that night. Next day there was more feasting, and so it continued for three days. There was no chance for the boats to sail. Then suddenly someone rushed in and said: "Those Mount Liang bandits have written a verse and stuck it up in Jizhou in front of the temple of the Earth God. Someone tore it down and brought it here."

Here is what this poem said:

Gao the Ball, that upstart fraud,
Can't seem to get his troops on board.
Who cares if he has a million boats?
We're going to sink whatever floats.

Goaded to fury by these verses, Gao wanted to attack at once. "I swear we'll never go back, till we've exterminated those lawless bastards!" he fumed.

Military adviser Wen cautioned him: "Calm your thunderous anger, Marshal. The insolent beggars must be scared stiff; ten to one they're just bluffing. No one could take them seriously. Enjoy a few days rest, until the armies are properly embarked. There's no hurry. We're in the middle of winter, but the weather's warm and conditions are just fine. Everyone knows your Excellency's formidable reputation."

Calmed by this flattery, Gao returned to the city and made his dispositions in consultation with his generals. Assistant Instructor Zhou and border general Wang Huan were to lead a large land force in support, while border generals Xiang and Zhang with ten thousand cavalry seized the approach road to Mount Liang. Mount Liang had always been isolated by a vast wilderness of reed beds and water, but recently there was this new road that Song Jiang had built; it didn't exist before. Marshal Gao ordered the cavalry to cut this route. The rest, that is to say, military adviser Wen, Chief Instructor Qiu and five border generals, together with the Marshal's secretary Vicious Wang and boat builder Ye Chun, the rest of his staff and junior officers and so on, were all to accompany the Marshal in the attack by water.

But military adviser Wen warned him: "You should go with the cavalry, sir. You shouldn't go on the boats, it's too big a risk for the commander-in-chief."

"Nonsense!" Gao the Ball replied. "The last two times we didn't have enough reinforcements, that's why we lost so many men and boats. This time we've got all these new boats just built. If I don't take command myself, how can I expect the bandits to be captured? This time it's a war to the finish. So you can just shut up."

Not daring to open his mouth again, Wen could do nothing but follow the Marshal aboard. Gao ordered thirty of the big boats to form the vanguard, commanded by Instructor Qiu and border generals Xu and Mei. Fifty small boats under border general Yang Wen, Vicious Wang and boat builder Ye Chun were to clear the way. Two red silk banners were flown from the leading boat, with the words in gold: "We shall sweep the seas, dredge the depths and roll the waves flat, to pacify the land and exterminate malefactors."

On the command boat of the main force were the Marshal and military adviser Wen, together with the singers and dancers and a detachment of personal guards. The forty odd large boats of the main force were provided with green awnings, the commander's flag, an array of yellow banners and white streamers, red pennons and black umbrellas, together with all the army's weapons. On the last of the boats two more border generals directed operations.

It was the middle of December. The cavalry set off first. Then the leading boats of the naval force went forward, with their three commanders aboard. Along they flew like storm clouds in the wind, setting their course for the Marshes of Mount Liang.

Song Jiang and the Professor had received a full report of all this and had made their preparations. They were now waiting for the government fleet to arrive.

The three commanders of the vanguard were coming on at speed. The small paddle boats were on either side, sealing the small channels, while the large paddle boats sailed up the middle. The government commanders, like stalk-eyed crabs or tall-necked cranes, stared fixedly ahead as they raced forwards deep into enemy territory.

Then far off in the distance, a crowd of boats was seen. On each boat there were fourteen or so men, all in armour, a leader in their midst. The first three boats were flying white flags, with the words "Ruan Brothers of Mount Liang". Ruan the Second was in the middle, Ruan the Fifth on the left and Ruan the Seventh on the right. Their gleaming armour could be seen from afar, but in reality the gold and silver plates were cut out of paper and stuck on. When the first three units of the government force saw them, the order was given to open fire. A salvo of shells, musket shots and fire arrows winged away. Totally undismayed the Ruan brothers waited till the boats were well within range and then, when the shooting began, gave a great shout and plunged into the water. The Chief Instructor and his crew captured nothing but three empty boats.

The government flotilla continued another mile or so and then they saw three light skiffs shooting towards them like the wind. The first of these raced forward with a crew of a dozen, their bodies painted with woad and ochre, smeared with earth and clay, their hair unbound; they were blowing on whistles. The boats on either side held only half a dozen men each, variously stained with red and green. The one in the middle was Flagpole, with Cave Dragon on his left and River Rider on his right. The Chief Instructor again gave the order to open fire. Immediately the enemy abandoned their boats with a shout, diving into the waves. Three more empty boats were captured. Another mile, and three more medium-sized boats appeared, four-oared, two men to an oar. They also carried a dozen troops, waving red flags and crowded around a leader who sat in the prow. On the flag was written: "White-Water Dragon Li Jun". The warrior on his left was brandishing a spear and holding a green flag with the words "Pilot Zhang Heng". On the right stood a hero who was bare chested and bare footed, with several chisels stuck in his belt, and a bronze hammer in his hand. He had a black flag with silver letters which said: "White Eel Zhang Shun". As they steered their boats they shouted out: "Thank you for sending us your boats!"

"Fire!" came the command from the leading government boats. As the crossbow bolts whistled towards them the occupants of the three enemy boats somersaulted into the water and were gone. Now remember it was a winter's evening. Which of the conscripts in the government boats would have been prepared to jump into the water?

They were still trying to decide how to respond to this, when a series of reports rang out on the summit of Mount Liang and thousands of little boats shot out from the surrounding reed beds and came skimming towards them like a swarm of locusts. There were four or five to each boat, and the decks were loaded with something which could not be identified. When the large paddle boats tried to close on them, it was found that they wouldn't move. The crews strained to turn the paddles but the water ahead was filled with hidden obstructions and the paddle blades simply wouldn't budge. And when crossbows were fired from the towers, every crew member on the little boats shielded himself with a plank. As the enemy boats closed on them, someone grappled their rudder with a hook, whilst another slashed at the crew with a sword. Before long fifty or more of the enemy had swarmed aboard the leading boat. The other boats tried to retreat but the way behind was also blocked and there was no escape. While the leading boat was thus embroiled, a cry arose from the hindmost. Hearing this commotion, Gao and Wen on the middle boat thought of disembarking, but at this moment gongs and drums sounded among the reeds and all the sailors in their boat cried out: "She's sprung a leak!" Water was pouring in. The first and last boats were also leaking and apparently about to sink. Everywhere little boats swarmed like ants, converging on the big boats. Now, how was it these brand-new vessels of the Marshal's were taking in water? Well, it was all on account of White Eel and his band of skilled sailors, who with hammer and chisel had knocked holes in the hulls below the waterline, so the water came flooding in everywhere.

As Marshal Gao clambered onto the bridge and shouted to the boat behind to come to the rescue, someone emerged from the water and sprang up onto the bridge, saying: "I will rescue you, Marshal!" It was not someone Gao knew. The stranger grasped him with one hand by the topknot and with the other by the belt and shouting "Down we go!" hurled him, splash! — into the water. The horrified commander of the great armada was now a soused and drowning man! Then two small boats shot out from the bank to rescue him. On one of them was White Eel, who thrust his hand into the waves and plucked the Marshal out, like someone who grasps a turtle in a jar!

As the battle raged all around, the Chief Instructor on the leading boat frantically tried to think of a way out. Suddenly from the melee a sailor emerged and before the Chief Instructor had time to defend himself one blow of the sword had toppled him into the water. The attacker was Mount Liang's Panther. Generals Xu and Mei rushed over to attack their comrade's killer. Immediately four leaders leapt out from a knot of sailors — Whitey, the Pill Monger, the Tiger Killer and Knife, and rushed the government generals from behind. Seeing the situation so unfavourable, Xu leapt into the water. But he was counting without the enemy lurking under the surface and he was soon captured. Mei was wounded in the thigh by a thrust from the Pill Monger's spear and toppled into the hold.

Now, eight of the Mount Liang leaders had volunteered to serve with the waterborne forces and three of these were aboard the first boat: Greeneyes, Spots and Uglymug. If the government commanders had had three heads and six arms, they still would not have got anywhere against them!

Song Jiang and the Unicorn had led separate forces on land and on the water. The former led the attack by water, the latter the attack on land. Let us say no more of the victory by water and turn our attention to the Unicorn, who commanded a famous force along the approach road to Mount Liang, where they came up against the Assistant Instructor and border general Wang Huan. When they met, the Assistant Instructor rode out in front and shouted: "Rebellious scum, do you know who I am?"

The Unicorn shouted back: "You're nobody, and you're about to meet your death right here, though you don't yet know it!" With this he levelled his lance and kicked his horse and charged the Assistant Instructor. The latter swung his great axe and rode to meet him. There on the road to the mountain they did battle. They fought nearly twenty bouts, but neither had the advantage. Then a shout went up from the troops in the rear. The main army from Mount Liang had left the mountain earlier to lie in ambush in two wooded areas and were now attacking from every side with bloodcurdling yells. On the southeast Scimitar, Thunderclap, from the northwest Leopard's Head and Twin Rods, all these heroes converged. The other two border generals could not withstand their ferocious charge. As soon as they managed to fight their way out they took to their heels. The Assistant Instructor and Wang also had no heart for a fight and put up their lance and axe and fled back along the road all the way to Jizhou, not stopping till they were inside the city. They tethered their horses and went to hear the news.

Meanwhile Song Jiang's waterborne force had captured Marshal Gao. Song Jiang immediately told the Magic Messenger to pass on the order that the captives were not to be harmed. Wen, the military adviser, and the others on the boats of the main fleet, together with the singers and dancers and all the staff, were taken off. The bugle was blown to recall the troops to the stronghold. White Eel brought in the dripping Marshal and presented him to Song Jiang, the Professor, Taoist Gongsun and the other leaders in the Ceremonial Hall. Song Jiang hurried down to receive him and ordered clean silk clothing for him so he could change. Afterwards he led him to the dais and begged him to be seated opposite, then he respectfully prostrated himself before him, saying "We have given you great offence!" Gao hurriedly returned the courtesy.

When the Professor and Taoist Gongsun had paid their respects Song Jiang asked them to be seated too. He told the Prodigy to proclaim that from then on any further killing would be punished by death. Shortly after this a whole crowd of people arrived with prisoners: five border generals were brought in and the head of the Chief Instructor, as well as the heads of boat builder Ye Chun and Vicious Wang. Also captured were military adviser Wang, and the artistes and other hangers-on. Only the four on land had escaped: the Assistant Instructor and three of the border generals.

Song Jiang ordered all the leaders to change their clothes and tidy themselves. When they had done so, they were asked to enter the Ceremonial Hall and be seated there according to their rank. As for the troops captured alive, they were all sent back to Jizhou. In addition a comfortable boat was equipped for the artistes and others, who were then left to their own devices.

Song Jiang had oxen and horses killed and arranged a great banquet. While the troops were rewarded and there was a lot of music played, all the chiefs great and small assembled and came up to be presented to Marshal Gao. When these ceremonies were completed, Song Jiang proposed a number of toasts and the Professor and Taoist Gongsun took charge of the wine and offered it round, while the Unicorn and the rest stood in attendance. Song Jiang addressed the company as follows: "How could a lowly official such as I, branded as a criminal, oppose the will of our sacred Emperor? It is simply because of faults I committed that I have been forced to live like this. Although we have twice received offers of pardon from the Emperor, they were presented in a perverse and malicious form. I don't want to go into that now, but I hope Your Excellency will be merciful and help a deeply sinning man. If you rescue me from the pit where I languish and bring me back into the sunlight, your kindness will be engraved on my heart forever, I will repay it with my life!"

When Gao saw those heroes, all so strong and manly, with Leopard's Head and the Blue-Faced Beast staring angrily at him, as if they might explode at any moment, he was more than a little intimidated. He said: "Song Jiang, put your mind at rest! When I return to the court, I will urge the Emperor to grant a full amnesty." Song Jiang was delighted and prostrated himself in gratitude. The banquet that day was extremely elaborate. All the leaders passed round the cup. Gao got very drunk and lost all his inhibitions. He said: "When I was young I learnt wrestling, I'm the best in the world."

The Unicorn was drunk too. Riled by Gao's boastfulness he pointed to the Prodigy and said: "This young friend of mine knows a thing or two about wrestling. He has won the competition on Mount Tai three times!"

Gao rose to his feet and started taking off his clothes, because he was determined to wrestle with the Prodigy. Everyone had seen what respect Song Jiang gave him, as a Grand Marshal of the court, so there was nothing they could do but go along with it. The Prodigy needed no urging: he couldn't wait to take Gao down a peg. So they all stood up and said: "Good, let's have some wrestling!" Excitedly they crowded down from the dais. Song Jiang was drunk too, and his judgement was not entirely clear. The two men stripped and Song Jiang ordered soft mats to be spread out on the platform. Standing on a velvet rug, the contestants took guard. Gao rushed in first. The Prodigy reached out and caught him and with one quick twist threw him down on the mat. He didn't move for some time. This catch is known as 'The Lifesaver".

Song Jiang and the Unicorn hurriedly picked the Marshal up and helped him on with his clothes. Everyone said laughingly: "You were drunk, Marshal, you were in no state for wrestling. Please don't be upset!"

Gao the Ball's chagrin was unbounded, but he returned to the banquet and went on drinking till late into the night, when he was helped to his bed.

Next day another feast was laid on, to put the Marshal at ease. All the Marshal wanted now was to leave, and see the last of Song Jiang and company. Song Jiang said: "If we have kept you here, Marshal, it is not because we harboured any ill intent. If I am not being honest with you, may heaven strike me dead!"

Gao said: "If you are generous enough to allow me to return to the court I will petition the Emperor on behalf of all of you, secure an amnesty, and bring you back into the nation's service. I will not betray you, it would be an unpardonable crime, let me die at another's hand if I do!"

Song Jiang bowed his head in gratitude. Marshal Gao went on: "If you do not trust me, I can leave behind some of my generals as hostages."

Song Jiang said: "How could a man of your noble character not keep his word? There is no need for any hostages. Later I will have horses provided for all of you and escort you back to your camp."

Marshal Gao thanked him, saying: "You are most gracious. I am truly grateful. But now I must be going."

Song Jiang and the others pressed him to accept further hospitality. Two more banquets were arranged for that day. The dishes were continually renewed and they did not break up till the small hours.

On the third day Marshal Gao was determined to leave. Song Jiang and his company still urged him to stay on. A farewell banquet had been arranged and presents of gold, silver and brocades were paraded. Something like a thousand pieces of gold were given to the Marshal in lieu of the banquet. The other commanders likewise received gifts. Gao made a show of refusing but in the end accepted it all. Whilst they were drinking, Song Jiang raised the question of the amnesty again. Gao the Ball said: "You can send someone with me, if you like, someone diplomatic. I will take him to see the Emperor, so that he can explain your precise concerns and obtain an appropriate decree."

Now Song Jiang really wanted this pardon. He discussed the matter with the Professor and then told Magic Hand to go along with the Marshal. The Professor said, "Send Lungs along too. They can keep each other company."

Marshal Gao said: "Since we trust each other, I'll leave my military adviser here with you as a guarantee." Song Jiang accepted this arrangement. On the fourth day, Song Jiang and the Professor with a score of cavalry escorted Marshal Gao and his officers down the mountain. They travelled 6 or 7 miles further with them after the crossing from Golden Sands Landing. After they had said farewell to the Marshal, they returned to the stronghold where they awaited news of the amnesty. Marshal Gao and his party headed for Jizhou. When their imminent arrival was announced, the Governor and the four generals who had escaped came out to meet them. Marshal Gao decided to remain in the city just long enough to regroup his army and instruct his generals to take charge of their own troops and lead them home to rest for a while pending further orders. After this, he himself, with the Assistant Instructor from the imperial guards and the officers of his own army set off for the Eastern Capital, taking Lungs and Magic Hand along too. Now because Marshal Gao had with him these two leaders from Mount Liang, certain things were going to happen. Heroes would be found mixing in the halls of the great, brave men would be seen treading the floors of palaces.

The Prodigy Yan Qing Meets the Emperor By a Trick on a moonlit night; Magic Messenger Dai Zong Rescues Xiao Rang & his comrades from their plight

On Mount Liangshan the chieftains conferred. "I wonder what Gao Qiu will do," mused Song Jiang.

Wu Yong laughed. "He's a beady-eyed, slippery character, the kind who'll turn on you in a flash. He lost so many troops and wasted so much of the government's money and grain, when he gets back to the capital he's sure to claim that he's ill. He'll make some vague report to the emperor and order his army to rest. Xiao Rang and Yue Ho he'll keep under house arrest. So far as an amnesty is concerned, you're just hoping in vain."

"That's terrible! We won't get the amnesty, and we're harming two of our men besides."

"Pick two more clever fellows and send them to the capital with money and jewellery. Have them inquire what's going on and find a connection who can convey our wishes to the emperor. Then Gao Qiu won't be able to squirm out of it. That would be the best plan."

Yan Qing came forward. "Before we raised such a rumpus in the Eastern Capital last time, we managed to get acquainted with Li Shishi. I imagine she guessed pretty well what we're after. Since she's the emperor's mistress, of course he didn't suspect her of having anything to do with us. She probably simply said that we had found out where he went for his private pleasures and deliberately tried to frighten him. The incident was closed. Let me go to her again with money and jewellery. Pillow talk is the quickest way to get word to the emperor. It will be easy. One way or another, I'll persuade her."

"All right," said Song Jiang. "But you may run into danger."

"Let me go along and help," Dai Zong proposed.

"When we attacked Huazhou, you did a favor to Marshal Su," Zhu Wu the Miraculous Strategist reminded Song Jiang. "He's a good-hearted person. If he intervenes with the emperor for us, it will help a lot."

Song Jiang summoned Chief of Staff Wen and invited him to be seated. "Do you know Marshal Su Yuanjing?" Song Jiang queried.

"We were students together," Wen replied. "The emperor never goes a step without him. Su is extremely virtuous and generous, a kindly, amiable person."

"Frankly, we doubt whether Gao Qiu will really request the emperor for an amnesty when he returns to the capital. I met Marshal Su once when he was burning incense in Huazhou. I'd like to beg him to petition for us."

"If that's what you want, General, I'll write a letter which you can have delivered."

Pleased, Song Jiang called for paper and pen. At the same time, he lit fine incense, brought out the Heavenly Books of the Mystic Maid, prayed to Heaven, and cast bamboo prediction slips which revealed an extremely favorable omen. Then he drank with Dai Zong and Yan Qing to their successful journey.

Two large hampers were packed with gold and jewellery and silks, and the letter was concealed on the person of the emissaries, who bore also forged identity documents from the Kaifeng prefectural government. Both were disguised as bailiffs.

They took their leave, crossed at the Shore of the Golden Sands and headed for the Eastern Capital. Dai Zong carried an umbrella and wore a pack upon his back. Yan Qing, his bailiff's staff on his shoulder, toted the hampers, one at either end. His black gown was tucked up in front, a pouch hung at his waist. Puttees bound his legs to the knees, his feet were shod in hempen sandals. Except for pauses to eat or drink, the two halted only to sleep at night, pushing on again at dawn.

After many a day, they arrived at the Eastern Capital. Instead of going in directly, they circled round to the Wanshou Gate. A guard halted them. Yan Qing set down the hampers.

"What are you stopping us for?" he demanded in a countrified accent.

"Orders from headquarters. Men from Mount Liangshan may try to slip in with the crowds. At every gate all travellers must be questioned."

"You certainly know your duty," Yan Qing snickered, "questioning your own people! We have some business to do in Kaifeng Prefecture. I don't know how many thousands of times we've gone through this gate! You question us and turn a blind eye to the Mount Liangshan men strolling by right under your nose!"

He pulled out the forged documents and shoved them in the guard's face. "Can you recognize Kaifeng identity papers?"

The officer in charge of the gate shouted at the guard: "They've got Kaifeng papers. What are you questioning them for? Let them in!"

Yan Qing snatched back the documents, shoved them inside his gown, picked up the hampers and walked on. Dai Zong, with a cold laugh, followed.

They proceeded to the neighborhood in front of the Kaifeng government compound, sought out an inn, and retired.

The next day Yan Qing changed into a cloth gown, tied at the waist by a sash, and wore a hat at a rakish angle in the manner of a young idler. He took from the hamper a packet of gold and jewellery.

"I'm going to see Li Shishi, brother," he told Dai Zong. "If anything goes wrong hurry back to the stronghold."

Yan Qing proceeded to the courtesan's home. The carved railings were still there, and the green windows and vermilion doors had been repainted, prettier than before. He pushed aside the door curtain of spotted bamboo and entered.

The fragrance of incense greeted him. Pictures and calligraphy by famous artists had again been hung in the parlor; beneath the eaves were twenty or thirty trays of curiously shaped stones and miniature pines. Brocaded cushions were piled on couches of carved sandlewood.

Yan Qing coughed softly. A maid emerged, then informed the courtesan's "mama" that they had a caller. The bawd was startled to see him.

"What are you doing here again?"

"Please ask the lady to come out. I have something to say."

"The last time you called you got us into trouble and wrecked the house. If you've anything to say, say it."

"My words are for the lady's ears only."

Li Shishi, who had been listening outside the window, now entered. She was a lovely sight, her cheeks as rosy as dew-drenched apples, her waist as supple as a willow swaying in the breeze, a veritable Heavenly Maid, more beautiful than a Moon Fairy. Her skirt swirled as she glided lightly into the room.

Yan Qing stood up, placed the packet on the table, kowtowed four times before "Mama" Li, then twice before Leading Courtesan Li.

"You're too courteous," Shishi protested. "You shouldn't honor one so young."

Yan Qing rose and said: "Last time we gave you a fright. We've been uneasy ever since."

"Don't deceive me," exclaimed the girl. "You said you were Zhang Xian and that the other two were merchants from Shandong, and you created a terrible riot! Luckily, I was able to cajole the emperor. If it were anyone else but me, she and her whole establishment would have been ruined!"

"There were a couple of lines in that poem your magnate wrote which I wondered about:

Six time six in wild goose formation,
Plus eight times nine,
Waiting only for news
From the Golden Cock

I was about to question him, when the emperor arrived unexpectedly. Then the rumpus started, and I had no chance. Now that you're here, you can explain. Don't try to fool me. Tell me the truth. I won't be satisfied till you clear things up!"

"I'll tell it to you straight, but please don't be alarmed, Queen of Courtesans. That short swarthy fellow who sat at the head of the table was none other than Song Jiang the Defender of Justice. In the second seat, the fair-complexioned man with the mustache and goatee was the Small Whirlwind Chai Jin, descendant of Emperor Chai Shizong. The man dressed as a bailiff who stood opposite was Dai Zong the Miraculous Traveller. The one at the door who fought with Marshal Yang was Li Kui the Black Whirlwind. I myself am from Daming Prefecture, the Northern Capital. Everyone call me Yan Qing the Prodigy."

"Big Brother Song Jiang came to the capital to see you, and sent me first, disguised as Zhang Xian, to arrange it. He wasn't seeking to buy your smiles and charms, but wanted rather to reveal to you our story because he knows you're close to the emperor. We hope you'll tell His Majesty of our desire to act on Heaven's behalf, defend our country and preserve peace for the people. An early amnesty will prevent a further loss of lives. If our monarch will grant such a decree, you, my lady, will be the chief benefactor of the thousands of men on Mount Liangshan. Due to the interference of corrupt ministers, the true situation has been kept from the emperor. And so, we seek this path. We have no intention to frighten you, my lady. Big Brother has no proper gift to offer, only these small trinkets. He begs that you don't laugh at them, and accept."

Yan Qing opened the packet and spread upon the table gold and jewellery and precious plates. The bawd, who loved riches, was enchanted. She urged Shishi to accept, and led Yan Qing to a small private room and begged him to be seated. She served him fine delicacies and waited on him solicitously. Since no one knew when the emperor was likely to drop in, none of the young lords and rich young gentlemen ever dared to venture to the courtesans' house for tea. Li Shishi waited on Yan Qing personally.

"I'm a condemned criminal," he protested. "How dare I sit at the same table with the leading courtesan in the land?"

"Don't talk like that," exclaimed the girl. "You're a famous warrior. It's only because no good person has been able to speak up on behalf of you men that you've had to bury yourselves in the marsh."

"The first amnesty, which Marshal Chen brought, had no reassuring words, and he substituted cheap drink for the imperial wine. The second amnesty was phrased in such a way that it could be interpreted as excluding Song Jiang and Lu Junyi. For that reason, we didn't surrender. Next, Minister Tong came with an army, and we demolished them in two engagements. Finally, Marshal Gao mobilized thousands of people and built a great fleet and attacked. In three battles we wiped out more than half his forces. The marshal himself was captured and taken to our stronghold. Brother Song Jiang not only didn't kill him, but treated him royally and sent him back to the capital. All the prisoners were also let go. When he was on Mount Liangshan the marshal swore a great oath that he would petition the emperor for our amnesty. We dispatched two of our men with him—Xiao Rang the Master Hand and Yue Ho the Iron Throat. But it looks like the marshal has them confined in his residency and won't let them out. He'll never admit to the emperor that his losses were so heavy."

The girl agreed. "He wasted money and grain and the lives of his officers and men. He wouldn't dare tell the emperor the truth. I heard all about it. Let's have a few cups together and discuss this thing."

"I'm a very poor drinker."

"You've had a long, hard journey. Here you can relax. We'll drink some wine and then decide what to do."

Yan Qing couldn't get out of it. He had to match the courtesan cup for cup.

Li Shishi had made her start in life as a prostitute. She was a temperamental girl, and when she saw that Yan Qing was a fine figure of a man and an eloquent speaker she took an immediate liking to him. As they drank, she began dropping hints, which grew increasingly provocative. Yan Qing was a clever fellow, and he understood perfectly. But he was a dedicated warrior, determined to put through Song Jiang's grand plan. How could he respond?

"I've heard you're an excellent musician, brother," said the courtesan. "I'd love to hear you play."

"I have studied music a bit," Yan Qing admitted. "But I wouldn't have the nerve to perform in your presence, my lady."

"I'll play first, then, and you listen."

Shishi directed a maid to bring her flute. She took the instrument from its brocaded bag and blew softly. Truly a lovely sound, soaring into the clouds and seeping into the rocks.

Yan Qing was lavish in his praise. When Shishi had finished she handed him the flute.

"Now play something for me."

Yan Qing wanted to win her esteem. He accepted the instrument and performed with all his skill. The girl was enchanted.

"I didn't realize you were such a talented flutist!"

She took up a lute and played a little tune. The notes lingered in the air like a chorus of jade chimes, like a duet of orioles.

Yan Qing bowed his thanks and said: "I'll sing a song for your amusement, my lady." He had a beautiful voice, and he enunciated the lyrics clearly. At the conclusion of his song, he bowed again.

The girl raised her cup and drank to him. She thanked him in her most seductive tones. With lowered head, he murmured an acknowledgment. After a few more drinks, the courtesan addressed him with a smile.

"I hear that your body is artistically tattooed. Would you let me have a look?"

Yan Qing laughed. "It's true I have a few decorations. But how dare I disrobe in my lady's presence?"

"With a gallant gentleman like you, who worries about such things?"

At her insistent pleas, Yan Qing finally removed his robe. Shishi was delighted. She ran her jade fingers over the designs. The young man hastily put his robe on again.

Again she drank with him. Her suggestiveness was quite open now. Yan Qing was afraid she'd make a move he'd find hard to repel. Suddenly, he had an idea.

"How old is my lady this year?" he asked.

"I'll be twenty-seven."

"I'm two years younger, twenty-five. Since you're kind enough to give me your affection, I'd like to acknowledge you as my foster big sister."

Yan Qing dropped to his knees. Like pushing a golden mountain, like a toppling jade pillar, he kowtowed eight times.

This stymied the girl's wicked inclinations and enabled the grand plan to go forward. Anyone else so beguiled with drink and sexual allure would have brushed the grand plan aside. But Yan Qing had a will of iron. He was a real man!

Then Yan Qing asked "Mama" Li to come in, and he kowtowed to her too, and acknowledged her as his foster mother.

"Stay here with us," said Shishi. "There's no need to live at an inn."

"That's very kind of you. I'll go get my things."
"Don't keep me waiting, now!"
"The inn's not far. I'll be right back."
Yan Qing took his leave, went to the inn, and related to Dai Zong what had happened.
"Excellent," said the Miraculous Traveller. "I'm only afraid she'll arouse you and you won't be able to control yourself."
"A man who can be diverted by drink or sex when he's out on a mission is no better than a beast! May I die beneath ten thousand sword cuts if I let that happen to me!"
Dai Zong laughed. "We're both men of honor. No need to swear."
"But there is. You surely doubt me."
"Just go quickly. At a propitious time push the thing through and hurry back. Don't make me wait too long. We have to deliver that letter to Marshal Su."
Yan Qing packed some odd bits of gold and jewellery and silks and returned to Shishi's house. He gave half to "Mama" Li and distributed the rest among the servants and attendants. They all were very pleased. Quarters were prepared for him in a room adjacent to the parlor, and he moved in. Everyone fondly addressed him as "Young Uncle."
By fortunate coincidence that evening a man came and said: "The emperor is coming tonight." On hearing this, Yan Qing went to Li Shishi.
"Do me a favor, sister," he pleaded. "Arrange for me to meet the emperor so that I may request his imperial pardon in writing for my crimes. You'll be conferring a blessing."
"I can do that. Move him with your eloquence. I've no doubt he'll grant it."
Gradually, darkness fell. The moon was hazy, the air was filled with the fragrance of flowers and the musky scent of orchids. Accompanied by a young eunuch, the sovereign arrived through the secret tunnel at the rear door of the courtesan's house. He was dressed in the white garb of a scholar. Seating himself in the anteroom, he directed that the front and rear gates be locked and the lamps and candles brightly lit. Li Shishi, formally dressed and coifed, presented herself before his majesty. She curtsied, and they exchanged courtesies.
"Put on something more comfortable and entertain me," said the emperor.
Shishi did so, and led the monarch into her chamber. A table had already been laid with delicacies. The courtesan lifted her cup and urged him to drink.
"Come, beloved," he said happily, "sit beside me." He was obviously in a good mood.
"A cousin of mine, who has been wandering around, just arrived today," said Shishi. "He longs to see Your Majesty, but dares not present himself. He's asked me to make the request."
"Since he's your cousin, why not?"
The courtesan summoned Yan Qing. He dropped to his knees and kowtowed. The emperor was pleased by his handsome appearance. Shishi directed Yan Qing to entertain the sovereign with some flute music while he was drinking his wine. After a while she played the lute, then she told Yan Qing to sing. The young man again kowtowed before the monarch.
"I only know some naughty tunes, which I wouldn't dare sing!"
"Exactly what I need to cheer me," said the emperor. "I'm here privately in this house of pleasure. Go right ahead."
Yan Qing took up a pair of ivory clapper sticks, bowed again to the sovereign, and said to Shishi: "If I go off key, sister, please correct me." He cleared his throat and, keeping time with the clappers, sang:

No news from him
Since he left our village,
Constant longing
Tears at my heart.
The swallows are gone,
The flowers fade,
In just one spring
My waist grows thin.
Faithless lover,
When will he return?
It would have been better
If we never had met!
In dreams we're together,
But then I awake,
Outside my window
Orioles sing in the dawn.

Yan Qing was in excellent voice, and the emperor, delighted, bade him sing again. The young man kowtowed.
"I have another tune that's rather special."
"Good. Let's hear it." With feeling, Yan Qing sang:

Hear my plea, hear my plea,
Who knows how I've wandered,
Who knows!
In Heaven and on Earth
The innocent oft are wronged,
In the Fiery Pit, 'tis said,
Are hearts that are loyal and true,
Loyal and true!
Surely the day will come
When great benevolence
Will be by men repaid!

"What's the meaning of this song?" asked the startled monarch.
Weeping bitterly, Yan Qing prostrated himself on the ground. The emperor was puzzled.
"If you'll tell me what's troubling you, perhaps I can find a solution."
"I've committed towering crimes! I dare not address my sovereign!"
"I forgive you. You may speak freely."
"All my life I've been a wanderer. While travelling with merchants in Shandong and passing by Liangshan Marsh, we were captured and taken to the bandit Stronghold. There I stayed for three full years. Only recently did I escape and return to the capital. Although I've seen Cousin Shishi, I dare not walk the streets for fear that someone will recognize me and report me to the police. How would I be able to explain?"
"He's been miserable," Li Shishi added. "You must help him, Your Majesty!"
"That's easy," the emperor laughed. "No one would dare molest the young cousin of Leading Courtesan Li."
Yan Qing gave the girl a significant glance. Shishi pouted and said to the monarch: "All I want is your written pardon. Then my cousin won't have to worry."
"How can I write it? I don't have my royal seal here."
"A pardon in your own hand is better than any document with a seal. Save my cousin! You'll be doing me a great favor!"
Unable to resist her blandishments, the sovereign called for pen and paper. "Mama" Li brought the writing materials from the study and Yan Qing ground the ink stick on the writing slab. The girl handed the emperor the ivory brush-pen with purple bristles. In a flourishing script he commenced to write on the imperial yellow paper, then paused.
"I'm afraid I've forgotten your name."
"I'm called Yan Qing."
"Ah." The emperor wrote: Xuan Ho the Taoist Sovereign does hereby pardon Yan Qing of all crimes. Let no official arrest or question him. At the bottom, he signed his name.
Yan Qing respectfully received the document and kowtowed. Shishi raised her cup and drank her thanks.
"Since you've been in Liangshan Marsh, you must know the situation there," said the monarch.
"Song Jiang and his band have Act in Heaven's Behalf written on their banner and their hall is called Loyalty Hall. They never attack a government seat or harm the people. They kill only corrupt and slanderous officials. They long for an early amnesty so that they can devote themselves to serving our country."
"But I sent them amnesties twice. Why did they reject them and refuse to surrender?"
"The first one contained no words of comfort, and the emissary substituted cheap local brew for the imperial wine. The second was read in a manner that excluded Song Jiang. The brigands suspected a trick, and that changed everything. Minister Tong led an army against them, but after two engagements only a few escaped with their lives. Marshal Gao organized a huge civilian force to build ships of war, and attacked, but he didn't gain so much as a broken arrow. In three engagements the bandits slaughtered his men and cut his army in two and captured the marshal. He vowed he would get them an amnesty, and they let him go, sending two of their men with him and keeping Chief of Staff Wen as hostage."
The emperor sighed. "I knew nothing of any of this. Tong Guan said his troops couldn't stand the summer heat; that's why they returned. Gao said he had come back to the capital temporarily because he was ill."
"Although you are a wise sovereign," said Shishi, "you live deep inside the palace. How can you know when dishonest ministers conceal the truth?"
Again the monarch sighed. It was growing late. Yan Qing took his pardon, kowtowed and withdrew. The emperor and Shishi went to bed, where they revelled in intimate union.
The monarch left with the waiting young eunuch before dawn. Yan Qing got up and, on the excuse that he had some matters to attend to early in the morning, went back to the inn. He told Dai Zong everything that had been said, word for word.
"It's developing very well," said the Miraculous Traveller. "Now, let's deliver the letter to Marshal Su."
"After we've eaten."
The two had breakfast, filled a hamper with gold and jewellery and silks, took the letter, and headed for Marshal Su's residency. They asked one of the neighbors whether he was home.
"The marshal hasn't returned from the palace yet," they were told.
"Why not?" said Yan Qing. "There are no audiences in session at this hour."
"He's our sovereign's closest companion. The emperor never goes a step without him. He may come home early, he may come home late. It's hard to say."
"There's the marshal now," someone exclaimed.
Very pleased, Yan Qing said to Dai Zong: "Brother, wait for me outside the residency. I'm going to speak to him."
Approaching was a sedan-chair carried by porters in brocaded garments and ornate hats. Yan Qing knelt in its path.
"I have a letter to present to the marshal," he called.
Su looked at him. "Come with me," he directed. Yan Qing followed the sedan-chair into the residency compound. It halted before a large hall. The marshal got down, entered an adjoining study and seated himself. He ordered Yan Qing to come in.
"On whose business are you?"
"I've come from Shandong with a letter from Chief of Staff Wen."
"Which Chief of Staff Wen?"
Yan Qing presented the letter. The marshal looked at the envelope.
"I couldn't imagine who it was! Why, it's Wen Huanzhang, my childhood schoolmate!" he opened the letter and read:

With hands washed clean, kowtowing a hundred times, I write this missive to the Respected Marshal. It's thirty years since I played in your home as a child. Recently, Marshal Gao appointed me Chief of Staff of his army. Unfortunately, he wouldn't heed my advice, and was defeated three times in succession. I'm ashamed to mention it. We both were captured and bound. But Song Jiang, in his benevolence, would not permit us to be harmed.
With Xiao Rang and Yue Ho—two men from Mount Liangshan, the marshals has now returned to the capital, promising to seek an amnesty. I have been left as hostage. I pray that you urge the emperor to pardon the crimes of Song Jiang and his cohorts, and let them make recompense through meritorious deeds. This will benefit not only our country, but the entire world! Your credit will resound through the ages!
Rescue me and allow me to live! I anxiously await your reply and trust you will understand.
In deepest gratitude, respectfully,
Wen Huanzhang

The__ day of the first month, spring,
of the fourth year of the Xuan He Period

Marshal Su was astounded. "Who are you?" he demanded.
"Yan Qing the Prodigy from Liangshan Marsh." The young brigand went out for the hamper and brought it into the study. "I waited on you several times when you were burning incense in Huazhou, Marshal. How could you have forgotten? Brother Song Jiang sends you these paltry gifts as a small token of his esteem. He prays every day that you will save us. His sole desire is that the marshal will obtain our amnesty. If you can persuade the emperor to grant one, you will be the great benefactor of the thousands of men on Mount Liangshan. The time for my mission is limited. I must go back now."
Yan Qing kowtowed and left the residency. Marshal Su directed that the gifts be put away. He already had an idea.

Dai Zong and the Prodigy returned to the inn and Yan Qing said: "The first two parts of our mission succeeded pretty well. But Xiao Rang and Yue Ho are still detained in Gao's residency. How are we going to get them out?"
"We'll dress as bailiffs again and wait in front of Gao's place. When some officer comes out, we'll bribe him to let us see them. Once we've made contact, we'll decide what to do."
The two disguised themselves, took some money, and proceeded towards Taiping Bridge. At the gate of the residency they kept watch. Soon, a young captain came swaggering forth. Yan Qing approached him and bowed.
"Who are you?" the captain demanded brusquely.

"Shall we go to the tea-house where we can talk?"
Dai Zong was waiting in a private room, and the three sat down together and had tea. Yan Qing spoke.
"I'll come to the point. Marshal Gao brought two men back with him from Mount Liangshan. One is called Yue Ho. He's relative of this brother here, and I'd like to see him. So we're asking your assistance."
"I don't want to hear it! I don't know anything about what goes on in there!"
Dai Zong took from his sleeve a large silver ingot and placed it on the table. "There's no need for him to leave the residency," he said. "Just let us speak to him and you can have this ingot."
Stirred by the sight of the silver, the captain admitted: "Those two are there, all right. But the marshal has ordered that they must remain in the rear garden. If I let him out to talk to you, you must keep your word and give me the ingot."
"Naturally," said Dai Zong.
The officer hurriedly went back to the residency, while Yan Qing and Dai Zong waited in the tea-house. In less than half a watch, he returned, all in a flurry.
"First give me the silver. I've got Yue Ho in one of the side buildings."
Dai Zong whispered something in Yao Qing's ear and handed the captain the ingot. Yan Qing went with the officer to the side building and saw Yue Ho.
"Talk quickly, you two, then go," said the captain.
"I'm here with Dai Zong," Yan Qing said to Yue Ho softly. "We're planning to rescue you and Xiao Rang."
"They've got us in the rear garden. The wall is high and they've hidden the ladders. How are you going to do it?"
"Is there a tree anywhere near the wall?"
"There are large willows all along one side."
"Tonight, listen for a cough. We'll be outside and throw over the ends of two ropes. Tie them to the willows, and we'll pull our ends tight. Then you and Xiao Rang climb over. At the fourth watch. Don't be late."
"What're you so gabby about?" the captain called. "Go back inside and be quick about it!" Yue Ho returned to the garden and quietly informed Xiao Rang. Yan Qing swiftly reported to Dai Zong. All waited for night to fall. On the street, Yan Qing and Dai Zong bought two thick lengths of rope and concealed them under their robes. They wandered to the rear of the residency to get the lay of the land. They found a stream and two empty boats moored not far from the bank. They hid in these craft until they heard the watchman's drum sound 4 times. The 2 went ashore, circled round to the rear wall, and coughed. From within they heard an answering cough. Both sides were ready. Yao Qing threw over the rope ends. Giving them time to be secured, he and Dai Zong pulled their ends tight. Yue Ho was the first to climb out, and he was followed by Xiao Rang. When both had slid down, they tossed the ropes into the garden. The four hid themselves in the boats until daybreak. Then they proceeded to the inn and knocked on the door. They packed their luggage, cooked and ate breakfast, paid the bill and left. As soon as the city gate was opened, they swarmed through and headed for Mount Liang to report their news. And if those four hadn't returned to the stronghold, would Marshal Su have petitioned the throne and obtained a full amnesty for Song Jiang and his men? Truly, when a high official reads a royal edict, heroes kneel before the imperial presence.

Three times the heroes of Mount Liang had inflicted defeat on Marshal Gao by water, and they had even held him captive on the mountain. But Song Jiang would not allow him or his men to be harmed and had released them all. When Marshal Gao returned to court with a number of his troops, Magic Hand and Lungs went with him to the capital until the amnesty was arranged and for his part Gao left behind his military adviser Wen Huanzhang. Whilst he was on Mount Liang the Marshal had promised: "When I get to the court I will personally take care of Magic Hand and his companion, and when the Emperor grants me an audience I will recommend that as a matter of urgency a messenger be sent here with the pardon." Lungs had been ordered to go too as a companion for Magic Hand. However, it is not of them that we must tell now, but of the discussions that were proceeding on Mount Liang.
Song Jiang said: "Now Marshal Gao is gone, I begin to doubt whether he was sincere."
The Professor found this amusing: "From what I know of him he has the temper of a wasp and the nature of a snake. He is two-faced and thankless. He has just lost a vast number of troops and squandered a huge amount of government money and provisions. When he gets back he is bound to plead illness and stay away from court. He will deliver an ambiguous report to the Emperor in order to buy time and rest his troops. Magic Hand and Lungs will be kept under house arrest. If you're thinking of waiting for that pardon, you're wasting your time!"
"What are we going to do, then?" said Song Jiang. "The pardon is still wanting, and we've lost two good men."
The Professor said: "You'd better pick two quick-witted characters and send them to the capital with plenty of funds so they can find out what's going on, hand out bribes and let everyone know the true facts so Marshal Gao can't cover up. That's the best plan."
The Prodigy rose to his feet and said: "That time we caused an uproar in the capital, I managed to get into the house of Li Shishi, the singer, remember? When the trouble broke out I think they more or less guessed what was going on. The point is, since she is the Emperor's lover, he wouldn't suspect her of anything. No doubt she said: 'The bandits from Mount Liang found out about Your Majesty's secret visits and decided to come here and give us a fright', and the business was all hushed up. This time I'll go there with some gold and jewels. There's nothing more effective than a pillow present. I can size things up and decide what to do."
Song Jiang said: "It would be putting a lot of weight on your shoulders!"
The Magic Messenger said: "I'll go too and give him a hand."
The Strategist said: "Previously, when we attacked Huazhou Marshal Su was pretty cooperative. He's a man of integrity. If we can persuade him to petition the Emperor, things will go all right for us."
Song Jiang remembered the words of the Mystic Lady: "Chance lodgings will bring many joys". Might not this be what they referred to, since the Marshal's name, Su, was written with the same character as lodging? He summoned Wen, Marshal Gao's military adviser and said: "Your Excellency, do you know Marshal Su Yuanjing?"
Wen replied: "We were classmates. Now he is very close to the Emperor. He's an extremely compassionate and generous person. He's the kind of man who's always ready to put in a good word for someone."
Song Jiang said: "Let me be frank with you. We suspect that when Marshal Gao gets back he will not ask for the amnesty on our behalf. I once met Su when he was in Huazhou. I would like to send someone to him with a present to beg him to speak to the Emperor on our behalf so we can bring this affair to a successful conclusion."
Wen said: "In that case, I'd better write you a letter for him."
This was exactly what Song Jiang wanted. He called for paper and brush. Meanwhile he burnt some good incense and took out the Mystic Lady's books and after looking to heaven and saying a prayer pulled out an excellent omen. He then regaled Magic Messenger and the Prodigy with wine before their journey. They collected the money and valuables in two big baskets, while the letter was concealed by one of them on his person. As before, they carried a forged warrant from the authorities of the capital. Dressed as policemen, they bade their companions farewell, went down the mountain, crossed at Golden Sands Landing and set off for the Eastern Capital. Magic Messenger had an umbrella and a pack on his back. The Prodigy had a staff of office and the baskets on a carrying-pole. He wore a black shirt, a silk sash around his waist, knee guards and hemp shoes with eight eyelets. On the journey they stopped only when necessary for food and drink, travelled till late and set off early. They reached the capital without delay and casually tried to enter the city by the Gate of Longevity. But as they approached the guards stopped them. The Prodigy put down his load and affecting the local accent said: "Why are you stopping us? What's all this about then?"
"Strict orders from above," the guard said. "They're afraid some of those types from Mount Liang may try to sneak into the city. That's why we're required at every gate to question all travellers from the country outside, coming and going."
The Prodigy jeered at him. "You're a pretty smart fellow, aren't you?" he said, "Questioning your own people, like this! We both worked here since we was nippers, must've been through this gate more times than I can count, but you, you go and question us. Whereas that lot from Mount Liang, I bet you'd let them walk through right in front of your eyes." Then he took out the fake warrant and thrust it under the man's nose: "Here, see this? Is it a government pass, or isn't it?"
The guard commander shouted: "If he's got a government pass, what's the point of questioning him? Let them go!"
The Prodigy retrieved his warrant and tucked it away, then picked up his carrying pole. Magic Messenger gave a sarcastic laugh. The two went off into the city to look for an inn.
Next day the Prodigy put on a clean robe and a gauze sash, changed his headdress and tilted it over one eye, in the manner favoured by profligates. From the bundle he took out some gold and valuables, tied up them in a handkerchief, and said to Magic Messenger: "I'm going to Lily's now to do that business. If I should get caught go back to Mount Liang at once." He set off in the direction of Li Shishi's. Arriving at her door, he found that it hadn't changed at all: there were the same curving balustrade, with the carved rail, green windows and red door, but it had all been repainted. He lifted the bamboo curtain of a side door and went in. He immediately smelt some wonderfully fragrant incense. Arriving at the guest chamber, he found it hung with famous old paintings; beneath the eaves were more than a score of weirdly shaped stones and miniature pine trees. The back of the couch was of carved cedar wood. The cushions on the little bed were covered in brocade. He gave a discrete cough. The maid came out to see what it was, and went back in again to fetch Mama Li. When she saw the Prodigy she had a shock: "Why have you come back?" she asked.
"Ask Lily to come here," he said. "I've got something to say to her."
"You gave us a lot of trouble," she said. "You smashed the place up. If you've got anything to say, say it."
"I'm not going to say anything unless Lily is here," said the Prodigy.
Lily was listening in the next room but she was reluctant to appear. Eventually she did. What a sight! The Prodigy thought of morning dew on plum blossom, of willows gently swayed by the breeze, of houris in paradise, of goddesses, nymphs and fairies, as Lily glided into the room with mincing steps. He rose to his feet at once and placed his package on the table. He prostrated himself four times before the old woman and twice before Lily, who modestly protested: "Please, no ceremonies. I am too young. I don't deserve this honour."
Rising to his feet, the Prodigy said: "I fear we inconvenienced you last time. I and my friends had nowhere else to take refuge."
"Don't try to kid me," she said. "You told me you were Zhang Xian, and your two friends were merchants from Shandong. Then there was all that hullabaloo. Luckily I was able to find a way to explain it to His Majesty, but if it had been anyone else but me there'd have been a proper mess! And what's those two lines of verse your man wrote down: 'Six times six like a skein of geese plus nine times eight, just waiting for the news of the golden chicken'? It sounded pretty suspicious to me. I was going to ask what it meant, but then there was His Majesty's surprise visit, and then that brawl, so I never had the chance. Now you are here and you can explain it to me. But don't hide anything, tell me the truth. If you're not going to be open with me, I don't want nothing to do with it!"
"I'll tell you everything, sweet lady," said the Prodigy. "But prepare yourself for a shock. That short black chap who was with me that time, the one who took the place of honour, was none other than Song Jiang, the fount of chivalry. The fair-skinned one, who took the second place, the one with the three-cornered hairdo, that was the Little Whirlwind Chai Jin, descendant of a famous emperor; the one disguised as a policeman who stood by the door was the one we call the Magic Messenger. The one who fought with Marshal Yang in the courtyard was Iron Ox, otherwise known as the Black Whirlwind Li Kui. I myself am from the northern capital and people call me the Prodigy. Our Leader Song Jiang came here on purpose to seek an interview with you. He told me to gain access to your house, pretending to be Zhang Xian. He just wanted a glimpse of your beauty, he wasn't asking anything in return. Your position has made you so famous, he would like to come himself and tell you about our wrongs, how all we want is to be able to do heaven's will, serve the country and protect the people. If His Majesty will only hear us and grant us pardon, it will prevent so much suffering. If you help us, you will be the saviour of countless thousands of heroes on Mount Liang. We are being persecuted all the time by evil officials, those who spread slander, abuse their power, prevent the rise of virtue, keep good men down. This is why we have to grasp this opportunity, it's not because we want to frighten you. The Leader cannot come here himself to pay his respects, but he has a very small gift for you, which he hopes you will not despise." The Prodigy opened the package and spilled its contents on the table. Out poured gold and pearls, jewels, precious plates and bowls. Now, the old woman had a passion for such baubles and she was delighted. She quickly called a maid to gather them up and invited the Prodigy into one of the private rooms inside and had him served with the choicest wines, the rarest foods. Lily's house, of course, was somewhere the Emperor might drop in at any time, so nobody, whether noble or prince or rich man, would visit expecting to be offered tea! Yet of all that was displayed there, wine and dishes of fruit and nuts, Lily offered him with her own fair hands. The Prodigy said: "I am an outlaw under pain of death, how can I remain seated in the presence of a princess?"
"Don't be silly, now," she said. "Your lot are famous; of course I've heard about you. It's just because there aren't enough good men around to give you a leg up, that's why you've had to go and bury yourselves in those marshes."
The Prodigy said: "The time before when Marshal Chen came with the pardon there was no friendliness or sympathy in the language. And in addition the wine was switched. On the second occasion when an envoy brought the pardon an important sentence was deliberately left ambiguous: an exception being made for Song Jiang, for Lu Junyi, known as the Unicorn, and for all the rest full pardon is granted, absolving them from the consequences of their wrongdoings. That's why we still couldn't accept it. Marshal Tong attacked us. After two battles there was nothing left of his forces, not so much as a scrap of armour. After this Marshal Gao forced the people to build boats for his campaign. After three more battles most of his army was destroyed and Marshal Gao himself was made prisoner and taken up the mountain. No harm was done to him. He was entertained royally not once but many times and then sent back to the capital. All the other prisoners were released. When he was on Mount Liang, the Marshal swore that after he returned to court he would petition the Emperor to send an unconditional pardon. He therefore took two of our people with him: Magic Hand, our master calligrapher, and Lungs, renowned for his singing voice. Obviously he is keeping these two under house arrest and won't let them out. He has not told the Emperor about his losses."
Lily said: "How could he? He'd never dare tell the Emperor about all that money and supplies he's wasted and all the men and officers he's lost! I've heard rumours of this. Have a few cups of wine with me first and then we'll think what we can do about it."
The Prodigy said: "I can't take wine."
Lily said: "You've had a long hard journey. A few cups will do you good."
The Prodigy had to give in. He was obliged to join her in drinking.
Now Lily naturally had the habits of a courtesan. She was a flirt, and talking to the Prodigy with his quick wit and ready tongue she took quite a fancy to him. As they drank together, she did her best to get him excited using suggestive language. After a certain number of cups her hints became more and more transparent. The Prodigy was no fool. Of course he knew what was going on. But he was a man of honour and his purpose was firm. He would have hated to endanger the Leader's aims. He had no intention of letting himself go.
Lily said: "I've heard you have a tremendous talent for music. It's good to listen while one's drinking. I'd love to hear you sing."
The Prodigy said: "I'm no good really, how could I possibly perform in front of you?"
"I'll play for you first," she said. "You can just listen." She called the maid and told her to bring the flute. She took it out of its cotton case and began to blow softly. It was indeed a sound to melt the hardest heart and make the spirits soar. The Prodigy was hugely impressed. After playing one piece, she handed him the flute and said: "Now you play something for me!" He dared not disappoint her if he wanted his business with her to succeed, so he took the flute and played a haunting melody. Lily could not stop applauding. "You play absolutely marvellously," she said. She took back the instrument and played another short tune. What a magical sound! Like the warbling of two orioles, ravishingly sweet.
To show his gratitude the Prodigy said: "I will sing for you." He burst into song, a truly moving and beautiful rendition; the phrasing and control of rhythm were perfect. He concluded and bowed. She took up the cup and drank to him, murmuring some seductive little sounds to stir his senses. But he just sat there with his head respectfully bowed.
After several more cups, she said with a laugh: "I have heard that you are completely covered with tattooes. Dare I ask to see what they're like?"
He said with a smile: "It is true that I have some tattooes, nothing very much. But how could I possible bare myself in front of you?"
"A young man with such a fine body needn't be bashful about showing it," she said.
After much discussion they came to an agreement and the Prodigy bared his upper body. Lily expressed her delight as she touched him with her delicate little fingers. He quickly covered himself again. They had another cup of wine and she continued trying to excite him. He was afraid she might make some move he would find it difficult to reject. Suddenly he thought of something. "How old are you exactly?" he asked.
"I shall be twenty-seven this year," she answered.
"And I am twenty-five, so I am two years younger than you," he said. "Since you have been so kind to me, may I have the honour of calling you elder sister?" He stood up and flung himself down before her. Eight times he prostrated himself. These eight salutes were what brought her licentious ideas to a standstill and enabled the important business to go ahead. Had he been anyone else, the wine might have gone to his head and the whole affair been ruined. This episode proves that the Prodigy had a will of iron. He was a true gentleman. He called Mama Li in too, and prostrated himself before her, treating her as an adoptive mother.
When he was about to leave, Lily said: "You must stay here with us. There's no need for you to go to an inn."
"If you are so kind as to invite me, let me go back to the inn and fetch a few things."
"Don't you keep me waiting, now," she said.
"The inn is not far," he said. "I'll be back in a moment."
Having bidden her a temporary farewell, he went back to the inn and told Magic Messenger what had happened. "That's great," the latter said. "The only trouble is I'm afraid you may have lecherous thoughts that you can't repress."
"A man who drowns his conscience in debauchery is no better than a beast. If I have any such thoughts, may I die the death of a thousand cuts!"
Magic Messenger laughed and said: "We are both men of honour. You don't have to swear any oaths!"
"I must, otherwise you won't trust me."
"You just go quickly, choose your moment, get the business done as quickly as possible and come straight back. Don't leave me waiting here too long. There's still that letter for Marshal Su waiting to be delivered."
The Prodigy packed a bag with some loose gold, jewels and other valuables, and returned to Lily's house. He gave half to the old woman and divided the rest among all the other members of the household, so that each one got their share. A room was prepared for him to one side of the guest quarters. Everyone in the house addressed him as uncle.
It so happened that as evening approached someone arrived and announced that the Emperor intended to come that night. The Prodigy immediately went to Lily and prostrated himself. "I want to ask you a favour, Elder Sister," he said. "Will you allow me to see His Majesty tonight? And provide some of the imperial paper and brushes so he can write out a pardon? I am dependent on your bounty!"
Lily said: "Certainly I will present you to the Emperor tonight, and if you let him know your problems there's no need to worry about getting his pardon."
Evening came on. The moon shone mistily, a multitude of scents perfumed the air. At this moment His Majesty walked down the little path to Lily's back door, leading a young eunuch from the palace and dressed as a common scholar. He was taken to sit in a private room. All the doors, back and front, were bolted, and every lamp and candle in the place was lit. Lily came to receive him, with a comb in her hair and most elaborately got up. After the ceremonial exchange of greetings, the Emperor asked her to change her elaborate attire and to entertain him. Lily obeyed and then took him to the inner room. All kinds of delicacies had been prepared for the occasion, fruit and nuts and such, all laid out waiting. Lily raised her cup for a toast, and the Emperor responded happily by calling out: "Approach, my dear and sit with me!" Seeing the Emperor in such a good mood, Lily respectfully petitioned him: "I've got this cousin who went away when I was small. He returned today. He asked if he could see Your Majesty. Of course it is not for me to say, but may I entreat Your Majesty to admit him to the royal presence?"
"Since he is your relative," the Emperor said, "of course he may be admitted into my presence, I can have nothing against it."
The girl sent for the Prodigy to appear before the Emperor. The Prodigy pressed his knuckles to his forehead and prostrated himself. The Emperor liked his looks. Lily told him to play something on the flute to entertain His Majesty while he was drinking. Then she played the lute and asked the Prodigy to sing. The Prodigy bowed and said: "The only songs I know are licentious love songs, how can I perform something like that for His Majesty?"
The Emperor said: "Just the sort of thing that's needed for a private visit to a house of pleasure, something to banish care. No need to be shy."

So the Prodigy took up the ivory clappers, bowed and then said to Lily: "Please correct me sister if I hit some wrong notes." He filled his lungs, grasped the ivory clappers and sang:

Since the day he left his home,
No news, no sign from him.
Longing and pain afflict me now
When will my poor heart break?
No longer do the swallows come,
The flowers are faded all.
I waste, I pine; when will I see
The faithless wretch again?
Better it were we'd never met.
In my dreams I sense him, yet
When I wake it's only the oriole
Greeting the dawn outside my window.

This performance was indeed like the fluting of an oriole, beguiling to the senses. The Emperor wanted him to sing again. The Prodigy bowed very low and said respectfully: "I have a little air of my own that I'd like Your Majesty to hear." He sang thus:

Hear my plea! Hear my plea!
I've wandered who knows where
Far from the haunts of men.
Many there are in the world
Who suffer cruel wrong:
Many languish in the fiery pit
Yet house a loyal heart.
A loyal heart, a loyal heart,
The day for giving thanks will come,
And a merciful lord shall be repaid!

Somewhat taken aback, the Emperor asked: "What exactly is the point of choosing this song?"
The Prodigy began to weep and prostrated himself.
Still more alarmed the Emperor said: "You'd better get it all off your chest. I will sort it out for you."
The Prodigy replied: "My crimes are unforgivable. I don't know how I can tell you."
The Emperor said: "If I pardon you there is no crime. You may speak freely."
The Prodigy said: "Since my youth I have been wandering in the rivers and lakes. I found myself in Shandong, I went with some merchants and when we were passing the Marshes of Mount Liang I was taken up the mountain and remained there three years. This year I managed to escape and return to the capital. I found my cousin, but I don't dare show myself in the street. If someone should recognize me and report it to the police what would become of me?"
Lily then put in a word: "This is my cousin's only worry. I beg you, Your Majesty, you must decide his fate!"
"It's no problem," the Emperor said pleasantly to the Prodigy. "You're a close relative of Miss Li, no one will dare to arrest you."
At a sign from the Prodigy, Lily coquettishly pressed the Emperor further: "But please Your Majesty, won't you put the pardon in writing? Once he has your forgiveness he can rest easy."
"But I don't have the imperial seal here, how can I do that?" the Emperor objected.
"Your personal calligraphy is good enough for anyone. If you vouchsafe my cousin your protection, you will be bestowing the greatest of blessings on poor little me."
The Emperor could put up no further resistance. He ordered writing materials to be brought. The old woman went and fetched the four treasures of the study — paper, brush, ink and ink stone — while the Prodigy ground the ink on the stone and Lily handed the Emperor a fine-haired brush with an ivory shaft. The Emperor smoothed out the sumptuous paper and began to write across it in bold characters. He paused and said: "I'm afraid I don't recall your name."
"They call me Yan Qing, Sire," the Prodigy said.
Here is what the Emperor wrote:
His Sacred and Imperial Majesty Xuan Ho, Guardian of the Way and Keeper of the Mysteries, hereby absolves Yan Qing of all his crimes. Let no officer seek to detain him!
When he finished writing, he appended the royal monogram. The Prodigy kowtowed again to the Emperor and Lily filled the cups to show her thanks. The Emperor remarked: "If you stayed on Mount Liang you must know all about the place."
The Prodigy said: "Song Jiang's band have a banner which says "To Do Heaven's Will" in big characters. Their ceremonial hall is known as the Hall of Loyalty and Righteousness. They have never tried to usurp the local government nor do they harm good people. They only attack greedy officials, corrupt ministers, slanderers and sycophants. They live all the time in hope of a royal pardon and their chief desire is to serve the country."
The Emperor said: "But I have twice promulgated decrees granting them an amnesty. Why do they continue to resist and refuse to surrender?"
"Sire," said the Prodigy, "the first of those decrees was couched in insulting terms. What is more, the imperial wine that was sent with it was purloined and some very ordinary stuff substituted for it. That is why everything went wrong. The second time there was a deliberate omission in the text: Song Jiang appeared to be excluded from the amnesty, the wording was ambiguous. So it went wrong again. Marshal Tong's army attacked and after two battles it was totally destroyed. Marshal Gao raised an army and press-ganged the people to build boats for his campaign, vowing to wipe out Mount Liang entirely, but in three battles his troops were cut to pieces and he himself captured alive and taken up the mountain. He promised to secure an amnesty when he got back to the capital. He brought two members of the company back here with him, and left Colonel Wen, his military adviser, behind as hostage."
The Emperor said with a sigh: "I knew nothing of all this. When Marshal Tong returned he said the heat was too much for them, he said he ordered a ceasefire to allow his troops to rest. Marshal Gao said he had called a temporary halt to the campaign and returned to the capital because sickness prevented the attack."
Lily said: "Despite Your Majesty's clairvoyance and heavenly status, the proper path can be obstructed by evil counsellors, you can't help it."
But the Emperor remained exceedingly downcast. It was quite late when the Prodigy took up his pardon, kowtowed and went to bed. The Emperor slept with Lily and was fetched just before dawn by one of the palace eunuchs.
When the Prodigy rose next day he announced that he had business to attend to early and returned to the inn where he gave Magic Messenger a full account of what had been said and done. Magic Messenger said: "We're in luck then. Let's go and deliver the letter to Marshal Su."
"We can do that after breakfast," said the Prodigy.
After breakfast they packed a hamper with gold and valuables, took the pardon and directed their steps toward Marshal Su's palace. Inquiring in the neighbourhood they heard that the Marshal was not at home. The Prodigy said: "The morning audience at the palace should be over by now. Why isn't he back?"
The man said: "Marshal Su is the Emperor's favourite, he scarcely leaves his side. Sometimes he comes home early, sometimes late. You can never be sure."
Just as he was speaking, someone else said: "Isn't that the Marshal coming now?"
The Prodigy was very pleased and said to Magic Messenger: "You wait here at the gate, Brother. I'll go and see him by my-self." When he approached he found a knot of richly dressed attendants escorting the sedan. The Prodigy knelt down right there in the street and cried: "I have a letter for His Excellency!"
The Marshal looked him over and said: "You'd better come inside then."
He went inside with the sedan which stopped in the front of the hall, where the Marshal got down and went to sit in the library on one side, inviting the Prodigy to follow. "Where are you from and what's your business?" the Marshal asked.
"I am from Shandong, and I am bearing a letter from Colonel Wen."
"What Colonel Wen is this?"
The Prodigy took out the letter and presented it. Marshal Su inspected the seal and said: "Why, that's who it is! It's Wen Huan-zhang who was my schoolmate when I was young." He broke the seal and read:
Dear and respected friend: I greet you most humbly. When we were small we used to play together. But that is thirty years ago now! Recently I was invited by Marshal Gao to join his staff as military adviser. Because he neglected my advice and refused to take precautions, he suffered three defeats, shameful to relate. The bandits captured him and tied him up, but their respected leader Song Jiang, moved by a humane and generous spirit, would not allow any harm to come to him. Now Gao has taken two of their company to the capital with him, the Magic Hand and Lungs, to seek the royal pardon, and left myself here. I beg Your Excellency to raise this matter with His Majesty and request him to quickly proclaim the amnesty for Song Jiang and his company and allow them to redeem their crimes through good works, to the great benefit of the country and of the world! Rescue me I beg you, I await your reply and trust you will understand.
The Marshal found this quite surprising. "And who are you then?" he asked the Prodigy.
"I am Yan Qing. On Mount Liang they call me the Prodigy," the latter replied. He went out and fetched the hamper. "I often attended Your Excellency that time when you were going to burn incense at the temple in Huazhou, have your forgotten? Our Leader Song Jiang has sent a few little gifts for you, in token of his sincerity. Every day in the divination ceremony we have been told to pray that Your Excellency will intercede for us. Song Jiang and the others are ardently hoping that you will procure us the amnesty. If you could find the time to raise this matter with the Emperor the whole host on Mount Liang will owe you eternal gratitude! The Leader gave me a strict time limit, so now I must go back." With this he took his leave.
The Marshal had servants collect up the gold and valuables. He had much to think about. The Prodigy and Magic Messenger went back to their inn to talk things over: "These two affairs are all under way. Now there's only the question of the Magic Hand and Lungs in Marshal Gao's palace. How are we going to get them out?"
Magic Messenger said: "We'll disguise ourselves as country people again and wait around in front of Gao's residence until someone comes out. We'll take some money along to bribe him and secure a meeting with them. When we've seen how the land lies we can decide what to do."
So as soon as they had changed they got some money and went round to Marshal Gao's. They watched the front gate for a while, till a young palace superintendent came out. The young man walked with a swagger, and the Prodigy greeted him with the utmost respect. "What's your business?" he asked the Prodigy. The latter replied: "Would Your Honour be so good as to accompany me to a teashop? I would like to have a word."
They found a convenient nook inside, where Magic Messenger joined them. They sat down and ordered tea. "I won't beat about the bush," said the Prodigy. "One of those two that the Marshal brought back from Mount Liang, the one who is known as Lungs, is a relative of my friend here and he would like to see him, that is why we have approached Your Honour."
"You can forget it," said the young official. "That's all in the hands of the Military Council and top secret. No one can do it."
Magic Messenger now took the money from his sleeve and placed it on the table. "All you have to do," he said, "is bring Lungs out to see us for a moment, we don't need to get inside. If you do, these bars of silver are for you."
The sight of this booty awakened the man's greed. "It's true we have these two men in there," he said. "The Marshal has ordered them to be lodged in the garden at the back. If I bring him out for you so you can speak, will you keep your word and give me the money?"
"Of course," said Magic Messenger.
The man stood up. "You two wait for me here in the tea-shop," he said, and rushed off into the palace. They had waited less than an hour when he came hurrying back. "Give me the money first," he said. "I've got him here in another room."
With a certain amount of whispering they handed over the money and after putting it away he took them to a neighbouring room to see Lungs. "When you've had your talk, clear off!" he said.
"We want to draw up a plan for getting you out," the Prodigy said to Lungs.
"They've got us in the garden at the back," said the latter. "The wall is high and I can't see any way to climb it. There's a ladder for picking flowers, but they've hidden it. How can we get out?"
"Are there any trees near the wall?" the Prodigy asked.
"There are some big willows next to it, as it happens," said Lungs.
"Then tonight listen for a cough. That will mean I'm outside and I'm going to throw over the ends of a couple of ropes. You can put them over the branch of a willow tree and from the other side we'll haul you up to the top of the wall. It'll be in the fourth watch. Make sure you're there."
"Haven't you talked long enough?" the superintendent said: "Get out now." When Lungs went back inside he quietly told Hand about the plan while the Prodigy hurriedly explained everything to Magic Messenger. Then they all waited for night to come. On the street the Prodigy and Magic Messenger bought two lengths of hemp rope, which they secreted on their persons. Then they went to the back of Marshal Gao's palace to find a place to hide. Just behind the palace there was a stream. 2 empty boats were moored there, a little distance from the bank. They hid inside the boats till they heard the drum beat for the fourth watch, at 1 a.m. Then they went up to the garden wall and coughed. From inside came a quiet answering cough. When those on each side of the wall had established each other's whereabouts, the Prodigy threw over the rope's ends. The 2 on the inside made the ropes as secure as they could and those outside took a turn on each rope and began slowly to pull. First Lungs appeared over the top and then Magic Hand. They dropped to the ground. The ropes were thrown back inside the wall, and then everyone went to the inn and knocked on the door. They collected the luggage from the room and cooked breakfast and settled the bill. Then they went to the city gates and waited till they opened, when they left and headed back to Mount Liang to report. Had these four not completed their mission, things would have turned out differently. As it was, Marshal Su made his report to the Emperor and the outlaws received their pardon.

The Mount Liang Fortress Distributes its Wealth & holds a clearance sale; Song Jiang & All of his Men are Amnestied & return to favour

When Yan Qing didn't return that night, Li Shishi became suspicious. Marshal Gao's trusted subordinate, delivering breakfast to Xiao Rang and Yue Ho the next day, found the room empty. He hurriedly informed the chief steward. The steward searched the garden, and discovered the two ropes tied to the willow. The captives had escaped. He had no choice but to report to the marshal. Gao Qiu's gloom deepened at this startling news. He secluded himself in his residency, claiming he was ill.
The following day the Taoist Sovereign held court at the fifth watch and received the homage of his officials. He seated himself on the throne in the Hall of Culture and Virtue.
"Are the civil and military officials all assembled?' he asked.
"They await outside the hall, each in his respective group, civil on the left, military on the right," replied the chief of ceremonies.
The emperor ordered that the curtain be rolled up and that Tong Guan, Chancellor of Military Affairs, come forward.
"That punitive expedition of a hundred thousand troops you led personally against Liangshan Marsh, was it victorious or defeated?" queried the sovereign.
Tong Guan knelt and replied: "It wasn't that I didn't do my utmost! But it was the height of summer, and the soldiers weren't used to the surroundings and the climate. Many fell ill. Two or three out of ten died. With our forces dwindling, all I could do was bring them home for further training. Unfortunately on the way back more than half died of heat prostration. Your Majesty directed the bandits to surrender but, filled with false pride, they haughtily refused. Then Gao Qiu went after them with a naval armada, but he sickened and had to return."
"Inept, treacherous minister! Your failure to tell the truth has caused our nation great damage. How is it that in only two engagements the bandits utterly demolished the imperial forces! And that rascal Gao Qiu, after wasting who knows how much of the province's money and grain, not only lost many ships and a considerable number of troops, but was personally captured and taken to the bandits' mountain stronghold! Instead of killing him, Song Jiang and his lieutenants treated him courteously and let him go. Our royal orders were disgraced and made a laughing stock!
"I have heard that Song Jiang and his men neither attack local governments nor harm the people. They seek only an amnesty so that they can serve the country. Officials like you, who are jealous of the talents of others and deliberately conceal the facts, are the lowest of vermin! A fine Chancellor of Military Affairs! You should be ashamed! I ought to have you executed to appease the indignation of the people, but I'll spare you for the time being!"
The emperor shouted at Tong Guan to fall back. Silently, the chancellor withdrew to a side. The sovereign addressed his Hanlin Academy scholars.
"Prepare my personal imperial decree, and send it with a high official, ordering Song Jiang and his men to return from Mount Liangshan."
Marshal Su Yuanjing came forward and knelt before the throne. "Although I have no talent, I would be glad to go."
The sovereign was very pleased. "I'll write the document myself," he exclaimed. He ordered that a table be brought and the paper be spread.
After penning the decree, he called for the imperial seal and impressed it on the document. He directed the Keeper of the Royal Stores to draw thirty-six gold slabs and seventy-two slabs of silver, thirty-six bolts of red satin and seventy-two bolts of green satin, plus one hundred and eight bottles of yellow-sealed imperial wine, and entrust them to the marshal. He also gave Su twenty-four bolts of cloth for coats and linings and a banner proclaiming the imperial amnesty in letters of gold, and ordered him to set forth on the morrow.
The marshal took his leave of the emperor and left the Hall of Culture and Virtue. Court concluded, the officials withdrew, and Chancellor of Military Affairs Tong Guan slunk back to his residence in disgrace. He dared not attend any more royal audiences, and feigned illness. When Marshal Gao heard what had happened, he was terrified. He too was afraid to appear before the sovereign.
Marshal Su had the imperial wine and other gifts packed and shouldered by porters. Mounting his horse, he left the city. Officials saw him and his entourage out of the Nanxun Gate. The party proceeded towards Jizhou, flying the imperial banner with its inscription of gold.
Meanwhile, Yan Qing, Dai Zong, Xiao Rang and Yue Ho returned through the night to the stronghold and reported to Song Jiang and the other chieftains. Yan Qing showed them the pardon the emperor had personally written by hand.
"Good news is sure to come," said Wu Yong.

Song Jiang burned fine incense, brought out the Heavenly Books given him by the Mystic Maid of Ninth Heaven, and raised his head and prayed. When he cast the divining sticks they revealed an extremely lucky omen.
"We're sure to succeed," cried Song Jiang. He requested Dai Zong and Yan Qing to go once more to the city, check on developments and report back immediately, so that adequate preparations could be made. A few days later, the two returned. "The emperor has entrusted Marshal Su with his royal decree," they said. "The marshal is also bringing imperial wine, gold and silver slabs, satin of red and green, and cloth for coats and linings. He's on his way to proclaim the amnesty and will be here soon."
Song Jiang was overjoyed. From Loyalty Hall he busily issued a series of orders: Men were to set up twenty-four shelters along the road from Liangshan Marsh to Jizhou, all decorated with bunting and filled with musical instruments. There, musicians—hired from neighboring shires—would play to welcome the procession. A lesser chieftain was to be in charge of each of the shelters. Others were sent out to buy fruit and sea delicacies and wine and tidbits to serve as snacks.
Marshal Su and his entourage, winding their way towards Mount Liangshan with the amnesty, reached Jizhou. Prefect Zhang Shuye came out to welcome them, and settled them in the hostel for officials. Politely, he raised his cup of greeting.
"Twice before the royal court sent amnesties. It was a serious loss to the country that they were not effectuated because their delivery was entrusted to the wrong persons. This mission of yours, Marshal, will surely be of great benefit."
"His Majesty has recently learned that the band on Mount Liangshan are interested primarily in righteousness. They neither raid the prefectures nor harm good people. They stress acting in Heaven's behalf. And so His Majesty has dispatched me with his hand-written decree, plus gifts of thirty-six slabs of gold, seventy-two slabs of silver, thirty-six bolts of red satin, seventy-two bolts of green satin, a hundred and eight bottles of yellow-sealed imperial wine, and twenty-four bolts of cloth for coats and linings, to deliver an amnesty. Do you think the gifts too trifling?"
"It's not a question of gifts with these people. They want to serve the nation faithfully so as to earn fame for their posterity. If only you'd been able to come earlier, Marshal, our country wouldn't have had to suffer such heavy losses in officers and soldiers, money and grain. Once these warriors return to the fold they certainly will perform meritorious deeds for the emperor."
"Can I trouble you to go to the fortress, Prefect, and tell them to prepare to receive my mission? I will wait here."
"Of course."
The governor mounted his horse and left the city with a dozen men. At the foot of the mountain he was met by lesser chieftains, who at once reported the news to the stronghold Song Jiang hastened down and escorted Prefect Zhang to Loyalty Hall.
"Congratulations," Zhang exclaimed. "The emperor has dispatched Marshal Su with his personally hand-written amnesty, together with valuable gifts. The marshal is already at Jizhou. Prepare, warrior, to welcome the imperial decree."
Pressing his fingers to his brow in a gesture of delight, Song Jiang said: "He is bringing us new life!" He begged Zhang to dine with him.
"I'd love to," said the prefect, "but the marshal would be annoyed if I were slow in getting back."
"At least have a drink, and accept these paltry things—I can hardly call them gifts." Song Jiang presented gold and silver on a platter.
"I wouldn't dare."
"A mere trifle, why refuse? Not nearly enough to express our thanks, but do take them as a small token of appreciation. Once the mission is completed, we shall offer something more substantial."
"I'm deeply grateful for your good intentions. But please keep them here, for now. I can always call for them later."
Prefect Zhang was absolutely incorruptible. He made strict demands upon himself.
Song Jiang directed his generals Wu Yong and Zhu Wu, plus Xiao Rang and Yue Ho, to escort Prefect Zhang to Jizhou, and there see Marshal Su. On the day after the morrow all chieftains, big and small, would wait to greet the emissary thirty //from the fortress.
Wu Yong and the others travelled through the night to return the prefect to Jizhou, and called on the marshal the next morning at the hostel for officials. They kowtowed and remained kneeling before him. Su directed them to rise and be seated. Deferentially, the four replied they wouldn't dare. The marshal asked their names.
"I am called Wu Yong," said the brigand military advisor, "and these are Zhu Wu, Xiao Rang and Yue Ho. We have been sent by brother Song Jiang to welcome Your Excellency."
"Why, Master Wu, how nice to see you again! It's been years since last we parted in Huazhou. Who would have thought that we'd meet again today.' I am fully aware of the fidelity and righteousness in your hearts. Corrupt ministers have used their authority to conceal the true facts from the emperor. But now he knows, and has dispatched me with his personal amnesty, imperial wine and various gifts. You need have no hesitation about accepting them."
The four kowtowed their thanks and said: "It is entirely due to the marshal's kindness that we crude rustics living in a mountain wilderness have the good fortune to meet Your Excellency and receive His Majesty's benevolence! It shall be engraved always on our hearts and bones! We don't know how we can ever repay!"
Prefect Zhang entertained them that night at a banquet.
Early the next morning in Jizhou three carts were laden with burning incense. A group of porters bore the imperial wine in a phoenix and dragon decorated case. Another group carried gold and silver slabs, and silks and satins of red and green. A miniature pavilion housed the emperor's decree. Marshal Su rode beside it as the procession headed east. Prefect Zhang, also on horseback, followed, with Wu Yong and the other three riding in his wake. Horsemen leading the way in the tightly packed assembly carried the gold-lettered imperial yellow banner, preceded by troops with fluttering pennants beating golden drums.
For nearly ten //they advanced along the winding road, and soon reached the first shelter. Marshal Su noted the gay bunting and the tootling musicians playing a welcoming tune. A few score li beyond they arrived at another decorated shelter. Ahead they saw, amid swirling incense, Song Jiang and Lu Junyi kneeling in the road, and behind them, also on their knees in neat ranks, all the other chieftains, big and small, waiting to welcome the imperial decree.
"Let everyone mount," the marshal directed.
They rode together to the water's edge, where many boats ferried them to the Shore of Golden Sands. Above and below the three passes music soared to the heavens. Soldiers, celebrants, in clouds of incense, flowed in long lines to Loyalty Hall.
There the riders dismounted, and the incense and the imperial decree in the miniature pavilion were carried into the hall. In the center stood three ceremonial tables skirted with imperial yellow gauze of dragon and phoenix design. The decree was placed on the central table before the tablet representing the emperor, which was in the exact middle of the room. The gold and silver slabs were set on the left table, the red and green satin on the right, while the imperial wine and the cloth for the coats and linings were placed before the tables on the floor. From a golden burner rose the fragrance of fine incense.
Song Jiang and Lu Junyi escorted Marshal Su and Prefect Zhang to the seats of honor. Xiao Rang and Yue Ho stood on the left, Pei Xuan and Yan Qing stood on the right. Lu and the others knelt before the dignitaries. At Pei Xuan's command, all kowtowed. Xiao Rang then read the decree:

Imperial Edict: From the day I assumed the throne I have ruled with virtue and righteousness, changing the world by ceremonial rectitude, bringing peace through punishments and rewards. Never have I ceased seeking good ministers or loving the populace. Broadly have I dispensed charity, endeavoring to bestow happiness equally upon all. The people enjoy my benevolence, even infants know my concern.
Song Jiang, Lu Junyi and their men are loyal and righteous, and do not engage in violent persecution. For a long time they have wished to return and display their gratitude. Although they have committed crimes, it was not without reason. In view of their sincerity, I sympathize with them deeply. I have directed Marshal Su to deliver my amnesty to Song Jiang and the other offenders presently residing in Liangshan Marsh. I bestow also on Song Jiang and his higher chieftains thirty-six slabs of gold and thirty-six bolts of red satin; to his lesser chieftains I give seventy-two slabs of silver and seventy-two bolts of green satin. From the date of this decree let them cast doubt aside, return quickly and submit. Important tasks will be given them.
Let this document be proclaimed so that all may know.

The second month, __ day, spring,
in the fourth year of Xuan He

"Long live the emperor!," shouted Song Jiang and his cohorts. They fell to their knees and kowtowed. As Pei Xuan called the roll, Marshal Su dispensed the gifts. The imperial wine was opened and poured into a huge silver tureen. From this it was ladled out, warmed and placed in a silver wine pot. Marshal Su filled a golden goblet and addressed the chieftains.
"On orders from our sovereign I have brought this imperial wine as a gift. Fear it not, warriors. See, I drink before you."
He drained the cup, and the chieftains voiced their thanks. Su filled it again and presented it to Song Jiang. Song dropped to his knees and drank. Lu Junyi, Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng were each in turn handed the goblet. Finally, Su toasted all one hundred and eight chieftains together.
Song Jiang directed that the wine be poured, and invited Marshal Su to be seated in the center of the hall. The chieftains paid their respects. Song Jiang then approached.
"I had the honor of meeting you at the temple on the West Sacred Mountain. I'm profoundly grateful for your kindness. Thanks to your efforts with those close to the emperor, my men and I are able to see the sun again. We shall never forget."
"I knew how loyal you all are, and that you act in Heaven's behalf, but I didn't realize you were being wronged. And so I dared not put in a word for you before. I'm sorry for the delay. It wasn't until I received the letter from Chief of Staff Wen and your generous gift that I began to learn what was going on. While chatting with emperor in Mantled in Incense Hall one day I managed to tell him. He checked and found what I told him was correct. The following day, while holding court in the Hall of Culture and Virtue in the presence of all his officials, he severely castigated Chancellor of Military Affairs Tong Guan, and blamed Marshal Gao for having repeatedly failed. He called for his writing equipment, personally penned an amnesty, and entrusted me to bring it and present you and your chieftains with gifts. I hope you will wind up your business here quickly and report to the capital. You must show yourselves worthy of the emperor's benevolence."
All were very pleased and respectfully expressed their thanks. Song Jiang invited Chief of Staff Wen to join them. The happy reunion between Su and Wen spread joy throughout the hall. Wen and Prefect Zhang were seated opposite Marshal Su, and everyone took his place at banquet tables according to rank. Many toasts were drunk, while outside the band vigorously played. Although the fare was not elaborate, there were mountains of meat and seas of wine. All drank heavily, and had to be supported to their quarters to rest.
The following day, they feasted again, talking of things old and new, and chatting about their aspirations. On the third day they dined once more, and took the marshal on a tour of the mountain. They returned to their quarters at dusk, many sodden with wine. After several such days, though Song Jiang and his chieftains were reluctant to let him go, the marshal said he must leave for the capital.
"You don't understand," he explained. "It's been some time since I delivered the amnesty. If you heroes return promptly, all will be well. If you don't, false and jealous ministers will very likely gossip."
"We were hoping you'd stay a few days more," said Song Jiang, "but since you feel you must go, of course we won't detain you. Let's have one more day of drinking, and we'll see you off early tomorrow morning."
The chieftains joined in a merry feast, and again voiced their thanks in the course of toasts. Marshal Su spoke flattering and reassuring words. They caroused until night.
The next morning horses and carts were readied. Song Jiang brought gold and jewels on a platter to the marshal's quarters, and respectfully presented them. Only after Song Jiang's repeated urging did Su accept and place them in his chest of clothing. His luggage packed, his horse saddled, the marshal prepared to set forth.
Those returning with him were given food and wine by Zhu Wu and Yue Ho, and lavishly rewarded with money and clothing material, to their great delight. Gold and valuables were also presented to Chief of Staff Wen and Prefect Zhang. They accepted only after Song Jiang insisted. He ordered that Wen depart with Marshal Su.
To the beat of golden drums and the trilling of fifes the chieftains accompanied the marshal down the mountain, proceeding a distance of thirty //after crossing the river at the Shore of Golden Sands. There all dismounted and raised their wine cups in a farewell toast.
"When you see the emperor, Marshal, please give him an excellent report," said Song Jiang.
"Rest assured, warrior. Wind up your affairs and come to the capital as soon as possible. When your army nears the city be sure to send someone on ahead to notify me. I'll inform the emperor and dispatch a welcoming party. We want to do this in proper style."
"Excellency, I beg your indulgence. Wang Lun built the mountain stronghold in this small marsh of ours, and he was succeeded by Chao Gai. I, in turn, have ruled here for many years. Damage to the neighboring populace has been considerable. For the next ten days I'd like to distribute our wealth among them. Once that's done we'll hasten to the capital without further delay. Would you please convey this to the emperor so that he'll allow us a bit more time."
Marshal Su assented. He bid them farewell and, with his entourage, headed for Jizhou.

Song Jiang and his men returned to the stronghold. In Loyalty Hall the assembly drum was beaten. As the chieftains seated themselves all the officers gathered. Song Jiang addressed them.
"Brothers, ever since Wang Lun established the fortress and Chao Gai strengthened it this place has flourished. Many years have passed since you brothers rescued me at Jiangzhou and chose me as leader. Today we've been amnestied and have seen the face of the sun again. Soon we shall go to the capital, serve our country, win prestige and privileges for our wives and children, and enjoy the blessings of peace. Those of you who have things which should go in the storerooms deliver them there for our common use. The remaining property shall be divided equally among us in a righteous manner with no contention.
"We hundred and eight are all stars. We live and die together. The emperor's amnesty frees us of any crimes. Soon we shall go to the capital and see His Majesty. We must be worthy of his benevolence. As to you other officers, some of you came with the intention of joining us, some simply followed others, some are army officers who lost their commands, others were captured. If you wish to go with us to the capital, you may enroll. If you don't, you may resign. I will pay you off and you can return to civilian life."
On Song Jiang's instructions Pei Xuan and Xiao Rang prepared two registers. After discussion among the members of the three armies four or five thousand men resigned. Song Jiang gave them money and gifts and sent them on their way. Those who wished to remain registered for duty.
The next day Song Jiang had Xiao Rang write proclamations and sent men out to post them in all the neighboring towns and hamlets. Everyone was invited to come to the mountain for a ten-day close-out. The proclamation read as follows:

Notice from Song Jiang and his warriors in Liangshan Marsh: Because in the past we occupied these hills and groves we caused considerable disturbance among the neighboring populace. Now His Imperial Majesty has amnestied our crimes and we are returning to his service. As a recompense to you neighbors we are holding a close-out for ten days. We shall dispense our property among you, free of charge. This is absolutely true. Have no doubts. Please honor us with your presence. It will be our pleasure.

Song Jiang and his warriors of Liangshan Marsh __ day of the third month of the fourth year of Xuan He

From the storerooms gold and jewels, silks and satins were distributed among the chieftains and officers and men. Another portion was selected as a gift for the government. The remainder was piled in the fortress for dispensation during the ten-day close-out.
This ran from the third to the thirteenth of the third month. Meat and wine were liberally served to the people, who came in droves, carrying empty bags and trays. Song Jiang ordered that they be compensated at the rate of ten times the damage suffered. Happily the recipients thanked him and departed.
When the close-out ended, the chieftains began packing for the trip to the capital. Song Jiang thought the men's families should return to their old homes. But Wu Yong had another idea.
"Better keep them here, brother," he said. "It will be time enough for them to go home after we've seen the emperor and been assured of his kindness."
Song Jiang saw the point. "You're right." He ordered the chieftains to get on with their packing and, at the same time, reorganize their troops.
They very soon set out, and quickly reached Jizhou where they warmly thanked Prefect Zhang Shuye. He gave a banquet for all the warriors and rewarded the ranks of the three armies.
Song Jiang thanked the prefect and they left the city. Preceded by an advance contingent of six or seven hundred they marched towards the Eastern Capital. Dai Zong and Yan Qing were sent on ahead to notify Marshal Su. The marshal promptly informed the emperor: "Song Jiang and his army are on their way."
The sovereign was very pleased. He directed the marshal and the imperial controller to greet the arrivals with pennants and standards. The two at once left the city.
The brigand forces were marching in smart formation. In the fore were two red banners, one reading Obey Heaven, the other Defend the Country. The chieftains were in full armor. The only exceptions were Wu Yong—who wore a black silk head kerchief, Gongsun Sheng—who wore a heron feathered Taoist coat, Lu Zhishen—in a fiery red Buddhist robe, and Wu Song—in a pilgrim's black cassock. All the others were in battle dress with metal fittings.
They had been marching for many a day, and now, as they neared the capital, the vanguard saw coming towards them the imperial controller with pennants and standards. Song Jiang was informed. He and his chieftains went first to greet Marshal Su then halted the army outside the New Official Gate, set up shelters, and waited for the emperor's summons.
Marshal Su and the imperial controller entered the city and informed the emperor.
"I've heard a lot about Song Jiang and his chieftains," said the sovereign. "A hundred and eight of them, bold and courageous, all corresponding to star spirits. Remarkable men. Today they have submitted and returned to the capital to become respectable citizens. I shall proceed with my officials to Xuante Tower. Let Song Jiang and his chieftains march in full armor at the head of their army and enter the city, but with not more than four or fire hundred troops. I will review them as they march from east to west. I also want the people and the officials, civil and military, to know these gallant heroes who are now our loyal subjects. Then let them divest themselves of their armor and weapons, put on the satin robes which I have presented to them, and enter the palace through East Glory Gate. I shall receive them in the Hall of Culture and Virtue."
The imperial controller went to the brigands' camp and transmitted the message to Song Jiang.
The next day Song Jiang had Ironclad Virtue Pei Xuan select six or seven hundred stalwart men, and before these place golden drums and colorful flags, then a corps of spear and sword and ax bearers, with the two red banners Obey Heaven and Defend the Country in between. Every man carried a sword and bow and arrows, and wore full armor. In ranks they entered the city's East Gate.
Civil and military, the whole populace had turned out, supporting the old and holding the young. They lined the roads and stared at the brigands as if they were gods. The emperor and his officials watched from the tower. They saw the golden drums and fluttering pennants, the swords and axes in gleaming array, the white fetlocked cavalry, and the red banners Obey Heaven and Defend the Country. In addition there was a band of thirty or so mounted musicians, drumming and blowing. Finally came the massed ranks of the stalwarts. Xie Zhen and Xie Bao cleared the road for the procession, Zhu Wu brought up the rear.
The emperor was delighted at this magnificent display. He said admiringly to his officials: "They are indeed heroes!"
He instructed the chief of ceremonies to tell Song Jiang and the chieftains to change into ceremonial clothes and be prepared to be received at court. The order was transmitted. Outside the place gate the men removed their armor, donned the satin robes of red and green, attached the slabs of gold and silver, put on the special hats and pale green boots worn at imperial audiences. Gongsun Sheng had tailored his red satin into a Taoist coat, Lu Zhishen had made a Buddhist robe, and Wu Song a pilgrim's cassock. All had used the material presented by the emperor. With Song Jiang and Lu Junyi in the lead, seconded by Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng, and followed by the other chieftains, they entered the East Glory Gate. The ceremonial fittings and paraphernalia had already been placed in order.
By then it was early morning, and the sovereign arrived at the Hall of Culture and Virtue. The master of rites led Song Jiang and the chieftains into the royal presence. They formed lines and, in keeping with the commands of the chief of ceremonies, kowtowed and shouted, "Long live the emperor!" Pleased, His Majesty invited them to draw near and be seated according to rank. On his order, a banquet was laid by the imperial caterers. The emperor's vintners brought the wine, the Delicacies Department brought the entrees, the royal chefs did the cooking, and the official Banquet Bureau served the food, while in the background music played. The emperor, in his royal chair, joined them personally at the table.
The feasting went on until dusk. Song Jiang and the chieftains thanked the sovereign, and left the palace with flowers in their hair. Outside the West Glory Gate they mounted their horses and rode back to camp. The next day they again entered the city and went with the imperial master of rites to the hall of Culture and Virtue to express their gratitude. His Majesty, very pleased, was thinking of giving them official rank so that they would qualify for appointment to government posts. Again Song Jiang and the chieftains thanked him and returned to camp.

But the Chancellor of Military Affairs said to the emperor: "They've only just submitted and have not yet won any merit. They shouldn't be given rank so easily. They ought to distinguish themselves in battle, first. What's more, there are thousands of them camped outside our gates. That's a bad situation. Among Song Jiang's forces are officers of the capital garrison who fell into his hands. They should return to it. Officers and men from other armies should also go back to their original units. The remainder should be divided into five columns, and assigned to duty in different parts of Shandong and Hebei. That would be best."
The next day, the sovereign sent the imperial controller to the camp with a directive: Song Jiang's forces shall be disbanded and returned to their original units.
The chieftains were angry. They said: "Though we've submitted to the throne, not only aren't we given rank, but you want to split us brothers up! We chieftains have vowed to live and die together! If you insist on dividing us, we have no choice but to go back to Liangshan Marsh!"
Song Jiang hastily stopped them. He begged the controller to explain the situation to the emperor. The controller reported word for word, not daring to leave anything out. Startled, His Majesty summoned his Chancellor of Military Affairs.
"Although those fellows have surrendered, they haven't actually changed. Sooner or later, they're going to make serious trouble," said the chancellor. "It seems to me you should issue an order which will lure them into the capital, exterminate the whole hundred and eight, and then disband their army. This will save the country from disaster."
The sovereign hesitated. From behind a screen, a high official emerged, dressed in a purple gown and holding an ivory tablet. "On every border the beacon fires burn continuously," he shouted, "and within the country there's danger of internal calamity! It's all because treacherous ministers like you're wrecking His Majesty's domain!" Truly, only this voice calling for strengthening the nation and pacifying its borders could save our Heaven-startling, Earth-shaking heroes.

After the Prodigy's happy encounter with the Emperor at Lily's house when he got a personal pardon from him, and after he had seen Marshal Su, and with Magic Messenger devised a plan to free Lungs and Magic Hand from house arrest in Marshal Gao's palace by means of a bribe, the four of them left the city the moment the gates opened and hurried back to Mount Liang to report all these events. Lily was concerned when the Prodigy did not return that night. And in Marshal Gao's palace the confidential servants who took food to Lungs and Magic Hand next day found their quarters empty and anxiously reported this fact to the major-domo. The latter went to the back garden to see for himself. When he saw the two ropes over the branch of a willow tree he realized the two prisoners had escaped and had no choice but to inform the Marshal. Gao the Ball was shocked and highly apprehensive. Pleading illness he shut himself up in his palace. At the next morning's court audience, after the initial ceremonies had been completed, the Emperor told his close advisers to order Marshal Tong Guan to come forward. "Last year you had a hundred thousand troops and my personal commission to mount an attack on the Marshes of Mount Liang," he said. "Were you successful?"
Tong Guan knelt and said: "With the army I led there last year we mounted an offensive but it failed. The reason was that my officers suffered from the summer heat and they all got sick. Three out of ten died. In view of the great hardship to the troops I temporarily withdrew and called a halt to the campaign. I sent them all back to barracks to recuperate. Many of the imperial guard became sick on the return journey and there were heavy losses. Since then there has been an offer of amnesty, but those villains in the Marshes refuse to be pacified. Marshal Gao has used naval forces to attack them, but was also obliged to turn back on account of sickness."
The Emperor was furious. "You're rogues, all of you, envious of the worthy and able," he shouted. "You think you can lie to me about everything! Last year you took troops to Mount Liang. How is it that after only two battles the enemy routed them and our army was totally destroyed? It was a disaster! Then that scoundrel Gao the Ball went and squandered vast amounts of government money and provisions, lost thousands of boats and crew, had I don't know how many infantry and cavalry slaughtered, and allowed himself to be captured by the robbers and taken up their mountain. Song Jiang and his gang did him no harm, they released him and sent him home. I have been informed that this Song Jiang and his band do not attack government property, do not harm innocent people, and would like nothing better than an amnesty so they can serve their country. Everything is the fault of you greedy, deceitful ministers, on whom I have bestowed honour in vain, who have brought the country's affairs to rack and ruin! You have mishandled important affairs of state, you are utterly shameless. I have decided to be merciful this time. But future transgressions will not be pardoned."
Tong Guan remained silent and withdrew to one side. The Emperor went on: "Amongst you officials, which of you thinks he is able to go and make peace with Song Jiang and his band on Mount Liang?"
Immediately Marshal Su Yuanjing came forward and knelt before His Majesty. "Despite my inadequacy I would like to have a try," he said.
The Emperor was relieved. "I will write out the edict in my own hand," he said. He had his special desk brought, smoothed out the paper and proceeded to write out the edict there and then. His courtiers simply brought the writing materials and he did the rest himself. Then he ordered the official in charge of the treasury to take out thirty-six gold tokens and seventy-two silver tokens, thirty-six rolls of crimson brocade and seventy-two of green, one hundred and eight bottles of yellow seal imperial wine, all this to be delivered to Marshal Su. There were also twenty-four rolls of material for clothing and a banner proclaiming the amnesty in gold characters. A time limit was set for the departure of the mission. Marshal Su bade the Emperor farewell in the Palace.
After the court was dismissed Marshal Tong returned shamefacedly to his residence where he claimed sickness and did not return to court. When Marshal Gao heard about these proceedings he was shaken rigid and dared not show his face at court. There is a poem:

The amnesty offered is clear beyond doubt;
The embassy's ready, about to set out.
Kind treatment prevails over pacification:
Too bad that they've suffered such aggravation.

So Marshal Su, with the imperial wine, the gold, silver, silk and other materials, rode out of the city. The imperial banner with gold characters was unfurled and all the officials came to the Gate of Southern Fragrance to see them off as they headed for Jizhou. Of this no more.
Meanwhile the Prodigy, Magic Messenger, Lungs and Magic Hand had travelled non-stop back to Mount Liang, where they recounted everything to Song Jiang and the rest. The Prodigy took out his own pardon in the Emperor's own hand and showed it to them. The Professor said: "This is really good news for us." Song Jiang burnt some top-class incense and took out the Mystic Lady's books in order to consult the heavens. The omens were excellent, and Song Jiang felt on top of the world, confident that all would now go well for them. The Magic Messenger and the Prodigy were asked to go off again and check up on their story, returning as fast as possible so that suitable preparations could be made. They were gone a few days. When they returned they said: "The court is sending Marshal Su himself here with the edict, and also imperial wine, gold and silver, crimson and green brocades and clothing material, to announce the amnesty. They'll soon be here!"
In great excitement Song Jiang gave out his orders in the Ceremonial Hall, specifying who was to go down to Jizhou, and ordering the erection of twenty-four marquees decked with silk embroidery, to house flutes, drums and gongs. Hired musicians were brought in from all over the neighbourhood and divided among the marquees to greet the imperial party. One of the minor chiefs was allotted to each marquee to supervise all this. People were sent out separately to buy fruit and nuts and seafood, superior wine, dried food and suchlike, everything that was necessary for a great banquet.
Meanwhile Marshal Su bearing the imperial edict and with a retinue of one thousand had reached Jizhou. Governor Zhang rode to the outskirts of the city to welcome him and installed him in the government rest-house. After a few words of formal greeting, the Governor offered Marshal Su wine. Then he said: "The Emperor has twice declared an amnesty but because the wrong envoys were employed affairs of state have miscarried. Now you have been sent, Marshal, and there can be no doubt that your mission is going to do the state great service."
The Marshal said: "The Emperor has heard that the band on Mount Liang hold loyalty dear and do not attack government property or harm innocent people, and that their motto is 'To Do Heaven's Will'. Now the Emperor has done me the honour of sending me to proclaim the amnesty, with an edict written in his own hand and a gift of thirty-six gold tokens, seventy-two silver tokens, thirty-six bolts of red silk and seventy-two of green, a hundred and eight bottles of yellow seal imperial wine, twenty-four bolts of cloth for clothes. Does that sound like enough?"
"With those people it's nothing to do with the size of the gift." said the Governor, "They want to demonstrate their loyalty to the nation and win fame for posterity."
Marshal Su said: "If I wait here, do you think you could go to the mountain to inform them and tell them to prepare to receive the edict?"
"Most willingly," said the Governor. With a dozen followers he rode out of the city towards the Marshes of Mount Liang. At the foot of the mountain they were met by a minor chief who announced their coming. Song Jiang hurried down the mountain to receive the Governor and escort him up to the stronghold. After greetings had been exchanged in the Ceremonial Hall, the Governor said: "My heartfelt congratulations to you all, gentlemen! The Emperor has sent Marshal Su, bearing an imperial edict in his own hand, to announce the pardon. There is also a gift of tokens, certifying his approval, cloth, imperial wine and silk awaiting you in Jizhou. You should prepare to receive the edict."
Song Jiang struck his forehead with his knuckles in respect and said: "Our luck has turned!" They immediately pressed the Governor to stay and celebrate with them. But the latter said: "Do not think me ungrateful, but I am afraid the Marshal will think something is amiss if I do not return as quickly as possible."
Song Jiang said: "Have just one cup. I won't dare press you to more." But the Governor was adamant. Song Jiang then had trays of gold and silver brought and tried to present them to him, but the Governor said: "This I certainly cannot accept!"
"It's nothing but a meagre token of my goodwill," said Song Jiang. "When the business is completed I shall repay you more adequately."
The Governor said: "I truly appreciate your generosity. But let us leave all this here in the stronghold. I can always fetch it later." This governor can indeed be called an honest and upright man! There is a poem:

This governor's certainly one of a kind:
Not gold but Song Jiang is his friend.
Being honest he thinks is the way to gain hearts;
He'll win them with kindness not threats.

Song Jiang sent some of his officers with the Professor, the Strategist, Magic Hand and Lungs to accompany the Governor down the mountain and return to Jizhou with him to meet Marshal Su. A couple of days later the other leaders would ride ten miles out from the camp to await Marshal Su's coming.
The Professor and company had gone straight to Jizhou with the Governor. The day after arriving there they went to the government rest-house to see Marshal Su. After greeting him they knelt. The Marshal bade them all rise and be seated. They modestly refused. The Marshal asked their names.
"I am Wu Yong," said the Professor. "These are my friends the Strategist, Magic Hand and Lungs; we come by order of our leader Song Jiang to welcome Your Excellency. The day after tomorrow the Leader and our other colleagues will travel ten miles from the mountain stronghold to await you."
The Marshal said with pleasure: "My learned friend, many years have gone by since we saw one another in Huazhou. Who would have thought we would meet again here today? I know that all of you are honest and loyal, and that it is through evil counsellors that your path is blocked, that you are prevented from rising through the influence of calumny and envy. Today the Emperor fully understands this and has sent me to you with an edict written in his own hand, with gold and silver tokens, with red and green silk, imperial wine and rolls of cloth to proclaim an amnesty. You may rest assured: you can accept it without reservation."
The Professor and his companions prostrated themselves again in gratitude. "Savages that we are," they said, "we thank Your Excellency for honouring us with this visit. We are truly grateful for the Emperor's favour and for Your Excellency's good offices. All this is engraved on our hearts and we can never repay it."
The Governor organized a feast for them. By dawn on the third day three ceremonial cars had been constructed in Jizhou. The imperial wine in a special casket was carried on one. The gold and silver tokens, the red and green silk were carried on another. The imperial edict was placed inside a special shrine on the third. Marshal Su mounted and set off eastward riding at the side of the shrine containing the edict, with the Governor behind him. The Professor and the other three also on horseback followed on, with a crowd of lesser figures pressing behind them. One of the front riders had unfurled the yellow imperial banner proclaiming the gifts and their progress was heralded by trumpets and drums and waving pennants. They had only gone a few miles when they saw the first of the marquees. The roof was festooned with decorations and beneath it were musicians with pipes, drums and gongs giving them a resounding welcome. A few more miles and they came upon another decorated marquee with incense burning in front of it. Song Jiang and the Unicorn were kneeling there and behind them the whole mass of the outlaw band on their knees to honour the imperial edict.
Marshal Su said: "Everyone please rise and mount!" Together they all now rode to the water's edge, where hundreds of battle craft ferried them across to Golden Sands Landing. They passed upward through the three gates to a thunderous musical accompaniment, and between the unbroken ranks of an honour guard, amid swirling incense, till they reached the Ceremonial Hall, where all dismounted. The special car with the imperial shrine was carried in. Three altars had been set up inside swathed in yellow silk. Three rousing cheers of 'Long Live the Emperor' rang out as the imperial edict was set down with the gold and silver on its left and the red and green silk on the right. The imperial wine and the clothing material were placed in front. Incense was lit in gold burners. Song Jiang and the Unicorn ushered Marshal Su and Governor Zhang to seats on the high dais. Magic Hand and Lungs stood on their left, Sterling the Registrar, the Prodigy, Song Jiang, the Unicorn and others on their right. Sterling made the announcement and Magic Hand began to read the edict:
Be it known: from the time of my accession to the imperial throne I have ruled the world with justice and humanity, maintaining order with appropriate rewards and punishments, tireless in pursuit of virtuous counsel and boundless in my love for the people. My subjects are all, down to the very least and youngest, aware of my concern for them. I know that Song Jiang, the Unicorn and all their band are loyal and true at heart, that they do not commit senseless violence, and have long desired to return to allegiance, earnestly hoping to redeem themselves; and although they have committed crimes, these crimes are not without reason and if their true feelings are known they can be regarded with sympathy; consequently I am sending my adviser Marshal Su to the Marshlands of Mount Liang bearing this edict to absolve Song Jiang and all his leaders, greater or lesser, from all their crimes and grant them unconditional pardon. There is also a gift of thirty-six gold tokens and thirty-six rolls of red silk for Song Jiang and his senior commanders, and seventy-two silver tokens and seventy-two rolls of green silk for his junior commanders. On receipt of this amnesty, let them not disappoint me but return at once to the court that they may receive important posts. Let this edict be proclaimed for all to know.
Published on the nth day of the second month, spring of the fourth year of Xuan Ho.
When the reading was over, Song Jiang and the others again gave three cheers for the Emperor and prostrated themselves in gratitude. Marshal Su had the gold and silver and silk brought and told Sterling to call the roll so it could be distributed. The imperial wine was broached and poured into a large silver bowl, from which it was ladled out, warmed and poured into silver jugs. Taking a gold cup and filling it with wine, Marshal Su said to them: "Although I have the honour to bear the Emperor's express command to bring this wine and reward you all, I would not wish you to feel any suspicion, so I am going to drink this cup first, in order that you may see there is nothing to fear."
The company applauded as Marshal Su drained the cup and then ladled out more wine and handed it to Song Jiang. Song Jiang raised the cup in his hands and knelt to drink it. After him the Unicorn, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun drank in turn. All one hundred and eight leaders had to drink one cup. Finally Song Jiang ordered the imperial wine to be taken away and asked the Marshal to remain seated while all the leaders in turn kowtowed before him. Song Jiang then came forward to express his personal thanks: "I had the honour to make Your Excellency's acquaintance previously at the Western Peak. I am eternally grateful for Your Excellency's great kindness in interceding with the Emperor. Truly this is a new dawn for all of us. It is a day that will remain engraved on our hearts, a day never to be forgotten."
Marshal Su said: "I am fully aware that your hearts are loyal and true, and that your aim is to do heaven's will, but since I was not previously aware of the wrongs done to you, I could not bring the matter to His Majesty's attention. Consequently there was a considerable delay in redressing them. But then a missive from the military adviser, followed by your most generous gift, apprised me of your sense of injury. The Emperor was pleased to hold some conversation with me that day in the Incense Hall and he asked about you so I was able to acquaint him with the details. His Majesty made full inquiries and everything confirmed what I had told him. Next day in the Hall of Culture and Ethics he reprimanded Marshal Tong in front of the whole court and severely criticized Marshal Gao for his repeated failures. He called for his writing materials and indited in his own hand this edict which he sent me to deliver to the stronghold, together with gifts for all the company. It is hoped that you will pack up and return as soon as possible to the capital and not disappoint His Majesty's earnest desire for reconciliation."
This gladdened all hearts and they gratefully prostrated themselves. The ceremonies completed, the Governor excused himself, on the grounds of having government business to conduct, and bidding the Marshal farewell returned to the city. Song Jiang now had Colonel Wen the military adviser brought in to join them. He and Marshal Su thoroughly enjoyed talking about old times, and everyone had a good time. Marshal Su was entreated to take the chief place among them with Colonel Wen in the second place of honour. Everyone else took their place in order of precedence for a grand banquet. The hall was filled with the sound of music. Although it may not have been a case of "roasting a dragon, boiling a phoenix" there is no doubt that the phrase "mountains of meat, oceans of wine" applied. Everyone got very drunk that day and staggered back to their quarters in the small hours. Another feast was organized for the day after, and all spoke freely and shed their cares, they told the story of their life and shared their innermost feelings. On the third day there was yet another feast, this time in honour of Marshal Su, which only broke up in the evening when they were all drunk.
Suddenly several days had gone by and Marshal Su expressed his intention of returning. Song Jiang and his friends pressed him to stay, but he said: "You don't understand. It is already several days since I set out to bring you the pardon. Righteousness will reign supreme if you all return promptly. But if I do not hasten back, I fear there is a real danger that evil tongues will wag and objections be raised."
Song Jiang and his friends said: "In that case we must not detain you, Marshal. Let us conclude today's celebrations, and early tomorrow we will accompany you down the mountain."
All the chiefs were present that day to honour the Marshal. While they drank, they expressed their thanks and the Marshal likewise used flattering words. The party broke up late. Next morning bright and early horses and carts were made ready, and Song Jiang with his own hands carried a tray of gold and jewels to the Marshal's quarters and respectfully presented it. The Marshal refused to take it. Not till the third time of asking would he accept. Clothes were packed, packs fastened, horses saddled and all prepared for the start. The Strategist and Lungs had been looking after the Marshal's followers for the last few days. They provided them according to custom with choice food and drink — wine to the limit of their capacity. All were richly rewarded as well with gold and silver and silk and none went away dissatisfied. Gold and jewels were also presented to Colonel Wen, who at first refused them, but relented at Song Jiang's insistence. Song Jiang now proposed Wen should return with the Marshal to the capital. All the chieftains assembled to see Marshal Su off to a rousing accompaniment of martial music. They went with him down the mountain, across the water at Golden Sands Landing and for a further ten miles of the road. Then they dismounted to share a stirrup cup. Song Jiang took the cup first and raising it said: "Please speak well of us, Your Excellency, when you see the Emperor again."
The Marshal replied: "You may rest easy on that count. Just make sure you pack up and return to court as soon as possible. When you bring your troops to the capital, send someone along to my residence first to let me know. I will petition the Emperor for an official reception; it will be a grand state occasion."
Song Jiang said: "Allow me to make one request, Your Excellency. A good many years have gone by in this place in the marshes, first under Wang Lun who built the stronghold on the mountain and then under Chao Gai and now myself. During this time the neighbouring folk have suffered no little inconvenience. Forgive my presumption, but I would like to redistribute our wealth by holding a ten day clearance sale. When we're done with this we will all of us return to the capital. I certainly do not want to delay. I hope you will convey this proposal to the Emperor and humbly request him to grant us an extension."
When the Marshal had given his consent they parted and the Marshal's group rode on to Jizhou, while Song Jiang and the rest returned to the stronghold where everyone was summoned by the drum to a meeting in the Ceremonial Hall. The leaders all took their seats and a great crowd of troops assembled below the platform. Song Jiang announced: "My friends, since the times when Wang Lun first built this fortress and Chao Gai drew up the ordinances, we have prospered exceedingly. Since the day you rescued me and brought me here from Jiangzhou and honoured me as leader, several years have passed. Today, thanks to the Emperor's pardon, we are permitted to appear before His Majesty again. Soon we must go to the capital and offer our services to the country. All of you who have items which belong in the stores should hand them in. The remaining valuables will be distributed equally. The one hundred and eight of us who are heavenly stars must live and die together. The Emperor has treated us with great benevolence, sending us his edict with an unconditional pardon and releasing us all from the consequences of crime. I and the rest of the one hundred and eight will soon head for the capital, in order not to disappoint the Emperor's great benevolence. Of the rest of you, there are some who became outlaws of their own choosing, some who followed their leaders to the mountain, some who are deserters from the army and some who are common robbers. Now that I and my companions have received the royal pardon, we must go to the court. If any of you wish to go with us your names will be added to the roll. If you do not wish to go then speak your name and we will here part company. I will personally pay you a gratuity and let you go down the mountain to live as you please."
When these orders had been given out Sterling and Magic Hand were appointed to draw up the lists. On receiving their instructions the three forces conferred separately. Of those who opted for leaving there were four or five thousand. Song Jiang paid them all off in money and goods and added a bonus. Those who opted to stay on reenlisted and their names were noted down. Next day Song Jiang told Magic Hand to write a notice and have it posted throughout the neighbourhood, in every district, village and hamlet, to inform all and sundry that they were invited to the mountain for a grand ten day disposal of goods. The notice was as follows:
Song Jiang and the company on Mount Liang wish it to be known by all and sundry: that that they are aware their presence in the region as outlaws has given rise to some inconvenience to the people. Recently in his graciousness the Emperor has granted them an amnesty. This is to inform the public that for the next ten days a clearance sale will be held. This is a genuine offer and all who come will be rewarded. The purpose of this announcement is to let all know, near and far. All are welcome.
Issued the nth day of the third month of the fourth year of Xuan Ho by Song Jiang and company of the Marshes of Mount Liang
When Magic Hand had finished the notice someone was sent to post it up everywhere immediately. Part of the cash and valuables and silk and other articles in the treasury was divided among the leaders, officers and men, a portion was set aside as a contribution to the nation, and the remainder was piled up in the stronghold for the ten day clearance which lasted from the third of the third month to the thirteenth. Oxen and sheep were slaughtered and wine was warmed in order to feast all who came to the mountain and to reward their servants. When the time came the locals flocked to the mountain stronghold with baskets and cases. Song Jiang ordered them to be compensated tenfold and all left the mountain well contented, after prostrating themselves to express their gratitude.
The general clearance went on for ten consecutive days. At the end of this period it ended and everyone was ordered to settle their affairs and repair to the capital for their audience with the Emperor. At this point Song Jiang wanted to send all the families home. But the Professor objected: "You shouldn't do that. Keep our families here in the stronghold till after our audience with the Emperor. When His Majesty has shown proof of his favour it will be time enough to send our families home." Song Jiang had to agree. "Your advice is good," he said. The order was issued for all the leaders to get packed up right away and muster their men. Song Jiang and the others hastily stirred themselves and went to Jizhou to thank Governor Zhang. The latter arranged a banquet for them and distributed rewards among the army. Song Jiang and his companions then said goodbye to the Governor and set out from the city with a vast host, heading for the Eastern Capital. Magic Messenger and the Prodigy were ordered on ahead to let Marshal Su know of their coming. On hearing the news Marshal Su went in to tell the Emperor that Song Jiang and his companions were on their way. This intelligence gladdened the Emperor's heart and he told the Marshal, together with one of the Emperor's defence council to ride out of the city to meet them in full armour and carrying banners. Marshal Su rode forth with the Emperor's mandate.

Song Jiang's forces were travelling in excellent order. In front came two red banners. On one were the words "To Do Heaven's Will", on the other the words "For the Defence of the Realm". All the leaders were dressed in full armour except for the Professor who wore the silk kerchief made famous by Zhuge Liang and a robe of feathers, Taoist Gongsun, who wore a robe trimmed with crane's down, Monk Lu Zhishen with a cassock of fiery red and Pilgrim Wu Song in a fresh black one. The remainder were in battle array, each wearing the colour of his choice. They tarried not one day on the road, and when they were approaching the capital they learnt of the Emperor's representative coming out to greet them. When Song Jiang heard, he rode forward with his commanders to meet Marshal Su and then halted his army outside New Gate where they bivouacked, awaiting the Emperor's com-mand. Marshal Su and the official returned to the city and reported to His Majesty: "Song Jiang and his army are encamped outside New Gate, Sire. They await your orders."

The Emperor said: "We have heard that Song Jiang and his friends number one hundred and eight, that they represent heavenly powers and are moreover of a brave and martial spirit. Now they wish to surrender and are returning to the capital. Tomorrow we will repair with the whole court to the Tower of Illustrious Virtue. Let Song Jiang and his friends be informed that they should dress in full battle array and enter the city, with a limited number of troops, say a maximum of five thousand infantry and cavalry. Let them travel from west to east and we will review them. Let the people honour them as servants of the realm. Afterwards they are to remove their armour and change into the silk robes which have recently been presented to them, and pass through the Gate of Eastern Splendour to the Hall of Culture and Ethics where I will give them audience."

The imperial aide went to the camp outside the city and relayed the Emperor's wishes to Song Jiang and his friends. Next day Song Jiang ordered Sterling to select five hundred of the strongest and fittest infantrymen and, with gongs, drums and banners marching at the front followed by troops armed with spears, swords, battle-axes or halberds and rising from their midst the two red banners which said "To Do Heaven's Will" and "For the Defence of the Realm" and the remaining troops all carrying swords or bows and arrows and each man wearing his personal body armour, drawn up in their companies, they entered by the Eastern Gate. Then the people of the city, civilians and military, with their families, young and old, turned out to watch, as if gazing upon the gods.

The Emperor now led his courtiers to the Tower of Illustrious Virtue and entered the pavilion to watch. There were the gongs, drums and standards drawn up in front, followed by the various companies carrying spears, swords, battle-axes and halberds. There were two on white horses bearing the two red banners "To Do Heaven's Will" and "For the Defence of the Realm" and also twenty or thirty mounted musicians. Behind them came the gallant company of heroes. Here is how it was as they entered the palace compound for their audience with the Emperor:

A light breeze blows at the foot of the jade steps; the incense burners are misted with dew. The sun is just starting to rise in the east; to the north the sky's veil is half rolled back. Beyond the Gate of Southern Fragrance are waiting the one hundred and eight who are returning to the fold: before the Tower of Illustrious Virtue a million throats salute the Sovereign. All is done in accordance with solemn court ceremonial and strict military discipline. Wind, rain, sun and stars bear witness to the clearing of the heavens; lightning and thunder no longer disturb the sky's serenity. Before the imperial watchtower a thousand spirits have assembled: viz, saints, immortals, nachas, doorgods, kings of Hell, infernal judges, gateway spirits — all the way down to rakshasas and goblins, each one of them looking up to the Emperor; under the phoenix tower a deadly array of beasts have gathered: as, tiger-cats, leopards, unicorns, chimaeras, dingoes, golden eagles, hawks, turtles, apes, right down to dogs, rats, snakes and scorpions, all of them acknowledging the Lord of Song. Present are the five dragon powers of the universe: namely, the cloud dragon, the river dragon, the forest dragon, the nine-striped or tattooed dragon and the one-horned or unicorn dragon, and with them the cave dragon and the river beast or river rider, all obedient to the court. The various tigers have come down from the mountain: the winged tiger, the river-jumping tiger, the elegant tiger, the ornate tiger, the green-eyed tiger, the smiling tiger, the short-legged tiger, the wounded or scarface tiger, the pill toting tiger, the mother tiger, all in due order paying homage. Naturally the nobility are represented, as court etiquette dictates. More surprising is the inclusion of militiamen, doctors, craftsmen, boatmen and the like. Many grave gentlemen are present, bearded and whiskered: but would you have expected to see these judges, these womenfolk, these sons and heirs, these monks and pilgrims? There are military officers and civilian officials of every rank, there are replicas of many famous characters of antiquity. There are the good-looking ones, like Whitey with his elegant flower, with his flute, his fan, his drum and his flag, as if poised to burst into song and dance. There are those whom fortune has not favoured with looks, like the Blue-Faced Beast, with a countenance ugly as sin, but adept with lance and sword, happiest in the strife of battle. Some are immensely tall, like Perilous; some quarrelsome, like the Guv, or the Tamer of Three Mountains. Some have brown hair, some green eyes, all are honourable. They touch the sky, they leap the waves, not one follows the paths of duplicity and cunning. Admitted now to the presence of the Monarch, they no longer have to live unrecognized or "Name-less"! The barriers set against them now dismantled, this day they can truly be called "Unstoppable"! Here they come now, this great company, masters of sword and staff play, ready to take on all these corrupt courtiers who cheat honest men and oppress the people. See them march, the righteous, basking in their sovereign's favour, about to reap their reward!

So there was the Emperor with all his courtiers in the Tower of Illustrious Virtue watching the parade led by Song Jiang of the Marshes of Mount Liang. The imperial countenance broke into a smile, indicating how His Majesty's heart was gladdened, and turning to his courtiers he said: "What a brave show these fellows make!" His enthusiasm knew no bounds.

A senior palace official now brought Song Jiang and his company the order to change into the newly gifted silk clothing, for their audience with the Emperor. He told them to remove their battle gear outside the Eastern Gate and don the red and green silk robes with gold and silver insignia that the Emperor had presented to them, and the court headdress and the green court shoes. The only exceptions were Taoist Gongsun who had used the red silk for the official robe of a Taoist priest, Monk Lu Zhishen in his monk's garb, and Pilgrim Wu Song who changed into a new cassock. All of them were showing off the imperial gifts. With Song Jiang and the Unicorn at the head, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun close behind, the whole company processed through the Gate of Eastern Splendour.

The strictest court procedure was followed that day. The imperial carriage had been prepared and in the early morning the Emperor arrived at the Hall of Culture and Ethics. The Master of Protocol led Song Jiang and his companions one by one into the court where they all lined up to do obeisance. After the usual court ceremonies and three cheers for the Emperor, His Majesty graciously invited them all to enter the Hall of Culture and Ethics and bade them be seated in due order. An imperial banquet was ordered, to be laid in the Temple of Official Salaries. The finest imperial wine and rarest delicacies were supplied for this and a musical accompaniment. The Emperor graciously joined them at table.

Thus did the Emperor honour Song Jiang and his companions in a banquet which did not break up till the small hours. After expressing their thanks they went in with flowers in their hair and all mounted outside the Gate of Western Splendour and returned to their camp.

Next day they returned to the city and processed to the Hall of Culture and Ethics to express thanks again. The imperial countenance showed pleasure: His Majesty desired to advance them and told them to return next day to learn of their appointments. They thanked him and returned to camp. Of this no more.

Now officials of the Military Council unanimously advised: "Those who are only recently pardoned and have as yet contributed nothing should not be promoted so rapidly. It were best to wait till they have given proof of their loyalty and performed some meritorious service before offering them official posts. At present they are numbered in thousands and have pitched camp close to the capital, which is most undesirable. Your Majesty should deal thus with Song Jiang and his armies: those generals who were originally lured from the imperial armies can return to their posts; troops from outside should return to where they came from; the remainder can be formed into five divisions and transferred to Shandong and Hebei. That is our advice."

Next day the Emperor's envoy went to Song Jiang's camp and relayed the Emperor's decision that Song Jiang's forces were to be broken up and returned to their home provinces. The leaders were highly incensed: "We have voluntarily offered our allegiance but we have received no office in return and now they want to separate us. But we vowed to live and die together, we will not consent! If that is really what they want, we had better return to Mount Liang!" Song Jiang hurriedly called a halt to all this and using honourable words of entreaty, begged the envoy to convey his request to the Emperor.

The envoy returned to the court. He did not dare conceal anything from the Emperor but reported exactly what had been said. The Emperor was concerned and hurriedly summoned the members of the Military Council. The President of the Council, Marshal Tong said, "Even though they've surrendered, they have not changed their spots, blast them! This presages great ills for the country. In my humble opinion, it would be best for your Majesty to have them lured into the capital and then exterminated, all one hundred and eight of them. Then their armies can be split up. This way, greater ills will be prevented."

On hearing this, the Emperor hummed and hawed for a long time. Suddenly an important official burst out from behind a palace screen wearing a red robe and carrying ivory tablets. He shouted: "On all sides the warning beacons blaze, evil threatens in our midst, all because of evil counsellors your reign's like to be ruined." Indeed I who was a pillar of the nations was coming to the rescue of I before whom heaven shakes and the earth moves.

Song Jiang is Ordered to Smash the Liao Tartars; At Chen Bridge Station, Weeping, he Executes a Subordinate & the Quay is littered with corpses

That year the king of the Liao Tartars dispatched his armies over the mountains. First they occupied nine border prefectures. Then, in four columns, they swept down and pillaged Shandong, Shanxi, Henan and Hebei. Every prefecture and county sent petitions to the throne pleading for rescue. All such documents had to pass through the hands of Tong Guan, Chancellor of Military Affairs. He talked it over with Prime Minister Cai Jing, Marshal Gao Qiu and Marshal Yang Jian, and they decided not to forward the petitions. They only notified a few neighboring prefectures and urged them to send reinforcements and relief. This was as futile as trying to fill a well with snow. People knew about it, but they kept the facts from the emperor.

Then, the four crooked ministers hatched a scheme. They arranged for Tong Guan to propose to the sovereign a means that would destroy Song Jiang and his men. They hadn't expected that another important minister would intervene. The man who hurried out from behind the screen was Marshal Su Yanjing, and he appealed directly to the emperor.

"Your Majesty! Song Jiang and his bold fellows have just surrendered. The hundred and eight of them are extremely close and devoted. They'd never agree to being separated. They'd rather die, first. And now, some people want to have them killed! These gallant men are extremely brave and intelligent. If, when you bring them into the city, they rise up in revolt, then what? How will you deal with them?

"The Liao Tartars have occupied nine border prefectures with a hundred thousand troops, and every county is petitioning for relief. We have sent some units, but it's been like splashing water on ants. The enemy is too powerful. Our forces can't cope with them. We've lost every engagement. All this news has been kept from you.
